THE colony of Georgia was not conceived in the bold, adventurous spirit of enterprising individuals, who merely sought the gratification of their own selfish ends, but, on the contrary, in the sufferings of a large class of British subjects; and the enterprise that culminated in a charter from the crown was the result of a legislative measure enacted for the relief of these sufferers. The colony of Georgia, therefore, was the only one of the original thirteen colonies along the Atlantic coast that derived its existence through the legislative functions of the government; and not only is this fact recalled with pride and pleasure by Georgians, but especially do they recall with satisfaction the feelings of kindness and humanity in which the enterprise originated.

In order to fully comprehend the scope and nature of the movement that resulted in the colony of Georgia, it is necessary to review the hardships of the debtor class in England and the rise to prominence of their illustrious benefactor, Gen. Oglethorpe, who espoused their cause in the house of commons. It was Gen. Oglethorpe who conceived the idea of compromising with their creditors and of giving them a fresh start in the new world. Under the rigid enforcement of the iron laws that governed the relationship existing between debtor and creditor the former class had become the objects of legislative persecution, and many were the distinguished victims who fell prey to this cruel injustice. If perchance a debtor was unable to meet his obligations, or varied even in the merest detail from the stipulations of his contract, he was rudely thrown in prison as a punishment for the crime imputed to him, and thus permitted to suffer without regard to the excuse rendered, or to such considerations as his physical health or social respectability. No discrimination was made by the law between the honest and the dishonest insolvent, and all who failed to meet its rigid requirements were treated as common thieves and placed on the same scale of criminal equality. Hundreds of the best men in England, representing the culture, genius and respectability of the kingdom, were thus placed under the proscription of a law that blighted their reputation without good and sufficient reason. But this was not all; the operation of the law did not end with the public disgrace to which the hapless victim was upheld, but continued to oppress him within the walls of the prison. The rules by which these torture-dens of oppression were conducted ignored the religious atmosphere of England, and recalled the pre-historic days of barbarism and brutality. The jail officials were monsters of inhumanity, who were utterly deficient in both sense and sympathy. They were the mere hirelings of justice, who tortured the inmates of the prison with a grim delight that seemed to revel in the privilege of applying the lash. But these were scarcely better than the judges who disgraced the bench by the acceptance of bribes and costly presents, and who degraded justice into mercenary traffic. This cruel order of things existed in England for a number of years, but happily for her subjects the obnoxious law was subsequently annulled, and her prison life purified. This reign of terror is now recalled by Englishmen as perhaps the darkest blot on the fair page of their country's civilization.

GEN. OGLETHORPE'S PLAN.

A man whose strong sympathies made him the friend of the unfortunate debtor, and whose broad intellect speedily grasped the situation with a realizing sense of its injustice, was Gen. James Edward Oglethorpe, the founder of the colony of Georgia.

Gen. Oglethorpe was an Englishman of noble birth and distinguished ancestry. He was born in the parish of St. James, Westminster, on June 1, 1689, and was the third son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe. He received his early training at Oxford, after which he entered the military service, having acquired the martial instinct from his father, who was a distinguished officer under James II. His promotion in the army was rapid, and his signal courage displayed on the continent soon gave him a pronounced reputation for soldierly conduct both at home and abroad. On his return to England he succeeded to the family estate at Westbrook, and after a few years, in 1722, he was elected to the house of commons as a member from the county of Surrey. According to the records he was intrusted with the representation of this county for thirty-two years. At the beginning of his political career Gen. Oglethorpe evinced a decided feeling of sympathy for the unfortunate debtors, and his labors were chiefly devoted to the amelioration of their distresses. His avowed championship soon gave him a conspicuous place, and made him one of the prominent figures of the house of commons. As the result of this attitude Gen. Oglethorpe was made the chairman of a special committee to visit the prisons, and, after a thorough examination into their rules and regulations as they concerned the care and treatment of inmates, to make a full report to the house, suggesting practical measures of reform. Gen. Oglethorpe performed his duty well, and as the result of this investigation of the prisons and his exposure of the manner in which they were conducted, he succeeded in convincing the government that a radical change was necessary and that speedy measures should be adopted for their purification.

Thus engaged in the study of prison life in England, and especially of a method for relieving the unfortunate debtor who, though honestly insolvent, was made a victim of legal persecution, it occurred to Gen. Oglethorpe, as if by inspiration, that the fitting out of an expedition to the new world for the purpose of establishing a colony was the key to the situation. Convinced of the feasibility of his plan he lost no time in taking the preliminary steps. His attention was drawn to the lands lying between the Altamaha and the Savannah rivers as an excellent site for his contemplated colony. The British subjects in Carolina were anxious to secure a neighbor to the south of them in order to prevent the incursions of the Indians upon their territory, and to aid them in successfully defying these ruddy natives of the forest.

Lord Percival was informed of this scheme by Gen. Oglethorpe, and other noblemen were taken into consultation. It was explained that the purpose of the expedition was not to relieve those who were righteously imprisoned for the repudiation of their debts, nor for those who merely submitted to a brief imprisonment in order to secure an unmolested title to their shamefully acquired wealth. The object of the enterprise was simply to befriend the honest and worthy inmates of these prisons, who would demonstrate their desert of such clemency by the character of their exertions in the new world. Accordingly a memorial was addressed to the privy council in which the enterprise was fully stated. It was further urged that the care of these indigent debtors was a burden to the public, and that to colonize the better portion of them in America would not only be a relief to the treasury of the kingdom, but would give these debtors an opportunity to make a fresh start, besides strengthening the British possessions on the continent. The petitioners agreed to take a personal charge of the expedition, and to safely conduct the emigrant party to the lands that might be granted to them by the crown. They proposed to establish a plantation, to be owned and regulated by the government, in such a manner as the government might prescribe. The petition was favorably considered, and after passing through the usual channels, received the legal sanction, and a charter was accordingly framed by the advocates of the measure and signed by his majesty George II. on June 9, 1732.

GEORGIA'S COLONIAL CHARTER.

In substance the charter recited, by way of preliminary exposition, a full inventory of the reasons that were urged upon the crown in support of the enterprise of Gen. Oglethorpe. The special reasons emphasized were those of establishing more firmly the British possessions in America, increasing the trade and wealth of the kingdom, and the necessary defense of the colony of South Carolina, exposed to the slaughter and depredation of the red men.

The territory conveyed by the charter embraced all the lands "lying and being in that part of South Carolina, in America, from the northern part of a stream or a river there commonly called the Savannah, all along the sea coast to the southward, unto the most southern stream of a certain other great water or river called the Altamaha, and westerly from the heads of the said rivers respectively in direct lines to the South seas; and all that share, circuit and precinct of land within the said boundaries, with the islands on the sea lying opposite to the eastern coast of said lands, within twenty leagues of the same, which was not inhabited already or settled by any authority derived from the crown of Great Britain."

It was further stipulated in the terms of the grant that a yearly sum of four shillings should be paid on each hundred acres of land which the corporation should grant, demise, plant and settle; but that no payment should commence or be made until ten years after such grant, demise, planting or settling; that the province should be designated by the name of Georgia, and that for a period of twenty-one years from the date of the charter the corporation should have power to enact laws for the government and regulation of the colony, not repugnant to the laws and statutes of England.

The transaction of the ordinary affairs of the colony was lodged with the common council, and this body was given the power to receive and disburse the moneys of the corporation; to use the common seal in the execution of necessary contracts; to nominate a treasurer, secretary and other important officers; to fix salaries; and to administer oaths for the faithful performance of duty. The creation of this council was to obviate the difficulty of bringing together the entire corporation in carrying on the business of the colony.

In consideration of the reasons for granting the charter the following named subjects were designated as members of the corporation, appointed by the crown: John, Lord Viscount Percival, of the Kingdom of Ireland, Edward Digby, George Carpenter, James Oglethorpe, George Heathcote, Thomas Tower, Robert Moor, Robert Hucks, Roger Holland, William Sloper, Francis Eyles, John Laroche, James Vernon, Wm. Beletha, Esqs., John Burton, Richard Bundy, Arthur Beaford, Samuel Smith and Adam Adamson, Gentlemen, and such other persons to be elected in the manner subsequently prescribed, to be known as "The Trustees for Establishing the Colony of Georgia in America."

Lord Percival was named as the first president of the corporation, and he was required to convene the corporators within thirty days for the purpose of getting ready for the expedition. A common council of fifteen was also designated by the charter to transact business in behalf of the corporation. Provision was made for subsequent additions to the council, and Edward Digby was selected as the first chairman.

In keeping with the unselfish and benevolent nature of the enterprise, both the president of the corporation and the chairman of the common council were forbidden to receive pay in compensation for their services either directly or indirectly. Each officer, before entering upon the discharge of his duties, was required to take a solemn and binding oath, obligating himself to perform the duties of his office faithfully.

An important duty enjoined upon the corporation, under the provisions of the charter, was to present a written report each year, addressed to the proper officers of the crown, showing an itemized statement of all transactions and expenditures of money by the colony.

The privilege of transporting British subjects to America was granted by the charter, and also all foreigners who were willing to take the oath of allegiance and become true and loyal subjects of Great Britain. Religious liberty was accorded to all who might avail themselves of the expedition, except the Catholics. In brief, without going into details, the charter provided for the comfort, proper maintenance and protection of all who should join the emigrating party; and the privilege of taking with them agricultural implements, cattle, provisions, furniture, firearms, and munitions of war, in addition to such merchandise as they might need in carrying on negotiations with the natives, were all granted to the corporation in behalf of the colonists. It was further provided in the charter that, after the expiration of twenty-one years, a new and substantial form of government should be adopted in lieu of this provisional one.

THE COLONY STARTS FOR THE NEW WORLD.

A meeting was held by the corporation for the purpose of accepting the charter in July, 1732. This was followed by several others in rapid succession. The officers of the corporation as provided for in the charter were duly elected and qualified, and the Bank of England was selected as the custodian of all moneys subscribed in furtherance of the enterprise. It is important, as well as interesting, to observe in this connection, the character of the seal adopted. On one side of the instrument two figures were represented, each reclining against an urn from which issued a stream, signifying the two rivers that formed the upper and lower boundaries of the province in America. Each figure held in its hand a spade, suggestive of the agricultural employment that would engage the attention of the settlers. Above these figures was seated a goddess, who impersonated the genius of the colony, holding in her right hand a spear and in her left hand a cornucopia, signifying protection and plenty. In the background stood a tree, and above it was written this inscription: "Colonia Georgia Aug." The purpose of this face of the seal was to attest all deeds and commissions as well as to give proper authentication to legislative acts. The other face of the seal represented a lot of silk-worms with this engraving: "Non Sibi Sed Aliis," the literal meaning of this motto being "Not for Ourselves but for Others." This face of the seal was to be used for all grants, orders and certificates. It was thought at the time of the adoption of this seal that the cultivation of silk would be the controlling industry on account of the number of mulberry trees supposed to abound in the locality.

The charter having been procured, a committee of citizens was appointed to bring the enterprise before the people and solicit contributions in behalf of the colony. The liberal sum of £10,000 was donated by parliament, in addition to large subscriptions from private individuals and benevolent associations. Before the enterprise was fairly launched the heart of England was deeply stirred in behalf of the unfortunate class who had been so long the subject of discriminating legislation. The offer of the trustees to defray the expenses of all who wished to embark for the new world, the permission of their creditors having been obtained, met with general acceptance on the part of the oppressed debtors, and many worthy foreigners, in addition to large numbers of poor people, were prevailed upon to join the expedition. They listened to the glowing descriptions that were given to them of the new country, and their imaginations began to picture it as a land of peace and plenty in which they would have no occasion to revert to their former ills except to contrast them with their contented and happy lot.

In the regulations that were drawn up by the trustees each man was regarded as a planter and a soldier. He was not only charged with the cultivation of the soil but also with its defense and protection. It was adjudged that fifty acres of land would be sufficient for himself and his family and this was to be held by him as a military fief. It was provided that no African slaves should be introduced into the colony, but this provision was afterward rescinded. A number of regulations were prescribed, in pursuance of the charter, including the tenure of land by estates in tail, and for life only, in order to prevent confusion. The colonist had the privilege of naming his heir if he died without male issue. The lands were to be cultivated within a certain time or forfeited.

By the time the expedition was ready to start the number of emigrants enrolled was one hundred and fourteen, including men, women and children. Gen. Oglethorpe was appointed to command the expedition and to superintend the planting of the colony. A vessel was comfortably fitted up and provided with all the supplies that were needed for the voyage. In going with the emigrants Gen. Oglethorpe volunteered to bear his own expenses, and to give to the enterprise the unremitting service of his hands and heart. The last Sabbath in England was spent by the emigrants on the banks of the historic Thames. They held devotional exercises and passed the day in prayer and meditation.

On Nov. 17 the vessel weighed anchor and started on its watery journey. The name of the ship was the "Anne," commanded by Capt. Thomas. It numbered thirty-five families and one hundred and thirty persons, including Gen. Oglethorpe, Dr. Henry Herbert, an Episcopal clergyman, and a man by the name of Amatis who was to instruct the emigrants in the cultivation of silk. The weather for the trip was unusually good, and the emigrant vessel reached Charleston Harbor on Jan. 13, 1733. Only two children died at sea. The other members of the party landed in safety.

Gen. Oglethorpe and his crew were cordially received by the governor of South Carolina and pledges of hearty support and co-operation were extended to him. The next morning Gen. Oglethorpe returned to the "Anne" and set sail with his crew for Port Royal. Leaving the colonists at Beaufort he proceeded with Col. Wm. Bull to the Savannah river and explored that stream as far as Yamacraw bluff. His eye at a glance comprehended the situation, and he proceeded at once to mark off the new town and to give it the name of Savannah. The height of the bluff was forty feet and extended for nearly a mile along the river. It was covered with pines, live-oaks and magnolias, and presented a beautiful and pleasing prospect to the eye of the noble-hearted Englishman. The bluff extended for several miles to the west. It overlooked the broad expanse of the Carolina lowlands which contained the delta of the Savannah river and presented a gorgeous picture to the morning sun.

TOMO-CHI-CHI, THE INDIAN CHIEF.

In the immediate neighborhood of the spot on which Gen. Oglethorpe landed, and occupying a part of the bluff, stood an Indian village, and here lived Tomo-chi-chi, the aged chief or Mico of the Yamacraws. A Carolina trader by the name of Musgrove, whose wife was a half-breed Indian, had established a trading post with the natives, at this point; and before returning to his party Gen. Oglethorpe decided, if possible, to obtain communication with the old chief. He accordingly paid Tomo-chi-chi a visit for the purpose of securing his friendship in behalf of the colony, and to make known to the chief his own friendly intentions. Mary Musgrove, the wife of the trader, who was kindly disposed to Gen. Oglethorpe, acted as interpreter for them, and used her influence with the old chief to accomplish the purpose of the Englishman. At the beginning of the interview the Indian chief was disposed to be uneasy, but he was soon persuaded of the benefits to be derived from the immigration of the English, and was led to look upon it with extreme favor before the conversation was concluded.

Having thus treated with the Yamacraws, Gen. Oglethorpe lost no time in returning to the emigrants who awaited him at Beaufort. He conducted the colonists through a blinding and bitter storm to the bluffs on which he himself had landed a few weeks before; and thus the early settlement of Georgia commenced. No time was lost by the colonists in transferring their supplies to land. They began to fell the trees and to busy themselves in the erection of rude huts for their provisional shelter and protection. They were greatly aided by volunteers who came over from South Carolina to help them along until they could manage to plant the colony upon a secure foundation. Religious exercises were held by Gen. Oglethorpe in gratitude to God for the safe landing of the emigrants, after which he implored his followers to guard against the evils of intemperance and idleness, and to so conduct themselves as to be a blessing and not a curse to the red men. In laying off the streets of the new town, Gen. Oglethorpe was ably assisted by Col. Bull, and for that gentleman one of the streets was named. It is now the leading thoroughfare of Savannah and is beautified by many handsome monuments. For nearly a year Gen. Oglethorpe, as an evidence of his desire to share in the common hardships of the colony, occupied a rude tent on the bluff overlooking the Savannah river. Seated in his camp on Feb. 10, 1733, he indited his second letter to the trustees, in which he gave a full account of the expedition after leaving Charleston, and the circumstances connected with the landing. He described the situation minutely, enclosing a key to the town, and also letters from the governor and council of South Carolina. He also expressed his obligations to Col. Bull and others for a loan of servants in addition to their personal help.

In his next letter, written the following month, Gen. Oglethorpe expressed his surprise at finding the province much larger than he had supposed. He had measured the distance between the Savannah and the Altamaha rivers and found it to be 120 miles. He described the Indians and also the general features of the country, and closed by saying that old Tomo-chi-chi was a regular attendant at church, and had given his nephew to him to rear in the faith of the Christian religion. Gen. Oglethorpe was regarded by the settlers as a father to them, and they looked up to him not only with respect but with love and veneration.

Having no machinery the work of building homes for the settlers proceeded slowly. One by one, however, the little frame houses began to rise, and the colonists with a pride in their new homes commenced to cultivate their surrounding lots and, in the midst of a wild and cheerless country, to grow the bloom and beauty of an English civilization. In gratitude to the colony of South Carolina for the kind assistance extended to the emigrants Gen. Oglethorpe paid a visit to Charleston, and was received with a cordial demonstration. He expressed his gratitude, in behalf of the young colony, in a very graceful speech and pledged to South Carolina, in all her undertakings, his hearty support and co-operation.

The traditional account of the treaty between Gen. Oglethorpe and the old Mico, Tomo-chi-chi, is interesting. As soon as the colonists arrived, under the leadership of Gen. Oglethorpe, they were met on the bluff by the chief himself, in company of his wife and a retinue of Indians. In front of the chief advanced the medicine man, bearing in his hands a fan of white feathers, emblematic of the peace and friendship that would always exist between them under the terms of the treaty. The chief, at this time, was ninety-one years old, but he was still erect and possessed a commanding influence over the neighboring tribes. A convention of all the chiefs was subsequently called and, at the instance of Tomo-chi-chi, it was agreed that no harm should befall the colony as long as they could prevent it. In view of the perilous situation of the young colony, between the Spaniards on the south and the Indians to the north and west, in addition to the hardships incident to pioneer life, the colony would never have survived its infant struggles without the favor and friendship of the red men; and both the wisdom of Gen. Oglethorpe and the magnanimity of the old Indian chief deserve to be commended.

EARLY STRUGGLES OF THE COLONY.

The numerical strength of the colony was increased by the arrival of a new emigrant ship, the "James," bringing seventeen passengers in May, 1733. The vessel was commanded by Capt. Yoakley and contained a lot of additional supplies for the colony. The new emigrants were given a hearty welcome by the settlers. No uneasiness or alarm disturbed the peaceful life of the colony for several months. In wise provision, however, against the possibility of harm in the future, it was deemed prudent by Gen. Oglethorpe to begin the erection of a fort on the Ogeechee river at a point where the Indians usually crossed in carrying on their hostile relations with South Carolina. To the new military post he gave the name of Fort Argyle, in honor of his friend, the Duke of Argyle. A large number of families were immediately transferred from Savannah to this neighborhood for the purpose of strengthening the fortification. This was the second settlement made in Georgia. Fort Argyle was located near the mouth of the Ogeechee river about eighteen miles from Savannah.

In the neighborhood of Savannah a number of small villages were started, but they lacked the concentration of strength that was needed to give them life and vigor, and hence they declined. As a further protection to the colony a small fort was erected at Thunderbolt on St. Augustine creek. A light-house was constructed on Tybee island and here also a guard was posted for security. As the number of emigrants increased, plantations were assigned to them along the several water courses in the neighborhood of Savannah and on the islands in the vicinity. On July 7, 1733, Gen. Oglethorpe called a meeting of the colonists for the purpose of giving names to the streets and parks, and also to make such divisions of the town as might serve to better advantage the purposes of government. The town was divided into four wards: Percival, Decker, Heathcote and Derby, in honor of the friends of Gen. Oglethorpe, who assisted his enterprise and who belonged to the nobility. Each ward was subdivided into four tithings and to each of these appropriate names were given. The public square was called Johnson square, in honor of Gov. Johnson of South Carolina. To the streets running north and south the names of Abercorn, Drayton, Bull and Whitaker were given. The streets crossing at right angles were designated as Bay, Bryan and St. Julian. In the middle of Johnson square a large sun-dial was erected. This spot is now marked by a handsome shaft erected to the memory of Gen. Nathaniel Greene. The town lots were intended simply as sites for private dwellings. In addition to one of these town lots, sixty by ninety feet, each settler received a garden spot of five acres in the neighborhood and a farm containing forty-four acres and a fraction, making in all the total prescribed in the regulations of the colony. Judges were appointed and courts of justice established with the proper officers attached.

A few days after this public meeting was held a colony of forty Jews landed at Savannah, having received the permission of the trustees. Much dissatisfaction was caused by their arrival, but the Jews were permitted to remain and they were soon absorbed into the life of the growing colony. The formal deeds conveying the requisite amount of property to each settler were executed in proper form on July 7, 1733.

The next movement of Gen. Oglethorpe was to make a survey of the southern frontier of the province in order to form an estimate of the defense needed to protect the colony against the Spaniards. To one of the islands on the coast below St. Simon he gave the name of Jekyll island, in honor of Sir Joseph Jekyll. During this expedition he selected sites for the future defenses of the frontier to which the names of New Wilderness and Frederica were given. Gen. Oglethorpe returned to Savannah greatly pleased with his trip. The funds for meeting the expenses of the colony were nearly exhausted by this time, but they were shortly replenished by a handsome appropriation from the general government.

In the spring of 1734 a large colony of Salzburgers landed at Savannah on board the "Purisburg." These worthy settlers came from Germany, where they had been the objects of bitter persecution on account of their religion. They applied to the trustees and were given the privilege of coming to Georgia provided they would become true subjects of the British crown. The colonists were given a warm welcome by Gen. Oglethorpe, and after a few days they made a settlement in what is now Effingham county. To this settlement they gave the name of Ebenezer, in recognition of the fact that God had helped them. The Salzburgers labored under many disadvantages and were largely dependent upon the bounty of the trustees. In the following year they were reinforced by the arrival of a new colony of their persecuted fellow countrymen.

Having been away from England for nearly fifteen months Gen. Oglethorpe decided to return home on a short visit. The colony was in a prosperous state and the frontiers of the province were well protected. He decided to carry with him old Tomo-chi-chi, his wife and nephew and five Indian chiefs, who gladly consented to make the trip with him. The trustees were delighted with the Indians and with the glowing account of Gen. Oglethorpe as to the growth and outlook for the young colony. The Indians were greatly amused and entertained by the revelations of the new world into which they were ushered, and numerous presents were heaped upon them by their admiring friends of the nobility. During their stay in London a portrait of Tomo-chi-chi and his nephew was sketched by one of the leading artists of the kingdom.

Gen. Oglethorpe was detained in England for several months after the departure of the Indians. He was engaged, however, in prosecuting the affairs of the colony, and was instrumental in sending over a colony of Swiss and Moravian settlers in January, 1735. These settled at Fort Argyle on the Ogeechee river. A colony of Scotch Highlanders was likewise sent over in the fall of the same year and located at New Inverness, on the Altamaha river. They gave to the district in which they settled the name of Darien.

For the purpose of introducing two important measures for the welfare of the colony Gen. Oglethorpe temporarily resumed his seat in parliament. One of these measures was to prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors into the colony, and the other the introduction of negro slaves. They were passed with the royal sanction but they failed to operate successfully, although wisely conceived. They served to place the colony at a great disadvantage, especially the prohibition of African slave labor, which was well adapted to the new and undeveloped country. New rules were adopted by the trustees for the regulation of the colony, which was fast growing and which called for important changes as experience and actual demonstration approved their expediency.

JOHN AND CHARLES WESLEY.

The success of Gen. Oglethorpe in planting the colony of Georgia and the hardships which he voluntarily endured in order to promote his enterprise soon gained for him a reputation not only in Great Britain but throughout the Christian world. His humane and liberal spirit, thus signalized by his success, became the toast of all Europe, and many sonnets were composed in honor of the illustrious soldier and statesman.

Among the companions of Gen. Oglethorpe, on his return to America, were two young men whose names were destined to become associated with the growth of Methodism in Georgia, John and Charles Wesley. In order to accompany Gen. Oglethorpe on his return voyage John Wesley gave up his position as a fellow in Lincoln college, Oxford, and decided to endure the hardships incident to missionary work in the new world. His brother, Charles Wesley, desired to accompany him, and Gen. Oglethorpe agreed to make him his private secretary, and also the secretary of Indian affairs. Rev. Samuel Quincey, who had been the resident missionary in Georgia, failed to give satisfaction and his commission was revoked on Oct. 10, 1735.

The vessel was delayed by adverse winds and it was not until Dec. 10 that the sails were lifted. It was a stormy and tempestuous voyage, but the trip was finally accomplished. Mr. Wesley was deeply impressed with the religious conduct of the German emigrants on board, and he immediately began the study of German in order to understand the character of these people more fully. On his return Gen. Oglethorpe found that much dissatisfaction had prevailed during his absence on account of the oppressive conduct of Thomas Causton, who was left in charge of the government. Under the direction of Gen. Oglethorpe, however, order was again restored.

The Germans who came over with Gen. Oglethorpe were permitted to join their fellow countrymen at Ebenezer. On a subsequent visit to Ebenezer it was found that the colony was not prospering on account of the sterile condition of the land. Gen. Oglethorpe at first opposed a change of location, but the Salz-burgers felt that a change was necessary, and in a short time the old settlement was abandoned for a new one near the Savannah river. The plan of the settlement was drawn by Gen. Oglethorpe and closely resembled that of Savannah. Shortly after his return Gen. Oglethorpe founded the colony of Frederica, on St. Simons island, at the mouth of the Altamaha river, named in honor of Frederick, Prince of Wales. This was in February, 1736. Here he constructed a fort and fixed his own place of residence. After commencing these military fortifications on the island Gen. Oglethorpe continued his tour of inspection. He visited all the new settlements and found them in a flourishing condition. Passing beyond Jekyll island he discovered a new body of land, to which he gave the name of Cumberland island in honor of the Duke of Cumberland. Here he located two forts, one on the northern extremity called Fort Andrews and one on the southern extremity called Fort Williams. This tour was of great advantage to Gen. Oglethorpe in his subsequent difficulties with the Spaniards, as it gave him a thorough knowledge of the country.

Before leaving the colony on his return voyage to England Gen. Oglethorpe had given instructions to lay out a military post further up the Savannah river. The name of Augusta was given to this new town. The first settler was Roger de Lacey, an Indian agent.

Gen. Oglethorpe's new secretary entered upon the discharge of his duties with zeal and earnestness, but he soon found that his lot was not a happy one, and a gradual estrangement sprung up between himself and Gen. Oglethorpe. The change was too decided for the young minister who was just from the cloisters, and who was accustomed to a more pronounced religious atmosphere than he found in the colony. A reconciliation, however, was afterward effected, though Mr. Wesley was never satisfied. In the summer of 1736 he resigned his commission, but Gen. Oglethorpe prevailed upon him to withdraw it. He returned to England, however, and his health declining, he was not permitted to cross the water. His resignation was tendered, therefore, and accepted. Mr. Wesley is the author of many familiar hymns that are sung to-day in the Christian world. It was Charles Wesley who suggested to Mr. Whitfield the establishment of an orphan asylum in Georgia.

Rev. John Wesley, the more distinguished of the two brothers, and known as the founder of Methodism, began his missionary work among the Indians. He held his first interview with Tomo-chi-chi on Feb. 14, 1736. The old chief explained to him that he was greatly perplexed by the French on the one hand and the Spaniards on the other, but he would be glad to call his people together. The chief was not impressed with the conduct of the white Christians, as they had been guilty of many acts that seemed to contradict their religion. Mr. Wesley was not encouraged by his work among the Indians. He was ignorant of their language and lacked the services of a good interpreter. He was, therefore, compelled to give up his work among them and devote his time to the Europeans. His labors in Savannah were characterized by intense zeal, and his sermons, though bold and vigorous denunciations, were marked by a peculiar eloquence, and hundreds flocked to hear him whenever it was known that he was going to preach. The first Sunday school in Georgia was organized by Mr. Wesley in Savannah, and in the weekly services that were held each Wednesday evening the germ of the Methodist church was planted. On account of Mr. Wesley's bold and fearless conduct in denouncing people, and especially his attitude with reference to certain members of his congregation, charges were preferred against him and these proved very damaging to his reputation. Mr. Wesley was deeply grieved by the charges against him and he determined to quit the province. Accordingly on Dec. 24, 1737, he sailed for England, never to return.

In his dealings with the Spaniards Gen. Oglethorpe was soon convinced of their hostile intentions. Accordingly he set out for England a second time in January, 1737. This was long before the troubles of Mr. Wesley commenced. The fortunes of the province began to waver at this time. The threatened invasion of the Spaniards which necessitated the return of Gen. Oglethorpe to England in order to procure arms and ammunition, and the hardships incident to pioneer life, were beginning to fret the colonists and they were sorely discouraged over the situation. Fifty-seven thousand acres of land had been granted to the settlers and five large towns had been established. Slave labor, however, was needed in order to compete with the other colonists, but this the trustees steadily refused.

DIFFICULTIES WITH THE SPANIARDS.

The fullness of time had now arrived for the Spaniards to assert their claim to the land occupied by the colony of Georgia. In their settlement of South Carolina the English derived their claim from the discovery of the Cabots, John and Sebastian, in 1497. The Florida peninsula was settled by the Spaniards, and the dividing line between the two discoveries was never fully determined. The early Spanish discoverers who explored the continent were Juan Ponce de Leon, a daring officer, who labored under the delusion that the fountain of youth existed among the flowers of this tropical country; and Ferdinand De Soto, who penetrated the wilds of the interior until he discovered the waters of the Mississippi. During this expedition De Soto marched through Georgia, camping near the site of the present city of Augusta and near the confluence of the Etowah and the Oostanaula rivers. Relics of this expedition have been preserved, and they have thrown considerable light on Georgia's pre-historic annals. These explorations of the Spaniards were made during the early part of the sixteenth century.

The new colony of Georgia thus planted between these hostile frontiers, though it served to strengthen the arm of South Carolina was not calculated, by any means, to appease the greed of the Spaniards. It was now time for Spain to assert her dominion and accordingly she raised the standard of war on Oct. 22, 1739. In the meantime Gen. Oglethorpe had returned from England and every precaution was taken for the defense of the frontier. Soldiers were distributed along the coast and each fort was strongly garrisoned. A conference was held with the Indians and the original treaty was confirmed.

Hostilities began by the introduction of spies who endeavored to excite a mutiny among the soldiers and to murder Gen. Oglethorpe. The design of the Spaniards, however, was intercepted, and the men who were appointed to execute it were tried and shot. An effort to incite insurrection among the negroes of South Carolina was also made and, though the movement failed, it served to put Gen. Oglethorpe more securely on his guard in showing him the dangerous character of the enemy.

In addition to the wily schemes of the Spaniards, Gen. Oglethorpe was menaced by a lack of enthusiasm and a spirit of discontent in his own camp. A number of the colonists were dissatisfied because of the refusal of the trustees to grant them a title to their lands in fee simple and to allow the importation of negro slaves. In consequence of this refusal the colony was in a wavering condition and there was little inclination on the part of the settlers to imperil their lives for such a restricted liberty. A petition was sent to the trustees at this critical juncture but they still refused. They sought, however, to pacify the discontented element by giving them a promise of speedy relief in a different direction.

On Oct. 5, 1739, Tomo-chi-chi, the old Indian chief, died. He had reached the advanced age of ninety-seven years and his dying exhortation to his people was to stand squarely by the English. His only regret in dying was that he was prevented from serving Gen. Oglethorpe in his war against the Spaniards. The death of the old Indian was calm and peaceful, and his soul passed out into the spirit land just as the red October sunset was beginning to shed its glory upon the forest and to give a crimson hue to the foliage. In the death of the old chief the colony realized a severe loss and he was mourned as if he had been one of their own countrymen.

Receiving orders to prosecute war against the Spaniards, who had committed a number of outrages along the frontier, Gen. Oglethorpe enlisted 1,000 Indians and started in pursuit of the enemy, routing them with great slaughter. On Dec. 1, 1739, he resolved to penetrate farther into Florida. The expedition succeeded, and after gaining possession of the St. John's river, he returned to Frederica. In May of the following year he collected 1,100 men and marched toward St. Augustine. He was reinforced on the way, however, by troops from South Carolina, and sending on a detachment in advance he hoped thereby to deceive the enemy. The movement failed, however, and many of the soldiers were either murdered or taken prisoners. Gen. Oglethorpe resolved to besiege the town, but after twenty days, on account of ill health, he was forced to abandon the siege and return to Frederica.

For several reasons the growth of the colony began to slacken and the trustees resolved upon a change of government. They made a division of the colony into two distinct counties—Savannah and Frederica. Each county was to be governed by a presiding officer, and the power of the courts was restricted to prevent them from oppressing the inhabitants. Two years later the two counties were consolidated.

In a final effort to overthrow the colony the Spaniards resolved to invade Georgia with a strong fleet. Seven thousand men and fifty-six vessels left Havana and started for the Georgia coast in the spring of 1742. They were met by Gen. Oglethorpe, however, in the sound near Cumberland island and driven back into the Florida waters. Gen. Oglethorpe returned to Frederica and sent to Charleston for immediate aid. On June 28 a fleet of thirty-six vessels, bearing 5,000 Spaniards, appeared near one of the islands, and raising the battle flag, proceeded to land on the southern extremity of the island. Gen. Oglethorpe had only 700 men, but he was momentarily expecting to be reinforced. On July 1 the first engagement occurred, but on account of the numerical weakness of his troops Gen. Oglethorpe suffered a severe defeat. It was found that two of his companies were missing and he was greatly concerned to know what had become of them. In the meantime, however, these companies retrieved the fortunes of the day by getting behind the Spaniards and secreting themselves in ambush along the road. As soon as the enemy came up they halted and stacked their guns. The signal was then given and a deadly fire of shot was poured upon the Spaniards. Two hundred and fifty of their men were killed. Gen. Oglethorpe hearing of the engagement immediately promoted the two officers. By a shrewd letter that was written to Gen. Oglethorpe in French, and addressed to one of his deserters who had fled into the Spanish camp and who would probably betray the weakness of his troops, unless intercepted, the desired effect was produced, and the Spaniards were given to understand that Gen. Oglethorpe was strongly reinforced and in possession of vast supplies of ammunition. The Spaniards were overcome with dismay, and setting fire to their camp they embarked on July 14, 1742. This concluded the Spanish difficulties, as the war between Spain and England across the water engaged the attention of the two countries and the colony was left serenely undisturbed.

Rev. George Whitfield came to Georgia just in advance of the Spanish invasion. From the two Wesleys he conceived the idea of establishing an orphan asylum in Georgia, and by his eloquent appeals he soon succeeded in raising the necessary funds. The asylum was located at Bethesda, and completed during the year 1741.

GEN. OGLETHORPE LEAVES THE COLONY.

In September, 1743, Gen. Oglethorpe left the colony, having watched its early growth and progress and having guided its affairs with consummate skill and ability. His departure from the province caused universal sorrow. The return of Gen. Oglethorpe to England was hastened by the diminution of his private fortune. In order to promote the welfare of the colony he had not only given up his seat in parliament but had even sacrificed a portion of his property. On account of certain charges that were made against him by one of his officers, Lieut.-Col. Cooke, he called for a thorough investigation soon after reaching England. As the result of this investigation the charges were pronounced false and without foundation and their author was given his dismissal from the army.

In 1745 the appointment of brigadier-general was conferred upon Gen. Oglethorpe by George II. during the war with France. During this same year he wedded Elizabeth Wright, the daughter of a wealthy baronet. Being called to meet the pretender, a close kinsman, he was commissioned with the title of major-general, and subsequently, on Feb. 22, 1747, he was still further promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general. Eighteen years after this he was made the commander-in-chief of all his majesty's forces. He was offered the command of the British troops in the revolutionary war, but he refused the offer partially on account of his advanced age and because his sympathies were largely enlisted in behalf of the colonies. He lived to see the colony of Georgia erected into a free state and forming a part of an independent nation. Among his personal friends he had numbered the intellectual men and women of Europe, among them Edmund Burke, Samuel Johnson, Oliver Goldsmith, Sir Joshua Reynolds and Hannah More. He survived all his contemporaries and, as a very singular coincidence, died at the advanced age of ninety-seven years, exactly that of Tomochi-chi, the old Indian chief who had greeted him on the bluffs of the New World. Gen. Oglethorpe was buried with national honors and a splendid memorial was subsequently erected over him. A more illustrious soldier, benefactor, Christian statesman and philanthropist never lived, and the fame of Gen. Oglethorpe is equally cherished by all Georgians and by all true Englishmen.

SLAVES INTRODUCED AND THE BOSOMWORTH CLAIM.

In spite of the frequent appeals that were made by the colonists the trustees persistently refused to allow the importation of negro slaves. They were strengthened in this position by letters received from the German settlers who differed in their views from the remainder of the colony. Finally, however, after several years had elapsed the eloquence of Rev. Geo. Whitfield, combined with the approval of the Salzburgers, prevailed upon the trustees. Resolutions stating the terms on which the colonists desired the importation of slaves were drawn up and read before the trustees on May 16, 1749. The petition was granted with a proviso that called for the proper treatment of the slaves and for their education and religious instruction. The cultivation of silk, though discontinued before the revolution, was one of the chief industries of the colony at this time. Rice and indigo were also cultivated.

The new era of growth that dawned upon the colony in the final concessions of the trustees was soon clouded by what is known as the "Bosomworth Claim." Thomas Bosomworth, a minister sent out by the trustees to labor among the Indians, had married Mary Musgrove, the interpreter for Gen. Oglethorpe, and through his influence she was led to assert her claims to all the islands along the coast. The denial of her claim by the president of the colony resulted in the organization of a small band of followers, headed by her husband, who marched against Savannah. No blood was shed, however, though Mary and her husband were both captured. The colonists assured the Indians that Mary had imposed upon them, and urged that as long as they had been friends since the landing of Oglethorpe they might continue their cordial relations. The Indians were satisfied and left Savannah. Mary was afterward set at liberty with her husband, but the case was carried into the English courts and there died a natural death.

A change in the government was resolved upon at this time by the trustees. They first called for a general assembly, but on account of the lack of sufficient legislative power it soon dissolved. In 1751, Col. Wm. Stephens, who had been for eight years the president of the colony, resigned. Two years later he died, having become a mental and physical wreck on account of his cares and the burden of advancing years. Henry Parker, the vice-president, succeeded him, with James Habersham as secretary. During this year the title to land was changed to a fee simple, and there was great rejoicing throughout the colony.

In order to provide a militia for the protection of the colony the trustees required every man who owned 300 acres of land to appear at a certain time on horseback, and all who owned less to appear on foot. At a subsequent meeting Capt. Noble Jones was placed in command. The Uchee Indians in the neighborhood of Savannah, and the Cherokees in the northern part of the province, exhibited hostile intentions and it was necessary for the colony to be on its guard.

A large colony of Puritans settled on the Ogeechee river at Midway in 1752. They had settled first in Massachusetts, but on account of the severe climate they decided to come farther south. It was only human that, after the expiration of twenty-one years, the trustees should have no desire to renew the charter. On April 29, 1752, the last meeting of the trustees was held and all matters pertaining to the colony were settled. It is well to note, in this connection, that the trustees included many of the noblest and purest men in England, who managed the affairs of the colony without reward or compensation. In 1752, therefore, Georgia passed directly under the British crown.

UNDER THE BRITISH CROWN.

The last president of the colony, under the government of the trustees, was Patrick Graham. On March 5, 1754, a committee appointed by the lords of the council recommended that Georgia be governed like the other colonies in America, by a royal governor, a legislative body and by courts of law and equity. It was further provided that officers should be appointed for the collection of customs and duties and that a provost-marshal, an attorney-general and a secretary to the governor be also appointed. This recommendation was adopted, and the first royal governor sent to Georgia was Capt. John Reynolds of the navy. A new seal, retaining the principal features of the old one, was ordered for the colony. The newly appointed governor reached Savannah in October, 1754, and was cordially received.

His first appointments were James Habersham, secretary, and Wm. Clifton, attorney-general. The command of the militia, the right to convene and dissolve the assembly at will, and the veto authority, were among the powers vested in the governor of the colony. Patrick Graham was elected president of the upper house and David Douglas of Augusta, speaker of the commons house.

In the organization of the judiciary Noble Jones and Jonathan Bryan were appointed to hold office during the king's pleasure. They had jurisdiction of all crimes and offenses committed in the colony and the right to try all civil matters above forty shillings. A court of chancery was also organized with the governor at the head.

On Jan. 7, 1755, the first legislative assembly met in Savannah. Gov. Reynolds delivered a well received address and called upon the colonists for their support and co-operation. He began his administration by making a tour of the province, and being impressed with a certain locality on the Ogeechee river he conceived the idea of moving the capital to that point. The removal was never made, however, and his plans of defense for the better security of the province were also postponed.

A rupture between the governor and the legislative assembly occurred during the following year and he never regained the love of the colony. Complaints were made against him and he was called to England for investigation. As the result of these complaints Georgia received a new governor, who arrived before the departure of Gov. Reynolds.

A large number of French Catholics who arrived at Savannah in a destitute condition were given admittance to the colony, but they left in the spring of the following year.

ADMINISTRATION OF GOVS. ELLIS AND WRIGHT.

Georgia's next royal governor was Henry Ellis. He arrived in Savannah in February, 1757, and was received by the people with enthusiasm on account of his distinguished reputation. He addressed himself to the relief of the people, and sought by kindness to secure their confidence. He concluded his address to the legislature by saying: "If my wishes and efforts for the welfare of the colony prove fruitless I shall be the first to solicit my recall." A bill was passed by the legislature offering a home in the province to insolvent debtors.

The province, at this time, was divided into eight parishes: Christ Church, including Savannah; St. Paul's, including Augusta; St. Matthew's, including Abercorn and Ebenezer; St. George's, including Halifax; St. Philip's, including Great Ogeechee; St. John's, including Midway; St. Andrew's, including Darien; and St. James', including Frederica. The exports of indigo and rice by the colony were very large.

Difficulties with the Indians, involving all the English settlements in America, soon extended into Georgia and Fort Prince George on the Savannah river became the center of hostile operations. After much disaster and bloodshed the Indians, nearly all of whom belonged to the Cherokee nation, were defeated and a treaty of peace was concluded. On account of ill-health Gov. Ellis requested his recall, but the government, refusing to give up such a valuable man, transferred him to Nova Scotia. He was a good man and was held in high respect by the colony. His departure from the province was greatly regretted.

Gov. James Wright was the third and last governor of the colony. He arrived in Savannah Oct. 11, 1760. Having practiced law in South Carolina he was familiar with the needs of the colony and understood the situation. The affairs of the colony were at a low ebb, but Gov. Wright immediately addressed himself to the task of restoring a better condition. A number of plantations were reclaimed from the swamp, and bills of credit were put into circulation.

On Oct. 25, King George II. of England died. Impressive services were held by the colonists in his honor, as he had granted the charter to the colony and given it his own name. A report from Gov. Ellis revealed the colony to be in a prosperous condition at this time. No articles were manufactured, but numerous products of the soil were exported. A breach of feeling between the governor and the chief justice at this time led to a very unfair procedure on the part of the chief justice, and he was accordingly removed by the English authorities in 1763.

In order to conciliate the Indians Gen. Wright issued a general call to all the tribes to meet him at Augusta. He was aware of the hostile attitude of the French settlers, and their influence with the Indians needed to be counteracted. Seven hundred Indians were present, representing the Catawbaws, the Choctaws, the Chickasaws, the Cherokees and the Creeks. The governors of North and South Carolina and of Virginia were also present. A general treaty of peace was signed.

As a result of an understanding between Great Britain and France the territorial limits of the province extended as far west as the middle of the Mississippi river. Florida was surrendered to the British, and after the removal of the Spaniards it was settled by French emigrants. It was agreed, as the southern boundary of the province, to fix the St. Mary's river. Four additional parishes were added to the province in 1765—St. Patrick's, St. Thomas', St. David's and St. Mary's, all between the Altamaha river and the Florida line.

The conduct of the British government at this time sounded the first note of alienation. As the result of the French and Indian war on the continent a heavy debt was entailed and it was decided by the British ministry that this debt should be paid by the colonies.

In pursuance of this decision the nefarious stamp act was shortly afterward passed in parliament, requiring all papers, bonds and deeds to have stamps on them which amounted to a heavy tax. The free, open life of the North American forest had fully aroused the colonial spirit of liberty, and a wave of popular indignation extended itself along the entire Atlantic coast. A general congress was called to meet in New York in October, 1765.

A meeting was held in Savannah at which resolutions were passed expressing full sympathy with the movement, but on account of the interference of Gov. Ellis no delegates were sent to the New York congress. A public demonstration ordered by Gov. Wright to commemorate the succession of George III. to the throne was converted into a scene of protest and remonstrance that indicated, in no slight measure, the spirit of revolution.

THE EVE OF REVOLUTION.

The enforcement of the stamp act was not calculated to increase the affection of the colony for the mother country, and the stamps that were sent over by the government were only used on compulsion. Gov. Wright received a number of letters and his life was in imminent peril as long as the stamp act continued in operation. On Feb. 22, 1766, the offensive act was repealed and good will and harmony were restored; Gov. Wright made a neat speech and the people assured him that they would remain loyal subjects as long as their rights and liberties were not invaded.

The population of the colony at this time was about 18,000. One hundred and seventy-one vessels entered the harbor and the active militia numbered 1,800. The growing of silk reached its highest mark and the general condition of the colony was good, due largely to the wise administration of Gov. Wright. If the stamp act encountered a fixed resistance on the part of the colonies it was simply paving the way for the military act, a second measure of oppression, that provided for the raising and quartering of troops on the continent. A demand was made on Gov. Wright for barracks in which to accommodate a body of British soldiers. This demand was laid before the assembly only to be indignantly refused.

In February, 1768, a letter was received by the speaker of the assembly from the speaker of the Massachusetts house proposing a colonial union. The legislature was not in session, but the speaker penned a letter in which he expressed his full sympathy. This action offended Gov. Wright, to whom it savored of disloyalty. In April of this year Benj. Franklin was appointed as Georgia's agent to the court of Great Britain. The legislature that met this year approved the action of the speaker in regard to a colonial union of aggrieved subjects and was immediately dissolved by Gov. Wright.

The assembly appealed to the crown through their agent only to be ignored. Events, however, were slowly drifting on. The Boston massacre created another wave of indignation and the colonies became more firmly united. A meeting was held at a private house in Savannah, at which it was declared that all commercial relations with England should cease and that anyone who should deal with her would be a foe to the interests of liberty. Jonathan Bryan, a member of the governor's council, was present at this meeting.

In July, 1771, Gov. Wright left for England and was absent a year and a half. James Habersham, a friend to the colonies, filled the position during his absence and though it gave him pain, he ruled with loyalty to England and the assembly was frequently dissolved. Returning to America Gov. Wright issued a call for a second meeting of all the Indian tribes at Augusta. In order to extinguish a debt contracted with the traders the Indians conceded a large tract of land to the colony. Numerous depredations were committed by them, however, along the frontier after the conclusion of the treaty. In the meantime it became evident from the attitude of the British ministry and the withdrawal of the charter of the Massachusetts colony that only one course was left, and that was expressed in the word—Liberty.

A meeting of all the friends of liberty was held in Savannah on Aug. 10, 1774, against the protest of the governor. This meeting was called by Noble Wimberly Jones, Archibald Bulloch, John Houston, and George Walton. Each parish was represented, and a set of resolutions expressive of the feelings entertained by the colony was drawn up. The Boston port bill, the withdrawal of the charter of Massachusetts, the unjust taxation of the colonies, and the transportation of accused persons to England for trial, were all heartily condemned. The effect of these resolutions was to show that Georgia was in full sympathy with the revolutionary movement.

In order to counteract these resolutions a meeting of the royalists was also held in Savannah, and resolutions passed to which a number of fictitious names were affixed. A provincial congress was held in Savannah on Jan. 18, 1775, presided over by John Glen, the legislature being in session at the same time. On account of the sympathy existing between the lower house and the provincial congress and a resolution to send delegates to the continental congress in Philadelphia, May 10, 1775, the governor adjourned the assembly until May 9. Delegates, however, were elected by the provincial congress: N. W. Jones, A. Bulloch, and John Houston, but, on account of dissensions, they did not attend. Lyman Hall, who was elected at a special meeting of St. John's parish, was present, however, and his name was enrolled.

Just at this time it was reported in Georgia that 3,000 British troops had collected in Boston, and that great danger was felt. Gathering up a body of men, on the night of May 11, Joseph Habersham made a raid on the powder magazine at Savannah. A large part of the ammunition was stored away in private cellars, and the remainder conveyed secretly to Boston. Gov. Wright made an effort to punish the guilty parties, but they were never discovered. The feeling of the colonists was so intense that a young royalist who ridiculed the friends of liberty for their conduct was tarred and feathered in the public square at Savannah.

The next provincial congress met on July 4, 1775, and every parish was represented. Information was given, during the session, that 14,000 pounds of powder would shortly arrive at Tybee for the suppression of the colonists. It was resolved to capture this powder, and the enterprise, being placed in the hands of Col. Habersham and Commodore Bowen, succeeded. The situation had grown alarming, and Gov. Wright, seeing that he was powerless, asked for his recall. In the meantime the council of safety ordered the arrest of Gov. Wright, and the order was executed by Joseph Habersham in person. He afterward escaped, however, and made his way to England. At a subsequent meeting of the provincial congress held in January, 1776, A. Bulloch, John Houston, George Walton, Lyman Hall and Button Gwinnett were selected to represent Georgia in the continental congress. Provisions were also made for the protection of the Savannah river. A number of British vessels were in the river at this time, and it was agreed upon to capture these vessels or set them on fire. The latter course was adopted and successfully carried into effect. Those who figured in this bold enterprise were Col. Lachlan McIntosh, Commodore Bowen, Joseph Habersham, James Jackson, Samuel Elbert and John Morcl.

GEORGIA NO LONGER A ROYAL COLONY.

In behalf of Georgia the declaration of independence was signed by George Walton, Lyman Hall and Button Gwinnett. When the news reached Georgia a public demonstration was held and great enthusiasm prevailed. A copy of the declaration was read, and at night bonfires were kindled. In order to adopt a new form of government to meet the changed condition of things a convention was called to meet in Savannah on Feb. 5, 1777. The declaration of independence was ratified and provision made for the selection of a governor and a legislative assembly. A chief justice for the state and a superior court for each county were also provided. The new constitution abolished the parishes and divided the state into eight counties, named in honor of the friends of liberty across the water. The counties were designated as Chatham, Glynn, Effingham, Richmond, Burke, Camden, Liberty and Wilkes. A new seal was adopted, one bearing the inscription "Deus nobis haec otia facit," and the other, "Pro bono publico." Archibald Bulloch, who was chief executive, under the new constitution, died shortly after the adoption, and was succeeded by Button Gwinnett, who had been instrumental in its preparation.

Without consulting Col McIntosh, who was in charge of the military operations of the state, the new executive projected one or two important expeditions much to the anger of Col. McIntosh. The failure of these expeditions did not appease him, and when the next election for governor was held Col. McIntosh successfully used his efforts to defeat Gwinnett. As the result of this feud the defeated aspirant for gubernatorial succession challenged Col. McIntosh to mortal combat. Facing each other at a distance of twelve paces they simultaneously fired. Both fell wounded, Gwinnett dying in a few days and McIntosh recovering after a painful illness. At the suggestion of Col. Walton he afterward sought a transfer to the northern division of the army in order to avoid the hostility of Mr. Gwinnett's friends.

IN THE REVOLUTION.

The valor and patriotism that Georgia evinced during the revolution was equal to that of her sister colonies who had suffered with her under the yoke of British oppression. Her blood and treasure were freely dedicated to the cause of liberty, and having entered the revolution she determined to persevere in the struggle until every resource was exhausted. In January, 1778, John Houston was called to the executive chair. Gen. Howe, who was in command of the southern army, at the suggestion of Gov. Houston, commenced operations against the British in Florida, assisted by Col. Elijah Clarke. The enterprise was soon abandoned, however, on account of dissensions, which made it impossible to proceed with a union of strength.

Gen. Washington, who was in command of the American forces, had gained a signal victory in the meantime, notwithstanding the severity of the winter, at Trenton, N. J., and the enthusiasm of the patriots was deeply aroused. Gen. Howe was called to Philadelphia, where he took an active part with Gen. Washington in the battle of Brandywine in that vicinity. The rigors of the northern winter were intense, but the sufferings of the British were equally as pronounced as those of the patriots, and the fortunes of battle seemed to favor the cause of liberty. Burgoyne was forced to surrender to Gen. Gates, and this was followed by friendly offices from France which gave the colonists every reason to indulge in the hope of ultimate victory.

In November, 1778, Gen. Clinton, in command of British troops, left New York for the Georgia coast, taking with him a fleet of ten vessels and 3,500 men. Gen. Howe, who had returned to Savannah, hastened to meet him with as many men as he could hastily summon. After landing his forces about two miles from Savannah on the south Gen. Clinton made a camp. Having located the British forces Gen. Howe ordered the bridges, over which they would have to pass in order to make an attack on the Americans, burned to the edge of the water. The British officer, however, was shrewd, and leaving a portion of his men facing the headquarters of Gen. Howe, he withdrew the greater number of them from the rear, and discovered a circuitous route by which to advance upon the Americans unawares. In this way the British gained a signal victory, and the troops under Gen. Howe were scattered in every direction. As the result of this martial stratagem Savannah fell into the hands of the enemy, and numerous spoiliations and brutalities were committed. Gen. Howe was severely censured for his carelessness in allowing the British to get the better of him, as Col. George Walton, among others, had warned him of the danger of the situation. Being acquitted by the court-martial that was ordered to try him, he was recalled from the southern department, and Gen. Lincoln sent to Georgia in his stead.

SAVANNAH OCCUPIED BY THE BRITISH.

The defeat of Gen. Howe greatly discouraged the American cause in Georgia, and on the return of Gov. Wright from England in the summer of 1779 a large number of the colonists were induced to join the king on the assurance of a favorable reception. On the arrival of Gen. Lincoln the situation in Georgia was not very inviting. He had scarcely more than 1,200 men against 4,000 British in possession of the city and adjacent strongholds. The hopes of the patriots were revived in a measure by small victories won over the royalists in Burke county and in the neighborhood of Augusta, and this afforded them enough encouragement to wait for brighter signs. Hostilities were practically suspended during the spring and summer of 1779, though Savannah remained in possession of the British.

In the meantime the legislative business of the state was carried on in Augusta. John Houston continued to act as governor until the legislature convened, and John Werriat was elected. A quorum, however, was not present, and Col. George Walton challenged the election. A new assembly being called Col. Walton was declared the chief executive.

Count d'Estaing, who represented the favor of the French government, and who had won quite a number of signal victories, reached Georgia on Sept. 23, 1779, with a large number of frigates and battle ships. He captured several British vessels near Tybee Island, and after landing pitched his camp about three miles from Savannah. Gen. Provost, in charge of the British forces, ordered all outposts to fall back into the city.

Count d'Estaing was soon joined by Gen. Lincoln, and together they resolved to lay siege to Savannah. The count, however, perceiving that the storms were ruining his vessels, proposed an attack, and for this purpose 2,500 men were put in motion. The British, who were on their guard, perceived the advance of the Americans and their allies, and proceeded to open fire. Count d'Estaing, in leading the gallant charge, received a severe wound and fell back with his men. The Americans, however, pressed forward until they planted a battle flag on one of the principal redoubts. This flag had been presented to Sergt. Jasper by Mrs. Elliott, of South Carolina. As soon as the flag was placed in position it was immediately struck down. As quick as a flash the gallant hero leaped to the top of the battlement, and, amid a storm of bullets, reinstated the flag securely. This noble feat accomplished, he fell to the ground mortally wounded.

"Tell Mrs. Elliott," said he with his last breath, as he lay on the field, "that I died fighting for my colors."

In the same bloody engagement Count Pulaski, a brave and dashing Polish officer, was also mortally wounded. On the following day Gen. Lincoln retreated to Charleston, S. C., the French fleet returned home, and Savannah remained securely in possession of the British.

In 1780 Charleston shared the fate of Savannah and fell into the hands of the enemy. During the same year the seat of government was changed from Augusta to Heard's Fort, in Wilkes county. Having reduced both Charleston and Savannah, Gen. Clinton next endeavored to subjugate all the southern colonies. He ordered Col. Brown to take possession of Augusta, and this ferocious and brutal officer immediately undertook to capture that stronghold. Col. Elijah Clarke, however, intercepted his movements and put the force to rout, while on the way to Augusta, with great slaughter. He was subsequently reinforced, and Col. Clarke's efforts to retain Augusta proved unsuccessful.

Gen. Nathaniel Greene assumed the command of the southern army in the spring of 1781. He was successful to a marked degree, and the British were driven into the neighborhood of their strongholds at Charleston and Savannah. During the summer, with the aid of Lieut.-Col. Henry Lee and Gen. Pickens, a second effort was made by Col. Clarke to capture Augusta. Forts Grierson and Cornwallis, by which it was defended, were both taken, and June 5, 1781, Augusta was re-occupied by the Americans. It was during this critical season that Nancy Hart, a brave woman residing in Elbert county, who cordially despised the Tories, held six of them captive in her house by forbidding them to move, under the penalty of being shot. One of them made a movement toward her and fell dead at her feet. A county was subsequently named in honor of this brave woman. Maj. James Jackson was left in charge of Augusta, while Pickens and Lee hastened to join Gen. Greene at Ninety-Six.

At the north the issue of battle was decidedly in favor of the colonies. On Oct. 19, 1781, Gen. Cornwallis surrendered his army of 7,000 men to Gen. Washington. The Americans in the south, especially in Georgia, were greatly reduced on account of privations to which they were subjected, but they had every reason to be encouraged, and they persevered through existing hardships in the hope of ultimate victory.

THE EVACUATION OF SAVANNAH AND THE CLOSE OF THE REVOLUTION.

In January, 1782, Gen. Wayne was sent into Georgia, and by his skillful maneuvering he succeeded in driving the British into their stronghold at Savannah. Realizing that little hope of success was now left to them, and that further resistance was fruitless, they voluntarily surrendered the city on July 11, 1782. A treaty of peace was signed between the United States and England at Paris on Nov. 30, 1782, by which the independence of the thirteen states was recognized, and the war of the revolution was at an end.

The governors who had served Georgia during this critical period were George Walton, Richard Howley, Stephen Heard, Nathan Brownson and John Martin. On Jan. 9, 1783, Lyman Hall was elected governor, and George Walton chief justice. On account of the enlarged area of population the seat of government, which was transferred to Savannah after the evacuation by the British, was again changed to Augusta, in order to be nearer the center of population. Gov. Hall delivered an address to the legislature that convened July 8, urging the people of the state to devote themselves to a speedy restitution of their losses, and to prove themselves worthy of the freedom which they had achieved. A tax was levied on slaves and property, and the lands of all the royal adherents were confiscated. A treaty was made with the Indians by which enough territory was ceded for two additional counties. They were given the names of Franklin and Washington, in honor of those two distinguished patriots of the revolution. John Houston was called to the executive chair in January, 1784. At the next session of the legislature a bill was introduced providing for the establishment of a state university.

THE STATE UNIVERSITY FOUNDED.

Scarcely had Georgia emerged from the revolution before she commenced to lay the foundation of a broad and liberal system of education. The bill that was introduced in the legislature provided for a survey in each of the counties of Washington and Franklin of 20,000 acres of land, divided into tracts of 5,000 acres each, for the endowment of an institution of learning; the said lands to be granted in trust to the governor for the time being, John Houston, James Habersham, William Few, Joseph Clay, Abraham Baldwin, William Houston and Nathan Brownson. By an act of the legislature, passed in the following year, a board of visitors was created, to consist of the governor, the speaker of the house and the chief justice of the state, and a board of trustees composed of influential Georgians, the two bodies to be known as the Senatus Academicus of the University of Georgia. The first meeting of the Senatus Academicus was held in Louisville, Ga., in 1799, and Joseph Meigs was chosen as the first president, at a salary of $1,200. The original site for the university was located in Greene county, but the trustees were not satisfied, and it was subsequently changed to the banks of the Oconee river, in Franklin county, and the name of Athens given to the location.

A land court was organized in 1784 for the purpose of investigating all claims to the land recently ceded by the Indians. Nearly 5,000 applications were received, based on various grounds. Twenty thousand acres were voted to Count d'Estaing in recognition of his gallant services. In 1785 Samuel Elbert was elected governor. His administration was characterized by Indian disturbances along the frontier. The general government had appointed commissioners to meet with the Creeks and the Cherokees to fix the boundary line, but Georgia claimed that her wishes in the matter should have been consulted, and accordingly appointed her own commission to see that her rights were not invaded. The year 1786 began with the election of Edward Telfair as governor, and was subsequently marked by the death of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, who died at his home, about fourteen miles from Savannah. By an act of congress the currency was changed from the English to the American system. It was ascertained that the debt of the state was $150,000, and bills of credit were accordingly issued.

GEORGIA ENTERS THE UNION.

Gov. Telfair was succeeded by George Matthews in 1787. In April of this year a boundary line was agreed upon between Georgia and South Carolina. A convention having been called by the continental congress to meet on Feb. 21, 1787, to establish a national constitution, the following delegates represented the state at Philadelphia: William Few, William Houston, William Pierce, Abram Baldwin, George Walton and Nathaniel Pendleton. The constitution adopted by this convention was duly ratified, and on Jan. 2, 1788, Georgia was admitted as the fourth state into the union.

George Handly was the next governor. On Nov. 4 a state convention was held at Augusta for the purpose of considering a new constitution. This convention adjourned, after a full discussion, in order to give the people of the state an opportunity to express themselves in a second convention to be held on Jan. 4, 1789. In the meantime electors were chosen in all the states for the ensuing national election, and, as the result of the ballots cast, George Washington and John Adams were declared the choice of the American people for president and vice-president.

On account of several new amendments proposed the second state convention failed to adopt a constitution. Gov. George Walton, having succeeded to the chair of state, called a third convention, which met in Augusta on May 4, 1789, and adopted the new constitution. This instrument went into effect in October, 1789, and Edward Telfair was the first governor under the new constitution. On Dec. 8 the state was divided into three congressional districts, and James Jackson, Abram Baldwin and George Matthews were selected as Georgia's representatives in congress.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S VISIT.

In order to understand the people better and to give them his personal assurances of interest and good will President Washington decided to make a tour of the southern states. He reached Savannah in May, 1791, and was warmly greeted by a large delegation of people collected from all parts of the state and headed by the local authorities. After a pleasant stay in Savannah, horses were provided and the distinguished chieftain, attended by a large escort, set out for Augusta, the state capital. Here he was warmly received by Gov. Telfair and several speeches were delivered. The president was taken to the Richmond academy, and after making the pupils a brief address, presented to Mr. William H. Crawford, who was then a young tutor, with a copy of "Caesar's Commentaries." At the elegant home of Col. Walton near Augusta Gen. Washington was lavishly entertained for more than a week, after which he left for South Carolina greatly impressed by his visit and leaving a fragrant impression in the hearts of all.

The population of the state at this time was 83,000, and the value of goods exported nearly $500,000. The administration of Gov. Telfair was marked by unusual prosperity. For the next few years the progress of the state was uninterrupted, except for occasional difficulties with the Indians along the frontier. The seat of government was changed from Augusta to Louisville, Ga., in May, 1795, and Gov. Matthews, after serving the state for a second term, was succeeded in January, 1796, by Jared Irwin.

THE YAZOO FRAUD.

A thrilling and dramatic chapter in Georgia's history is the one that records the Yazoo fraud. In order to understand this monumental fraud, perpetrated upon the people, it is necessary to go behind the events that have just been recorded. In the year 1789 a company was organized in South Carolina, known as the South Carolina Yazoo company. This company was organized for the purpose of purchasing from the state of Georgia a large tract of land in what was then the western part of the state, bordering on the Mississippi river. The name was taken from a tribe of Indians that formerly occupied that locality. The land in this section of the state was comparatively unknown, and was remote from the center of population. It occurred to the projectors of this great land enterprise that if the purchase could be effected at a nominal price it would enable them to realize a large sum of money and to live in feudal ease and splendor.

At the same time in Virginia and Tennessee companies of a like character were organized. A man by the name of Tom Washington first conceived the idea of purchasing this large domain. Agents were sent into every part of the country and large sums of money were expended in order to create a favorable impression upon the state legislature. Everything having been arranged a bill was introduced providing for the sale of a portion of these lands. Under the provision of the bill these companies were to receive over 20,000,000 acres of land for $200,000. The bill was passed and received the approval of the governor, much to the regret and disapprobation of the people of the state, but, on account of certain difficulties in the way, the sale of the land was never negotiated.

In 1794 these men renewed their efforts to purchase the land. The companies organized for the purpose of making the purchase from the state were "The Georgia Company," "The Tennessee Company," "The Virginia Yazoo Company," and "The Georgia Mississippi Company." A bill was introduced, finally receiving the approval of the governor, who at first opposed it, conveying 35,000,000 acres of land to these companies for $500,000. This was almost equivalent to giving the land away, and the people of the state were not slow in expressing their indignation. Charges of corruption were brought against members of the legislature in yielding to the overtures of men who merely sought to cheat and defraud the commonwealth. Mr. William H. Crawford, who subsequently became one of the most distinguished men of the state, took a leading part in the opposition. One of the state senators, James Gunn, had been prevailed upon to accept a position in one of the Yazoo companies, but no amount of inducement could persuade his colleague, Hon. James Jackson. He refused to be influenced, and finally resigned his seat in the senate in order to prevent the sale of the Yazoo lands from being consummated. He was elected to the state legislature that met in January, 1796, and became the author of the rescinding act that declared the law a nullity on account of the fraud practiced to obtain it. This act received the official signature of Gov. Jared Irwin on Feb. 13, 1796. A few days later the papers and records pertaining to the fraud were burned in the presence of the assembled representatives. They were kindled by a beam of light passed through a magnifying glass in order that the fire of heaven might be the instrument of their destruction.

A prolonged dispute in the courts resulted. The companies were deeply aggrieved by the state's action, and they vowed to prosecute the matter until their rights were recognized. A commission was appointed, but the demands of the companies were never satisfied until Georgia ceded her western domain to the United States and a large sum of money was voted by congress for their extinction. The notoriety attached to the Yazoo fraud was such that Georgia, in the course of a few years, acquired a world-wide renown.

The popularity of Gen. James Jackson was such that he was called to the gubernatorial chair on Jan. 12, 1798. In the following May a constitutional convention was held at Louisville and a permanent constitution adopted.

GEORGIA'S NEW SEAL.

A new seal of the state was adopted by the legislature that met in June, 1799. On one side the flag of the United States was displayed from a ship that was receiving on board hogsheads of tobacco and bales of cotton. In the rear of this view a man in the act of plowing and a flock of sheep were represented, with the motto: "Agriculture and Commerce, 1799." On the other side an arch resting upon three pillars represented the constitution as resting upon the three cardinal virtues: "Wisdom, Justice, and Moderation." After the adoption of this seal it was placed in the hands of the secretary of state and by him used in the proper authentication of all state papers.

It will be observed that the silk worm was not honored in the pictorial design of the new seal, that industry having yielded to a more prolific source of profit—the culture of cotton.

Twenty-four counties were represented in the legislature of 1799, and under the plan of representation there were twenty-four senators and seventy-five representatives. Three judicial circuits were formed, known as the eastern, middle, and western, and over these David B. Mitchell, George Walton, and Thomas P. Carnes were elected respectively. Gen. Washington died at his home at Mt. Vernon, Va., on Dec. 14, 1799, and his death was universally deplored. On the following day Georgia sustained an additional loss in the death of Gen. Elijah Clarke, one of the heroes of the revolution.

The introduction of cotton into Georgia is placed to the credit of Josiah Tattnal and John Milledge. At the close of the century the population of the state was 163,000, and the productions of the field and forest represented a great variety. The invention of the cotton gin by Eli Whitney, a Georgian living near Savannah, gave a much-needed impetus to this industry. The Indian tribes that came in contact with the settlers on the frontier were the Creeks and the Cherokees, the Creeks occupying the middle and southern portions of the state, and the Cherokees living among the mountains. In this connection it may be observed that the Cherokees were the most intelligent Indians that peopled the solitudes of the American forest.

GEORGIA CEDES TERRITORY TO THE UNION.

The reins of government were next placed in the hands of Josiah Tattnall. His first official signature was affixed to an act of the legislature recalling his banished father, whose property had been confiscated and he himself exiled on account of his loyal adherence to the English government during the revolution.

By an act passed on Dec. 2, 1800, Abram Baldwin and James Jackson, the two state senators, and James Jones and Benjamin Taliaferro, representatives, were appointed to settle all disputes growing out of the Mississippi land troubles. John Milledge was subsequently placed on the committee instead of Benjamin Taliaferro and James Jones. On the part of the United States, James Madison, Albert Gallatin and Levi Lincoln were appointed to meet with the Georgia committee. The conference took place in Washington city in April, 1802, and the following treaty was agreed upon:

"Georgia cedes to the United States all the territory belonging to her south of Tennessee, and west of the Chattahoochee, up to the great bend, thence west of the line direct to Nickajack creek, near the present city of Chattanooga, upon these conditions:

"(1) That out of the proceeds of the sale of these lands the United States*shall give to Georgia $1,250,000.

"(2) That all persons who are settled within the said territory shall be confirmed in all their titles under the United States government.

"(3) That the ceded lands be considered a public fund to be distributed by the United States in the proper manner, as other public funds in lands.

"(4) That the United States, at their own expense, extinguish for the use of Georgia as soon as the same can be peaceably done on reasonable terms the Indian claims to the county of Tallahassee, to the land occupied by the Creeks, and to those between the forks of the Oconee and Ocmulgee rivers, for which several objects the president of the United States shall order that a treaty be immediately held with the Indians, and that, in like manner, the United States shall extinguish the Indian title to all other lands in the state of Georgia.

"(5) That the territory thus ceded shall form a state as soon as it shall contain 60,000 people, and as such be admitted into the union."

The stipulations of this agreement were ratified by the state legislature, and all moneys that were paid into the state treasury by the Yazoo companies were transferred to the vaults of the general government.

A few days after this a treaty was made with the Creek Indians by which they agreed to surrender all their territory between the Oconee and the Ocmulgee rivers. The treaty was signed at Fort Wilkinson by the commissioners and forty chiefs on June 16, 1802, and received the signature of President Jefferson the following year.

In November, 1802, John Milledge, who was then representing the state in congress, was elected governor of Georgia. He had distinguished himself as one of the most illustrious men in the state, having taken an active part in the war of the revolution, and having been one of the most bitter opponents of the Yazoo sale. As the friend and patron of all learning, Gov. Milledge may be well styled the father of the state university, for he was one of the founders and chief benefactors of that institution.

The lands ceded to the state by the Indians were divided into three counties, Wayne, Wilkinson, and Baldwin, and parceled out among the people by means of the lottery system. Twelve months after the drawing each fortunate land owner was required to pay $4 for every 100 acres. Georgia was the only state that adopted this method of division.

THREE DISTINGUISHED GEORGIANS PASS AWAY.

In close succession the state was now called upon to mourn the departure of three of her most distinguished sons. The first of these was Josiah Tattnall. He died in the West Indies on June 6, 1803, and his dying request to those about him was to carry his remains to Georgia, that he might repose on the banks of his own beautiful Savannah. He had served as governor of the state and had been one of the first planters to introduce the cultivation of cotton.

At his home near Augusta, Ga., Gov. George Walton breathed his last on Feb. 2, 1804. No citizen of the state was more profoundly honored than this devoted Georgian. He was a member of the continental congress, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence for Georgia, twice governor of the state, its highest judicial officer, wearing the ermine of the chief justice, and for nearly fifteen years a judge of the superior court, in addition to his gallant services as a colonel in the revolution. He was a man of considerable literary talent, and was on the eve of writing a history of Georgia when his death occurred. During his visit to Augusta in 1796 Gen. Washington was the guest of Gov. Walton, and was entertained by him with lavish hospitality. Gov. Walton at the time of his death was the judge of the middle circuit. One of the largest counties in the state is named in honor of Gov. Walton, and his ashes repose near Augusta, on the banks of the Savannah river.

In March, 1806, while discharging his duties at Washington, Senator James Jackson, who made himself illustrious by his opposition to the Yazoo fraud, died. He was buried four miles from Washington city, but his remains were afterward transferred to the Congressional cemetery. On his tombstone was engraved this plain inscription: "To the memory of Maj.-Gen. James Jackson, of Georgia, who deserved and enjoyed the confidence of a grateful country. A soldier of the revolution." In the death of Gen. Jackson the state suffered a severe loss, and he was universally mourned. His place in the senate was filled by ex-Gov. John Milledge.

A brilliant Georgian whose star was beginning to rise at this period of Georgia's history was William H. Crawford. He became the secretary of war under President Madison, and afterward United States minister to France. He was regarded by the great Napoleon as the handsomest man he ever met, and the only one to whom he felt constrained to lift his hat. In 1807 Mr. Crawford was elected to the United States senate, and Gov. Jared Irwin occupied for a second time the gubernatorial chair. The capital of the state was changed to Milledgeville, and here the laws of Georgia were enacted for more than fifty years.

For the next few years the progress of the state was uninterrupted. Edward Telfair died in September, 1807, and his death was soon followed by that of other revolutionary heroes. A dispute with North Carolina over the boundary line, the formation of several new counties, a revision of the militia laws, and the act of 1810 incorporating the State Agricultural society, were the chief features of the next two or three administrations. A number of towns and cities had sprung up, educational institutions had multiplied, the population of the state had steadily increased, and the people of the state were industrious, enterprising and happy.

THE WAR OF 1812.

A second difficulty with England, however, soon interrupted this tranquillity, and the quarrel between the two governments was soon referred to the arbitrament of the war of 1812. American vessels had been insulted by British sailors, and this, added to the attitude of the English government with reference to American commerce, thoroughly aroused the indignation of the United States, in which resentment the people of Georgia warmly shared. England, however, was anxious to have dealings with Georgia and South Carolina on account of the cotton trade, and for this reason fitted out a number of vessels to open their ports. At Savannah, however, they were met with decided coldness and ordered to leave immediately. On putting out to sea a number of shots were fired from the British vessels and other outrages committed.

England and France were shedding each other's blood at this time, and both of these countries had issued orders respecting American commerce. They took offense at the neutral attitude of the United States, and threatened to capture all American vessels and imprison their seamen. England added to this offensive threat by actually putting it into outrageous execution. Seeing that bloodshed was necessary in order to maintain the national honor, and spurred by an urgent petition from the people of Georgia, President Madison recommended to congress a declaration of war. On June 18, 1812, war against England was declared. A spirited message from Gov. Mitchell called attention to the unprotected coast, and to the need of troops for the purpose of defying the invader. This call was promptly answered by the legislature with an appropriation of $30,000, and preparations for a thorough military defense were immediately commenced.

Learning that the British had formed an alliance with the Spaniards in Florida, President Madison directed Gov. Mitchell to inquire into the situation. A correspondence ensued between Gov. Mitchell and the chief officer in charge of the affairs in East Florida, with a view to annexation, but the proposition was indignantly repelled. An effort was made to drive the American troops away, but in this attempt the British and Spaniards failed signally. Leaving Col. Smith in charge of the troops, Gov. Mitchell returned to Georgia. In order to protect the coast, two companies of infantry were stationed in each of the counties of Camden, Bryan and Chatham and along the Florida line. The Seminoles in Florida were instigated by the Spaniards, but after several engagements, conducted by Adjt.-Gen. Newman, they were brought to terms. During the hostilities William H.

Crawford was elected to fill the vacancy caused by the death of George Clinton, vice-president of the United States, on April 20, 1812.

The seat of war, during the year 1813, was confined to the northern part of the country. At the expiration of his term of office Gov. Mitchell was succeeded by Gov. Peter Early, and the first act of the new executive was to draw a warrant of $80,000 upon the state treasury as a loan to the general government in prosecution of the war. The brilliant victory of Commodore Perry on Lake Erie had greatly enthused the army, under the command of Gen. Andrew Jackson, who was, at this time, in the neighborhood of Mobile. The Creek Indians made a dangerous and wily foe, but after a number of battles a treaty of peace was signed by which all lands between the Chattahoochee and the Altamaha were ceded. Gen. John Floyd, Gen. William McIntosh, Gen. David Blackshear and Col. Daniel Appling distinguished themselves with great valor during this campaign.

In January, 1815, an effort was made by the British to land on the Georgia coast after leaving St. Augustine, but they were met by Col. William Cone and driven back to sea with a loss of 180 men. This ended the war of 1812, so far as Georgia was concerned.

For the second time Gov. Mitchell was called to the helm of state in November, 1815. A board of inspection was appointed to visit the state penitentiary, and the penal code was framed and passed, Dec. 19, 1816. A convention of judges was held at Augusta this year, and several acts of the legislature were condemned as unconstitutional. A serious outbreak of the Seminole Indians in the southern part of the state was one of the features of Gov. Mitchell's administration. Maj. McIntosh, a Creek Indian, led the expedition against the Seminoles. He surprised one of their posts and captured a stand of 3,000 arms, in addition to nearly 300 killed and wounded.

On the accession of James Monroe to the presidency, Gov. Mitchell resigned the chair of state to assume the agency of Indian affairs. He called an assemblage of the Creek nation, July, 1817, and assured them of his good will. From the territory ceded by them to the state the counties of Newton, De Kalb, Gwinnett, Walton, Hall, and Habersham were formed. A large sum of money was appropriated by the legislature this year for the improvement of rivers in order to render them more suitable for navigation. The Seminoles in Florida renewed their hostilities along the frontier. Gen. Jackson, who was the head of the troops, assisted by Gen. Gaines and Col. Arbuckle, soon reduced them to surrender and put an end to their disturbances.

MISSISSIPPI AND ALABAMA ADMITTED.

Georgia now enjoyed the satisfaction of seeing two states admitted into the Union from the territory which she had ceded to the general government in 1802. Mississippi was the first to join the sisterhood of states on Dec. 10, 1817. Two years later, on Dec. 14, 1819, Alabama was admitted, and both of these young states entered upon brilliant and successful careers.

In 1818 the boundary line between Georgia and Tennessee was settled to the satisfaction of all parties. By an act of the general government, during the same year, Mr. Wilson Lumpkin was appointed to fix the boundary line between Georgia and Florida.

In November, 1818, a Creek Indian meeting was held at Fort Hawkins to receive their fixed allowance from the government, and over 4,000 Indians were present. The entire population of the Creek nation at this time was about 10,000. A similar meeting of the Cherokees was held near the Georgia line for the purpose of discussing the terms of their removal by the government to a point west of the Mississippi river.

A visit from President Monroe in the spring of 1819, the crossing of the first steam packet on its ocean voyage laden with Georgia produce, and the cession of Florida to the United States were the events of the next few months in which Georgia was interested.

On Feb. 27, 1819, a treaty between the chiefs of the Cherokee Indians and John C. Calhoun, the secretary of war, was made at Washington. A large tract of land was ceded by them, and articles of peace were entered into, besides various stipulations as to the extension of religious and educational advantages among them. The land thus ceded was divided between Hall and Habersham counties, leaving enough for the formation of Rabun county.

Slave labor had become a very essential factor in the growth and progress of the state. An effort to evade the law governing the slave trade was made in Brunswick in the summer of 1819. A number of slaves were brought over, and soon after their landing were seized by the collector of the port. After due notice they were exposed for sale. Before the sale was consummated a deputy marshal arrested the slaves by virtue of a warrant purporting to have come from a citizen of Portugal. The governor refused to surrender the slaves, acting upon the belief that a certain party of men were merely using the Portuguese citizen as a blind.

A calamity befell the state at this time in the death of Gov. Rabun, who passed away during his term of office. He was succeeded by Matthew Talbot, pending the action of the legislature.

In the campaign which ensued Hon. William H. Crawford was the leader of one faction, and Gen. John Clarke of the other faction. Mr. Crawford was a man of national reputation and pre-eminent ability, who was reckoned as a presidential candidate, but on account of a sudden and severe illness he was not able to continue in the race or devote himself longer to the cares of public life. He transferred the leadership of his party to George M. Troup, who was defeated by only a small majority in favor of Gen. Clarke.

THE INDIANS REFUSE TO CONCEDE MORE LANDS.

Having purchased from Georgia the territory west of the Mississippi river the United States seemed to be in no hurry to remove the Indians or extinguish their claims in compliance with the terms of the treaty. An urgent appeal was made to congress by the legislature, but it accomplished very little good. A civil engineer was appointed to survey the rivers of the state for the purpose of removing all obstructions to navigation. A report from the university gave a glowing account of that institution, then under the control of Dr. Moses Waddell. The population of the state was now about 340,000. There were no railroads, and travel and transportation were restricted to wagons and stage coaches. A disastrous fire occurred in Savannah in 1820, followed by an epidemic of yellow fever. The population of the city was greatly reduced, and the business life of Savannah was considerably enfeebled. Prosperity, however, returned in a few months and the growth of the city was resumed.

On Jan. 8, 1821, Daniel M. Forney and David Meriwether, having been appointed by congress to confer with the Creek Indians in regard to the cession of their lands, held an interview with the chiefs of the nation at Indian Springs. A treaty was signed, by the terms of which the government was to pay into the state treasury the full amount of all indebtedness due from the Indians, not to exceed $250,000. In consideration of this relief enough land was ceded between the Flint and the Ocmulgee rivers to form the counties of Monroe, Bibb, Crawford, Dooly, Houston, Fayette, Pike, and Henry. The land thus acquired was distributed according to the lottery system.

The Indians were a source of great annoyance to the state, and their claims were a continual vexation. The reservation to which the Cherokees were assigned under the treaty of July 8, 1817, proved to be disputed property, and many quarrels between the Indians and the settlers occurred; all of which produced the effect of causing Georgia to renew her petition for their removal.

After a spirited campaign, in which Mr. Troup was his opponent for the second time, Gov. Clarke was re-elected by a small majority of only two votes. An act was passed by the legislature submitting the election of the governor after this to a vote of the people. It required an amendment to the constitution, but as the next legislature re-enacted the measure it became a law under the provisions of the constitution.

An important bank law was enacted in 1821 for the protection of state banks against the unfair opposition of the United States banks. It was urged that the latter had made every effort to drain the state banks, and it was provided that state banks should not be compelled to redeem in specie their bills presented by the national bank officers unless they made oath as to their good intentions. An exemption law for the benefit of the wives and children of honest debtors was passed at this session of the legislature.

Up to this time Georgia had purchased over 15,000,000 acres of land from the Creek Indians and only 1,000,000 from the Cherokees. The Creeks were still in possession of 6,000,000 acres and the Cherokees of 10,000,000 acres, comprised within the territorial limits of the state. The Creeks refused to part with any more of their land, and, having called a council of the chiefs, assumed an attitude of defiance. Every effort was made by the commissioners to conciliate the Indians and bring them to terms, but they stubbornly refused to give up their land.

GOV. TROUP'S ADMINISTRATION.

In the next campaign Mr. Troup renewed his fight for the gubernatorial chair. This time his opponent was Matthew Talbot, a distinguished member of the Clarke party, who held the office of governor for a short while on the death of Gov. Rabun. The campaign was one of marked asperity and the result, on account of the equal numerical strength of the two parties, could not be foreshadowed. As the act of the last legislature, submitting the office to the people, had not as yet become a law, the balloting took place in the legislature. For several days the count proceeded, and the patience of the state was sorely tried. Finally the deadlock was broken on Nov. 6, 1823, by a vote of eighty-five for Troup and eighty-one for Talbot.

Gov. Troup was inaugurated on the following day, and began one of the ablest administrations in the state's history. Endowed with a vigorous intellect, supplemented by the self-improvement derived from study and reflection, Gov. Troup was the peer of any man in Georgia, and his services were marked by the ability and patriotism of a born leader. He had served in the federal senate and house of representatives and had acquired a broad national reputation before he was called upon to exercise the executive functions of the state. In his message to the legislature Gov. Troup called attention to the treaty of 1802, in which the government had agreed to extinguish the Indian claims. He urged them to make a final but courteous appeal to congress in behalf of the state and call for an execution of the contract that was made in good faith. In compliance with this message a petition was sent to congress; but a delegation of Cherokee Indians arrived in Washington, at the same time, and the effect was partially nullified. The Indian delegates were John Ross, George Lowry, Maj. Ridge, and Elijah Hicks, all of them men of intelligence and culture, who understood the English language and represented the best element of their nation. But relief was not forthcoming. In his message to congress the president gave it as his opinion that the United States was under no obligation to forcibly remove the Indians.

Gov. Troup was sorely vexed by the attitude of the president, and did not hesitate to criticise his conduct severely. He protested against the treatment which the claims of Georgia had received and called upon the delegation in congress to use their influence in order to bring about a more thorough understanding of the situation. The matter was eventually referred to a committee, and by this committee the righteous claims of the state were recognized. It was further recommended that as soon as possible the terms of the treaty of 1802 be carried out as prescribed. A second delegation of Cherokees arrived in Washington at this time, and not only refused to cede their lands to the state, but to surrender them under any consideration.

In his second message to the legislature Gov. Troup urged an improvement of the militia, and also a revision of the judiciary system and the penitentiary. He referred to the Indian troubles and begged the legislature to investigate the matter carefully and to be guided by a patriotic sense of duty.

John McPherson Berrien and Thomas W. Cobb were Georgia's representatives at this time in the United States senate.

A conference with the Indians was held in December, 1824, at Broken Arrow, in the Creek territory, for the purpose of securing more lands. The commissioners appointed by the president were James Meriwether and Duncan G. Campbell, of Georgia. The conference was a failure, as the Creeks refused to part with their lands. They were strengthened in their determination by a letter received from the Cherokee nation in which they were urged to hold their ground.

DEATH OF M'INTOSH.

One of the bravest leaders among the Creeks was the chief of the Cowetas, William McIntosh. It was through the influence of McIntosh that a treaty was subsequently made with the Indians, and though he suffered death as the reward of his friendly attitude toward the government, he opened the way for the final exodus of the Creek nation.

On Feb. 10, 1825, a meeting of 400 chiefs was held at Indian Springs. A treaty was signed in which nearly all the Indians present concurred. Those who opposed the treaty withdrew from the conference, and holding a minority council of their own they resolved to keep their lands in their own possession. They sent a delegation to Washington in order to resist the confirmation of the treaty. The senate, however, refused to entertain their protest, and the treaty was confirmed. The Creeks, by this treaty, ceded to the government all the lands lying within the boundaries of the state as defined by the compact of 1802. In consideration of this surrender of their lands they were to receive an equivalent reservation west of the Mississippi river.

The confirmation of this treaty created intense excitement among the protesting Indians, and they resolved upon the death of McIntosh. Fearing hostilities, McIntosh, on behalf of his party, applied to Gov. Troup for protection, and this was promptly granted. Col. Henry G. Lamar was dispatched with a message to the hostile Indians and threatened them with severe punishment in the event they sought to violate the treaty or prevent the execution. In the spring of 1825 Gov. Troup issued a proclamation in which the terms of the treaty were set forth. He also obtained permission from the Creeks to begin a survey of the territory described in the treaty.

During the months that followed a large number of Indians voluntarily gave up their homes and started for the west. In the meantime a party of 170 Indians was organized for the purpose of putting McIntosh to death. They proceeded to his home on the banks of the Chattahoochee river, and at 3 o'clock on the morning of May 1, 1825, they applied their burning torches to the building. The brave chief, on being aroused from his slumbers, comprehended the situation and knew that the hour of death had arrived. He determined, however, to die like a warrior, and to make his death costly to the nation by killing as many of the hostile Indians as he could cover with his gun. Taking refuge in the second story of his house he used four guns in keeping the Indians at bay, and several of them were stretched upon the ground. The flames soon routed the brave chief, and as soon as he exposed himself to the view of his assailants he was promptly shot. His last breath was a shout of defiance, and closing his lips he fell back, never to open them again.

Gov. Troup immediately issued a call for troops to suppress the threatened insurrection and the greatest alarm prevailed. A large number of Indians left for the west and others fled to the white settlements for protection. At a called session of the legislature a survey of the Creek lands was ordered. The president made an effort to stop the proceeding and threatened to arrest the surveyors, but Gov. Troup protested that Georgia owned the soil and had a perfect right to survey her own property. The treaty, being referred to congress, the dispute was temporarily suspended.

GOV. TROUP'S RE-ELECTION AND GEN. LA FAYETTE'S VISIT.

In the fall of 1825 the first popular election for governor was held. The candidates were Gov. Troup and his old opponent, ex-Gov. John Clarke. The campaign was bitterly conducted and many abusive personalities were indulged in. Gov. Troup, on account of the vigorous Indian policy of his administration, desired to be endorsed. At this time there were sixty counties in the state and the election returns were made to the legislature in Milledgeville. On polling the votes it was found that Gov. Troup had received 20,545 and Gen. Clarke 19,862. In the legislature, however, Gen. Clarke had a majority of supporters and under the old system would have been elected.

John Quincy Adams occupied the presidential chair. He was opposed during the campaign by Hon. Wm. H. Crawford of Georgia, who might have been elected to that office had his health not failed.

The year 1825 was signalized by a visit from Gen. LaFayette, who came to this country in the spring of the year. He was feeble and emaciated, and merely came for the purpose of seeing once more before he died the country for whose liberties he had unsheathed his sword. He was received with pronounced affection and was given a cordial welcome to Georgia by Gov. Troup. He stopped at Savannah, Augusta and Milledgeville. At the last named place he was entertained at the governor's mansion and a public dinner was given in his honor.

In January, 1826, a subsequent treaty was made with the Creek Indians, and President Adams recommended to congress its ratification instead of the treaty made at Indian Springs. A large tract of land was to be conveyed by the Indians in consideration of the sum of $200,000, and a perpetual annuity of $20,000. Three hundred thousand acres of land were to be conveyed to the Creeks. The Georgia delegation protested against this treaty, as it was in the nature of a compromise and failed to provide for a removal of the Indians. However, the treaty was ratified in spite of the opposition that was brought to bear against it.

In the summer of 1826 two commissioners from Alabama and three from Georgia were appointed to run the dividing line between the two states. They met at Fort Mitchell in July and began the survey. A difference of opinion sprang up between the commissioners and the Alabama contingent withdrew. The Georgia commissioners proceeded alone and completed their work in September. It was subsequently accepted by Alabama and became the dividing line between the two states.

Gov. Troup refused to recognize the second treaty made by the government with the Creek Indians, and proceeded to survey their territory for the purpose of dividing it into districts. The Indians set up a loud complaint, and a misunderstanding between Georgia and the general government followed. The secretary of war addressed a letter to Gov. Troup, in which he stated that he felt constrained by the plighted faith of the nation to say to Gov. Troup that he considered an entry on the ceded lands a violation of the treaty. A lengthy correspondence ensued, but Gov. Troup refused to stop the survey. When the legislature met he urged that body to organize the territory and make a division of it by lottery.

Having received complaints from the Cherokees as well as from the Creeks, the secretary of war dispatched Lieut. Vinton with instructions to the surveyors to desist from their work. If Gov. Troup refused to permit this military force should be employed. Gov. Troup replied by saying that Georgia was in the right, and if the military force was brought to bear against her she would resist it to the last extremity. The militia of the state was ordered to prepare for hostilities and to be ready in the event of an invasion. The attitude of Georgia in defying the government of the United States indicated the loyalty of her adherence to the principle of state sovereignty. Wiser counsels prevailed at Washington, and Lieut. Vinton was directed to procure, if possible, a friendly cession from the Indians. A meeting of the Creeks was held in November, 1827, at which they agreed to cede all their remaining lands for $28,000. Thus after twenty-five years the compact of 1802, so far as the Creek Indians were concerned, was executed, and their titles to the land of the state extinguished. From the territory thus ceded the counties of Muscogee, Troup, Coweta and Carroll were formed. The land was sub-divided among the people by lottery.

The sum of $10,000 was voted by the legislature this year for internal improvements, and seven persons were designated as a board of public works. At the first meeting of the board it was agreed to make a survey of different portions of the state for the purpose of creating a system of canals. This was abandoned, however, and the question of railroads was discussed. At this time there was only twenty-six miles of railway in the United States and this was owned by the granite quarries of Quincy, Mass. The board existed for a short while only. It was impossible to dig the canals without a large expenditure of money and the railroad was still an experiment. In this quandary the act of the legislature creating the board was repealed.

GOV. FORSYTH'S ADMINISTRATION.

In the fall of 1827 John Forsyth, a distinguished Georgian who had served in the halls of national legislation and who had represented the United States government in the court of Spain, was called to the chair of state vacated by Gov. Troup. He had no opposition on the day of election, as the candidate of the Clarke party, Matthew Talbot, died during the campaign. Gov. Forsyth was a man of distinguished ability and his talents made him a worthy successor to Gov. Troup. President John Quincy Adams, having failed of a re-election, the presidential honors were conferred upon Gen. Andrew Jackson of Tennessee, who took such a distinguished part in the war of 1812. In the selection of his cabinet the claims of Georgia were recognized in the conspicuous talents of Hon. John McPherson Berrien, who was made attorney-general. The congress immediately preceding the election of Gen. Jackson had passed a protective tariff in order to stimulate American industry and to enable home institutions to compete with those abroad. The southern states refused to support the tariff measure, although it was strongly advocated in the north and east.

The candidates for governor at the next election were George R. Gilmer and Joel Crawford. The election resulted in favor of Gilmer by a good majority. The administration of Gov. Forsyth had been one of comparative ease and tranquillity. A rougher sea, however, awaited the inauguration of his successor.

GOV. GILMER'S ADMINISTRATION.

In the selection of Mr. Gilmer to guide the affairs of state the people of Georgia made a wise choice. Born in Wilkes county, he was a thorough Georgian and stood among the leading men of the state. He figured with prominence in the war of 1812, after which he represented Oglethorpe county in the state legislature and subsequently illustrated Georgia in the halls of congress. At the beginning of his administration Gov. Gilmer found the state in a prosperous condition. The cultivation of cotton had become the chief agricultural industry of the state and several hundred thousand bales were annually exported. The population of the state had reached nearly 600,000 souls and numerous public buildings, including houses of worship and educational institutions, had sprung up. Having disposed of the Creek Indians a sequel to this unpleasant chapter was now at hand in the defiant attitude of the Cherokees, who refused to surrender their mountain homes and to give up the domain of their forefathers. They claimed that, having advanced in civilization, the government should allow them to remain and to constitute an independent state in the federal union. They had enacted a system of laws for the regulation of their domestic affairs, and in this connection it may be observed that the Cherokees were the only Indians in America who possessed a written alphabet. In spite of the intelligence that characterized the better class of these Indians, the people of the state continued to clamor for their removal, especially since they were continually harassed along the frontier by Indian depredations. In 1829 Wilson Lumpkin, a representative in congress, introduced a bill providing for the removal of the Cherokees, and this bill was referred to the committee on Indian affairs, who reported it back favorably. An act was subsequently passed providing for a transfer of all the Indian tribes to a government reservation west of the Mississippi river.

THE CHEROKEES REFUSE TO GIVE UP THEIR COUNTRY.

The Cherokees stubbornly refused to consider any proposition that contemplated a surrender of their country. They continued to assert their independence and to resist the laws of the state in deference to their own established legislation. In the meantime, however, an act was passed by the legislature extending the jurisdiction of the courts into the Cherokee domain and holding the Indians amenable for all crimes and depredations committed. The Cherokees entered their indignant protest and employed counsel to represent them in the federal courts. Gov. Gilmer, on the part of the state, and Wm. Wirt, as attorney for the Indians, carried on a lengthy correspondence, the result of which was Gov. Gilmer's positive refusal to submit the matter to the supreme court of the United States, as he held that Georgia had jurisdiction over her own territory.

The situation at this time was further complicated by the discovery of gold which intensified the greed of the white settlers and caused them to encroach upon the Indian lands. In order to stop this illicit gold-digging, stringent measures were adopted by the legislature of 1830, and it was found necessary to employ force in order to stop the Indians and the white settlers, who were both viewed in the light of trespassing upon the state's property. Maj. Wagner of the United States army, with a number of troops, entered the Cherokee domain, and after seizing the provisions and utensils of the gold-diggers he placed the trespassers under arrest. They were subsequently released, however, with the understanding that all illicit gold-digging should be suspended. In the fall of this year a Cherokee Indian by the name of George Tassel was arrested for murder. He was tried before Judge Clayton in the Hall county superior court and sentenced to be hung. Tassel appealed for protection to the supreme court of the United States and Gov. Gilmer was accordingly summoned by Chief Justice John Marshall to appear before him, on behalf of the state of Georgia, in December, 1830.

The legislature directed Gov. Gilmer to ignore all papers that were served upon him, as he represented the sovereignty of the state and Georgia recognized no higher tribunal than her own courts. The authorities of Hall county were directed to proceed at once with the execution of Tassel and this injunction was accordingly obeyed. The bold attitude of the state had its proper effect. The Cherokees appealed to the supreme court to restrain the state of Georgia from exercising jurisdiction over their territory, but the injunction was refused.

In order to keep the white settlers from trespassing upon the Indian lands a law was enacted by the legislature making it a penal offense for a white man to be discovered on the Cherokee lands without permission from the authorities, and the oath of allegiance to the state of Georgia. The penalty for this offense was hard labor in the penitentiary for a term of not less than four years. A number of missionaries who determined to evade the law were arrested, but Judge Clayton held that, since they were merely disbursing charities, they were not amenable to the law and they were thereupon dismissed. Later on, however, Gov. Gilmer learned from the authorities at Washington that they were not authorized agents of the government, and he gave them ten days in which to leave the territory. At the expiration of this time they were tried and convicted. Eight of them were afterward set at liberty on agreeing to recognize the authority of the state, but the others were imprisoned. These eventually were pardoned also on the same conditions.

GOV. LUMPKIN'S ADMINISTRATION.

It was during this critical period that Gov. Wilson Lumpkin was inaugurated. He was the candidate of the Clarke party and defeated Gov. Gilmer, who was the candidate of the Troup party and stood for re-election. Gov. Lumpkin was a Virginian by birth and came to Georgia during his infancy. He lived in Oglethorpe county and was a neighbor of Gov. Gilmer. As soon as the legislature convened Gov. Lumpkin declared himself in favor of appropriating the Indian domain and recommended an immediate survey. The legislature directed the survey to begin on April 1, 1831.

The tariff agitation overshadowed the Indian troubles at this juncture. The southern states, on account of the high tariff duties imposed, felt themselves considerably aggrieved. A convention was held by the people of South Carolina and this was followed by one at Milledgeville in November, 1833. Gov. Gilmer was the presiding officer of the convention. Dissensions arose causing a number of delegates to withdraw, leaving a majority of the members behind; but only a minority of the counties were represented. However, a set of resolutions against the tariff was framed and the convention adjourned to meet in July, 1833. In the meantime President Andrew Jackson was re-elected over Henry Clay of Kentucky, and in his message to congress he recommended a reduction of the tariff. Prior to this South Carolina had threatened to leave the union, but this question was abandoned and peace soon prevailed. A hundred years had elapsed since the settlement of Georgia by Gen. Oglethorpe and the centennial of the state was celebrated on Feb. 13, 1833, with great pomp and ceremony.

Gov. Lumpkin, as the candidate of the union party, as that faction was now called, defeated Joel Crawford, the candidate of the states' rights party, in the October election for governor. In view of the approaching national election Gov. George M. Troup was endorsed by the states' right party for the presidency. He had just resigned his seat in the United States senate. The death of Hon. Wm. H. Crawford on Sept. 15, 1834, removed from the stage of public life one of the grandest men of his day. The latter years of his life were spent in great bodily affliction and, though he presided for a number of years on the bench of the northern circuit, he was not the same man who had graced the French court and aspired to presidential honors. He was buried near his home in Oglethorpe county.

INDIAN DIFFICULTIES RENEWED.

For two or three years no serious depredations were committed by the Cherokees, but in March, 1834, Eli Hicks, a son of one of the Indian chiefs who was friendly to the white settlers and advocated a removal of the tribe, was shot by a band of savage Indians. Numerous outrages followed and several distinguished advocates of the movement suffered the fate of the first Indian martyr.

A division of sentiment among the Cherokees resulted in the formation of two parties, and deputations were sent by each of these to Washington city in February, 1835. John Ross headed the delegation opposed to emigration and John Ridge the one that favored it. Ross, though opposed to leaving the state, was willing to cede the Indian lands for $20,000,000. This proposition was promptly rejected. Ridge asked that a person be designated to meet with his delegation and discuss terms of removal. This was granted and a conference was held at which it was agreed to submit a definite proposition to the Cherokee nation for ratification.

As a result of this conference a meeting with the Indians was held at Running Waters. A number of speeches were made, but nothing was accomplished. Later on a meeting was held at Red Clay, at which resolutions were adopted by the Ridge party favoring emigration. The Ross party having withdrawn from the meeting sent a delegation to Washington city, but the senate refused to entertain their objections.

A treaty with the Cherokees was signed at New Echota on Dec. 21, 1835. By the terms of this treaty the Indians were to give up their lands in Georgia, in consideration of $5,000,000, in addition to a perpetual reservation of 7,000,000 acres of land west of the Mississippi river. The government agreed to protect them in their rights and to maintain them for one year after their removal.

THE CHEROKEE INDIANS REMOVED.

The Indians were allowed to remain in the state two years after the confirmation of the treaty. On May 18, 1838, a military force, in command of Gen. Scott, was ordered out and the collection of the Indians commenced. It was not until the last of June that the Cherokee nation, 14,000 strong, started for the reservation beyond the Mississippi. Just before leaving the state Maj. Ridge and his son, John Ridge, were murdered by unknown hands, supposed to belong to the opposing faction. On the way to the Indian territory a large number of the Cherokees died. Having reached their destination, the pledges of the government were promptly executed, and ever since that time the Cherokees and their descendants have enjoyed their possessions unmolested. They have advanced in civilization and morality, and have frequently imperiled their lives in defense of the national flag.

GOV. SCHLEY'S ADMINISTRATION AND THE CREEK WAR

Gov. Wm. Schley, in the fall election of 1835, received the highest vote for governor and was duly inaugurated. His administration, however, was vexed by troubles with the Creek Indians in Alabama, who were nerved by the outbreak of the Seminole Indians in Florida. They began their hostilities along the Chattahoochee river, in the summer of 1836, and a large number of settlers were murdered. Intense alarm and excitement prevailed throughout the state, and Gov. Schley took the field in person. Volunteer companies were raised and a campaign against the Indians was commenced. Gen. Scott, who was placed in command of the United States forces, proceeded to organize his troops at Columbus, Ga. On account of the destitute condition of the Indians in that neighborhood they shortly surrendered.

The village of Roanoke, on the Chattahoochee, was burned by the Creeks on the night of May 15, 1836. Numerous plantations were destroyed along the river and several bloody engagements between the Indians and the whites occurred. Having committed these depredations, an effort was made by the Creeks to join the Seminoles in Florida. On their way southward they continued to murder the settlers, and having collected a large force of their scattered tribe they proceeded to penetrate the swamps. In the swamps, however, a desperate battle ensued, in which the Indians were driven back with great slaughter by the white forces in command of Maj. Jernigan, who had been stationed to guard the swamps. A second effort to cross the Florida line by the remaining Creeks met with a similar fate, and the nation was compelled to surrender. This closed the era of bloodshed known as the Creek war.

A charter for the first railroad in the state, running between Savannah and Macon, was granted in April, 1833. Later on a survey was made for the purpose of building a road between the Tennessee and the Chattahoochee rivers, in order to join two other proposed lines from Macon and Augusta. From this junction, at a point seven miles east of the Chattahoochee river, was destined to spring the capital of the state and the future metropolis of the south.

In 1837 Emory college was founded at Oxford, Ga., and Dr. Ignatius Few was called to the presidency. Two years later a charter was granted to the trustees of Mercer university, then located in Penfield, Ga. The first of these educational institutions was planted by the Methodists and the second by the Baptists, who named the college in honor of Rev. Jesse Mercer.

GOV. GILMER'S SECOND ELECTION.

For the second time Gov. George R. Gilmer, who had filled the executive chair several years before, was called upon to exercise the functions of the highest official position in the state. This time he defeated Gov. Schley, the candidate of the union party for re-election. It was during Gov. Gilmer's term of office that the Cherokee Indians were removed. Still another important event that gives it prominence is the charter creating the first female college in the world. It was tendered to the Methodist church, by which denomination it was given the name of the Wesleyan Female college, and Bishop Geo. F. Pierce was called to the president's chair.

The building of railroads was now carried on with astonishing rapidity. Nearly 700 miles had been completed. A stimulus to the manufacturing industries had been received and over $3,000,000 had been invested. The population of the state, according to the census of 1840, was nearly 700,000 people, and the annual exports amounted to $7,000,000. The chief cities of the state were Savannah, Augusta, Macon and Columbus. From every direction the tide of immigration had set in, the resources of the state had commenced to attract attention, and the future prosperity of Georgia was now assured by every sign.

GOV. M'DONALD'S ADMINISTRATION.

The next governor of the state was Chas. J. McDonald, a native of South Carolina and a man of distinguished ability. His defeated opponent in the October election was Charles Dougherty, the candidate of the state's rights party.

A stringency in the money market at the beginning of Gov. McDonald's administration made it very unpleasant for that official, but the complaint of hard times was not by any means restricted to the state of Georgia. A number of banks throughout the country suspended operations, and it was necessary to call an extra session of congress to relieve the distress of the situation. An act was passed providing relief in what was known as the sub-treasury system, and authorizing the issue of treasury notes to the amount of $10,000,000.

In Georgia a number of banks suspended the payment of specie, thereby entailing great disaster upon the state; numerous measures were resorted to by the legislature, but no relief was given and the people continued to suffer. The price of cotton continued to drop and the situation assumed daily a more alarming aspect. Finally a bill was passed by the legislature of 1840 requiring all banks to resume the payment of specie by the act of February, 1831, under the penalty of forfeiting their charters by a failure to comply with this demand.

An unsuccessful effort was made by the Seminoles to invade the southern portion of the state this year. Gen. Nelson was dispatched to the frontier with a volunteer force hastily collected, and the Indians were repulsed with great loss and bloodshed. In the national election of 1840 Gen. Wm. Henry Harrison, the candidate of the whig party, was elected over Martin Van Buren, who sought a re-election. The whigs contended that the hard times were caused by the administration, and for that reason Mr. Van Buren was defeated. The death of Gen. Harrison a month after his inauguration caused a deep sorrow all over the nation, and Georgia shared in the grief that mourned the loss of this truly great and good man.

In spite of the fact that Mr. Van Buren had been defeated in the national election by the cry of hard times attributed to his administration, the opposite result was observed in Georgia. In the fall election of 1841 Gov. McDonald was re-elected over Wm. C. Dawson, one of the most popular men in the state. The establishment of a new state bank at Savannah with several branches located in other parts of the state was recommended by Gov. McDonald as a substitute for the local banks; but as these latter institutions had resumed the payment of specie, no measures of relief were adopted.

The creation of a supreme court, or court of appeals, was strongly urged upon the legislature by Gov. McDonald. A uniform administration of the law made it imperatively necessary for such a tribunal to be established. The advice of Gov. McDonald was acted upon two years later.

The country was still in a very depressed financial condition, and the legislature of 1842 was about to adjourn without making any provision for the current expenses of the year. In this perplexity Gov. McDonald issued an order to the treasurer directing him to suspend all payments, except by legal warrants, as the legislature was about to adjourn, leaving an empty treasury. It was necessary to pay the interest on the public debt, to defray the expenses of protecting the frontier and to meet the running expenses of the government. Unable to draw their salaries by reason of this effective move on the part of Gov. McDonald, the members of the legislature lost no time in passing a general appropriation bill, under which the financial affairs of the state were successfully managed.

The legislature of 1842 severely criticised Senator Berrien because of his failure to represent the views of the state in his support of the national bank bill and the land distribution bill. He was asked to resign, but stubbornly refused to do so. In the legislature of the following year the whig element predominated, and the course of Senator Berrien was warmly approved. The lunatic asylum, for which provision was made in 1837, was formally opened this year. The discovery of anaesthesia, produced by sulphuric ether, also belongs to this year, and Dr. Crawford W. Long, of Athens, Ga., is entitled to the credit of having contributed to medical science one of its greatest boons. Though Dr. Long's discovery has been disputed, his claims have been recognized by the state, and his portrait is hung upon the marble walls of her capitol.

For several years prior to these events the state of Georgia had been deeply concerned about the annexation of Texas. At this time Texas formed a part of the Mexican republic, but was not given the full privileges of statehood. The people of Texas, as soon as Santa Anna, who had declared himself dictator, refused to admit her into the Mexican union, declared a revolution. Col. J. H. Fannin, of Georgia, and Col. Mirabeau B. Lamar were among the first to enlist in the struggle for Texan independence. Gen. Sam Houston was put in command of all the forces at the beginning of hostilities. The treacherous character of the Mexicans and their brutal massacre of the Texans greatly incensed the people of Georgia. In June, 1836, however, Gen. Houston defeated Santa Anna, and the independence of the Texas republic was recognized. Texas then applied for admission into the American union, and a great national issue was thus created. James K. Polk, the presidential candidate who favored the admission of Texas, with all it entailed in the way of protection, was elected to office, and Texas was formally admitted into the sisterhood of the American union. The whigs of Georgia nominated Geo. W. Crawford for governor and favored the election of Henry Clay for president. The democrats nominated Mark A. Cooper for governor and espoused the claims of Mr. Polk for the presidency. In the fall election Mr. Crawford, the whig candidate, was elected governor; but Mr. Polk, the democratic choice for president, carried the state by 2,000 votes, the year following.

GOV. CRAWFORD'S ADMINISTRATION AND THE MEXICAN WAR.

The whig convention met in the summer of 1843 and nominated George W. Crawford for governor. Presidential delegates were also elected to vote for Henry Clay and to urge the nomination of Mr. Berrien, a distinguished son of Georgia, for the vice-presidency. Mr. Crawford's opponent was Hon. Mark A.

Cooper, the candidate of the democratic party. Mr. Cooper received a flattering vote, but failed to secure the gubernatorial chair.

The newly-elected governor was a native of Columbia county, Ga., and for several years had been a prominent figure in the state. Gov. Crawford's first message to the legislature was a noble document and clearly evinced his familiarity with the situation. His report of the state's progress was very encouraging. An important measure was adopted by the general assembly of this year, reducing the number of senators to forty-seven, one from each senatorial district, and the representatives to one hundred and thirty, elected from each county. A committee appointed by the legislature to examine the treasury reported that Gov. Crawford was rapidly paying off the public debt and that, financially, the state was never in a more prosperous condition.

The strength of the two opposing parties in the state was equally matched in the congressional election of 1844, the delegation containing four whigs and four democrats. The democrats were Lumpkin, Cobb, Jones and Haralson; the whigs, King, Poe, Toombs, and Stephens. In the presidential election Mr. Polk, the successful candidate, carried the state by a good majority.

The popularity of Gov. Crawford's administration was such that in the summer of 1845 he was again the unanimous choice of the whig party, and defeated M. H. McAllister, the democratic candidate. Just before the re-election of Mr. Crawford the Georgia railroad had been completed to Atlanta and the success of this enterprise was signalized by a great demonstration held at Walton Spring in September, 1845. Atlanta was a small village at this time, and her population scarcely exceeded 500 people.

Since the admission of Texas into the Union was an issue in the presidential campaign, the election of Mr. Polk and his subsequent inauguration on March 4, 1845, was in effect a declaration of hostilities against Mexico in behalf of Texas. Mexico resented the interference of the United States and refused to recognize the independence of the Texas republic. Gen. Zachary Taylor, in command of the army at this time, was ordered to the frontier, and difficulties ensued immediately upon his arrival. While Gen. Taylor was thus engaged in driving back the swarthy Mexicans a formal declaration of war was made by the United States in May, 1845. The war department, in the spring of 1846, called upon the state of Georgia to furnish a volunteer regiment to serve twelve months. The martial enthusiasm of the state was fully aroused, and no difficulty was experienced in raising the necessary troops. From every part of the state letters were received from ardent and impulsive spirits, eager to rush into the fight. On June 20, 1846, the regiment was organized at Columbus, Ga., with Henry R. Jackson, of Savannah, Ga., as colonel. The regiment under Col. Jackson immediately repaired to the scene of hostilities and remained for twelve months on the frontier. Though not participating in the actual clash of the opposing armies, the regiment did much effective service. Nearly 150 men died from sickness on the plains. The return of the regiment elicited a complimentary resolution from the legislature, commending its conspicuous valor and the patriotic service rendered the country.

Among the gallant Georgians who distinguished themselves in the Mexican war were Gen. Wm. S. Walker, Capt. Hardee and Lieut. Wm. M. Gardner, each of them receiving a sword in recognition of his valor. Col. James McIntosh, a hero of 1812, who took an active part in the war, fell in the bloody engagement at El Molino del Rey. Capt. Josiah Tattnall and Gen. David E. Twiggs also acquitted themselves with distinguished ability and reflected additional honor upon southern chivalry. The defeat of Santa Anna by Gen. Taylor on Sept. 13, 1847, closed the bloody drama, and a treaty of peace was concluded on Feb. 2, 1848, by which the United States gained the territory of California, New Mexico, Utah and Texas, in consideration of $15,000.

An important event that marked the administration of Gov. Crawford was the organization of the supreme court of Georgia. For several years the lawyers of the state had been clamoring for this court of appeals, in order to establish a uniform administration of justice, and to correct the errors of the lower courts of law and equity. Hon. Joseph Henry Lumpkin was made chief justice with Eugenius A. Nisbet and Hiram Warner as associate justices. The state has never been served by abler or purer men than these illustrious pioneers of the supreme bench. Senator Berrien, who had resigned his seat in the United States senate on account of public censure, was triumphantly re-elected by the legislature as a mark of confidence and esteem.

ADMINISTRATION OF GOV. TOWNS AND THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

In the fall election of 1847 Geo. W. Towns, the democratic candidate for governor, defeated Duncan L. Clinch, the candidate of the whig party. Gov. Towns was a native of Wilkes county and had served the state on the floor of congress. At the first session of the legislature Hon. Wm. C. Dawson was elected to the senate of the United States and quite a number of important laws were enacted.

Gen. Zachary Taylor, the whig candidate, in the presidential election of 1848, defeated Lewis Cass, the democratic nominee. In addition to these the free-soilers, opposed to the extension of slavery in the newly admitted states, nominated Martin Van Buren. The campaign resulted in the triumph of the whig party. In dispensing the patronage of his administration the president called to the portfolio of war, Geo. W. Crawford of Georgia.

The year 1849 was marked by the completion of the Western & Atlantic railroad from Chattanooga to Atlanta and the re-election of Gov. Towns to the chair of state. The agitation of slavery had now commenced in real earnest, and the stormy debates on the floor of congress emphasized the intensity of the situation. These debates were precipitated by the admission of California into the Union and by the proposition to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. The southern states insisted that no restriction be placed upon the territories or the newly-admitted states, and urged the enactment of a law providing for the restoration of fugitive slaves. A brilliant son of Georgia was at this time speaker of the house of representatives and held the reins with a firm grasp. This was Howell Cobb. He had been elected to the speakership after months of ineffectual balloting, the opposition being pronounced on account of the slavery agitation.

In his message to the legislature, following the stormy scenes that had been enacted on the floors of congress, Gov. Towns urged the legislature to pass a resolution authorizing him to call a convention in the interest of the state's sovereignty and to see that the rights of Georgia were properly respected. The suggestion of Gov. Towns was not only adopted, but the legislature added that if congress persisted in its aggressive legislation that Georgia would adopt secession as a remedy.

During this period of excitement the country was shocked by the death of President Zachary Taylor in July, 1850. He was succeeded by the vice-president, Millard Fillmore.

The compromise measure of 1850, introduced by Henry Clay, afforded temporary relief to the situation. California was admitted into the Union as a free state, the slave trade was forbidden in the District of Columbia, a law was passed for the arrest and return of fugitive slaves and $10,000,000 was paid to Texas for the recently acquired territory of New Mexico.

In accordance with the resolution of the state legislature Gov. Towns issued a call for a convention. Two hundred and sixty delegates, a majority of them from the union party, as opposed to the southern rights party, met at Milledgeville in December, 1850. A platform was reported to the convention by Chas. J. Jenkins, the chairman, in which the devotion of Georgia to the Federal constitution was affirmed, together with her insistence upon the doctrine of state rights and her willingness, in behalf of the national harmony, to abide by the compromise measure of Mr. Clay.

During the ten years that had elapsed since the last official census the population of the state had increased to 906,185 souls, more than a third of this number being slaves. The industries of the state had correspondingly increased.

GOV. COBB'S ADMINISTRATION.

The popularity of Howell Cobb was emphasized in the fall election of 1851 by his successful campaign for governor, the defeated candidate being Chas. J. McDonald, one of the best and purest of Georgia's public men. Gov. Cobb was born in Jefferson county, Ga., and was a son of Jno. A. Cobb, a native of North Carolina. He had filled several positions of honor prior to his election as speaker of the national house of representatives and was one of the leading figures of the country. Gov. Cobb was elected as the candidate of the union party. A condition of unusual prosperity marked the state at the beginning of Gov. Cobb's administration. The expenses of the state were promptly met and a fair appropriation was made for the encouragement of education. The sum of $10,000 was appropriated for the Georgia Academy for the Blind, and $500,000 for needed repairs on the Western & Atlantic railroad.

In the presidential election of 1852 Franklin Pierce, the nominee of the democratic party, was the successful candidate. A number of votes in Georgia were cast for ex-Gov. Geo. M. Troup.

GOV. JOHNSON'S ADMINISTRATION.

Herschel V. Johnson, the democratic aspirant for governor, defeated Chas. J. Jenkins for that office in the fall of 1853. Gov. Johnson was a native of Burke county. He was a man of rare accomplishments and had filled many positions of honor and responsibility. On the resignation of Hon. Walter T. Colquitt as United States senator he had been appointed by Gov. Towns to that august and dignified body. The administration of Gov. Johnson, like that of his predecessor, was marked by great internal improvement. A number of steamboat, factory, banking and telegraph companies were incorporated and several railroad charters granted. A joint committee was appointed to investigate the condition of the state road.

A disposition on the part of several of the northern states to renew the slavery agitation was resisted by a resolution of the state legislation in 1854, deploring this fact and expressing the determination of Georgia to adhere to the compromise of 1850. A new party sprang up in Georgia at this time. The whigs and the democrats had substantially embraced the same political faith, and the principles of the new party, opposed to alien suffrage and Catholic office-holding, were promulgated by those who styled themselves Americans. In the contest of 1855 Gov. Johnson defeated Garnett Andrews, the candidate of the American party.

On account of the heavy increase of legislative business a constitutional amendment was adopted restricting the power of the legislature and conferring certain powers upon the state courts, as changing the names of persons and establishing bridges and ferries. The granting of charters was afterward conferred also.

The indications of a renewal of the agitation of slavery were beginning to make themselves apparent and a prudent foresight prompted the legislature to provide for the assembling of a state convention whenever the aggressive attitude of congress should make it necessary. A convention of the anti-slavery men was held in Philadelphia in June, 1856, and the republican party, based on an opposition to slavery in the territories, was formally organized. At this convention John C. Fremont was nominated for the presidency.

The democrats nominated James Buchanan for president and Jno. C. Breckinridge for vice-president. They adopted the compromise of 1850. Still a third candidate was put in the field, Millard Fillmore being the choice of the American party. In the ensuing election the democrats triumphed by an overwhelming majority. President Buchanan appointed Howell Cobb of Georgia secretary of the treasury.

GOV. BROWN'S ELECTION.

Perhaps the most exciting gubernatorial contest ever known in the history of the state occurred at this period. After an exciting personal campaign the democratic convention met at Milledgeville in the fall of 1857 and the names of five distinguished Georgians were presented for the office. These were James Gardner, John H. Lumpkin, Hiram Warner, Henry J. Lamar and Wm. H. Stiles. Having adopted the two-thirds rule the balloting proceeded for three days, and great excitement prevailed. Finally it was moved that a committee of three from each district be appointed to make a nomination. This motion prevailed and the committee reported to the convention the name of Joseph E. Brown. This distinguished Georgian, whose public services were afterward so closely interwoven with the history of the state, was comparatively unknown at this time. He represented the farming interests of North Georgia, and at the time of his election he was at work in his wheat field.

In the bitter campaign that followed his nomination Brown was opposed by that brilliant and illustrious Georgian, whose talents as an orator have never been eclipsed, Benjamin H. Hill. Mr. Hill was the candidate of the American party. His speeches during the campaign were characterized by a fervid brilliancy that sharply contrasted with those of his opponent, but he represented the weaker party, and, in spite of his own personal magnetism, his flag went down on the political field.

Gov. Brown was only thirty-six years old at the time of his election. He was born in South Carolina, and came to Georgia with his father at a very early age. In spite of hardships and reverses he succeeded in obtaining a meager education. He settled in Canton, Ga., and was shortly afterward admitted to the bar. He was subsequently elected to the state senate, and afterward to the bench of Blue Ridge circuit. During the campaign Gov. Brown developed the qualities of leadership that distinguished him in after life, and clearly evinced that he was a man of destiny. The administration of Gov. Brown was characterized at the start by his attitude toward the banking institutions of the state. On account of the financial stringency a number of these had suspended the payment of specie in the interest of their own preservation. They alleged that heavy drafts from the north made it absolutely necessary. In his inaugural address Gov. Brown, in spite of this defense, declared that he would institute proceedings against the banks for a forfeiture of their charters. He failed to secure the co-operation of the general assembly, however, and a bill was introduced holding up all forfeiture proceedings for one year. This bill was warmly discussed, but finally passed, only to receive Gov. Brown's prompt veto. It was returned to the general assembly and passed over his veto by a two-thirds majority. This caused a breach of feeling between the executive and the legislature, but nothing could be accomplished, as matters were at a standstill for at least a year.

The press of the state sternly criticised the attitude of Gov. Brown, but his official conduct was approved by the people at large. The banks resumed their specie payments during the following year. As a result of Gov. Brown's vigorous measures an alteration in the banking system was adopted that proved greatly beneficial to the state.

A charter having been granted to the Air Line railroad, the corporation selected Jonathan Norcross as the first president. On account of several difficulties in the way, including the rupture between the states, the building of the road was not commenced until several years later. It was finally completed to Charlotte in October, 1873, at a cost of nearly $8,000,000. The legislature of 1857 re-elected Robert Toombs to the senate of the United States. In this body Mr. Toombs was the peer of the strongest men in the nation, and he was considered by many as the intellectual and oratorical successor of Daniel Webster. At this session of the legislature the law governing the session of the general assembly was repealed, and instead of meeting biennially, a yearly session of forty days, unless extended by a two-thirds vote, was agreed upon.

On account of the failure of the state road to yield a sufficient income to the state Gov. Brown decided upon its reorganization. He adopted a rigid policy, but one that built up the road and made it pay a handsome sum into the state treasury.

GOV. BROWN'S RE-ELECTION AND THE BEGINNING OF HOSTILITIES.

The election of Gov. Brown in 1859 was followed by a renewal of the slavery agitation. Compromises were no longer discussed, and the nation was now confronted with the issue, slavery or anti-slavery. The quietude of the preceding years had only been a prelude to this tremendous outbreak, and no power could now check the irresistible current of events. Public meetings in the north left no doubt upon the public mind as to the feelings and attitude of that section of the country, and the frightful realities of dissolution responded to the faintest exercise of the imagination. The indignation of the south was highly inflamed at this critical juncture by the celebrated John Brown raid upon the arsenal at Harper's Ferry. He was captured and prosecuted in the courts of Virginia for inciting the negroes, and on being found guilty of the charges he was executed.

The national democratic convention met in Charleston in April, 1860. Georgia had held two state conventions, electing the same delegates to represent the state at each of them. The first instructed for Howell Cobb, but the second refused to give instructions. In a personal letter addressed to one of the delegates Mr. Cobb declined to allow his name to be presented. A deplorable division of sentiment distracted the national convention. The platform committee submitted three reports to the convention, one from the majority, and two from the minority. The northern delegates in the convention largely predominated, and in spite of lengthy debates they refused to be led by the sentiment of the south. This led to a withdrawal of the southern delegates under the leadership of William L. Yancey. A convention was called to meet at Richmond, Va., in June, 1860. The remaining delegates to the Charleston convention also adjourned to meet in Baltimore in June. The fate of the democratic party was thus distinctly foreshadowed in this unfortunate division.

The Baltimore convention nominated John Bell for president and Edward Everett for vice-president. At the Richmond convention the delegates were still divided, and several states, among them Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky and Oregon, withdrew. Caleb Cushing, the chairman of the convention, resigned his position to follow the seceding delegates. Those remaining in the convention nominated Stephen A. Douglas for the presidency and Herschel V. Johnson for the vice-presidency. The seceding delegates nominated John C. Breckinridge for president and Joseph Lane for vice-president.

The republican convention met in the city of Chicago and presented a solid organization. A platform antagonistic to slavery was adopted, and Abraham Lincoln was nominated for the presidency, with Hannibal Hamlin for the vice-presidency.

The division in the democratic ranks made an easy success for the republicans. They carried the fall elections by a large majority. In Georgia the popular vote was given to Breckinridge, closely followed by Bell. More than 11,000 votes were also given to Douglas.

The election of Mr. Lincoln and the success of the republican party revived the determination of the south to secede from the Union. South Carolina, always impulsive, was the first to act. The ordinance of secession was passed in that state on Dec. 20, 1860, the convention charging that congress had openly violated the constitution and virtually annulled the compact existing between the states of the American Union.

Just at this time the prosperity of Georgia was unprecedented, and the threatened dissolution of the Union was a serious menace to her progress. Her population had increased to 1,057,286, and twenty-six banking institutions, in addition to several railroad corporations, had been chartered. During one year alone the public wealth of the state had increased over $60,000,000. Commerce and agriculture had been greatly stimulated, and the resources of the state were daily multiplied.

In his message to the legislature Gov. Brown gave a gratifying report of the state road, showing that $450,000 had been paid into the state treasury. The legislature appropriated $75,000 for the purchase of arms, and recommended a further appropriation of $1,000,000 to defend the state from invasion. The office of adjutant-general was created, an order was made for 10,000 volunteer troops, and 1,000 rifles and carbines were purchased for the use of the militia in the event of hostilities.

GEORGIA PASSES THE ORDINANCE OF SECESSION.

In spite of these preparations for war the counsels of two eloquent and patriotic Georgians urged upon the people of the state the need of calmness and deliberation. These were Alexander H. Stephens and Benjamin H. Hill. They opposed secession with great eloquence, and were followed by a large number of supporters who thought it wiser to remain in the Union. On the contrary, influences were steadily at work in favor of secession. Howell Cobb resigned his position as secretary of the treasury under President Buchanan, and he and his brilliant brother, Thomas R. Cobb, who had never taken an active part in politics, boldly and openly avored secession. The influences of such men as ex-Gov. Wilson Lumpkin and Robert Toombs were also thrown in this direction. In the midst of this exciting campaign the news was received in Georgia that South Carolina had seceded from the Union. Gov. Brown promptly issued an order to the First regiment of Georgia volunteers, under Col. A. R. Lawton, to seize Fort Pulaski, at the mouth of the Savannah river, and to hold it until the meeting of the secession convention on Jan. 16, 1861. The fort was seized on Jan. 3, and Gov. Brown immediately telegraphed his action to the various governors in the south.

The legislature having called for a state convention to consider the advisability of secession, this body met on Jan. 16, 1861. It was the ablest body of men that ever assembled in the state, and the friends and foes of secession were both represented. Hon. George W. Crawford, one of the ablest political leaders in the state, and a man of national reputation, having served in the president's cabinet, was selected as the chairman of the convention. Among the delegates were Robert Toombs, in the prime of his intellectual strength, Alexander H. Stephens and his brother Linton Stephens, ex-Gov. Herschel V. Johnson, Eugenius A. Nisbet, Benjamin H. Hill, Alfred R. Colquitt, Henry L. Benning, Hiram Warner, Francis S. Bartow, Thomas R. R. Cobb, and many other brilliant public men. The interested gaze of the nation was fixed upon this dignified and august assembly. The ordinance of secession was prepared and introduced by Judge E. A. Nisbet, a man of blameless life and distinguished reputation. Albert Lamar was elected secretary of the convention. Gov. Brown and Hon. Howell Cobb were invited to seats on the floor. Before proceeding to business the convention listened to an able address from Hon. James L. Orr, commissioner from South Carolina, and Hon. John G. Shorter, of Alabama, who urged upon the convention, on behalf of their respective states, the importance of secession. The discussion of the great question was formally precipitated by the resolution introduced by Judge Nisbet. A substitute for this resolution was offered by ex-Gov. Johnson, calling for a convention of the southern states to meet in Atlanta, Ga., in February.

The scene that followed the introduction of this resolution was one that can never be described. Eloquence never soared to such heights, and the storm of enthusiasm resembled a wild, tumultuous sea. Speeches were made in favor of secession by Judge Nisbet, Thomas R. R. Cobb, Robert Toombs, Aug. Reese, and Francis S. Bartow. Those who eloquently opposed immediate secession were Johnson, Stephens and Hill. The convention seemed to be in favor of adopting the substitute until the brilliant speech of Thomas R. R. Cobb, in which he declared that better terms could be made outside the Union than in it, and appealed to the Union sentiment in favor of secession. The substitute was lost, and the vote on the original resolution stood 166 in favor of secession to 130 against it. The committee presenting the ordinance of secession to the convention was composed of the following: E. A. Nisbet, chairman; Robert Toombs, H. V. Johnson, F. S. Bartow, H. L. Benning, W. M. Brown, G. D. Rice, T. H. Tripple, T. R. R. Cobb, A. H. Kenan, A. H. Stephens, James Williamson, D. P. Hill, Augustus Reese, B. H. Hill, E. W. Chastain and A. H. Colquitt.

The ordinance of secession was adopted on Jan. 19, 1861, and thus Georgia formally seceded from the American Union. The announcement was received with great enthusiasm through the state and south. As soon as Georgia declared her intention to quit the Union Gov. Brown ordered the state troops to seize the Federal arsenal at Augusta. The garrison was in command of Capt. Arnold Edzey, with eighty United States soldiers. Terms of surrender were agreed upon, and the ensign of the state was hoisted in place of the Federal flag. The passage of the ordinance of secession resulted in the resignation of the following congressmen: Martin J. Crawford, L. J. Gartrell, Thomas J. Hardeman, Peter E. Love, James Jackson, John Jones and J. W. H. Underwood. The only member of the Georgia delegation who refused to resign was Joshua Hill.

ORGANIZATION OF THE CONFEDERACY.

In pursuance of a call for a convention of the seceding states the convention met at Montgomery, Ala., on Feb. 4, 1861. Six states were represented: Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, was made the chairman of the convention. The principal work of the convention was to form a provisional government and to elect officers for the Confederacy. The choice of the convention for president was Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi, and for vice-president, Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia. Mr. Davis was installed on Feb. 18, about two weeks in advance of President Lincoln's inauguration. The first official act of President Davis was to appoint a committee, consisting of Messrs. M. J. Crawford, of Georgia; John Forsyth, of Alabama, and A. B. Roman, of Louisiana, to proceed to Washington and treat for a peaceful adjustment of all the issues between the two governments. The committee, however, failed to accomplish its mission.

At a peace convention held in Washington city thirteen states were represented, but nothing resulted from the convention. On March 7, 1861, a state convention was held in Savannah for the purpose of framing a new state constitution, and to adopt such measures as were necessary to defend the state in the event of war. Gov. Brown was equal to the exactions of his high office at this critical period. He placed Maj. Gen. W. H. T. Walker in command of a large body of troops, contracted for a number of large cannon, and seized the government mint at Dahlonega, Ga., capturing $20,000 in gold.

FORT SUMTER TAKEN.

The war between the states being now at hand the state of Georgia no longer presented a division in her ranks. From the mountains to the sea the state was enthusiastic in its loyal adherence to the young Confederacy. Nearly all the forts and magazines belonging to the United States and located within the limits of the Confederacy were captured except Fort Sumter, on the South Carolina coast, and Fort Pickens, at Pensacola. President Davis made a requisition upon Gov. Brown for a regiment of soldiers to defend the strongholds of Pensacola, and such was the patriotic feeling of the state that over 250 volunteer companies were organized. A regiment was formed from a careful selection of these companies, and Col. J. N. Ramsey was put in command, with J. O. Clark lieutenant-colonel, G. B. Thompson major. Commodore Josiah Tattnall was placed in charge of the gunboats along the coast near Savannah.

The first thunders of battle that inaugurated the fighting drama of the war between the states now shook the country in the fall of Fort Sumter. Maj. Anderson, the Federal officer in charge, surrendered to Gen. Beauregard on April 13, 1861. About 100 soldiers were employed in the defense of Fort Sumter at the time of the bombardment. The feelings of the nation were now fully aroused, and both the north and the south were stirred to vigorous measures in prosecuting the war. President Lincoln, in behalf of the government of the United States, issued a call for 75,000 volunteers. Defiant responses to this call were made by several of the southern states that still remained in the Union. These were Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas and Missouri. In a few days Virginia seceded from the Union, followed by North Carolina, Tennessee and Arkansas. These additional states greatly strengthened the Confederacy, but, as compared with the states remaining in the Union, the population of the United States was 23,000,000, and that of the Confederate states only 8,000,000. Besides this the south was comparatively without coast protection.

The extension of the territorial boundary of the Confederacy made it necessary to change the capital from Montgomery to Richmond. The congress that assembled in Richmond called for volunteers, and each of the seceding states promptly responded. Companies were organized in all parts of the south, and it was evident that southern chivalry was ready with the great issues that distracted the country, and to settle them at the point of the bayonet.

The Federal army sustained a severe defeat on July 21, 1861, at the first battle of Manassas. A number of brave Georgians were killed in this engagement, among them Col. William T. Wilson and Gen. Francis S. Bartow. Gen. Bartow was killed at the head of his brigade, falling in the thick of the battle, and exclaiming as he fell: "They have killed me, but never give up." This brave utterance from the lips of the heroic Bartow is fully in keeping with his patriotic declaration as he left Savannah for the front. Said he: "I go to illustrate Georgia," and well did he illustrate the valor of the old commonwealth. It was largely due to the heroism inspired by this gallant officer that the Confederates lost only 2,000 men, against 3,000 Federals.

In order to prepare for a more thorough defense of the state the coast protection was assigned to Gen. A. R. Lawton, and the naval forces were placed in command of Commodore Josiah Tattnall. On account of the scarcity of guns and ammunition Gov. Brown called upon the people to dedicate their rifles and shotguns to the Confederacy. A convention was held in Atlanta on July 3, 1861, to consider the financial problems of the new government, and to discuss the issuance of Confederate money.

Fort Pulaski, at the mouth of the Savannah river, was equipped at a heavy cost to the state, and three war steamers were purchased. The attitude of Georgia was bold, defiant and patriotic. Up to this time she had furnished 30,000 soldiers to the war.

At a meeting of the Confederate congress in July an issue of $50,000,000 in bonds was authorized. The issue was made, and a large number of these bonds were purchased by Georgia planters. The example of Bartow in giving his sword to the southern cause was followed by Gens. Howell and T. R. R. Cobb. In a few weeks Gen. Toombs, unable to resist the martial impulse, also took the field.

In the fall of 1861 Gov. Brown was re-elected governor of the state by a handsome majority. In his message to the legislature he showed that Georgia had sent fifty regiments into the field and had appropriated $1,500,000 from the pockets of her people. The legislature appropriated large sums of money this year for the erection of hospitals and military supplies. Benjamin H. Hill and Robert Toombs were elected to represent the state in the Confederate senate, but Gen. Toombs, declining to serve on account of his preference for the field, left the office to be filled by Gov. Brown, who appointed Dr. John W. Lewis. The following brigadier-generals were in the field from Georgia: Howell Cobb, Thomas R. R. Cobb, Henry R. Jackson, W. H. T. Walker, A. R. Lawton, A. R. Wright, and A. H. Colquitt. In addition to these, two major-generals were commissioned, these being Gens. David E. Twiggs and W. J. Hardee.

At the close of the year 1861 the northern army in Virginia under Gen. McClellan numbered 150,000 men, opposed by only 100,000 Confederates.

THE WAR BETWEEN THE STATES.

No southern state eclipsed Georgia in her devotion to the principles on which her withdrawal from the Union was based, and the courage displayed by her in maintaining these principles made her the acknowledged peer of any state in the Confederacy. The year 1862 reversed the fortunes of the south, and defeat and failure followed in the wake of the brilliant victories of the preceding year. Troops were marshaled into the field on both sides. The total strength of the Federal army was nearly 800,000, while that of the Confederate forces was short of 300,000. Among the Confederate losses that dismayed the soldiers at the beginning of the campaign was the capture of Roanoke Island by Gen. Burnside. This strongly fortified garrison off the coast of North Carolina was a capital prize for the Federal army, and a corresponding loss to the southern cause.

The Confederate government called for additional troops to enter the field. Twelve regiments was the demand made upon Georgia, in addition to a war tax of $2,000,000. Both exactions were promptly met. The martial debt was paid and the regiments were furnished. Gen. Henry R. Jackson was promoted to the rank of major-general and placed in charge of the coast defense. Gen. Lawton was placed in command of the Confederate troops in Georgia. Federal operations were soon directed against the coast near Savannah, and Gen. Pemberton, who was in charge of the Confederate troops, was obliged to retreat from Tybee and Warsaw islands. Preparations were then started by the Federals for making an attack on Fort Pulaski. This garrison consisted of only 350 men, in command of Col. Charles Olmstead. Col. Olmstead refused to surrender the fort, stating that his duty was to defend it. Starvation, however, soon confronted his men and he was forced to yield.

Nearly all the troops that Georgia had furnished up to this time had enlisted in the service of the state for a brief period only. Events were such, however, as to make it necessary for a longer term to be prescribed, and for those whose terms had already expired to re-enlist for the war. The fall of Fort Pulaski was a final argument to all who hesitated, and the organization of troops now commenced in good earnest. The chivalry of the state leaped, as it were, into the saddle, and with drawn saber plunged into the fight, thus illustrating the martial spirit of the brave Bartow in the proffered services of a thousand gallant young Georgians. An act was passed by the Confederate congress in 1862, known as the conscript act, that led to a serious controversy between Gov. Brown and President Davis. It required all able-bodied men between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five to enlist in the war. The legality of this act was stoutly opposed by Gov. Brown, who was nevertheless put under the constraint of complying with the provisions. He proved, however, that Georgia required no conscript act to martialize her brave sons by supplying to the Confederacy more regiments each time than were demanded.

An effort was made during this year by a band of Federal spies to capture an engine and several cars belonging to the Western & Atlantic railroad. A number of them boarded the train at Marietta while the engineer and conductor were at breakfast, and leaving the coaches behind, started for the north. Discovering the design of the spies the chief of the motive power immediately started in hot pursuit of the fugitives. They were soon overtaken and a number of them captured, including the ringleader of the band, a man by the name of Andrews. Andrews had a large sum of money on his person, and offered $10,000 to be released. The men were tried and eight of them convicted. They were brought to Atlanta and executed near Walton Spring in April, 1862.

A number of decisive battles were gained by the Federals in the south and west during the early part of this year, New Orleans and Memphis being among the chief cities taken. During the latter part of the year, however, the Confederates under Gen. Lee were more successful, and Gens. McClellan, Pope and Burnside were successively defeated. Gen. Thomas R. R. Cobb was one of the illustrious victims of the southern cause who fell during the latter part of the year. He was killed at the battle of Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862. A monument on the spot, commemorating the valor of the distinguished Georgian, has since been erected.

A large sum of money was appropriated by the legislature that met in November, 1862, for war purposes, and also for the erection of hospitals. Before the war closed Georgia had sent 75,000 men to the front, in addition to the state troops, that numbered about 8,000 men. An armory for the manufacture of guns had also been established in the state penitentiary.

President Lincoln, at the beginning of the next year, issued a proclamation for the release of all slaves in the seceded states. The fortunes of the southern cause began to waver as the year advanced, and the strength of the northern army daily increased. The public debt of the state of Georgia at this time had reached $14,000,000, and Confederate money had commenced to rapidly depreciate. In the records of mortality produced by the war it was shown that Georgia had lost more of her brave sons than any state in the south. Nine thousand of her gallant heroes had given up their lives in the valley of Virginia and on the other crimson battlefields of the country.

An effort to invade the state in 1863 was promptly checked by Gen. Forrest, who met the invading party at Rome, Ga., and defeated them with great loss. During the early part of the year a Confederate steamship, the Nashville, was fired at Fort McAllister, on the Ogeechee river, near Savannah. In March of this year the fort was attacked by seven Federal gunboats, but after a fruitless siege of several hours the Federals gave up the fight and sailed away in complete exhaustion.

A special session of the legislature convened on March 25, 1863, to enact suitable measures for the relief of the situation. The war had entailed great suffering among the women and children throughout the state, and this was one of the problems that the legislature had to meet. An appropriation of $2,000,000 was made in behalf of the suffering families of absent soldiers, and the cultivation of wheat, instead of cotton, was enjoined upon the planters who were not in the field. Over 4,000 widows and 45,000 children were thus dependent upon the bounty of the state for support and protection.

The Federal army continued to increase in size, and the victories of the Union flag daily multiplied. Vicksburg fell into the hands of the enemy, and Port Hudson, a Confederate stronghold in Tennessee, was forced to surrender. In April, 1863, Gen. John B. Gordon, who became one of the most distinguished soldiers of the war, was commissioned as a brigadier-general. He subsequently became the confidential friend of Lee, attaining the rank of lieutenant-general, and commanding one of the wings of the southern army at Appomattox. Gen. Gordon entered the service as a Confederate captain. Another distinguished Georgian who illustrated the chivalry of the state was Gen. James Longstreet.

Notwithstanding the fact that Gov. Brown had already filled the chair of state for three consecutive terms, he was triumphantly re-elected in the fall of 1863 over Joshua Hill and Timothy M. Furlow. In the Confederate congress Georgia was represented by the following delegation: Julian Hartridge, W. E. Smith, M. H.

Blanford, Clifford Anderson, J. T. Shewmake, J. H. Echols, J. M. Smith, George N. Lester, H. P. Bell and Warren Aiken. The legislature that met in the fall of 1863, following the re-election of Gov. Brown for a fourth term, fixed the ages of enlistment between eighteen and sixty years. The Confederacy called upon the state for 8,000 home guards, and more than 18,000 volunteered. Howell Cobb was commissioned as a major-general on Sept. 14, 1863. During the preceding August Gen. A. R. Lawton was commissioned quartermaster-general of the Confederate army. Gen. Lawton was one of the most distinguished soldiers in the state, having enjoyed a fine military training, and having served the state as a brigadier at the beginning of the war.

The Confederate losses throughout the country were disastrous, and the close of the year 1863 plainly evinced that nothing short of a miracle could prevent the iron hand of fate from overturning the Confederacy.

A brilliant victory achieved by the Confederates under the command of Gen. Colquitt at Olustee, Fla., revived for a time the wavering hopes of the south at the beginning of the year 1864. Subsequent losses, however, only served to make this victory a splendid conflagration, as it were, in the midst of a surrounding wilderness of gloom.

GEN. SHERMAN'S MARCH TO THE SEA AND THE FALL OF ATLANTA.

Gen. William T. Sherman, who commanded a division of the Federal army, had already commenced his famous march to the sea before the beginning of the year. In March, 1864, Gen. Grant, having been elevated to the command of all the Federal forces, planned two campaigns, one against Richmond to be conducted by himself, and the other against Atlanta by Gen. Sherman, who was then on his way to the sea. Lee was in command of the southern troops at Richmond, and Joseph E. Johnston awaited the approach of Gen. Sherman at Dalton, Ga., on his southward march.

On May 4, 1864, Gen. Sherman started from Chattanooga, and Gen. Grant, on the same day, started for Richmond. Gen. Johnston, who stationed his army at Dalton, Ga., awaited Gen. Sherman with 43,000 men—just half the size of the invading army. Sherman made a vigorous attack on Johnston's front, having dispatched Gen. McPherson to Resaca, Ga., eighteen miles below, to advance upon the rear. Gen. Johnston had anticipated this flank movement, however, and had stationed a strong defense at Resaca. On May 12 he withdrew his entire army to this point, and two days afterward an attack was opened by Gen. Sherman. At the same time a part of Sherman's army crossed over the river and advanced toward Calhoun. Here they were surprised by a large reserve and driven back to Resaca with the loss of 5,000 men. Johnston then fell back to Cassville, in order to avoid another flank movement, and left Rome in possession of the Federals. He afterward stationed his men at New Hope Church, learning that Gen. Sherman was making for that point, and here a bloody battle ensued, in which the Federals under Gen. Sherman sustained a severe loss. The next position taken by the two armies was at Pine mountain, Gen. Johnston having marched from Marietta and secured a stand on the mountain. The Federals had been resting at Acworth, but hearing that Gen. Johnston had taken his position on Pine mountain they determined to break through the lines. The battle commenced on June 9, 1864, and lasted for twenty-three days. Each attempt of the Federals to climb the mountains signally failed, and on June 14 Gen. Leonidas Polk was killed. Gen. Johnston next concentrated his forces on Kennesaw mountain and succeeded in maintaining his position in spite of repeated assaults from the Federal army. Gen. Sherman next tried one of his old reliable flank movements by sending a part of his forces across the Chattahoochee river. Gen. Johnston observed this movement and immediately withdrew his men from the mountain, crossing over the river himself. Up to this time Gen. Johnston had only lost 10,000 men, while the loss of Gen. Sherman was more than four times that number. On July 17, Gen. Johnston was removed from the command of the army, and Gen. John B. Hood placed in charge.

Atlanta, the objective point of Gen. Sherman's march, was now only a few miles distant. It was strongly fortified, with a garrison of 10,000 men under Gen. G. W. Smith. Having been a Confederate depot of supplies, its capture had been agreed upon by Gen. Grant as holding the key to the situation. On July 20 a bloody engagement took place just north of Atlanta, in which the Confederates lost heavily. During the night both armies changed their position to the east of the city, and during the two days that followed one of the bloodiest battles of the war occurred. On the Federal side Gen. J. B. McPherson was among the distinguished officers killed, and Gen. W. H. T. Walker on the Confederate side. A huge cannon, erected as a monument to the heroism of the Federal officer, commemorates the exact spot on which he fell. Gen. John M. Brown, a brother of the governor, was also one of the victims of this terrible encounter.

A detachment of the Federal army sent out by Gen. Sherman to make a raid on the state met with a series of disasters and finally gave up the enterprise. About 600 of the raiders surrendered to Gen. Alfred Iverson.

Gen. Hood made a second desperate assault on Gen. Sherman's army on July 28, but failed to accomplish his purpose. On Aug. 5, however, he repelled an attack made upon him by Gen. Schofield, defeating that officer with a loss of 400 men. Gen. Sherman for several days continued to bombard the city, and in the meantime secured possession of all the roads. He tore up the track of the Georgia railroad, and also the West Point lines as far as Jonesboro. Here he encountered Gen. Hardee with a force of men who, after a brief engagement, compelled him to retreat. Gen. Sherman then returned to Atlanta, and took possession of the city. As soon as the army of Gen. Hood withdrew the residents who remained in the city were ordered to depart immediately. The torch was then applied to the buildings and everything in sight, except the Federal headquarters and one or two favored buildings, was destroyed.

Leaving Atlanta, Gen. Hood sought to force Gen. Sherman to quit the state by projecting a campaign into Tennessee. An effort to capture the Federal supplies at Altoona failed, but the Confederates advanced upon Resaca, tore up the rails for a distance of twenty miles, and put themselves in possession of Dalton. Instead of following Gen. Hood into Tennessee Gen. Sherman decided to send Gen. Thomas in that direction and to resume his devastating march to the sea.

LAST DAYS OF THE CONFEDERACY.

The march of Gen. Sherman to the sea was one of pillage and devastation. Villages and farmhouses were destroyed and the depredations of the soldiers beggar description. The front of the invading army covered a breadth of forty miles, and everything was literally swept away before it. As soon as Gen. Sherman left Atlanta, a telegram was sent to Gov. Brown at Milledgeville stating that Gen. Sherman was probably on his way to the capital. The people fled from the city in great confusion, and Gov. Brown gave orders for the removal of the state records to such places in the neighborhood as were thought secure from invasion. These hasty precautions were taken barely in time, and Gov. Brown and his family had just left the city when Gen. Sherman entered it. Leaving Milledgeville, Gen. Sherman started in a southeasterly direction, and reached Savannah on Dec. 10, 1864. Fort McAllister, at the mouth of the Ogeechee river, was captured after a gallant resistance on the part of Maj. G. W. Anderson and 250 brave men. Gen. Hardee was in command of the Confederate troops at Savannah, but having too small a number to cope with Gen. Sherman he withdrew into South Carolina, and left the Federals in possession of the city. The disasters that marred the command of Gen. Hood in Georgia continued to follow him in Tennessee until his army was driven back into Georgia completely annihilated.

The invasion of the state by Gen. Sherman had entailed great suffering and misery upon the people. The public debt had increased to nearly $24,000,000, and food and provisions were sold at fabulous prices. Fifty dollars in Confederate money was scarcely worth one dollar in gold. During this unhappy period the last session of the legislature, under the Confederate government, convened at Macon, Ga. A patriotic message was read from Gov. Brown, and eloquent speeches of encouragement were delivered by Gen. Howell Cobb, Benjamin H. Hill and William H. Stiles.

On Feb. 23 the Hampton Roads conference occurred between President Lincoln and William H. Seward, for the north, and A. H. Stephens, R. M. T. Hunter and Judge Campbell for the south. The conference, however, failed to accomplish the desired result. In the meantime Gen. Sherman, having left Savannah on Jan. 19, 1865, marched into South Carolina renewing his depredations. Columbia, the capital of the state, was reduced to ashes. Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was restored to his former command and placed in charge of the shattered remnants of Hood's army on Feb. 23, 1865.

The campaign of Gen. Grant against Richmond, in spite of the heroism of the southern soldiers under Gen. Lee, had been successful by reason of the superior numbers of the invading army. Gen. Lee had made a strong defense of Petersburg, but on April 2, after seven days of hard fighting, the lines were broken and Gen. Lee was forced to surrender with his army at Appomattox. The surrender occurred on the morning of April 9, 1865. The army under Gen. Johnston surrendered on April 26, at Greensboro, N. C. The surrender of Gen. Lee was shortly followed by the assassination of President Lincoln at Ford's theater by John Wilkes Booth. It was extremely unfortunate for the south that such an event ever should have occurred.

The fall of Richmond made it necessary for President Davis to leave that city. On his way to Texas, with a number of friends who sought to protect him from violence, he stopped at the home of Gen. Toombs at Washington, Ga. Here the last conference of the Confederate cabinet was held, Gens. Lawton and Bragg being present in addition to the members of the cabinet. After the meeting was over the parties dispersed. President Davis was subsequently captured near Irwinsville, Ga., by a detachment of cavalry, and taken to Fortress Monroe. Without a trial he was thrown into prison and remained a captive for nearly two years. Alexander H. Stephens, the vice-president of the Confederacy, was also arrested, but subsequently released. All the money that was rescued from the ruins of the Confederate government was divided among the old soldiers in consideration of their gallant services during the war. Only a small sum was received by each soldier, but it was something, and, in behalf of his impoverished household, he received it gladly.

The last official act of the Confederate government was the distribution of this money among the sick and disabled soldiers of the Confederacy.

An effort to arrest Gen. Toombs was skillfully avoided by that astute statesman, who dodged a Federal officer and made good his escape from home on horseback. Gen. Toombs sailed for England, and remained abroad for several years.

In summing up the contributions of the state to the Confederate cause it was found that Georgia had sent 120,000 men into the field. The property of the state, which was now in the hands of the Federal army, had depreciated nearly $500,000,000, due largely to the ravages of Gen. Sherman. Each of the principal cities of the state was placed under military control. Col. Eggleston was placed in charge of Atlanta, Gen. Upton of Augusta, Gen. Croxton of Macon, and Maj. M. H. Williams of Milledgeville. A meeting of the legislature was called by Gov. Brown, but Gen. Wilson, who was in military control, refused to allow that body to assemble. Howell Cobb, Alexander H. Stephens and B. H. Hill were all arrested. Gov. Brown was also arrested, but, having been paroled, he was released. This parole was subsequently taken from him by a force of men who surrounded the executive mansion. He was taken to Washington city and remained an inmate of Carroll prison for a week, after which he was released by President Johnson. Returning to Georgia Gov. Brown was surprised to find that Gen. Wilson had assumed the reins of government, and thereupon immediately resigned his office. He then issued a patriotic address to the people, in which he urged them to make the best of the situation, and to acquiesce in the terms by which the civil government might be speedily restored.

THE ERA OF RECONSTRUCTION.

If the era of reconstruction which followed the tragic drama of civil war lacked the fierce element of bloodshed, it was none the less painful and protracted. It was a gloomy period through which the people of the south were compelled to pass, and there was no appeal and no alternative but submission. In June, 1865, the president of the United States, in the exercise of his declared authority, appointed James Johnson, of Columbus, governor of the state. He entered upon the discharge of his duties at once, and issued a call for a convention to meet early in October.

The convention promptly assembled, and Herschel V. Johnson, a favorite son of Georgia, was elected chairman. Among the resolutions that were passed by the convention was one repealing the ordinance of secession. Slave ownership was abolished, in accordance with the terms of surrender, and a new state constitution was adopted. An election for governor was held in November, and Hon. Charles J. Jenkins was elected to that office without opposition.

It was beginning to look as if Georgia had escaped the dreadful evils of reconstruction, and that sinooth sailing would be enjoyed by the ship of state. For several months this happy delusion continued, only to form a bold and bitter contrast to the reign of terror that followed. The legislature assembled in December, 1865. Gov. Johnson, in a message to the legislature, stated that he would continue to hold the office until the election of Gov. Jenkins was duly recognized by the United States. This was merely a matter of form, and on Dec. 14 Gov. Jenkins was formally inaugurated amid great enthusiasm and rejoicing.

Gov. Jenkins, who was destined to play a romantic part in the events of the next few years, was a native of South Carolina, and was born in January, 1805. He began the practice of law in Sandersville, Ga., but afterward moved to Augusta.

He had filled many positions of trust, and had been the attorney-general of the state. As a man of integrity and patriotism he was beloved by all the people of the state, and their confidence was not unwisely imposed. Among the acts passed by the state legislature was the ratification of the thirteenth amendment of the Federal constitution forbidding slavery. Alexander H. Stephens and Herschel V. Johnson were elected to represent Georgia in the United States senate, but they were not allowed to take their seats in that body on account of the issues of reconstruction. It was just at this time that President Johnson had his controversy with congress in regard to the representation of the southern states—a controversy that entailed much suffering, and that patriotism, on the part of the chief executive of the nation, might easily have avoided. The republican members of congress objected to the seating of new congressmen until their respective states had ratified the fourteenth amendment, relating to the negro citizenship. All the southern states, except Tennessee, refused to ratify this amendment. It was distasteful to them for their late negro slaves to thus become their political equals. It was enough for congress to declare their freedom; to give them the elective franchise was too much. Georgia and the other southern states were thereupon declared by congress to be in a state of rebellion. This declaration Georgia stubbornly resisted, stating that she intended to protect the negro, but holding that the right of suffrage should not be too hastily conferred upon him before he had shown his ability to exercise it. The people of Georgia were greatly incensed by the attitude of congress, and a special committee was appointed, one of its members being ex-Gov. Joseph E. Brown, to repair to Washington in behalf of a more thorough understanding of the situation. This committee failed to accomplish anything, as congress was not disposed to alter its demands. Gov. Brown thereupon issued a letter to the people in which he urged them, at the expense of their personal inconvenience, to calmly submit to the terms of reconstruction in the hope of a final and complete revolution. In the light of subsequent happenings the wisdom and patriotism of Gov. Brown's letter is clearly seen, but the warm-blooded passions of the south were too easily inflamed to admit of calmness under insult, and they failed to see the wisdom of Gov. Brown's advice.

Gov. Jenkins himself repaired to Washington for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the amendment, and failing to secure satisfaction he advised the people of the state to persevere in their refusal to acquiesce in the demands of congress. The views of Gov. Jenkins were warmly espoused by the eloquence of Benjamin H. Hill, who delivered the greatest speeches of his life during this frightful era of gloom and despondency. In order to force upon the state the adoption of the measures proposed by congress, Georgia was again placed under military rule, and Gen. John Pope was put in command.

A convention of the democratic party was held in December, 1867, and Benjamin H. Hill was elected chairman. The convention declared in favor of non-resistance to congress, but boldly protested against the military administration of Gen. Pope. Resolutions were passed denouncing the measures of reconstruction as harsh and unwise.

Gen. Pope next called a convention to meet during the same month. All the counties were not represented, and the body was largely composed of negroes. The convention remained in session until March 1. In the meantime Gen. Meade succeeded Gen. Pope in command of the state. The convention being in need of funds demanded $40,000 from the state treasury to meet its expenses. This the treasurer refused to pay without an order from the governor. Gen. Meade thereupon addressed a request to Gov. Jenkins asking him to draw the order. Gov. Jenkins refused to comply with his request and was thereupon removed from office.

Gen. Ruger was detailed to act in his stead, and all the state officials who had served under Gov. Jenkins were likewise dismissed.

GOV. JENKINS GOES INTO EXILE, TAKING WITH HIM THE GREAT SEAL.

Being deposed from his high office as governor of the state, Gov. Jenkins took with him the great seal of the commonwealth and $400,000 of the state's money and departed for Washington city. He filed a bill of complaint in the supreme court of the United States against the seizure of the state government by certain military officials, and passing through New York he deposited the $400,000 in one of the banks of that city. He then departed into exile, still retaining the great seal in his possession.

The convention that was called by Gen. Meade, being still in session, ordered an election for governor to be held in April, 1868. Rufus B. Bullock was the candidate of the republican party, and Gen. John B. Gordon the nominee of the democratic party. The new constitution was submitted to a vote of the people during this election and ratified. A large number of the best people in the state being denied the privilege of voting, the republican candidate was elected by a small majority. A society known as the Union League was organized about this time to promote the interests of the republican party in the state. Contemporaneously the celebrated Ku Klux organization sprung into existence, and many acts of violence were committed by this band. It was designed, according to the declaration of its leading members, to protect the wives and daughters of Georgia from black republicanism. Gov. Brown became very unpopular by consenting to prosecute several members of the Ku Klux organization in Columbus for the killing of a man by the name of Ashburn. It was denounced as an act of disloyalty to the cause of southern patriotism.

Benjamin Conley was chosen president of the senate that convened in July, 1868, and R. L. McWhorter, by the small majority of only one vote, was elected speaker of the house. Gov. Bullock was inaugurated and the fourteenth amendment was ratified. Gen. Meade thereupon declared military rule in Georgia at an end. The unseating of twenty-five negro members, in spite of the protest of Gov. Bullock, called forth great indignation on the part of the republicans. A colored convention was held in Macon, and violent speeches were made condemning the action of the legislature. The matter was subsequently brought to the attention of Charles Sumner, who demanded that Georgia be put for a third time under military rule. A resolution was adopted by congress to this effect, but it was never put into operation. The supreme court in June, 1869, decided that, under the constitutional amendment, the negroes were entitled to their seats, and this put an end to the controversy. A delegation was appointed by the republican executive committee to urge congress to put the state again under military rule. Gov. Bullock also repaired to Washington for the purpose of securing the passage of a bill authorizing the governor to convene the legislature, and providing for the oath of amnesty, the seating of the colored members of the legislature, and the ratification of the fifteenth amendment.

For a third time Georgia was placed under military rule, and Gen. Alfred Terry was appointed commander for the district. The first session of the legislature under this new regime was held amid great confusion. Thirty-one negro members were seated, and twenty-four democrats expelled. The attention of congress was called to the manner in which the legislature was organized, and the state authorities were severely criticised by the judiciary committee of congress designated to inquire into the organization. A bill was introduced providing for a new election, and also for the re-admission of Georgia into the Union. The bill admitting the state into the sisterhood of American republics was signed by President Grant in July, 1870. Under the provision of the new act Gov. Bullock was re-elected in the following November.

Gov. Joseph E. Brown, who had been appointed by Gov. Bullock chief justice of the state, resigned that office in 1870 to accept the presidency of the Western & Atlantic railroad that had been leased from the state for twenty years. It may be stated in this connection that Gov. Brown, by reason of his peculiar views in regard to reconstruction, was obliged to affiliate with the republicans. In adopting this course he was severely criticised by his former friends and political allies. He acted, however, from patriotic motives, believing it better to suffer patiently than to oppose the measures of reconstruction that were put upon the state by the Federal authority. The fact that Gov. Brown was afterward received into full democratic confidence is the highest evidence of his patriotism and devotion to the state. The population of Georgia at this time in spite of the decimating effect of the war was 1,184,109. The taxable property of the state had greatly decreased in value, but was slowly beginning to rise again. The manufacturing industries had been greatly stimulated, and the cultivation of cotton was resumed with renewed vigor. In spite of the bitter ordeal of reconstruction there were lacking none of the visible signs of growth and prosperity, and Georgia needed only a home government of her own selection to make her once more strong and powerful.

During the month of October, 1871, Gov. Bullock, who had been re-elected to the office of governor the year preceding, formally resigned his position. He left the state immediately, turning over the executive chair to Benjamin Conley, the president of the senate. The state was surprised by the sudden departure, and the feeling was shared, in a great measure, by the whole country. It was known that Gov. Bullock had found it anything but pleasant to govern a state that entertained no love for the republican party, and that, furthermore, a misunderstanding had taken place between him and the state treasurer in regard to advancing a large sum of money to H. I. Kimball for fitting up the old opera house building for a state capitol, when Kimball was under an express obligation to put it in proper condition. No effort was made to apprehend the fugitive governor, and he was allowed to remain unmolested until the fall of 1872. A legislative committee, appointed to investigate the cause of his departure, reported that he was in default to the state in the sum of $60,000, and thereupon a requisition for his arrest was made to the governor of New York. He was not found, however, and in 1876 returned to Georgia, and was shortly afterward given a trial and acquitted.

Gov. Bullock had hardly left the state, after his resignation, when the legislature convened. James M. Smith was elected speaker of the house of representatives and L. N. Trammell president of the senate. Benjamin Conley assumed the executive chair and was permitted to retain it by the legislature. An election, however, was called for the following December and James M. Smith was declared the choice of the people without opposition. Thomas M. Norwood was elected to the United States senate by the legislature that met in the fall of 1871.

Gov. Smith had been a gallant officer in the Confederate army and had served on the floor of the Confederate congress, after being disqualified by a wound from serving in the field. The governor found it a difficult matter to correct the evils that had crept into the state government by reason of the republican administration, but he addressed himself to the undertaking with patriotism and ability. His message to the legislature suggested a number of reforms, many of which were substantially adopted by that body and enacted into laws. It was evident before a great while that the state was beginning to show marked signs of increasing prosperity.

The rebound from depression to buoyancy and hopefulness was instantaneous. Freed from the despoiling rule and the strangling grip of those who felt no real interest in her prosperity, and the government restored to her intelligent native and long-time adopted citizenship, Georgia soon regained her old-time progressive spirit, new political life was infused, manufactures, mining and railway construction was fostered, and improvement was manifest along all the lines of material development and commerce.

RESTITUTION OF THE GREAT SEAL.

It was now time for that patriotic old Roman, Gov. Chas. J. Jenkins, to emerge from his retirement and restore the great seal of the state that had been carried with him into exile. He had been informed of the changes that were taking place in the state, and as soon as Georgia's sovereignty was recognized he appeared upon the scene and made a formal restitution of the seal that he had faithfully guarded, saying, as he returned it, that he was thankful it had never been desecrated by the grasp of a military usurper's hand. A resolution of grateful thanks was voted to Gov. Jenkins in behalf of the people of Georgia, and the governor of the state was instructed to have a facsimile of the great seal made and presented to Gov. Jenkins and to bear the inscription: "Presented to Chas. J. Jenkins by the state of Georgia," together with the motto: "In aruduis fidelis."

In the presidential election of 1872 the vote of Georgia was cast for Horace Greeley, the democratic candidate, who was defeated by Gen. U. S. Grant. An appropriation for the common schools of the state was made this year by the legislature, setting aside the poll tax and all revenues derived from liquors, shows and exhibitions, in addition to one-half the rental of the Western & Atlantic railroad, making a total of $250,000 appropriated to the common school system. It was necessary to increase this appropriation, but this amount, meager as it was, served to awaken the popular heart of the state, and to create a sentiment in favor of a better educational system. In May, 1872, the Georgia state college of agriculture and mechanical arts was organized at Athens, Ga., under the control of the university.

Gen. John B. Gordon, who had served with such distinction in the Confederate army, was elected to the United States senate in 1873. He was one of the most picturesque men in the Union, and his election to the senate was hailed with popular rejoicing. The office of state geologist was created during the year 1874 and Dr. Geo. Little was appointed to fill this position. The department of agriculture was also created this year and Dr. Thomas P. Janes was called to its head.

The resignation of Judge McKay and Judge Trippe from the supreme bench in 1875 resulted in the appointment of Judge James Jackson and Judge Logan E. Bleckley to fill their vacancies. Dr. Gustavus J. Orr was also appointed by Gov. Smith to fill the position of state school commissioner.

The governor was authorized to lease the convicts of the state for a term not exceeding five years. His limit was afterward fixed for a term not to exceed twenty years. A provision was further made for the proper care and treatment of the prisoners. It was made the duty of the principal keeper of the penitentiary and of the state physician to visit each camp in the state monthly, and to submit a written report of their condition.

GOV. COLQUITT'S ADMINISTRATION.

In the summer of 1876 the state democratic convention met in Atlanta and Gen. Alfred H. Colquitt, who had distinguished himself in the war between the states, was the unanimous choice of that body for governor. His nomination was followed by his triumphant election in the fall, defeating his opponent by a popular majority of 80,000 votes. The vote of the state was cast for Tilden and Hendricks in the presidential election.

Gov. Colquitt was duly inaugurated on Jan. 12, 1877, and entered upon a term of four years, this term of service having been fixed prior to the administration of Gov. Smith. Gov. Colquitt was the son of Walter T. Colquitt, the distinguished statesman and orator. He was a native of Walton county, and was born in 1824. He graduated at Princeton college, after which he entered the practice of law, but soon gave up that profession to engage in agricultural pursuits. He served in the Mexican war, subsequently entered congress, became a distinguished general in the Confederate army, and had been the president of the state agricultural society. In his able message to the legislature Gov. Colquitt recommended economy in the use of public funds, and a more accurate return of taxable property. The legislature decided to call for a constitutional convention to revise the work of the one that had met in 1868.

The convention met in the summer of 1877 and ex-Gov. Chas. J. Jenkins was made the chairman. Gen. Robt. Toombs was the leading spirit on the floor of the convention. It remained in session for several weeks and a number of changes were adopted. The governor's term of office was reduced from four to two years; the selection of judges and solicitors was referred to the people instead of the executive; biennial sessions, instead of yearly ones, were agreed upon and the homestead was reduced. The regulation of freight and passenger tariff was put under the control of legislation, and the fraudulent bonds of the state were repudiated. These proposed changes were submitted to a vote of the people, together with the choice of a state capitol. Atlanta had been the seat of legislation since 1868, but the removal of the state capitol from Milledgeville to that city was not considered as permanent. In order to get the capitol, however, Atlanta made a liberal offer. In the election that followed the new constitution was ratified and Atlanta was made the seat of government. The change was exceedingly distasteful to Milledgeville, as the capitol had been located in that town for more than half a century.

The state recovered from the United States government in 1878 the sum of $152,000, an amount of money that Georgia had paid into the United States treasury in excess of what was right for repairing the Western & Atlantic railroad after the war. A number of Indian claims were also collected and these, in addition to an increase in the state's revenue, served to reduce the bonded debt considerably. Severe criticism was heaped upon the governor for endorsing the bonds of the Northeastern railroad. It was made to prevent the sale of the road in accordance with the state's agreement. Gov. Colquitt was found to be in the right, as the law of 1874 that repealed the instructions as to endorsing railroad bonds, distinctly excepted the bonds of the Northeastern railroad.

But the administration of Gov. Colquitt was further fretted and disturbed by charges of irregularity in the several state departments. A thorough investigation resulted in proceedings of impeachment against the comptroller-general and the state treasurer. Chief Justice Hiram Warner presided. The comptroller was impeached, but the treasurer was acquitted. The legislature of 1879 passed an act creating a board of railroad commissioners to carry out the provisions of the constitution with reference to railroad tariff. Under this act Gov. Colquitt appointed ex-Gov. James M. Smith, Campbell Wallace and Samuel Barnett.

In 1880, Gen. Gordon, having resigned his seat in the United States senate, Gov. Colquitt appointed Joseph E. Brown to succeed him. This created general dissatisfaction on account of Gov. Brown's unpopularity, and charges of a ring were preferred in many of the newspapers of the state and became the stock of the anti-Colquitt men in the succeeding campaign.

RE-ELECTION OF GOV. COLQUITT.

It was not the intention of Gov. Colquitt to seek a re-election, but such were the criticisms that were made against him that he found it necessary to seek from the people an endorsement of his administration.

The convention that met in August, 1880, to nominate a governor was one of the most eventful that ever assembled in the history of the state. Col. L. N. Trammell was elected chairman and the two-thirds rule was adopted, making it necessary for the successful candidate to receive two-thirds of the votes of the convention. Several days were spent in fruitless balloting, the Colquitt men being in the majority, but unable to secure the requisite majority. Finally the convention adjourned, recommending Gov. Colquitt to the people of Georgia as the choice of the majority of the convention. The name of Hon. Thos. M. Norwood of Savannah was presented as the preference of the minority.

In the fall election Gov. Colquitt received a popular majority of 55,000. The state house officers elected were N. C. Barnett, secretary of state; W. A. Wright, comptroller-general; Clifford Anderson, attorney-general, and D. N. Speer, treasurer.

The legislature that met in November confirmed the appointment of Joseph E. Brown, by electing him to represent the state for a full term of six years in the senate. Gen. Gordon, who had resigned that high office, engaged in private pursuits. The finances of the state were in good condition, and the ravages of war fast disappearing. A large sum of money was collected from the railroads in default of taxes, and this was put into the state treasury. At this session of the legislature Judge James Jackson was made the chief justice of the state. He was one of the most distinguished men in Georgia, having served the state in the legislature, in the halls of congress and upon the bench.

The assassination of President Garfield by Chas. Guiteau in July, 1881, produced general sorrow throughout the state.

A petition was sent to congress by the legislature of 1881 asking for an appropriation in behalf of the ignorant children of the state. The petition stated that by reason of negro emancipation it was necessary for the state to provide for their education, and it was impossible to do this without help. Nothing was immediately accomplished by this petition, but it received the warm support of Senator Brown, and resulted in a wholesome and beneficial agitation. In the state Commissioner Orr was making the best use of the state's limited allowance to further the interests of the common-school system. Among the signs of recuperation that indicated the rapid growth of the state were the establishment of numerous manufacturing industries, applications for railroad charters and the general development of the mining and agricultural resources of the state. This spirit of enterprise was stimulated by the international cotton exposition held in Atlanta in the fall of 1881. It was in the nature of a revelation to those who had no idea of the infinite resources of the piedmont region. If the first term of Gov. Colquitt's administration was one of violent dissensions, the second one was characterized by profound peace and tranquillity.

The close of Gov. Colquitt's second term of office was saddened by the death of Senator Benj. H. Hill, which occurred in August, 1882. Senator Hill was one of the ablest men that Georgia ever produced, and as an orator he had no superior in the nation. The cause of his death was cancer of the tongue. A life-size portrait of the deceased senator was ordered by the legislature, and a marble statue was subsequently erected to his memory by popular subscription.

ELECTION OF ALEX. H. STEPHENS AND HIS DEATH.

Under the provisions of the constitution of 1877 the governor's term of office was reduced to two years. In the summer of 1882, therefore, the gubernatorial campaign was inaugurated by the presentation of the name of Alex. H. Stephens, the great commoner. Mr. Stephens was well advanced in years and was in extremely feeble health. He was still in public life, however, and the suggestion of his name was received with patriotic enthusiasm. He received the nomination and in the fall election was successful by an unprecedented majority. He was duly inaugurated and entered upon the discharge of his official duties in November, 1882. It was preordained, however, that Mr. Stephens' term of service should be a brief one. He died early in the following year and was mourned by all the people of the south. He was buried in Crawfordville, Ga., and a monument over his grave has since been erected to his memory.

The president of the senate, Hon. James S. Boynton, assumed the chair on the death of Gov. Stephens and performed the duties of that office until the qualification of his successor. In the convention that met to nominate a candidate Gov. Boynton was the choice of a large number of the delegates. Speaker Bacon of the house of representatives also had a splendid following. After a prolonged session, however, Hon. Henry D. McDaniel was nominated as a dark horse and received a majority of the votes in the popular election.

It was during the term of Gov. McDaniel that the bill was passed authorizing the erection of the present state capitol at a cost of $1,000,000. The work of putting up the building proceeded without interruption and the structure was completed in 1889. At the laying of the corner-stone the oration was delivered by Gen. A. R. Lawton of Savannah.

The first legislature that assembled after the death of Senator Benj. H. Hill elected Hon. Pope Barrow of Athens, Ga., to succeed him until the expiration of the unfinished term. Gov. Alfred H. Colquitt was elected for the long term.

The administration of Gov. McDaniel was patriotic and conservative. In 1884, therefore, he was complimented by a re-election to the high office that he had filled with such distinguished ability. The election of Grover Cleveland, the democratic candidate for the presidency, in the fall of this year created universal rejoicing throughout the south.

GOV. GORDON'S ADMINISTRATION.

The spring of 1886 brought to Atlanta, as the guest of the city, the venerable chieftain of the Confederacy, Hon. Jefferson Davis. His visit to the city was the signal for a pronounced ovation, and the joy of the people at seeing their old leader again was all the more sincere because of the close retirement in which he had lived since the war. Flowers were sprinkled before the carriage in which he rode and the people of the city, young and old, turned out to greet him. The occasion of his visit was the unveiling of the statue of Senator Hill.

Gov. McDaniel's term of office expiring this year the name of Gen. John B. Gordon was proposed as his successor. The suggestion met with popular enthusiasm and Gen. Gordon, having received the democratic nomination, was elected by an overwhelming majority.

His administration was fearless and aggressive. In the summer of 1888 he was triumphantly re-elected.

The new capitol building was completed in 1889 and the executive department was transferred to the beautiful structure on Washington street, crowning the highest eminence in the city. It may be said in praise of the commission and of all concerned in the erection of the capitol, that it was built within the original appropriation.

In the fall of this year the greatest oratorical achievement of the generation was won by Henry W. Grady in the city of New York at a banquet of the famous New England society. In a speech of only twenty minutes Mr. Grady caught the ear of the entire nation and did more to heal the breach between the sections than all the orators who had declaimed in favor of reconstruction since the war. From this response of Mr. Grady to "The New South" until his final speech, delivered three years later at Plymouth Rock, his life was one continuous ovation. His death at the age of thirty-nine, following upon that of Mr. Davis by only a few weeks, was considered a national calamity.

A series of expositions inaugurated in Atlanta for the purpose of advertising the resources of the Piedmont region attracted thousands of people to Georgia. The first of these expositions was held in 1887 and President Cleveland was one of the distinguished visitors. The population of the state at this time was in the close neighborhood of 1,800,000. The enterprise of the state in all departments of industry, her rapid growth since the war and the development of her marvelous material resources, had won for her the well-merited distinction of the "Empire State of the South."

ADMINISTRATION OF GOV. NORTHEN.

The rise of the farmers' alliance now claimed the attention of the public. From a social organization it had grown into a strong political factor and sought to correct a number of legislative evils. Hon. Wm. J. Northen of Sparta, Ga., was the preferred candidate of this rural order and received the democratic nomination in the summer of 1890. He was subsequently elected by a large majority and entered upon the discharge of his duties with patriotic zeal, giving marked evidence of decided administrative ability. In the summer of 1892 he was re-elected to the office of governor by the unprecedented majority of 70,000 votes. In the meantime the farmers' alliance had merged into a new party known as the people's party, incorporating the sub-treasury plank in its platform. Gov. Northen, however, in the strictest loyalty to the farming interests of the state, remained true to the traditions of the democratic party. The success of the national democracy in 1892 restored Mr. Cleveland to the executive chair after a retirement of four years. In the distribution of portfolios Hon. Hoke Smith of Georgia was called to the department of the interior in Mr. Cleveland's cabinet, and Hon. Chas. F. Crisp, a distinguished citizen of Georgia, was elected speaker of the national house of representatives.

Gen. John B. Gordon, who had returned to public life, now occupied the seat of Senator Joseph E. Brown in the United States senate. Senator Brown, on account of failing health, was not a candidate for re-election at the close of his second term.

The death of Justice L. Q. C. Lamar of the United States supreme court, a native of Georgia, who had served in the councils of the nation, representing the state of Mississippi in the United States senate, in the first cabinet of President Cleveland and on the bench of the supreme court, produced general sorrow throughout the south. He was buried in the state of his birth, though his remains were subsequently exhumed and taken to Mississippi. The death of Senator Colquitt occurred within a few months after the demise of Justice Lamar. This distinguished Georgian, who had served with equal ability in the field and forum, and who had worthily won the mantle of his illustrious father, was buried with civic honors in Rose Hill cemetery, Macon, Ga.

Gov. Northen appointed Hon. Patrick Walsh of Augusta to succeed Senator Colquitt for the unexpired term. The legislature that met in the fall of 1894 elected Hon. A. C. Bacon of Macon, Ga., for the long term.

The democratic convention that met this year nominated Hon. Wm. Y. Atkinson of Newman, Ga., for governor. Gen. Clement A. Evans was a popular candidate for that high honor, but withdrew from the race before the assembling of the convention.

This brings the history of Georgia down to the closing decade of the nineteenth century—more than 160 years from the landing of Oglethorpe on the bluffs of the Savannah river. The state has grown into a splendid commonwealth, embracing a population of nearly 2,000,000 souls and rejoicing in the assured hope of a long-continued prosperity. In the preparations she has made for the cotton states and international exposition, the greatest enterprise ever inaugurated on southern soil, the state has written the peroration of the century so far as her own marvelous achievements are concerned. The crowned heads of the world have been invited to attend this exposition and to witness the miracle of growth on which the colony of Georgia, planted by the philanthropic hand of Oglethorpe, has been converted into the splendid and colossal commonwealth that responds in the roll-call of development to the "Empire State of the South."

GEORGIA was originally organized as a military province, subject to the crown of Great Britain. Its martial founder, Gen. James Edward Oglethorpe, had served with distinction in the armies of Prince Eugene and the Duke of Marlborough. Moved by a benevolent as well as a venturesome spirit, he projected and carried into effect a colony in this English province situated far down the lower Atlantic coast. In 1732, the colonists, with Oglethorpe at their head, left the shores of England and, crossing the ocean, debarked upon the bluff of the Savannah river, where they marked out the site of a town and called it Savannah; thus founding the present elegant and prosperous seaport of the state.

The first colonists of Georgia entered upon the edge of a wilderness which stretched in gloomy solitude more than a thousand miles northward and westward and met upon this threshold of the new world a body of aboriginal inhabitants differing from themselves in color, traits and customs so greatly as to be thought a distinct race of mankind. These Indians, as they were called, belonged to the tribes of the Creeks and Muscogeas and being but a part of many warlike nations inhabiting the great American forests, came forward to greet their coming. The situation required a military government. The town, exposed to attacks, must be under the rules of a garrison. Therefore Georgia began its career as a military colony, whose citizens held their lands at first by a tenure that exacted military duty. Every male inhabitant capable of service was armed with some weapon of war. Other emigrants came soon afterward, among whom were the sturdy Salzburger and the peaceful Moravians. A fine body of Scotch Highlanders dressed in picturesque plaids and armed with broadswords and firearms landed a little lower down the coast and settled Inverness. Oglethorpe, as the military chief and governor of all, explored the coast, selected sites for military posts, built a fort on St. Simon's island and adopted all necessary measures for the safety of the new colony.

TROUBLES WITH SPAIN.

Not six years after their landing the Georgia settlers found that their earliest antagonists were not Indians, but Spaniards—men of their own race. Spain had laid claim to Florida as England had to Georgia and these claims extending vaguely into the unsurveyed wilds, a conflict of interests was inevitable. A state of hostility soon occurred. The Spaniards threatened Georgia and Oglethorpe being appointed by the crown commander of the colonial forces of South Carolina and Georgia, invaded Florida with about 2,000 men. The expedition was designed against the old Spanish town, St. Augustine. Marching into Florida, Oglethorpe attacked several small outposts and capturing them, laid siege to the ancient city. But the Spaniards had fortified their position so well and provisioned it so amply that after some unsuccessful assaults and a fruitless siege of several months, Oglethorpe was compelled to retreat into Georgia.

The Spaniards afterward, in 1742, retaliated by appearing off the coast of Georgia with a large fleet and attacked Fort Williams on Cumberland island, which, however, was held against them by reinforcements sent to its support. The Spanish armament of fifty-six vessels, carrying about 7,000 men under Gov. Montiano, then sailed into Brunswick bay and afterward entered an inlet, effected a landing on St. Simon's island, notwithstanding the gallant fire from the batteries which Oglethorpe had erected. Montiano, having landed 5,000 men, marched against the fortified town of Frederica, which was situated farther inland. Oglethorpe met him with part of his command amidst the marshes which intervened, but was being driven back until by a skillful maneuver the rangers, under McKay and Sutherland, were wheeled under cover of a thick palmetto brush and from this ambush dashed upon the Spanish flank and producing a panic, made this battle, called Bloody Marsh, a brilliant and memorable American victory. The Spanish army abandoned a large quantity of military stores and hastily embarking set sail for Florida. This splendid victory won by not over 600 men fighting on their own soil against an equipped army nearly ten times their number, is one of the most lustrous events in military history, although Bloody Marsh is among the unnoticed battles of those perilous times.

DIFFICULTIES WITH INDIANS.

While Georgia was now safe from the formidable Spanish invasion contemplated by Montiano, the colonists were at no time entirely free from fears of attacks by the Indians. Therefore, in extending their settlements they built small wooden forts and block-houses at all trading stations and settlements. Oglethorpe went up the Savannah river a distance, by direct course, 130 miles, and selected a fine site for a strong trading post, which he laid off with great regularity into spacious streets and squares, naming the town Augusta. For the refuge and protection of the inhabitants in the event of Indian hostilities, he constructed a "brace of wooden forts" and mounted them with some guns of small caliber.

Considerable numbers of adventurous people from the adjacent province of South Carolina as well as from the settlements of the sea coast of Georgia began to gather at this important station in order to engage in profitable trade with the Indian tribes. The French and Indian war, opening up about the middle of this century, chiefly affected the northern and western sections, but toward its close a series of fierce Indian hostilities involved the south and produced widely-spread troubles. The Cherokee nation had been friendly to the English in the war with the French, but taking offense at some supposed indignities, a band of Cherokees ravaged the northern frontier of Carolina and provoked a retaliation by the destruction of many Indian villages and fields.

The governmental form in Georgia had been changed by the surrender of their charter and the adoption of a new plan approved in 1754, under which the king of England appointed John Reynolds captain-general and governor-in-chief of his majesty's province of Georgia and vice-admiral of the same. The new military governor made a tour of inspection of the coast and exhibited great zeal in increasing the military defenses. The alarm felt by the inhabitants in the upper part of the state was made known to him by earnest letters signed by leading men at Augusta, who represented that Indian hostilities were inevitable. The danger seemed to them so imminent that they declared, "We are afraid we cannot hold this place long without speedy assistance. All the settlements on the Ogeechee are abandoned. The fort cannot contain all the inhabitants, so that we shall be obliged to fortify some other places." At the same time a formal petition for help signed by a large number of the inhabitants of Augusta and other places and forwarded to the governor, represented that "Your petitioners by their vicinity and connection with the Indians and Indian affairs have had an opportunity to behold with concern the great progress the French have made for some time past in seducing the Creek Indians and drawing them over to their interest. These people are indefatigable in persuading and spurring on the Indians to a rupture with us and had within those few months, according to the best intelligence we could get, and from the behavior of the Indians in general, very nearly succeeded, and even with the concurrence of a part of the Cherokees." Augusta and other towns near by were then the frontiers of the state, around which hung the threatening cloud of restless, dissatisfied Indians. The trading goods, with which traffic was carried on with the Creeks, Cherokees and Chickasaws, were bulked at that place and invited the raid of the Indians under the instigations of the French emissaries. The situation was indeed gloomy enough. The old fort was not only small, but decayed. The few soldiers stationed there had been drawn upon so largely for detached service as to leave the town defenseless. Its loss by attacks of the Indians and French was regarded by the alarmed inhabitants as opening the way for the destruction of the whole province. The reports from the outlying country continued to come in that the Indians were murdering families and burning the settlements. A new white settlement on the upper source of the Ogeechee had given special offense to the Creeks, and outrages on their rights had provoked them to frequent murderous retaliation. The tomahawk in the brown hand of the savage did murderous execution. Scalps of men, women and children were grimly added to the belts of the warriors. All upper Georgia was in a state of constant dread, and stockades were newly built in all directions. As an example of the bloody incidents occurring in the rough experiences of the hardy settlers of Georgia but a little over a century ago, the following is taken from reliable authority. Richard Tyner had settled a place in Elbert county, built his log house, and with his little family was securing a subsistence from the fertile soil. One day during his absence the savage Creeks broke suddenly upon his place and proceeded with the usual bloody work. Mrs. Tyner was killed first, and her baby was dashed against a tree until its brains bespattered the ground. Little Noah Tyner, a young lad, fled to the forest, and concealed himself in a hollow tree. The two girls, Mary and Tamar, were carried away into captivity, where they were kept several years, concealed, until the eldest was found by a trader, who brought her back to Elbert. The trader offered to purchase both girls, but the Indians refused to sell Tamar, the youngest. After the departure of her sister, Tamar made her escape down the Chattahoochee river alone in a canoe, and at length reaching protection at Appalachicola, she was assisted to her home.

OPPRESSIONS OF THE MOTHER COUNTRY.

While the Georgians were thus annoyed by the Indians, their troubles were increased by the oppressive acts of the mother country. Various acts of parliament had been passed during many years, injurious to the interests of the colonies and destructive to their liberties. The British ministry obtained the right to tax the colonies either directly or by tariff, to restrict their manufactures, to control their commerce and to quarter troops upon them without their consent. These claims being asserted by practical legislation, produced great discontent. They were openly declared to be tyrannical, and a common political creed asserted that "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." Otis, of Boston, in an eloquent sentence, said that "taxation without representation is tyranny." Virginia had abolished the slave trade and passed other salutary laws which were annulled in London by the king. Patrick Henry in a passionate speech declared that "the king who annuls a law of so salutary a nature, degenerates into a tyrant and forfeits all right to obedience." The fever of resistance heightened from month to month, until all the colonies became alike inflamed. Georgia, youngest of the British provinces and least prepared for resistance, was soon borne by its sympathy into the general revolt. Public meetings, held as early as 1769, made strong patriotic protests against those acts of parliament which were declared to be "oppressive and contrary to the birthright of every Briton." Resolutions were passed not to import any British goods or to buy any negroes brought in by British ships. The royal governor, Sir James Wright, wrote to England "that a large proportion of the people of Georgia were Sons of Liberty, and the same spirit of sedition which first appeared in Boston had reached Georgia." The "Sons of Liberty" were composed of ardent patriots, a party of whom, led by Habersham, entered the magazine at Savannah, and, removing the powder, secreted it so safely that they secured its use later on in actual battle. In 1774 resolutions were passed in a public assembly held in Savannah condemning the act of parliament for blockading the port of Boston, the stamp act, the transportation of citizens to England for trial, and concurring with the other colonies in every measure to obtain redress of American grievances. Conservative steps were advised by leading men of the province, and the colony, still declaring its loyalty, made earnest efforts to obtain redress through peaceable means.

The general assembly of 1775 was addressed by Gov. Wright, who stated "that the alarming situation of American affairs at this juncture makes it highly necessary for me to say something to you on the subject, and it is with the utmost concern that I see by every account all the colonists to the northward of us as far as Nova Scotia in a general ferment." The governor warned the assembly that the extraordinary measures adopted by these northern colonies, if pursued, would involve all America in most dreadful calamities, and exhorted them not to suffer the province to be involved in these distresses. The assembly responded with assurances of their desire to have "every obstacle removed which may interrupt a cordial and lasting union with the mother country," but they said, "Anxious for the present welfare of our country and the interest of posterity, our ardent wish is that his majesty's American subjects may enjoy all the rights and privileges of British subjects, as fully and effectually in all respects as the inhabitants of Great Britain do, and to that end it now appears necessary that the constitutional rights of his majesty's American subjects may be clearly defined and firmly established, so that they may hold these inestimable blessings on such a footing as will unite the mother country and the colonies by a reciprocation of benefits, and on terms consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and the honor, dignity and safety of the whole empire." This firm response was followed by a declaration of rights, passed by the assembly in January, 1775, reciting the grievances and demands, afterward substantially repeated in the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776. "All and each of which," said this Georgia declaration of January, 1775, "the commons of Georgia in general assembly met claim, demand, and insist on as their indubitable rights and liberties, which cannot legally be taken away from them, altered or abridged by any power without their consent."

GEORGIA BECOMES AGGRESSIVE.

Georgia had not yet taken any steps of separation from Great Britain, but had sent delegates to the continental congress and raised contributions for the people of Boston. Events, however, were hastening on to the general declaration of independence. The first bloodshed occurred in Lexington, in April, 1775, the battle of Concord next took place, then Ethan Allen captured Fort Ticonderoga, and the battle of Bunker Hill was fought. All occurred during the first half of 1775, and the news was borne by couriers to all parts of the country.

The royal Gov. Wright had dissolved the Georgia general assembly early in the year, and as there was no authorized authority to express the popular will, a provincial congress convened in Savannah in July, 1775, composed of delegates elected by various parishes, and elected Archibald Bulloch president and George Walton secretary. After two days' discussion the congress resolved to "approve and adopt the American declaration or bill of rights, published by the continental congress, and to carry into execution all and singular, the measures and recommendations of the continental congress." Five representatives to the continental congress then sitting in Philadelphia were elected, composed of Houston, Bulloch, Zubly, Jones and Hall. A patriotic and fraternal declaration was also adopted, that the "loyalty, patriotism and prudence of the inhabitants of New England, under their unparalleled pressure, having been construed into timidity and dread of regular troops, a civil war in support of acts extremely oppressive to themselves has been actually begun, and there is much reason to believe that plans have been in agitation big with everything horrible to other provinces—plans as rash, barbarous and destructive as the cause which they were intended to serve. Resolved that this province join with all the provinces in America now met by delegates in continental congress."

Before adjourning, the provincial congress unanimously entered into an association in behalf of the province, under a strong declaration, tantamount to secession from British control, worded as follows: "Georgia, being persuaded that the salvation of the rights and liberties of America depend, under God, on the firm union of the inhabitants, in its vigorous prosecution of the measures necessary for its safety, and convinced of the necessity of preventing the anarchy and confusion which attend the dissolution of the powers of government; we, the freemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the province of Georgia, being greatly alarmed at the avowed design of the ministry to raise a revenue in America, and shocked by the bloody scene now acting in the Massachusetts bay, do, in the most solemn manner, resolve never to become slaves; and do associate under all the ties of religion and honor and love to our country to adopt and endeavor to carry into execution whatever may be recommended by the continental congress or resolved upon by our provincial convention appointed for preserving our constitution and opposing the execution of the several arbitrary and oppressive acts of the British parliament, until a reconciliation between Great Britain and America on constitutional principles, which we most ardently desire, can be obtained."

The spirit of resistance to British authority manifested itself in many violent demonstrations. In October, 1775, Gov. Wright directed a muster in honor of the king, but instead of loyal compliance the people made effigies of obnoxious royalists and burned them in the streets of Savannah. A large number of "Liberty Boys" assembled a few months later and threatened the governor with personal violence if he attempted to issue the odious stamps which had recently arrived. A considerable company, consisting of about 200 men coming from adjacent settlements paraded the commons near the city, clamoring for redress with such demonstrations that the governor marched against them with his regulars, rangers and seamen, and forced them to retire.

The excited state of the people of Savannah may be judged from other incidents occurring at the time, one of which was the seizure and dismounting of the guns on the battery. Gov. Wright had published directions for the celebration of his majesty's birthday, with the usual ceremonies, but on the night of June 2 a body of citizens dismounted the cannon, and after spiking all the guns, dragged them down the bluff, where they were found next day, and with some difficulty the spikes were removed, the guns reinstated in position, and made sullenly to sound the prescribed salutes.

GOVERNOR FLEES.

During the ferment existing in Savannah several ships of war appeared at Tybee and increased the popular fear. It was conjectured that they were sent at the instigation of Gov. Wright, to overawe the "Sons of Liberty," and in order to prevent him from communicating with the fleet it was determined by a small body of patriots to hold him as a prisoner. The party, led by Habersham and Milledge, entered the house of the governor, and politely making known their purpose, proposed to leave him at his own house protected by a guard at the door. The governor, however, eluded the sentinel after the departure of his captors, and making his escape to Bonaventure, obtained a boat and was rapidly rowed to the warship "Scarborough."

The flight of the royal governor brought the revolution in Georgia to a crisis. The province was left nearly without any organized government, as the general assembly had been dissolved, and the provincial congress had assembled by only a revolutionary authority. But on the departure of the governor, a provisional government was rapidly organized under a written agreement entered into by delegates from the parishes, which provided a method of electing new delegates by all the parishes, "to meet in one body or council, to be styled a provincial congress, who shall act in all cases whatsoever for the good of the common cause." After adopting this primitive method of forming a government of the people, the congress still in session provided for the protection of the commonwealth, until a new election could be held, and after their issuing an address to the inhabitants of the province of Georgia, dissolved itself. In this address they set forth that "a civil war in America is begun. Several engagements have already happened. The friends of America were in hopes that British troops could not be induced to slay their brothers. It is, however, done, and the circumstances are such as must be an everlasting blot on their character for humanity and generosity."

NEW CONSTITUTION IS DRAFTED.

The committee which was appointed to draft a constitution for a provisional government published a form which provided for election of delegates, the election by ballot of the next congress, of a president and commander-in-chief for six months, also a council of safety, who together with the five members of the continental congress from Georgia would constitute a privy council to the president. Ample powers were conferred on the president, subject to the advice of the privy council, and all legislative powers were reserved to the provincial congress. Former colonial laws were continued in force, and the congress was required to elect a full judiciary. Thus the new government of the province was launched under trying circumstances. The population of the entire province did not exceed 3,000 men, and they were generally poor. The arms were fewer than the men who could bear them, and were of an inferior kind. Munitions of war were scant indeed, discipline and drill little understood, but the people had been inured to danger, their hearts were inflamed with the love of liberty, and they were led by a number of intrepid men.

There were two general lines of settlement; one a narrow strip extending along the coast from Savannah to the Florida line, and the other up the Savannah river beyond Augusta. On the south of the province the Spanish state of Florida contained an unfriendly people, with whom serious difficulties had at times occurred, and several hundred regular, well-equipped Spanish soldiers were in garrison at St. Augustine. The Creeks, Chickasaws, Choctaws, and Cherokee Indians hovered on the west and north, in dangerous unknown numbers. Five British ships of war, the "Syren," the "Cherokee," the "Raven," the "Tamar," and the "Scarborough," with Gov. Wright, the refugee, on board, rode threateningly at the Tybee inlet, with two transports, carrying over 300 well-armed men. Another small force had landed at Cockspur Island and were ready for action. No assistance could be expected from the small continental force now gathering to defend the northern colonies, and South Carolina, the near neighbor, was already "drained of men" for its own defense.

PLAN OF MILITARY ORGANIZATION.

The military organization of the times was modeled on the European plan, and the orders for recruiting companies and battalions were duly issued, but money was sadly lacking to provide for their subsistence. Clothing for troops was hard to get, and imported goods of all kinds had advanced in price 300 per cent. "Our currency," said Col. McIntosh, "passed in no other colony than our own, and we have received very little continental money as yet." But a battalion upon the continental plan, composed of eight companies, was raised subject to the control of the Georgia provincial congress, except "where such control should interfere with the orders of the general congress or a committee thereof." Lachlan McIntosh was appointed colonel, Samuel Elbert lieutenant-colonel, and Joseph Habersham major. Col. McIntosh promptly addressed a communication to Gen. George Washington, in which, describing the condition of the province, and the dangers which threatened it, he asked for directions, and naively remarked that the provincial congress had chosen all other officers, but neglected to provide surgeons. He would, therefore, take the liberty of appointing "surgeons to those battalions, which are so indispensably necessary." The courageous colonel evidently intended to lead his brave command into danger. In addition to this infantry battalion several mounted companies were raised to patrol the coast, and to defend the western limit of the settlement from the Indians. The enlistments of these troops were generally for twelve months, although some were received for a shorter time. The pay for enlistment was fixed at $8 for each man. The infantry total amounted to about 360 officers and men, and the troops of horse to perhaps half that number. Less than 500 soldiers were mustered by April 1, 1776, and the arms and accoutrements were insufficient for even half that number. As for artillery, the guns which the patriots had dismounted and spiked were in position on the bluff, and a small battery was placed at Trustee's garden below Savannah. Not one ship of war to protect the scores of open inlets belonging to the new government. "Several armed vessels," as McIntosh wrote to Washington, "infest our inlets southward, and have made several captures, which we cannot prevent, as we have not a single vessel of any force; but they have always been driven off the shore when they attempted to get a supply of provisions."

OPENING OF THE WAR.

Such was the military state of the province when it entered into the confederation of colonies to resist the oppressions of Great Britain. Armed with flint-lock muskets of small bore, and with long-barreled rifles which they loaded from the muzzle by the use of the ramrod; equipped with powder horn, charges made of cane for loading, bullet molds and wadding, but bravely arrayed in homespun of blue, and belted with cutlass and broadsword by the side, cockade on the hat and courage in the heart, these revolutionary soldiers marched to the music of fife and drum into battle for freedom against all the power of England.

The British war upon America was at this time directing its force mainly upon the colonies upon the northern coast, but in 1776 Sir Henry Clinton turned his attention southward to begin operations against the Carolinas and Georgia. A resolute attempt was made to occupy Charleston, but the city was so well defended by Fort Moultrie on Sullivan island that the assault failed. This unsuccessful venture was followed by many annoying attacks all along the southern coast. Several vessels of war "spread terror along the coast," until the career of three of them was arrested by their valorous capture by Gen. Elbert, off the coast near Brunswick, April 19, 1778. Information being brought to Elbert of the presence of these vessels, he detached 300 men, and placing them and two pieces of artillery on board three small galleys, the "Washington," Capt. Hardy; the "Lee," Capt. Braddock; the "Bullock," Capt. Hatcher, he arrived opposite St. Simon's island late in the evening, and next morning bravely sailed out to attack the three large vessels which prepared to receive him. "You may imagine what my feelings were," said the chivalric Elbert, "to see our three little men-of-war going on to the attack of these three large vessels, which have spread terror upon our coast and were drawn up in order of battle." The gallant attack was made by the little Georgia navy with great spirit. Their shot from the guns poured upon the wooden sides of the ships, and they steadily stood the return fire. Moving closer they used the musket and rifle, as well as cannon, with such disastrous effect that the British began to fly to their boats and abandoned the vessels with everything on board. The captured ships and prisoners were put in charge of the brave Col. White, who had acted with conspicuous courage. The event elated the hopes of the Georgia province, and gave the several settlements along the coast greater assurance of being protected from the British raids, which had heretofore alarmed them so greatly.

EVENTS IN GEORGIA.

The county of Liberty had a most glorious record for its patriotic endurance of suffering during this, as well as other years of the revolution. The name was bestowed upon the parish in 1777 on account of the patriotism of its people. Its ancient town of Sunbury and Midway church were the scenes of a battle in 1778, in which the place was taken by the British after a most gallant defense. Sunbury, built on a high bluff, bade fair to become a flourishing port. It was occupied by a small body of intelligent inhabitants, engaged in agriculture and trade, who for protection against the Indians and all other foes built a fort and manned it with a few guns, but depended most on their own trusty rifles and muskets. On account of the many incursions attempted by the British, and the apprehension that this inlet would be entered, Gen. John McIntosh and Col. James Screven were sent to Fort Morris at Sunbury with American troops for its defense. The British, under command of Col. Fuser, very soon marched against the fort with a largely superior force, which was divided into four bodies, and captured the upper part of the town. Col. Fuser, commanding the advance, dispatched a note to McIntosh, calling his attention to the large force which now invested the fort, and demanded surrender upon conditions that the Americans would lay down their arms and remain neutral until the fate of America was determined. To this note McIntosh returned immediate reply that "we would rather perish in a vigorous defense than accept your proposals. We, sir, are fighting the battles of America, and therefore disdain to remain neutral till its fate is determined. As to surrendering the fort, receive this reply, Come and take it." In the meantime Col. Browne was ordered by Gen. Prevost to meet the Americans, who were reported as coming under Screven to the assistance of the garrison at Sunbury, and placing his command in ambush he surprised the troops under Screven with a sudden and murderous fire, from which the brave Screven fell mortally wounded, and his command retreated. The loyalists used their success in Liberty county to inflict great calamities on the patriots and their families, destroying their property and dragging their families into captivity.

In the latter part of 1779 Col. Campbell was ordered by Gen. Clinton to attack Savannah in association with Admiral Parker, and aided by the forces under Gen. Prevost. Col. Campbell's well-equipped command consisted of one regiment of British regulars, two battalions of Hessians, four battalions of provincials, and a battery of artillery, all of which were borne by transports to Tybee island. A fleet of ten ships under command of Admiral Parker accompanied the expedition to take an active part in the assault. The British force was over 2,000, and the continental defenders of Savannah were about 900. Without delay the British began to ascend the river at the beginning of the Christmas week, and after a brief and brave resistance by the Georgians effected a landing on Brewton's hill, about two miles above the city. Campbell immediately marched to the Tattnall plantation, where he found the Americans under Maj.-Gen. Howe drawn up in line of battle, four regiments of the Georgia brigade, commanded by Gen. Elbert, extending from the main road, the left resting on the battery on the bluff. The Carolina troops, under the command of Col. Huger, were formed with their right protected by a heavy timber swamp and their left joining the Georgia brigade. A detachment of riflemen was deployed in the swamp for the protection of the right flank of Huger's command, and a few pieces of cannon were scattered at available points along the line. A trench cut across the main road, and a slight marshy creek extending nearly parallel to the American line on its front, contributed to the strength of its defense. Col. Campbell, discovering that the weak point of Howe's line was on his left flank, made a feint on the right wing, and, at the same time, threw a corps of light infantry entirely around the left, and to the rear of Howe. Posting his artillery under cover of a slight swell of ground to be ready for the advance, and his dispositions being all made, the signal was given, and the attack followed with an onset that broke the American line. Col. George Walton, commanding a body of Georgia militia and a battery on the right, met the final brunt of the fierce charge of the British under Col. Baird, and, although he most bravely contested the position, was forced to fly. Within a short time the retreat became general and Savannah fell into the hands of the enemy. The Americans were hotly pursued through the streets by the victorious British, who bayoneted several non-combatant citizens, and seizing many others, hurried them to the prison ships. The Americans lost eighty-three killed and about 450 prisoners. The rest of the discomfited command retreated into South Carolina.

Gen. Prevost was placed in command of Savannah, and under his direction the British rapidly overcame all eastern Georgia. Maj. Maitland was sent to Ebenezer, where he built a fort and harassed the patriotic Germans, who were made to feel the severity of war to the utmost. Ebenezer was selected as the place where captured men were sent and kept under guard, until they could be forwarded in numbers to Savannah, and the inhabitants were forced to witness the merciless cruelties which the prisoners were compelled to endure. The rescue of a party of these prisoners is an incidental illustration of the daring spirit of the Sons of Liberty, who were fighting for their country against overwhelming numbers. Sergt. Jasper and Sergt. Newton, both bold scouts, having ascertained that a number of prisoners in irons were on the way from Ebenezer to Savannah under guard of ten men, secreted themselves near a spring where they knew the guard would pass. As they expected, the guard halted, leaned their guns against the trees, and leaving only two men with the prisoners, went down to the spring to refresh themselves with water. In a moment the two scouts sprang from their places of concealment, shot down the guard of two men, and seizing all the guns, demanded the surrender of the remainder, which was quickly granted. Losing no time the prisoners were released, and the captured British were marched across the Spanish river to the American camp.

The British invaders, pushing into the interior, established military forts at intervals along the west bank of the Savannah river, and in January, 1779, appeared before Augusta in such force that the town fell into their hands with little resistance. The capture of Augusta was followed by active operations on the part of the British forces to subdue the whole of Georgia, and in pursuance of this purpose Col. Boyd was ordered with a considerable force collected by him in Carolina to cross the Savannah river and scour the northwestern region. This invasion was bravely met in Wilkes county in the notable battle of Kettle Creek, by the Georgia and Carolina troops belonging to the commands of Heard, Clarke, Dooly and Pickens. Stephen Heard had moved into Georgia only a few years before the war of the revolution, and for protection against the Indians, he and his neighbors built a rude strong fortification which was named Fort Heard. Around this fort a sturdy band of planters had gathered, among whom Heard was the recognized leader, and at this spot after the fall of Savannah and Augusta the refugee government of Georgia made its final stand against invasion. Heard joined Dooly, Clarke and Pickens to meet Boyd at Kettle Creek, and there the desperate patriots fought their enemy with such impetuous bravery as to defeat and rout them completely. This scarcely noted battle, equal though it was to any in the revolution, was so decisive as to force for the time the British from Augusta back to Savannah and Charleston.

But a quick reverse of fortune occurred within a month. Gen. Ashe, in command of an American force in South Carolina, composed of Georgians under Gen. Elbert and Col. McIntosh, with North and South Carolina regiments, amounting to 1,200 infantry and a small body of cavalry, was ordered to cross the river and take a position near Brier Creek bridge in Screven county, about half way between Augusta and Savannah, so as to interpose the command between the enemy and the up country. His left rested upon the impassable swamp of the river, while the creek was along the front, and a curtain of cavalry hung around his right. Providing for possible disaster, notwithstanding his strong dispositions, Gen. Ashe made arrangements to retreat by boats across the river, and in his strong position felt secure against the enemy. But Gen. Prevost, marching from Savannah and collecting detachments from all parts as he went, made a rapid detour by which he evaded the cavalry that had been unfortunately crossed to the south side of the creek, and suddenly fell upon the surprised right flank of the American line. The attack found the command of Gen. Ashe wholly unprepared. The troops were not in battle line, and Ashe was unable to form his entire command before his enemy had charged and broken down the opposition of a few companies which Elbert and McIntosh with rare bravery had rallied, and fought until they were overpowered. The patriot army gave in confusion, and the mass escaped by the boats or by swimming the river. The Georgia troops suffered heavy losses, and their brave leaders, Elbert and McIntosh, with Maj. Douglass and eight captains, besides over 150 men, were taken prisoners. Elated with victory, Prevost marched his command, May, 1779, against Charleston and demanded its surrender. Moultrie courageously refused the demand, and while preparing the defense was succored by Gen. Lincoln, whose advance caused Prevost to beat a slow retreat toward Savannah along the coast. Col. Maitland, with a strong force, was attacked by the Americans at Stone Ferry, June, 1779, and repulsed the Americans with heavy loss.

In this state of affairs, where neither side appeared to gain any decided advantage, it was determined by the Americans to attempt the recapture of Savannah by a combined assault of the fortress under Gen. Lincoln, with the aid of a French fleet under Count d'Estaing. The troops under Lincoln were moved from South Carolina and upper Georgia to the west side of the Savannah, and in 1779 the French fleet, appearing off the coast, made demonstrations at various inlets, and finally began to land in launches below the city, and at the same time prepared their eleven frigates to advance up the river from Tybee. Upon this demonstration Gen. Prevost prepared for defense with great energy. Col. Maitland was withdrawn from Port Royal, the British ships retired up the river, guns and ammunition were transported in light vessels at Port Royal harbor through the cuts, and the seamen were appointed to the batteries which had been constructed under the skillful supervision of Col. Moncrief. The buoys of the bar were cut away, several ships were sunken in the channel for obstructions, and the fortifications around the city were hurriedly strengthened. Above the city a boom was laid across the river to avoid the danger of fire rafts, which Lincoln's men might float down the river among the British shipping, and the good ship Germain, armed with her guns, was stationed off Yamacraw to protect the flank.

Junction of the French and Americans having been effected, d'Estaing demanded the surrender of the city on Sept. 16, and received the defiant answer, "We are unanimously determined to defend the town." The attack opened with three small vessels having twelve-pound and eighteen-pound guns, which were advanced near enough to throw shot into the city with little damage. Proceeding afterward to reduce the fortified city by regular approach, the French commander constructed a line of works for infantry and thirty-seven pieces of artillery. These finished, a furious cannonading began at midnight of Oct. 3, and continued for nearly a week without producing any effect. It was then determined in a council of war to take the city by storm, and at daybreak Oct. 9 the assault was made along the entire American and French line combined. Three separate times the American and French charged the British in their entrenchments, but were as often repulsed with severe loss. Grapeshot from the British batteries was seen to do destructive work in assisting the fire of musketry. The Georgians and Carolinians, led by Lincoln, attacked the British batteries in the fort at Spring Hill, and even planted their colors on the crest, but were forced back by the fire of the foe. Sergt. Jasper again distinguished himself by his heroic conduct in this assault. He was already celebrated for repeated acts of gallantry, and was now among the first to scale the parapet of the redoubt with the colors of his regiment, which had been presented by Mrs. Elliott. To celebrate the momentary victory as well as to inspire his fellow-soldiers with new daring, the ardent patriot stuck the staff of his flag upon the parapet and saw it wave over the redoubt, but a moment afterward he was pierced by a deadly ball, and fell upon the spot made forever memorable for his chivalry.

During the fiercest hours of their combined assault the noble Pole, Count Pulaski, rode at the head of his 200 cavalry whenever a charge could be made. At length he thought he saw an advantage through which he could penetrate the British lines, and, forming his gallant horse for a headlong charge, dashed at full speed into the city and bore all before him until he reached an obstruction of heavy abattis, through which it was impossible to ride. This devoted body of brave men were then compelled to endure a galling fire from the British batteries and riflemen, which at last threw them into confusion. A canister shot driving through Pulaski's thigh, hurled him at this critical moment from his horse, and inflicted a deadly wound. The fallen hero was borne from the battlefield and afterward placed under skillful treatment aboard the "Wasp," but as the ship was departing for Charleston a few days later the patriot foreigner, who in love of liberty came to the help of Georgia in its extremity, yielded his great soul to death, and his body was consigned to the sea, where the waters of the Atlantic and the Savannah river met. The fierce battle continued until about noon, and the assault having failed with lamentable losses of officers and men, d'Estaing and Lincoln ceased firing, and running up a white flag asked for a truce to bury the dead and remove the wounded. This was agreed to by the British commander, and while these humane offices were being performed by both armies, a council was held in which Lincoln urged a renewal of the assault, but the discouraged count resolved to withdraw. Retiring to their original lines the French began to remove their heavy guns to the ships, and on October 17, without having made any further demonstration, d'Estaing drew off his command and embarked. Gen. Lincoln being left without support fell back upon the interior, and Georgia was again in control of the enemy.

Augusta was re-entered by the British with their Indian allies under the command of Col. Thomas Browne, who held it with an iron hand for many months. Col. Elijah Clarke made a gallant attempt in September, 1780, to wrest the town from Browne's grasp by hastily gathering three companies of militia, commanded by Col. McCall, Maj. Taylor and himself, and marched to an attack on the west side of the city. He first encountered the Indians, and driving them rapidly back, fell suddenly on a body of rangers in camp within a few miles of the city, and surprising the garrison, laid siege with vigor to the fortifications. Irregular fighting continued from day to day, resulting in an unsuccessful attempt by the patriots to either force Browne to surrender or to carry his works by storm. A body of Cherokee Indians arriving, and also a force of British under Col. Cruger coming to reinforce Browne, the Americans were compelled to raise the siege. They had suffered heavy loss, and Maj. Carter, defending the pass to the White House with great bravery, was killed, leaving behind him this eulogium from the commander: "A man of more bravery than Maj. Carter never occupied a space between heaven and earth." With him fell the fiery Luckie and many others equally brave. In one of the sorties Capt. Ashby, with twenty-eight men, was captured by the British, and twelve of the number, including Ashby, were hanged on the White House staircase. Indian brutalities were also permitted within the knowledge of the British officers, which painfully disclosed the savage nature of the wild war which was waged in Georgia. Col. Browne was desperately wounded himself during the skirmishes of this siege, but recovered and remained in charge of Augusta until the final siege and surrender of the place in 1781.

Gen. Greene had been sent to take charge of the southern department after the disastrous campaign of Gates, and had the assistance of the great partisan leaders, Marion, Sumter, Pickens, Clarke and Dooly. These noted leaders carried on a harassing warfare against the British, striking unexpected blows, and now began under the generalship of Greene to force the invaders of Carolina back toward the sea. With them "Light Horse Harry" Lee co-operated with signal distinction, and participating in the plan to drive the enemy from all their interior forts, moved his command into Georgia for the purpose of re-taking Augusta. Fort Galphin lay in his path, and there, he learned, had been recently stored a quantity of ammunition and presents for the Indians. These he seized with little resistance and distributed among his troops. The cavalry, under Maj. Eggleston, forded and swam the river, and the entire command was quickly marched to the western side of the city, and formed a junction with the provincial troops which Gens. Clarke, Pickens and Jackson had in their command. The plan adopted was to first attack Fort Grierson, which had been erected in the upper part of the place, and this was done at the first assault. The garrison was taken by storm and its defenders were killed, captured or driven down the river to Fort Cornwallis, near the center of the city. The Americans then took a strong position, with Lee near the bluff banks of the river, while Pickens and Clarke extended the right into adjacent roads. Taking advantage of the shelter which the curves and high banks of the river afforded, the Americans began to work their fortifications toward Fort Cornwallis, but as the flat, even ground afforded no advantageous position for the light artillery which they had, the expedient was adopted of building a low tower of wood from which their cannon might be fired with effect. The besieged British made several furious sallies against the besiegers, to be driven back to their fort at the point of the bayonet. Several bloody hand-to-hand engagements took place along the river bank in the vain attempt of Col. Browne to take the American works. The erection of the tower endangered Fort Cornwallis. Several houses between the American and the British lines had been seized by a few sharpshooters from Lee's lines, and the situation grew desperate for the British garrison. Browne made a final effort to burn the tower and the houses which sheltered the sharpshooters, but all means of defense failing, he was compelled to surrender. The British garrison marched out on the morning of June 5, 1781, at shouldered arms, with drums beating, to a spot near by, where their arms were piled, and they with the Indian allies were guarded toward Savannah, to be delivered as prisoners to the nearest American command until exchanged.

Col. James Jackson was ordered to march to Ebenezer with his command, and making that point the center of operations, engaged in numerous small battles with parties of British. Col. Jackson harassed the enemy at all points around Savannah until Col. Campbell followed after him with a large force of British cavalry, and overtaking him on the Ogeechee, compelled him after several hours of stubborn fighting to retreat into a swamp, from which he escaped during the night and returned to Ebenezer. Reinforcing his command he again scoured the country and intercepted the foraging parties sent out so successfully that the British commander ceased to occupy the country outside the limits of Savannah.

Georgia from Fort Heard to Savannah was once again free from British invasion. Gen. Greene, who had scarcely over 2,000 men when he assumed the command in the Carolinas, had fought Cornwallis, Rawdon, and Stewart successively, each time outnumbered, but always with such success as to re-inspire confidence in the colonies and to force the enemy steadily from their positions until at length they held only Charleston and Savannah. Washington soon compelled the surrender of Cornwallis at York, and the long seven years' war was over. Savannah was evacuated July 12, 1782, and Gen. Jackson entered it proudly with his dashing cavalry and received the surrender of the town.

The military organization which existed in Georgia during these years of war with England was of such an imperfect character as to have embarrassed the natural courage of the colonists. The number enlisted in service was small for the population, but a better organization and equipment with smaller forces would have been much more effective. The meager records show an attempt to form Georgia brigades in the continental line with regiments and battalions of infantry; companies of mounted men called dragoons; and certain bodies called legionary corps; unattached partisan rangers and troops of horse were accepted and used, sometimes in co-operation with the main body, and often in independent service. The artillery was least effective of all arms on account of the poor quality of the guns, the inadequate means of carriage, and the expensiveness of their use. Officers and soldiers were clad in coarse attire, generally home made, and by no means uniform in cut or color. These troops assembled and fought their battles, then many dispersed, and came together again in emergencies. And thus the state maintained its cause and won its place among the free commonwealths of the Union. The territory covered by the war, as has been noticed, was a narrow strip extending along the coast from St. Mary's to the Savannah, and then up between the Ogeechee and Savannah rivers to Elbert and Wilkes counties. The population was small and grouped around a score of little towns. The patriots were generally poor, hardy and brave, accustomed to perils by the Indians, and bred to the love of liberty. They fought well without complete military organization or equipment, but they learned the need of both and began to devise a militia system, which after many changes is growing into the more perfect plans of the present period.

UNDER THE CONFEDERATION.

Georgia was now a member of the confederation of states formed during the revolution, and a few years later united with the other states in the adoption of the constitution of the United States. When the colonies first opposed the aggressions of the crown and parliament they had no idea of producing a separation between the countries. Their object was merely to obtain a redress of their wrongs, and to this end repeated petitions and remonstrances were made, all expressing the most loyal feelings, and claiming or asking only those rights and liberties to which they were entitled as British subjects. When, however, these were all disregarded, and new petitions produced only new violations of their rights—when the parliament assumed to itself the right to bind the colonists in all cases without their consent, and when by repeated oppressions the burden became too heavy to be borne by a free people, they indignantly threw off the trammels of tyranny, declared themselves free and independent of the mother country, and by an appeal to arms supported that declaration to the emancipation of thirteen states from the oppressions of a weak, misguided king.

Although now free from British invasion, the people of the state were still flanked from the seaboard to the mountains by the Indians, who occupied a large extent of unceded lands which they claimed the right to use as hunting grounds. Their dangerous proximity and frequent predatory incursions upon the American settlements required the maintenance of a ready and vigilant military establishment, to be called at a moment's notice into actual service. The old organizations of the recent revolution provided a basis in part, and the officers who had distinguished themselves in that war furnished experienced commanders of divisions, brigades and regiments. Col. James Jackson was made a colonel, First regiment of regulars, and afterward brigadier-general of an important brigade composed of battalions from Chatham and contiguous counties. Tattnall was assigned to the duty of organizing commands to cover the exposed counties of Bryan, Liberty, and McIntosh, and for protection of the people against the troublesome Indians. The Chatham artillery was kept under Tattnall's instruction in superb drill. Gen. Wayne was also in constant service, and Gens. Twiggs, Elbert, Heard and other leaders were continued in commission. Col. Hammond, who had attained a richly deserved distinction as a partisan fighter, was sent with a battalion of Chatham militia to suppress a body of lower Creeks who were doing damage on the frontier. The office of adjutant-general was organized, the militia enrolled, and required to make regular reports. The legislature appropriated funds for the purchase of 10,000 stand of arms, 12 field pieces, 700 pairs horsemen pistols, 1,000 horsemen swords, 10,000 pounds of powder, and other munitions, to be deposited in the arsenal at Louisville, the capital of the state.

The following official return of a battalion of eleven companies will serve to show the military character of the organization of the times:

"A return of the First battalion of Burke county militia, agreeable to order with its present situation and rank, with the number of men in each company and the number of arms, shot bags, and powder-horns for the year 1792."

WAR OF 1812.

The war of 1812 was fought by the United States against England for maritime independence. The honor of the new republic was assailed on the high seas by the insistence of Great Britain of a right to search American vessels for fugitive British subjects. A doctrine which America regards as established by the revolution, that a citizen of a foreign country could voluntarily surrender his native citizenship and swear allegiance to another government, was disputed by Great Britain, who held that "once an Englishman was to be an Englishman always." Upon this ground American vessels were held up on the ocean by English men-of-war and searched to such an extent that within the eight years of forbearance, over 6,000 men were taken from the ships of the United States and forced into the British navy. At length the American ship "President" encountered and attacked the British war-ship "Little Belt," and with well-trained shots disabled and brought her to terms. About the same time the Indians in Indiana were excited by British agency to make war on the Americans, and were defeated in the great battle of Tippecanoe, fought under the leadership of Gen. William Henry Harrison. These victories roused the American spirit, and war was declared by congress against Great Britain in June, 1812. At that time the United States navy consisted of only thirteen inferior vessels, while the British numbered nearly 1,000, nor were the American armies yet organized and equipped. The first battles were therefore won by the British, and the war raged along the great lakes upon the frontier of New York, and in the west. But after a year of defeats the day brightened for the Americans by the naval victory of Perry on Lake Erie, and the brilliant battle where Col. Dick Johnson is famed for killing the great Tecumseh. Scott, Ripley and Gaines commanded in the New York district, winning the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane. The little navy began also to astonish the world. The "Essex" whipped the "Albert," the "Constitution" vanquished the "Guerrier," the "Wasp" forced the "Frolic" to haul down its flag. Capt. Bainbridge blew up the "Java" with his "Old Ironsides," and the "Hornet" sank the "Peacock." Privateers put in commission scoured the seas, captured three hundred merchant ships and broke down British commerce.

During this time Georgia was not invaded at any point, but was endangered on its western frontier by the visit of Tecumseh, whom the Shawnees sent to engage the Creek Indians on behalf of Great Britain in the general quarrel. In this visit to Alabama Tecumseh, who was afterward slain, excited the Creeks to attack Fort Mims and massacre the prisoners, producing such alarm that the call on the government in Georgia by the Federal government for a levy of troops was immediately filled. Thirty-six hundred men were assembled at Camp Hope in the vicinity of Fort Hawkins and placed under command of Gen. Floyd, with orders to join Gen. Andrew Jackson, who was in supreme command in Alabama. Floyd's force was composed of two regiments of infantry armed with muskets, one battalion of riflemen, one squadron of dragoons, and a company of artillery, nearly all of whom were volunteers and the best quality of Georgia militia. Delayed for a time for the want of supplies and transportation, Floyd procured funds from the state treasury and purchased his supplies for active operations. Then constructing a line of blockhouses and stockade forts from the Ocmulgee westward, he built a strong work on the Chattahoochee which was named Fort Mitchell. Establishing a camp there Floyd detached a body of 1,000 picked men, carrying their rations in their haversacks without baggage, and by a forced march of about two days and a night, reached the Indian town of Antossee at daybreak, which was instantly and furiously attacked. The Indians, although taken by surprise, fought with desperation, but were routed with great slaughter and the town was reduced to ashes. Floyd's command suffered severe loss, and he himself was seriously wounded, but after a short rest, the Georgians were reinforced from Fort Mitchell to the strength of 1,500 men, and moved to attack the upper Creeks at Challibee. On the march and when near the town they were in turn surprised by the Indians, who fell upon them at night in large numbers and kept them under murderous fire until, daylight coming, the Georgia troops rallied and drove the Indians entirely from the field with great loss.

Gen. Jackson, with Tennessee, Alabama and Georgia troops, rapidly reduced the Creeks to peace, and Floyd's command being disbanded to their homes, he was subsequently appointed to a new brigade to co-operate with Gen. Clarke on the coast. The British, however, made a few attempts to enter Georgia from the sea. Landing at Cumberland island they made an effort to hold the island, but were so vigorously attacked by a small force under Capt. Messias, Capt. Tattnall, Lieut. Hill and Lieut. Hardee, that they were compelled to retreat to their boats. Another similar enterprise was made up the St. Mary's river with barges, but they were driven back by the sharp-shooters along the bank, who from all coverts discharged their rifles with almost unerring aim. Other small harassing events occurred, but meanwhile Jackson won the great victory at New Orleans, and the treaty of peace signed at Ghent December, 1814, gladdened the distressed country.

REVISION OF MILITIA LAWS.

After the war of 1812 the militia laws of the state were thoroughly revised, and with some occasional changes the system was continued in force until the period of the Confederate war. By this militia system the state was divided into small military jurisdictions called captain's districts, and were numbered consecutively as districts of Georgia militia in which magistrates or justices of the peace had civil and criminal jurisdiction in limited cases. By the new statute of 1818, the militia was organized into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions and companies, respectively commanded by major-generals, brigadier-generals, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors and captains. The territory was divided into two departments and each of these departments was divided into six divisions, covering certain designated counties, making twelve military divisions, each under the command of a major-general. The divisions were composed of two or more brigades and these were formed of regiments and battalions of infantry, squadrons of horse and one company of artillery to each regiment. The regiments were made up of two battalions, and the battalions were composed of companies without special number, under command of the captains. The companies were divided into two platoons, and each platoon into four sections. The commissioned officers were first and second lieutenant and ensign. The non-commissioned officers were four sergeants and four corporals, and a drummer and a fifer were allowed for each company. Sixty-four privates constituted the limit of a company enrollment, and these were divided by the captains into four squads, each squad under direction and drill by a sergeant and a corporal. The enrollment of the citizen soldiery was designed to include the arms-bearing strength of the entire population, and every able-bodied white male citizen between the ages of eighteen and forty-five was made subject to military duty, and required to be enrolled in the company of his district.

The United States was expected to furnish arms, but the state, without waiting for them from this source, voted liberal appropriations for that purpose, and distributed them upon proper requisition among the troops. It was therefore required that every commissioned officer should be properly armed with his sword, every non-commissioned officer to appear at all musters "armed, equipped and provided with a firelock in good order, a cartridge box, and a shot-pouch." Grenadiers, or riflemen, the cavalry and artillery were to be armed and equipped fully, like regulars in the United States army, and all volunteer companies organized apart from the militia of the line were to be held to the same rule as to arms, uniform and equipment.

The musket of that date was a smooth-bore barrel on a rough-and-ready straight stock, with thimbles on the under side of the barrel to hold the iron ram-rod, and it was discharged by means of a flint and steel lock which cast a spark into a small metal pan primed with powder. The powder in the pan caught the spark and flashing out a little puff of smoke, its fire entered the barrel at the side of the breech through a touch-hole, and exploded the charge which had been rammed tightly to the bottom of the barrel. The round leaden ball, or the charge of buck-shot, was thus driven out with sufficient force to do good execution at the distance of a hundred yards. A bayonet was borne in a scabbard by the soldier and was adjusted so as to go over the muzzle of the musket, and by a turn of its shank was fastened securely in place. The manual of arms taught the soldier was necessarily adapted to the kind of weapon in his hands. He was taught to "Handle cartridge" in two motions, which transferred the cartridge from the cartouch to a position opposite his mouth: to "Tear cartridge," which he did by biting one end off with the teeth; "Load," "Draw rammer," "Prime," "Ready," "Aim," "Fire!" All these motions were gone through with in drill and were necessary to actual battle, although executed at the will of the soldier when face to face with the foe. It may be supposed that the firing was slow and the execution much less than in this period of improved weapons of war. The horseman's pistol was simply a short musket-barrel on a pistol stock. The entire arm was a little over a foot in length, heavy, cumbersome and of short range. A brace of them was carried by each trooper in holsters on the front of his saddle. But with these and his trusty, slightly curved broadsword, the mounted man did admirable service. The artillery was scarcely as effective in construction as these imperfect small arms. The guns were commonly smooth-bore ten and twelve-pounders, carrying round shot and grape, loaded by rammers at the muzzle and fired by being touched off at the vent near the breech. But they made a noise and were dreaded by the savages. The guns on the coast and the general equipment of the Chatham artillery were of superior quality and had been often handled with great effect. The private militia soldiers were not required to dress in uniform and consequently they mustered in all varieties of suits, but the uniform of the officers must correspond with those worn by the United States army officers, with this provision, that they "might be made of homespun dark blue cotton and wool, with plated bullet buttons." The uniform of the volunteer was required to be blue, but with liberty as to ornament. The button worn by the militia was a round, hollow, brass or white metal attachment put on in triple rows, the center row serving to fasten the coat and the others for conspicuous show. Field officers wore the heavy cocked hat with waving plume, and were further distinguished by epaulettes of gilt or bright yellow worsted fastened on each shoulder.

The musters required by law were frequent. The officers, both commissioned and non-commissioned, of every regiment were to be assembled once each year, and being formed into a company the adjutant-general was required to train and instruct them in the exercises and discipline prescribed by the congress of the United States. At these annual drills the commissioned officers were ordered to appear in full uniform and with their swords; the non-commissioned officers with firelocks and bayonets accoutered also with cartouch boxes, bayonet belts and scabbards, and with six blank cartridges each for practice in loading and firing. The encampment and drill could continue three days and in addition to this exercise the brigadier-general could order separate drills and reviews of the officers under his personal supervision. The regimental muster of the entire command was held annually under the inspection of the adjutant-general, who was directed by the law to instruct the regiments in the evolutions prescribed by congress. The colonel must also hold an annual muster of his whole regiment, and the majors were authorized to call on their battalions for exercise twice every year. In addition to these general assemblies the company parade was to be made in the several militia districts four times annually, at which time the captains exercised their men according to the tactics.

It was found necessary to give special encouragement to the volunteer cavalry, who could be rapidly moved in emergencies. Many sections of the state needed this particular arm for protection of the inhabitants. Hence squadrons of volunteer cavalry were organized, comprising two to five troops and commanded by a major. Each troop was required to consist of at least forty men uniformed in blue, mounted on good horses and armed with broadswords and pistols with holsters. Musters for instruction were held four times a year, and once annually a three-days' patrol and drill of the whole squadron was exacted. Every county was permitted to form a cavalry company, the whole body throughout the state being known as the Georgia Guards, and were subject to first call in all emergencies. A system of reports was adopted by which an exact account of arms, accouterments and the number of effective men was regularly made by each captain, and these forwarded to regimental headquarters were consolidated, then transmitted to brigade commanders, were again consolidated and forwarded to the division headquarters, and then to the office of the governor. Military storekeepers were also appointed for Savannah and Milledgeville, who were charged with the custody of all arms, munitions, arsenals and other military property.

This minute military system which converted the population of Georgia into a military force, was sustained in part by fines and penalties for delinquencies, but also by the knowledge of its importance for the safety of the people. Notwithstanding its imperfect fulfillment it provided the state with a method through which a sufficient force could be quickly assembled in any section. The governor was clothed with full authority to call out the militia of the line or any volunteer company on invasion or insurrection, or a probable prospect thereof, either by entire companies or by drafts of men, and when thus called out they were governed by the laws which regulate troops of the United States. Even officers commanding in counties were empowered in cases of sudden invasion of a county to summon their commands to repel the invaders without waiting for orders from any superior officer. In such cases, however, it was made their duty to dispatch a courier to the brigade commander, and through that source to report the invasion to the governor. With these military dispositions Georgia sustained itself throughout the petty Indian difficulties of twenty years following the cessation of British hostilities until confronted with the serious outbreak of the lower Creeks in 1836.

WAR WITH CREEK INDIANS.

The war with the Creek Indians in Georgia during the year 1836 was caused by the continued depredations committed by roving bands of this tribe upon the frontiers. Near the beginning of the century it was deemed advisable to extinguish by treaties the titles of the Indians to the territory of the state and to induce them to remove to the west beyond the Mississippi river. Many treaties were signed under which partial cessions of land had been made, and the United States government finally contracted with Georgia to secure the removal of the Creeks, Cherokees and all other Indians from the state. This effort was so warmly resisted by the Indians in South Georgia as to cause its temporary suspension, but the commissioners were directed to hold a council with the Creeks at The-Cath-Co, the capital of the tribe, for the purpose of final negotiations. The council was held in 1824 and resulted in a refusal by a majority of the chiefs to accede to the proposed terms. President Monroe being appealed to, brought about another full meeting of the chiefs at Indian Springs, February, 1825. Big Warrior, the head of the Muscogee Confederacy in the Creek nation, a man of great ability and of friendly disposition, was attended in the council by the notable chiefs of his tribe and listened with gravity to the addresses of the commissioners. They were answered by Opothleyolo, their chosen spokesman, who eloquently recited the claims of the Creeks, and in conclusion declared that no treaty for the extinguishment of their titles could be agreed upon by their chiefs. He therefore advised the holding of another council at Broken Arrow. After the council of the day ended Big Warrior departed with the chiefs and warriors of the Cussetas, but certain leading chiefs belonging to the party led by McIntosh remained in large numbers, and on the next day resumed the council and agreed upon a treaty which was duly signed and forwarded to President Monroe, who also signed it on behalf of the United States. This formal cession of their lands in Georgia created an excitement among the hostile portions of the Creek nation which was expressed at first in warm protests accompanied with threats of war. Among their first revenges was the assassination of McIntosh in the night at his house by two bands which had been selected for that purpose in a secret council. The home of McIntosh on the Chattochee river was set afire by the appointed assassins and he, after desperately fighting for his life, was slain and scalped. His house was then burned to the ground, his property plundered and his cattle killed. The excited Indians next marched to the house of Hawkins, the son-in-law of McIntosh, and brutally slew him in the same manner. Tustennugee, a brave, intelligent chief who had signed the treaty was also killed, and the Creeks proceeded to make forays for plunder and slaughter upon the defenseless settlements. The fears of the people becoming very great, Gov. Troup organized bodies of Georgia militia for defense. The secretary of war of the United States also ordered Gen. Gaines to co-operate with Troup. An extra session of the legislature was called, during which the treaty was fully discussed, and a dangerous controversy arose between the state and the Federal government. The legislature declared that upon its investigation it fully appeared that the Indian Springs council had concluded a fair and open treaty which President Monroe had ratified. The treaty was made in accordance with the compact entered into between the state and the general government in 1802. But through improper influences this treaty was ignored and another signed in 1826 which President Adams sent to the senate for ratification. Cuthbert, Forsyth, Meriwether and other Georgia congressmen vigorously opposed the second treaty, but it was ratified by the senate. Gov. Troup held to the validity of the first treaty at Indian Springs, and in reply to the president, who had threatened force in carrying the last treaty into effect, declared that "he would feel it to be his duty to resist to the utmost any military attack which the president of the United States should think proper to make upon the territory, people, or sovereignty of Georgia." The legislature sustained the bold governor, and the people declared for "Troup and the treaty" without dissent. Fortunately no violence was offered by the general government to sustain its untenable position, and the territory ceded by the Creeks was surveyed and divided by lottery in 1827.

But the hostile Creeks were not at all contented and uniting with the Seminoles in lower Alabama, made numerous hostile demonstrations throughout Alabama and on the borders of Georgia along the Chattahoochee river, producing constant alarm. One of the earliest attacks upon the Georgia settlers was made at night in May, 1836, upon the little village of Roanoke, situated on the left bank of the Chattahoochee river in Stewart county by the same body of Creek Indians who had attacked the small steamboat "Georgia" not long before, and killed all on board. The first night attack on Roanoke was repelled by the citizen soldiers who had collected there for its defense, chiefly from Stewart county, and the Indians were driven across the river. A block-house surrounded by sharpened pickets had been built in Roanoke and other preparations made to resist attacks, but as the Indians did not immediately return the town felt secure and relaxed its vigilance. So little fear was felt of further immediate assault that many of the soldiers who had been assembled at that place to guard the borders of Georgia went to their homes in Lumpkin and other parts of the county on short leaves of absence. Only a few men were left on guard and there appeared no danger. But on Sunday morning, very shortly after the first unsuccessful attempt of the Indians and just before day-break, the slumbering garrison was aroused by the yells and shouts of the Indians now numbering about 300. They had silently crossed the river and stealthily approaching the little hamlet, scattered around it in Indian fashion and, as if fearing the result of assault, began to pour in their fire from a little distance. The aroused troops returned the fire with irregular and uncertain aim in the dark, and the Indians closing in around them began to fire with deadly effect. Eleven men were killed in a short time and eight were wounded. The remainder who were unhurt, with such of the wounded as could escape, making a dash for life broke through the circle of Indians into the adjacent woods and fled under the bluffs of the river. The savages set fire to the town and in the midst of their revels during the day were attacked and routed by a new body of soldiers who had fortunately hurried to the relief of the little garrison. This and similar attacks created such alarm that many families fled to middle Georgia. Women and children were removed to Lumpkin, and the court-house was converted into a block-house as a safe refuge. All the men of the county were put under arms.

About three weeks later a severe fight occurred on Sheppard's plantation in the same county between Capt. Garmany's command of Georgia militia and the Creeks. Capt. Garmany's company consisted of only about forty men, but on meeting with the Indians the heroic little band at once attacked them, when a fight ensued in the style adopted often in Indian wars. The fight was in the form of a skirmish where each soldier took advantage of any tree or other protection while firing on his foe. At first Garmany drove his enemy before him, but reinforcements coming from the larger body of Indians he was forced to fight in retreat, stubbornly contesting the field from tree to tree. Maj. Jernigan, who was stationed at Fort Jones, hearing the firing pushed forward and arrived in time to take a brave and active part in the battle. At a critical moment another relief came from Fort McCreary and then a general advance being made the Indians were put to flight. The courage of these pioneer settlers fighting for the protection of their families from the ravages of Indian marauders was widely commended. Garmany was severely shot and many of the command were killed and wounded.

After these battles in Stewart county the Indians with increased numbers began their march down the Chattahoochee river and turning through Randolph county sought to reach the Seminoles on the borders of Florida and Georgia. As they were passing through Randolph and Lee counties they were pursued by the gallant Jernigan with the companies of Capt. Ball and Capt. Clifton, now reinforced by companies from other parts of the state commanded by Captains Wood, Mathews, Guilford, Snellgrove, Wills and Smith, making a regiment of about 300 men. A short and bloody encounter occurred on July 25 at the Ichuanochua creek and the Indians retreating at night were followed until July 27, when they were again overtaken and Gen. Welborn, arriving from Eufaula with troops, was placed in command and continued the battle. The Indians, numbering over 300, secreted themselves in the depths of the swamp and awaited the advance of the Americans. Dividing the command so as to move with advantage to a common center Welborn and Jernigan charged the Indians from several directions, but met with a desperate resistance at all points. Finally securing an advantage through a flank movement of Capt. Wood, and a simultaneous direct attack by the companies of Capt. Ball and Capt. Clifton, the whole line assailed the Indians and so impetuously scattered them, that contrary to their custom they left many of their dead and wounded behind.

The battle of Chickasawhatchee, which occurred in a swamp in Baker county, is a companion of the engagement just related and also illustrated the warfare in Georgia during its early settlement. The Indians, about 300 strong, had collected on an island in the swamp and prepared for defense. The swamp was about six miles wide and fifteen miles long, containing small islands and infested with wild animals. Within its dark recesses the Indians had penetrated, intending to march southward to join the Seminoles. Col. Beall, commanding a militia force of about 500 men, composed of infantry companies from Stewart, Early, Baker, Thomas and Pulaski and a cavalry company from Bibb, pursued and determined to attack them in their covert. First stationing a part of his force at points along the swamp to intercept the Indians on their escape, the other companies marched into the swamp through mud and water about four miles. The advance guard coming in sight of the savages imprudently fired and thus by alarming the camp saved the Indians from complete surprise. Instantly taking to their cover and animated by their chief, they fought the advancing Georgians with great bravery and only gave way when a rifle ball slew their courageous chief. The Indians were heavily slaughtered as they fled down the swamp, leaving behind them all their tents, horses, provisions and entire equipage. The battle almost entirely broke up the Indian party. Dispersing in all directions, one body hurried southward to the Seminoles for shelter and others skulking through the woods, recrossed the Chatahoochee into Alabama, while many of them were captured in small numbers in different places.

It was one of these scattered remnants marching through Thomas county toward Florida that was discovered and attacked by the Thomas county and Lowndes county battalions, commanded by Maj. Young, between Warrior creek and Little river. The battalion was formed in line confronting the Indian force, which had made a stand in a good position and dashed against them under a galling fire. The Indians made a fierce resistance, continuing the fight even after their lines were broken by firing from behind trees until they at last escaped below the borders of the state.

The difficulties with the Creeks in southern Georgia were co-incidental with the Cherokee troubles. The Cherokee Indians, once a powerful nation inhabiting the fine country from the Ohio to the Tennessee river, had dwindled to a small but intelligent tribe which had encroached on the territory of the upper Creeks until they had gained possession of a large part of north Georgia. The tribe in 1838, the date of their removal, had advanced very much in civilization. They had schools, churches, farms and trading places and lived under a written constitutional form of government. Conflicts of jurisdiction were inevitable where the state of Georgia claimed civil and military jurisdiction over territory occupied by a race which asserted for themselves another form of government, and the difficulties were of such a character as to be without solution except by the entire submission of the Cherokees to the state government, or their removal beyond the Mississippi. The latter alternative appearing to be alone feasible, the United States in 1827 provided for removal and permanent settlement of the Cherokees, but very few were found willing to make the change of counties. Georgia had found it necessary to extend its commercial jurisdiction over the Cherokee nation, but John Ross, principal chief, appealed to the supreme court of the United States for injunction to restrain the state from enforcing this legislation. Pending these troubles a survey of the land was made by Georgia amidst great excitement, and for many years the state as well as the general government was in perplexity. In 1834 the Cherokees began to make such a show of hostilities that the legislature authorized the government to organize the Georgia guard for protection, and a part of this guard composed of mounted troops was put under command of Col. Bishop and stationed within the Cherokee territory.

As a further complication of difficulties parties divided among the Cherokees on the question of removal. John Ridge, a Cherokee chief of distinction who favored the removal, and John Ross, another Cherokee of high esteem among his people who led the party opposed to removal, at first strove for supremacy, but finally went together to Washington and there formulated a plan of treaty which, after much discussion between the Ross party and the Ridge party, was concluded and ratified May, 1836, at Washington. But hostile sentiments felt by Cherokees opposed to the treaty were still exhibited in terms so unfriendly as to cause great fears of an outbreak. Consequently Gen. Hemphill was ordered to station a body of militia on the Coosa under Maj. Nelson and arms were freely distributed among the Americans in the Cherokee country. Gen. Wood was sent into Georgia with a Tennessee brigade commanded by Gen. Dunlop, and these prudent movements of well-armed troops acting in concert with the Georgia guard prevented hostilities. Final arrangements were then made for the removal of the Cherokees and Gen. Scott was sent in 1838 to superintend the work. He assembled his command at New Echota and dispatching various companies in different directions throughout the Cherokee nation, collected the Indians in camp and about the close of the summer started them up the long march to the west. About 14,000 were then removed and all possible arrangements were adopted for their comfort. Thus ended the Indian difficulties of the state with the Indian tribes whom Oglethorpe found in Georgia 105 years before.

MEXICAN WAR.

Scarcely a decade had passed, during which the whole country as well as Georgia passed through several years of financial distress, when the United States became involved in a brief successful war with Mexico, caused chiefly by the resistance of that country to the "annexation of Texas." But it is not within the scope of this sketch to follow the history of that foreign struggle. It is sufficient to say that Georgia favored most heartily the annexation of Texas, and having already contributed men like Lamar, Houston, Fannin and Wood to fight and die for Texan independence now responded to its small quota of men and money required by the government. The entire United States force employed in the invasion of Mexico was composed of 26,690 total regulars and 56,926 total volunteers, besides the navy. The losses of men by death from disease and wounds was about 11,000, and only about 1,500 were killed in battle, making a loss of only seven per cent. The cost in money amounted to $150,000,000. The gain consisted of the cession of extensive territory stretching to the Pacific ocean, several thousand miles of valuable sea coast and an immense bound of the United States into international power. In the accomplishment of this general result Georgia sent the following organizations in addition to numbers who served from the state in various bodies through the war:

First regiment of volunteers: Col. Henry R. Jackson, Lieut.-Col. T. Y. Redd, Maj. Chas J. Williams; Adjts. C. P. Hervey, John Forsyth, Capts. Bird, Calhoun, Davis, Dill, Grambling, Holmes, Jones, Nelson, Sarjent and Turner.

Battalion Georgia volunteers: Lieut.-Col. I. G. Seymour, Adj. F. M. Levison, Capts. Fain, Gaulden, Grant, Hervey, Nelson and Smith. Battalion Georgia mounted volunteers: Lieut.-Col. J. S. Calhoun, Adjts. Haliday and Knight; Capts. Fulton, Goulding, Hamilton, Kendall, Nelson, Renfro and W. T. Wofford.

Independent Georgia mounted volunteers: Capt. John Loyall; Lieuts. F. M. McCordy, George T. Anderson and Ed. L. Thomas. Among the regular army officers we find the names of men distinguished then and afterwards for military skill and gallantry, such as Maj. James Longstreet, Lieut. La Fayette McLaws, Lieut.-Col. W. H. T. Walker, Maj. Alfred H. Colquitt, Maj. Goode Bryan, Capt. Gilmer, Capt. G. W. Smith, Maj. Geo. Rains, Capt. Duncan Clinch, Capt. Ector, Col. Echols, all of whom, as is well known, rose to high rank in the Confederate war. Maj. David E. Twiggs was a distinguished soldier before the Mexican war and now bore a famous part under Taylor and Scott from the beginning to the close. Lieut. Geo. T. Anderson and Lieut. Ed. L. Thomas and Lieut. W. T. Wofford became brigadier-generals in the Confederate army. Lieut.-Col. Wm. McIntosh, an officer of the war of 1812, commanded the Fifth infantry, was one of the most conspicuously gallant commanders under Taylor, but was unfortunately mortally wounded in a charge upon the regiment by the Mexican cavalry, which he gallantly repulsed. The Georgia regiment in Quitman's brigade and in detached service fought at Resaca, Palo Alto and Monterey and followed Scott from Vera Cruz to Mexico. Loyall's chivalric command did extraordinary service. In one of the engagements at the storming of Huamantla Gen. Lane assigned an important assault to this company, in which they drove the Mexicans back with slaughter, and Lieut. George T. Anderson had the honor of capturing the brave Mexican general La Vega. The entire Georgia contingent became greatly depleted by the close of the war, especially by diseases produced by the climate, and when the struggle was over the survivors returned with honor to the state which they had faithfully served.

TERRITORIAL DIFFICULTIES.

Following the Mexican war questions arose relating to the territory acquired by the treaty of peace as well as by former purchases from France, causing fiery debates in the Federal congress and continuing until a settlement was had in the celebrated campaign measures of 1850. But the party spirit inflamed during these discussions produced an increased sectional feeling, notwithstanding the formation of a constitutional union movement which was designed to unite into one salutary organization the old whig and democratic parties of the country. Sectional discussions continued to be prominent through the years succeeding the settlement made in 1850 until the epoch of the great Confederate war began to dawn in 1859. Causes of various kinds had been tending towards this terrible event in American history, until coming together in full force they culminated in the convulsion which for a time concerned and even alarmed many civilized nations of the world. The period of that eventful war is the most interesting, tragical and patriotic part of Georgia's history and the great struggle between the states will be here considered mainly as it took place on the soil of Georgia with only necessary notices of nations and movements of armies outside the commonwealth.

Already the relations between the southern states and the general government were strained to the utmost tension. The governor of Georgia, Joseph E. Brown, set forth in his message to the legislature of 1859 a careful, serious and able review of the situation, pointing attention to the approaching presidential election as a critical period in the history of the country. He said: "In the present condition of affairs I would advise the citizens of Georgia to stand united with the national democracy so long as they continue to stand by her rights and protect them in the Union; but should this organization be broken down and her constitutional rights be denied, and her equality in the Union destroyed I would then advise her citizens to strike for independence and to pledge each other their lives, their fortunes and their most sacred honor never to forsake each other until triumphant success shall have crowned their efforts. My fervent prayer to Almighty God is that wisdom, moderation and justice may control our national and state councils, and that the rights of the states and the union of the states may be perpetuated."

SECESSION AGITATION.

This message of the governor sent to the legislature more than a year before secession actually occurred, merely reflected a common popular feeling. There were few in Georgia who were urging disunion per se. All parties, and even factions of parties, declared their veneration for the Union and uttered strong protestations of fidelity to the constitutional form of government as it then existed. With few exceptions the people held to the doctrine of state rights and under that view agreed in holding to the legal power of peaceable withdrawal from the Union as belonging to the sovereign state of Georgia. But the union sentiment in the state was greatly in the ascendant and prevailed with too much power to allow secession without causes which the people at least believed to exist. Mr. Stephens, afterward vice-president of the Confederate states, was the acknowledged leader of the Union sentiment and he boldly assumed the position that the questions at issue should be debated and determined in the Union and not out of it. Robert Toombs deprecated disunion if it could be averted. The majority in 1859 opposed secession as the sole remedy for alleged grievances, and indulged in the hope that political evils would be removed through the ballot and by peaceable legislation. There were, however, avowed secessionists who declared their despair of preserving the authority of the state, and of protecting the interests of the south within the Federal union. They pointed public attention to the formation and growing power of a sectional party which threatened to control the policy of the government adversely to all southern prosperity. The states thus threatened, they urged, were in a minority, and the majority was pressing on to control completely all departments of government. Just at this hour, when public sentiment was rapidly forming, the ill-starred invasion of Virginia took place, led by John Brown, of Kansas, and created a fear in the southern mind which swept away the suggestions of all cool reason. The bold criminal act of John Brown was regarded as only the advance skirmish line of a grand army of invasion and insurrection. A song composed after war set in by a southern soldier and afterward sung in the camps and marches of the Union army—"Old John Brown's Soul is Marching On"—expressed the fear felt in 1859 by the southern people.

Misunderstanding among the best citizens of the two great sections of the Union was the inevitable and unfortunate condition, resulting from the state of the times and the actions of rash partisans. The Georgia legislature declared that the John Brown raid was "the result of a fanaticism which had invoked the aid of treason, murder, and rapine, and advancing on southern soil had spread bloodshed throughout a southern state." Northern assemblies resented the strong southern language in expressions of equal bitterness.

Union hopes in Georgia grew fainter as these and other political events followed fast after each other. The advance of secession ideas was hastened by the utterances of eminent northern statesmen as well as by the warmth of speech indulged in by the southern men. Extremists in the press as well as on the hustings provoked the popular mind to discord. Threats on one side were answered by defiance on the other. The conservatives in Georgia were goaded into the secession ranks by provocations mercilessly made by extremists. The fuel for the flames was furnished by northern ultraists, and the kindled fires grew too great to be subdued. War became inevitable. Even in 1859 the conservative, sagacious governor began to buy arms for Georgia from northern factories. The extremity of wrong had come, and it is there that "without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins."

The political crisis in the history of the great American republic strided on into the year 1860. That was the year in which the presidency of the United States was at stake and with the choice of president was involved the possible installation in power of a new party whose policy was understood in Georgia as being wholly hostile to the welfare of its people. Abraham Lincoln was nominated by this new party for the presidency, and notwithstanding his high character he was held to be the representative of an aggressive party directed against the prosperity of the people of the state. No electoral ticket was offered in Georgia on his behalf, for he had no supporters. The people divided their votes among Breckinridge, Douglas and Bell, and the first named received the majority of ballots. But Lincoln carried all the northern states, and the movement through which he was borne into the office of president was regarded as a distinct declaration of hostilities to southern interests. It was the popular belief, whether grounded in reason or not, that a determined practical war was being made under the form of national government, against the sovereignty of all the states and against the welfare of one section of the Union. Georgia statesmen did not attack the character of Lincoln nor base secession merely on his election. Those who knew him personally eulogized his worth, and some even expressed the opinion that he would not obstruct by force of arms the effort of Georgia in confederation with other states to form a new government. No war was proposed against him, no army measures to set aside his election. Their aim was, as they avowed it to be, "simply to enter into concert of action with the sister southern states which will secure their common rights under the constitution in the Union, or if that be no longer possible, their independence and security out of it." Asserting their own interpretation of the constitutional provisions, designed to protect the states, they laid claim to a right peaceably to withdraw from the Union, and insisted that it was their purpose in secession to do no injury to the United States.

Such facts as those above stated are to be kept in view, in order that justice may be done the people of Georgia who had patriotically reposed the great interests of the state in the keeping of a common country, and were faithfully co-operating with all sections in increasing the majestic glory of the greatest popular nation on earth. "The war," said Stephens, "had its origin in opposing principles which in their action upon the conduct of men produced the ultimate collision of arms. The contest was between those who held that the general government was strictly federal in its character, and those who maintained that it was thoroughly national." With this statement of facts kept in mind let us look at the condition of Georgia at this date as it is shown by the report of Comptroller Thweatt for 1860. This report shows that the total wealth of the state was $672,323,777, disclosing a remarkable increase since 1850 and especially during the four years under Brown's administration before the date of the secession. This taxable wealth consisted of 450,000 slaves valued at nearly $303,000,000, thus averaging about $700 each. The taxable land was valued at $161,765,000, and all other property was summed up to about $200,000,000. Agriculture prospered and general trade was good. The rate of taxation was so low as not to be felt, a surplus in the state treasury from year to year had served to reduce the small bonded debt, and the state's property in the Western & Atlantic railroad was then paying increasing and profitable instalments every month. The debts of the people bore a small proportion to their general property; mortgages were few, and by an easy cultivation of the lands the farmers were able to produce enough food for themselves besides a good export of cotton which was turned into money. The wealth of the people was distributed with such evenness that very few were enormously rich and few were in abject poverty. The Georgians of 1860 were descendants of all states from Maine to California, but chiefly came from Virginia and North Carolina and South Carolina. Georgia was then a rural state with no large cities, many beautiful towns and a thrifty country population. Its people were characterized by morality, culture and republican simplicity with boundless hospitality. It was in these conditions of material advantage that this people considered in 1860 their grave political situation. Their interest in the national question was all the more intense because their state affairs were so well managed. The only threat thrust at their peace and prosperity seemed to come from the national government. Their political foes appeared to be resolved on using the Union which they loved as a power to do them damage. They felt harassed as Bartow declared by "the endless controversy, and were wearied by seeing this threatening cloud forever above their heads." So after a discussion in which their greatest and best men participated, these Georgians cast their electoral vote for Breckinridge and gravely rebuked the election of a sectional president.

In the last months of 1860, members of the legislature met to face the greatest responsibility. Soon after assembling they received the governor's message advising them to call a convention of the people of the state, and recommending the appropriation of $1,000,000 for a military fund to be expended for the purpose of placing the state in a condition of defense. The people also began to assemble in mass meetings to discuss the probable result of the presidential election and passed resolutions favoring some form of state resistance to be forwarded to the legislature for consideration. The volunteer and military companies of many cities and towns were assembled in a general convention and declared themselves ready to respond to any call of the governor when their services were needed. In response to these evident popular demands, as well as in accord with the message of the governor, the legislature unanimously voted the call for a convention to be held at Milledgeville, Jan. 16, 1861, and to be composed of delegates elected from each county by the ballots of the people. This convention was called to determine the momentous question of union or disunion by an august body representing directly the sovereign will of the whole people of Georgia.

MILITARY ORGANIZATION IN 1860.

At this serious juncture it is proper to consider the military organization of the state. We have seen that after the war of 1812 the militia system was revised and made efficient for the wars with the Indians and also that the state early furnished its quota of troops for the war with Mexico. But during the years of peace when attention was given to peaceful pursuits unharassed by fears of war, the militia system had fallen into disuse. The laws were not enforced and the plan of divisions, brigades, and regiments was nearly obsolete. Now and then some ambitious colonel or captain of militia summoned his command to muster, giving legal notice for every man to "appear armed and equipped as the law directs." But the muster became ridiculous by the appearance of the militiamen in line, armed with every conceivable substitute for a gun, such as walking sticks, one-barrel shotguns, or cornstalks, and the awkward evolutions contributed to the general fun of the burlesque parade. The militia muster grew to be a farce which the Georgians indulged in as an occasional amusement. Volunteer companies, however, were organized in the cities and in a number of the towns, composed of young men who bore the expense of the company, but these companies received but little encouragement from the state and were maintained with great difficulty. There was afterward a general awakening of interest about the year 1857, which resulted in an increase in the number of voluntary military and their better equipment. The legislature began to give more attention to the military defense of the state. The militia laws were revised and improved, and more liberal grants made for the encouragement of the citizen soldiery. Governor Brown addressing the legislature by message, said, "I do not hesitate to say that the state should offer very reasonable inducement for the organization and training of volunteer military corps as the best and most efficient mode of reviving the military spirit among the people. This cannot be done unless she has made provision for arranging such companies. At present the only provision for the purpose is the distribution of the small quota of arms which the states receive annually from the general government and which is wholly inadequate to the demand. The consequence is that many of our volunteer companies are without arms, while many others would be organized were it known that they would be supplied." The governor, also, early in his administration called attention to the benefit the state would derive by fostering liberally the state military institute at Marietta. "It would not only put the institute upon a solid basis and add largely to the number of educated persons in the state, affording a collegiate education to many of the poorest though brightest and most intellectual boys in Georgia, but would diffuse a knowledge of military service among the people of every county in the state; which all must admit in these perilous times is second in importance to no other." The successive legislatures from 1856 caught the spirit of the times and following the recommendations of the governor restored the state's military organization, and by energetic measures prepared to respond to the call of arms.

SEIZURE OF UNITED STATES FORTS.

Resuming the military story, we see that the many peace projects undertaken soon after the presidential election were destined to failure. The governor therefore, sagaciously seeing that delayed action would increase the peril of the state, resolved upon a bold act in advance of the formal secession by the convention. Georgia was still in the Union, but its people had spoken by ballot, and there was no doubt as to the action in the approaching convention. Anticipating that certain action of the sovereign state, the governor sought to protect the people against the seizure of all the forts on the coast and the occupation of its seaboard cities and towns. With these patriotic as well as sagacious views, he first took immediate and successful measures to get possession of Fort Pulaski on Cockspur island just below Savannah, which had been built to guard that seaport city against invasion. It was the most important fort on the entire coast of Georgia, although at that time scarcely garrisoned at all, and its occupation was indispensable to the security of the state. The governor went in person to Savannah, in order to become fully informed concerning the necessity of taking this important step in advance of the meeting of the convention, and after fully satisfying himself issued the following efficient and peremptory order:

Headquarters Georgia Militia,
Savannah, Jan. 2, 1861.

Col. A. R. Lawton, Commander First Regiment, Georgia Volunteers, Savannah:

Sir:—In view of the fact that the government at Washington has, we are informed on high authority, decided on the policy of coercing the seceding state back into the Union, and it is believed now has a movement on foot to reinforce Fort Sumter at Charleston and to occupy with Federal troops the southern forts, including Fort Pulaski in this state, which if done would give the Federal government in any contest great advantage over the people of this state: To the end, therefore, that this stronghold which commands the entrance into Georgia may not be occupied by any hostile force until the convention of the state of Georgia which is to meet on the 16th instant has decided on the policy which Georgia will adopt in this emergency, you are ordered to take possession of Fort Pulaski as by public order herewith, and to hold it against all persons, to be abandoned only under orders from me, or under compulsion of any overpowering hostile force. Immediately upon occupying the fort you will take measures to put it in a thorough state of defense as far as its means and ours will permit; and for this purpose you will advise with Capt. Claghorn, Chatham artillery, who has been charged with all matters relating to ordnance and ordnance stores and their supply. You will further arrange with Capt. Claghorn a series of day and night signals, for communication with the city of Savannah for the purpose of calling for reinforcements or for other necessary purposes. And you will arrange with Mr. John Cunningham, military purveyor for the time being, for the employment of one or more steamboats or other means of transportation by land or by water that may be necessary, and for other supplies (except for ordnance stores for which you will call upon Capt. Claghorn) as may be required. If circumstances should require it the telegraph will be placed under surveillance.

I think from your conversation you fully understand my views, and relying upon your patriotism, energy and sound discretion in the execution of this important and delicate trust, I am, sir, very respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

JOSEPH E. BROWN,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Co. A. R. Lawton was at this time commander of the state military at Savannah and subsequently was commissioned brigadier-general and assigned to the department of Georgia. After serving most efficiently several months in this department, he was, by his own special desire, ordered to engage actively in the field, assigned to the command of a fine brigade of Georgians, formed and forwarded for Virginia service and placed in the division of Stonewall Jackson. Lawton commanded his brigade in the battles around Richmond and in subsequent actions with marked distinction, and afterwards the division to which it was attached. He was severely wounded at Sharpsburg, and notwithstanding his urgent appeal to be returned on his recovery to active field duty, he was required by President Davis to accept the office of quartermaster-general of the Confederate states. The position was as distinguished as it was arduous, and was filled by him with such ability as gained the well-merited commendation of all the southern armies. Lawton on receiving the order of the governor organized a command for the proposed expedition by causing details to be made from several companies among whom an earnest emulation sprang up at once. The details were promptly furnished by the Chatham artillery, Capt. Jos. S. Claghorn, the Savannah volunteer guards, Capt. John Screven, the Oglethorpe light infantry, Capt. Francis S. Bartow, altogether making a force of 134 men. Borne upon a steamer the military under the command of Col. Lawton proceeded to the fort and after a temporary parley it was entered and occupied in the name of the state of Georgia.

The fort thus taken into the custody of the state of Georgia was built on a marshy island, the walls presenting five faces and prepared for a little over 100 guns. At the time of its seizure there were only twenty-two guns in the fort and a meager supply of ammunition. Its capture therefore was understood to be only a form through which Georgia would reassume the control of the works for the safety of the coast. The taking of this fort in the manner determined on by the governor and his advisers insured a bloodless occupation, and prevented all undue irritation of the people of the United States. Immediately after taking possession, the flag of the state, a red star on a white field, was raised above the fort, a salute followed from the guns, a small detachment was left in charge, the United States guards were honorably cared for and the occupation was complete. The fort was too important to be neglected, and consequently it was put in good order through the work of the efficient Savannah military. Ammunition was supplied and a daily drill and practice instituted. The city of Savannah exhibited great interest in the proper preparation of the fort for any attack, even the ladies uniting with patriotic zeal to furnish the cartridges for the mounted guns. The state convention afterward endorsed the act of the governor and made it the act of the state in the following terms:

"This convention highly approves the energetic and patriotic conduct of Gov. Brown in taking possession of Fort Pulaski by Georgia troops, and requests him to hold possession until the relations of Georgia and the Federal government be determined by the convention."

The governor was also applauded by the entire press, and having sent communications to several governors of southern states, informing them of his action he received replies fully commending his course. Public meetings held in many places expressed warm public approval, and Savannah in patriotic fervor testified its gratification in many ways. The flag of the United States was taken down from the custom house on the resignation of Mr. Boston, the port collector, and in its place floated a new ensign made for the occasion. The new white flag bore the coat of arms of the state, surmounted by six stars, the number of seceded states, and was raised by the hand of Maj. Lachlan McIntosh.

The march of events leading towards the actual shock of battles now took the double quick step. One after another in rapid succession the exciting causes of conflict followed in columns of attack to the inevitable result. Southern states in convention were seceding and calling for a confederacy. Fort Moultrie on the Carolina coast was burned and abandoned by the United States troops and the garrison stationed there was removed to Fort Sumter. Rumors were current that reinforcements were to be sent to this strong fort so as to hold it against South Carolina, and the war vessels were in the way to blockade Charleston harbor at once. One Federal steamer had actually attempted to reach Fort Sumter, and had been driven back by a fierce fire from Carolina troops at Fort Morris. Georgia was unanimous against coercion of any seceding state, and the rumor that South Carolina, which had already withdrawn from the Union, would be invaded aroused general resentment. A movement was started at once among the volunteer companies to march across the Savannah river to the help of the neighbor state. Several companies formally applied to the governor of Georgia for permission to offer their services at once to South Carolina, but the governor properly refused their request. Bankers grew enthusiastic and offered immediate money to the state for defense. The press sounded alarms in patriotic editorials, and the people became united in the sentiment against coercion of South Carolina.

SECESSION CONVENTION.

In the midst of these thrilling events the state convention called by the legislature and elected by the ballots of the people, met Jan. 16, 1861, in Milledgeville. The convention was composed of the ablest and most conservative men in the state chosen by their constituents without regard to party differences. Douglas men, Breckinridge men, and Bell men, who had contended in 1860, perceived in this grave crisis that they must rise above former party issues and face the tremendous question of state secession. Influenced by high patriotic considerations the people elected their best and truest men to represent them in the solemn and sovereign convention, who would gravely discuss the situation and determine the course of the state. Upon the assembling of this august body it became soon evident that even yet Georgia was reluctant to secede. One reliable, authoritative word of peace, good-will, and legal safeguard, coming just then from the United States, would have arrested secession. It was not spoken. Judge Nisbet, a cultured, upright, and conservative statesman, introduced a resolution favoring immediate separate secession and requiring that a committee be appointed to report the proper ordinance for adoption by the convention. But other resolutions were offered as a substitute, proposing delay of action and co-operation with other states in lieu of separate state action. It was fully proposed to call a convention of southern states in Atlanta in February following. One significant resolution provided that Georgia would in any event resist the coercion of any state which had already seceded. These resolutions were before the convention for discussion, and one of the ablest, most animated and eloquent debates ensued that ever occurred in human history. All the mighty issues of the critical hour were set forth with rare eloquence possessed by such intellectual giants as Nisbet, Stephens, Ben Hill, Toombs, T. R. R. Cobb, Herschel V. Johnson, and others nearly or quite their equal. The great debate was exhaustive, well-tempered, and with open doors, resulting in a ballot by which the Nisbet resolution was carried and the committee being appointed at once, very soon reported the ordinance by which the state would sever its connection with the government of the United States. This highly important public document is of such interest that it may well have a place in this chapter as follows:

AN ORDINANCE

To dissolve the union between the state of Georgia and other states united with her under a compact of government entitled, "The Constitution of the United States of America":

WE, THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF GEORGIA IN CONVENTION ASSEMBLED, DO DECLARE AND ORDAIN, AND IT IS HEREBY DECLARED AND ORDAINED:

That the ordinance adopted by the state of Georgia, in convention on the second day of January, in the year of our Lord 1788, whereby the constitution of the United States was assented to, ratified and adopted, and also all acts and parts of acts of the general assembly of the state, ratifying and adopting amendments of the said constitution, are hereby repealed, rescinded and abrogated.

WE DO FURTHER DECLARE AND ORDAIN:

That the union now existing between the state of Georgia and other states, under the name of the United States of America, is hereby dissolved, and that the state of Georgia is in the full possession and exercise of all of those rights of sovereignty which belong and appertain to a free and independent state.

After the first reading of this important paper a request was made for it to be repeated and this was done amid the profound silence of the sovereign convention. The approval of its terms by the majority was evident, but opposition to its passage was nevertheless made in the form of resolutions designed to delay separate action and invite the co-operation of other states, and on taking the vote for this substitute it was lost by only thirty-one votes. This first effort to secure secession by co-operative state action having failed, the opposition to secession broke down and the ordinance passed by a vote of 208 yeas to 89 nays. At two o'clock P. M., Jan. 19, 1861, the president of the convention, Geo. W. Crawford, briefly and impressively announced the vote and declared officially that by virtue of the ordinance the sovereign state of Georgia was a free and independent republic. To this announcement the convention responded with dignified applause, but the people outside who had gathered in Milledgeville from various parts of the state in large numbers, manifested their approval by much greater demonstrations. Cannon saluted the event, the bells were sounded, the popular voice rose in swelling volume of cheers, the colonial state flag waved over the capitol, and at night the city was made a blaze of illumination. Intelligence spread in a few minutes through the state by telegraph, and the people were everywhere promptly informed of this expected final action by thousands of extras poured out by the press. They were evidently ready to ratify the act of the constitution notwithstanding its serious import. Very many deplored disunion and nearly all would have averted it. There had been a difference of opinion, "not so much as to the rights which Georgia claims, or the wrongs of which she complains as to the remedy and its application." Union men fully believed that the power of the republican party would be overthrown as soon as it attempted any wrong against the south and had insisted on resort to another ballot in the Union. Others urged a temporary delay of secession until a convention of southern states could assemble and agree on a plan of concerted action. But now that the state had by its convention decided on immediate secession, its people buried their differences and united in support of the ordinance. The entire state thus rapidly rallied and was aroused to indescribable enthusiasm. Cities and towns became the centers of mass meetings in which the population, men, women, and children, gathered to hear the orators of the state. Every possible aspect of the momentous question was fully presented, even to the dreadful possibilities of long and wasting war. Speakers with impassioned utterance quoted the words spoken by the colonial orators, "Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and my heart to this cause." "Peace if possible, but war to the end if we must." "If we perish, let it be so, for we will die for liberty and all liberty will perish with us." Yet the hope was brightly painted that secession would be peaceable; that armed coercion by the United States government would not be used; southern states would all unite in a constitutional government; treaties of amity and close commerce would be made with the United States, and prosperity and peace for both governments would certainly follow. Thousands shook their heads in dissent to these fond hopes and urged that no delusions be indulged. Secession, they said, involved war and it was the first business of the hour to prepare for the inevitable, irrepressible conflict.

The foregoing account of popular feeling and state action preceding the military operations in Georgia is necessary to a presentation of the causes that produced the disastrous movements of contending troops, when brave Americans of common blood met in great battle within the limits of the state. The profound convictions of the Union forces which invaded the state being conceded and their valor proclaimed, it is fully just to say that no impeachment of the people of Georgia on account of their action in those days can be sustained. They had a rare reverence for the principles fought for and then framed into constitutional form by the founders of the American Union, and they were distinguished by ardent devotion to the Union itself. The political platforms of all their parties reposed on the conservative doctrines of fidelity to the Union and the constitution. They had furnished troops, arms and sustenance in all the wars of the common country. They were conspicuously faithful to the Union in the war of 1812, when other sections talked seriously of secession; they had refused to sustain the nullification views of a southern sister state; they had first contributed as a southern people the leaders who had won peace and vast territory in the Mexican war. They were justly proud of their heroes, Zachary Taylor, Winfield Scott, Robert E. Lee, and Jefferson Davis, whose armies had brought Mexico to terms; and in 1850, ten years before secession took place, the state stood foremost in agreeing to the celebrated compromise, which it was hoped would allay all sectional disputes and secure constitutional union. Now at this crisis of 1861, the same people of Georgia were profoundly persuaded that a dual Union formed in the whole country covered by the United States would be better for both north and south than the one Union governed by a sectional party. They had lost confidence in the power of constitutional guarantees to protect them from sectional oppression. They wished in good faith to withdraw in peace, and not without great hope that the separation by a geographical line running from ocean to ocean would destroy the causes of strife and unite the two distinct nations in the closest international fraternity. Even if it be supposed that secession thus considered was a mistake, it would be admitted that Georgians were provoked into error and acted with becoming dignity in asserting their views. All they had they staked in this action. They immolated property and their lives on the altar of their convictions; they illustrated honor itself by their conduct of the war, and put new and loftier value upon the love of liberty under constitutional free government by making its "last analysis the blood of the brave." The legal rights of Georgia under the Federal constitution to secede, has been conceded by implications in those amendments of the constitution, resulting from the Confederate war, which expressly forbade secession. Whether the exercise of that privilege was prudent admits of contrary opinions, but does not affect the question of the honorable purpose of Georgians to abide by the terms of the constitution, nor allow a criticism which accuses Georgia of disloyalty to the flag of the nation, the constitution of the government and the union of the states.

The ordinance of secession was signed by all the members of the convention Jan. 22, 1861, and on the next day thereafter the governor emphasized the sovereign act by taking steps to obtain possession of the Augusta arsenal in the name of the state. On the summit of salubrious sandhills noted for the purity and dryness of the climate and near a patriotic, historic and delightful city, the United States had erected buildings, established an arsenal, and kept there at all times a detachment of regular troops. The flag of the nation floated over the place and asserted resistance to the secession and sovereignty of Georgia. The continued occupation of this arsenal by United States forces after Georgia had formally resumed its original independent sovereignty was construed to be a defiance of its supreme authority within its own boundaries, and hence the demand arose for the surrender of its possession to the authorities of the state. Gov. Brown, accompanied by Col. Henry R. Jackson, an accomplished and experienced officer as his aide, and also Col. William Phillips as a member of his staff, proceeded to Augusta in person and on Jan. 23 addressed a courteous note to Capt. Elzey, commanding the arsenal, requesting him to withdraw his troops and proposing to receipt for all public property in his charge to be accounted for on adjustment between the state and the United States. The commandant, Capt. Elzey, well understanding his duty as a military officer, declined to surrender his post on this demand and immediately sent a dispatch by telegraph to the secretary of war at Washington, and about midnight received the following answer:

Washington, Jan. 23, 1861.

Capt. Arnold Elzey, Second Artillery Commander, Augusta Arsenal, Georgia:

The governor of Georgia has assumed against your post and the United States an attitude of war. His summons is harsh and peremptory. It is not expected that your defense should be desperate. If forced to surrender by violence or starvation, you will stipulate for honorable terms and a free passage by water with your company to New York.

T. HOLT, Secretary of War.

The governor having received the refusal of Capt. Elzey to vacate the arsenal, ordered the military of Augusta to be put in readiness to take it by force if necessary. Col. Cumming, in command of the Augusta battalion, prepared for action in obedience to orders, but no further movement was made on that day in order that Capt. Elzey might have ample time to determine on a bloodless surrender of his charge. Early on the morning of Jan. 24, the command of Col. Cumming was assembled under arms to march against the arsenal, when the governor received a note from Capt. Elzey requesting an interview "for the purpose of negotiating honorable terms of surrender." Elzey having become fully satisfied by the show of force which had been marshaled to take the arsenal that resistance would be vain, and result only in the wanton destruction of life, determined to act upon his judgment according to the discretion given him by the secretary of war. The governor had only desired to enforce the authority of the state, and promptly retiring the troops which had assembled, he went at once to hold the interview which Elzey had requested. Attended by Gen. Williams, Gen. Harris, Col. Wm. H. T. Walker, and his aides, Col. Jackson and Col. Phillips, the governor entered the arsenal grounds and held a satisfactory consultation with the gallant officer in command. After proper deliberation it was agreed that the flag on being lowered should be saluted, the garrison should march out with military honors, retaining arms and private property and have safe passage to Savannah and then to New York. The governor also receipted for the property of the arsenal, and thus all the honorable terms were adjusted.

Great sympathy was shown for the commandant in the trying circumstances of this enforced surrender of his trust. No one doubted his courage or his willingness to defend his post at any reasonable hazard, but all commended the prudence by which needless loss of life was prevented. In appreciation of his embarrassing position, Gov. Brown and all present extended warm assurances of their esteem, and expressed the common desire that the unhappy difficulties of the country might be adjusted without estrangement or hostility. The brave and impetuous Walker, afterward major-general in the Confederate army, and killed in battle near Atlanta, had been with Elzey at West Point. Seizing the hand of his former fellow-cadet with a warm grasp, he said: "You have done all that could be required of a brave man." Elzey silently threw his arm around his friend in acceptance of his sympathy, and both expressed regret that an occasion had arrived which separated chief friends. A very large amount of ordnance and general munitions fell into possession of the state upon the occupancy of the arsenal, including 22,000 small arms, two howitzers, two cannon, together with considerable stores of ammunition. Observing the form of surrender the garrison was paraded and a salute of thirty-three guns, one for each state, was fired. The United States flag dropped down the line along the staff and soon afterward Gen. Harris with a detachment of Oglethorpe artillery took possession under the authority of Georgia. A flag had been provided, made of white material and displaying in the center a five-pointed red star, and this was run up on the arsenal to symbolize the sovereignty of the state. The event was duly celebrated by a salute of twenty-one guns, the first for the republic of Georgia, five others in honor of the states already seceded, and then fifteen more in anticipation of the union of all the states of the south in the southern Confederacy.

Gov. Brown and staff returned immediately to the capitol, where the convention was still in session, and engaged in maturing many important measures made necessary to the new relations which the states bore to all nations and states of the world. Among other acts the governor was authorized to raise two regiments at once for state defense. These were very promptly formed. Offers pressed in upon the governor from all parts of the commonwealth and the only difficulty was in the selection from the excessive number of eager aspirants. Two colonels, William J. Hardee and W. H. T. Walker, were commissioned; also Lieut.-Cols. Chas. J. Williams and E. W. Chertain, and Majs. McLaws, Gardner, Cumming and Harben. The governor, or commander-in-chief, proceeded vigorously to organize the military of the whole state so as to be ready for possible war. The formation of volunteer companies in every county was considerably encouraged, notwithstanding the want of arms. These companies were advised to organize and drill with or without guns. Uniforms made at home were adopted without much regard at first to regularity of cut or color. Officers capable of drilling were few and books of military tactics were scarce. There were more plough-shares than swords in Georgia, and while shotguns and small-bore rifles were plentiful, they were not well adapted for battle. Nevertheless the military spirit was at work and strong enough to overcome all difficulties so successfully that companies were rapidly formed in such numbers as to be far in excess of the requisitions.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE STRUGGLE.

The honor, it is said, falls to a company called Lee's Volunteers, organized in Atlanta, of being the first in Georgia to tender service to the Confederate States government. The tender was formally and enthusiastically made at Montgomery on the fifth day of March, by officers who had gone to Montgomery, Ala., the Confederate capital, for that purpose. On their return from this successful mission they were honored with public demonstrations at various places on the way and received with distinguished honor at Atlanta. On the train which bore them homeward there were some patriotic ladies who, fully imbued with the spirit of the times, procured material at Grantville, and with their own hands made the first Confederate flag for Georgia, and presented it to the company. The flag as made showed seven stars in a circle on a blue union, and three horizontal bars of red and white. As in all parts of the state volunteer companies were being formed and drilled numerous incidents suitable to that just related occurred and increased the already ample enthusiasm. In forecast of the needs of the state Gov. Brown had contracted with northern firms for arms and some had been delivered, but the difficulty of securing their delivery increasing, he contracted with the Tredegar iron works, at Richmond, Va., and through that source obtained a number of guns for coast defense. As a further means for obtaining small arms all old muskets were put in order. The smooth-bore flint and steel gun was altered to the percussion lock. Where it could be done the bore was rifled and bayonets were attached. Companies were directed to arm themselves with the common double-barrel shotgun. Cartridges were made of buckshot, or with "buck and ball," consisting of one lead ball and three or four buckshot. Such private arms as these were freely contributed by the people, and with these the companies learned to drill, and in many cases fought their first battles.

Pending all the popular stir in the state which followed the ordinance of secession the convention which had adjourned from Milledgeville met again March 7, 1861, in Savannah, and gave the governor power to issue state bonds and treasury notes for war purposes. The convention also yielded entire control of forts, arms and military operations to the Confederate States government, which had been formed at Montgomery during the first week of the preceding February. After adopting all other measures of immediate necessity the convention proceeded to adjournment, after hearing the parting words of the president, George W. Crawford, a portion of which are here recalled to show the common spirit of the times. Said he:

"You have overturned a government which has been sectional in policy and sectional in hostility. It had lost nationality, and the first requirement of every government is that of protection to person and property. You have overthrown the Federal Union, but you have preserved the Federal constitution. You have sustained ancestral wisdom in the foundation of your government separated only from those abuses which experience has developed. In short you have effected a political reformation."

After the state had become a member of the Confederate States government the issue was joined between the two nationalities and no longer existed as between the state separately and the United States. Georgia in convention formally recognized the fact that the supreme military authority, and, therefore, the responsibility for the conduct of military operations, rested in the Confederate States government. Accordingly the governor responded promptly to all requisitions for troops made by the secretary of war. The first regiment ordered into Confederate service was organized at Macon and sent to Pensacola, where it was early under fire and sustained itself with admirable gallantry. Subsequently it saw some service in Northwestern Virginia, and still later on, being divided among other commands, its gallant companies were conspicuous in nearly all the great battles of the war. This first regiment attracted particular attention on account of its priority in the field, and its organization at Macon was witnessed with great enthusiasm. An election was held in camp for field officers, resulting in the choice of James N. Ramsey, colonel; J. O. Clarke, lieutenant-colonel; G. H. Thompson, major. A review of the troops was held by Gov. Brown, witnessed by a great assembly of citizens and in these inspiring circumstances the regiment left for action and dangerous service. Further requisitions continued to be quickly made, and were responded to in numbers of companies far beyond the ability of the state to equip them for service or the demand made by the Confederate government. Local camps were also formed in many counties during the spring of 1861, when the young soldiery learned their first lessons in the art of war. Not only did the young men offer themselves as soldiers, but the people of all ages and classes showed a wonderful readiness to share the burdens now falling on the state. Contributions of funds to meet the expenses of new companies were raised in large amounts. Uniforms were bought in many instances at the public expense. Even entire companies were equipped by the liberality of a few men of wealth. The women formed sewing societies and made clothing for the young soldiers who were preparing for war. Pledges were given to protect the families of men who enlisted for the Confederate struggle. The food crop was more largely planted and in general a community of feeling and effort existed everywhere.

It will be borne in mind that these active preparations were stimulated by the threatening effect of the clouds which were gathering in the north and the early mutterings of the storm brewing at Washington. Peace commissioners had been sent from southern states to submit the secession question to peaceable consideration of the government. Among these messengers from the south, an eminent Georgian, Martin J. Crawford, accepted a prominent place, and after a long, unavailing effort to obtain a hearing he returned home in April, 1861, and announced to the people that the subjugation of Georgia would certainly be attempted. The peace commissioners now understood that the hearing which they had so long asked for in Washington had been delayed, in order to gain time for military operations, and that the final refusal in April to allow their overtures to be considered was in their judgment tantamount to a public declaration of war. Their address published throughout the south destroyed the last hope of peaceful settlement, and aroused the state to immediate preparations for a war that might begin at any time by invasion of the coast.

BEGINNING OF HOSTILITIES.

Hence no great surprise was felt at the beginning of hostilities by the appearance of war vessels off the coast of Carolina, and the attempted reinforcement of Fort Sumter, which resulted in the thrilling bombardment and surrender of that fortress to the Confederate forces. The further news was also brought that Norfolk was under threat of attack and it was now clearly realized that war had indeed begun.

A telegram from Richmond, sent by Gov. Letcher to Gov. Brown, asked for troops from Georgia to be dispatched without delay to Norfolk to aid in its defense. The governor expeditiously put himself in communication with the cities of Columbus, Macon and Griffin, where he knew that military companies had been well drilled and prepared for emergencies. The demand was very urgent. Not over a day was given for departure and not more than an hour allowed for the answer of acceptance. But the responses came to their demand quickly and bravely. The companies were ordered to move at once, and in less time than twenty-four hours the gallant men composed of the flower and pride of the state had made preparations, bidden adieu to their homes, and were aboard the cars hurrying with ardent haste to the front. Notwithstanding this short notice, the people of the cities left behind as well as those through which they passed evinced their patriotic pride with enthusiastic demonstrations. This is but one instance given as an example of the readiness with which the young Georgians of that day exhibited their fealty to the state. The companies composing the command were the Floyd rifles, Capt. Thos. Hardeman; Macon volunteers, Capt. Smith; City light guards of Columbus, Capt. P. T. Colquitt; and the Griffin guards, Capt. Doyal. These were formed into a battalion commanded by Capt. Thos. Hardeman, and made a record unsurpassed for courage and fidelity to the close of the war. But it is not within the scope of this chapter to trace the events of the Confederate war outside of the limits of the state; the history of Georgia troops in Virginia and other states will not be told. Their deeds are worthy of the lofty patriotism which inspired them and the state should not be left without an honorable and enduring record of the services and sacrifices of these, its gifted and gallant sons. It is, however, an interesting legend in the record of this battalion that it reached the immediate seat of war before Norfolk with such promptitude as to be on the ground, even in advance of troops called out from noble, patriotic Virginia itself. And there is the further statement, which reflects luster on the military history of the state, that the first gun turned against the enemy and that sent the first hurtling defiance against the invasion of the south was in the charge of this command. Capt. Colquitt had this rare distinction and months afterward he gave up his loyal life in battle. Thus it is history for Georgia that it fired the first gun at Norfolk, and we will see in the sequel that Georgia also fired the last gun at Appomattox.

Five regiments of twelve-months infantry troops had been organized during the first four months of 1861, besides a large number of unattached companies of infantry not yet put in service, and several commands of cavalry and artillery. Further demands for Georgia troops continued to be made by the Confederate government. The great war was now on in earnest. The Federal government had made a call for a large army and its demand was met with offers of troops from every quarter of the northern states. Washington was crowded with applications for service. The two great sections were becoming terribly interested. Both sides appeared to believe that the struggle would be short, fierce and decisive. Three months was to be the limit in which the momentous issues were to be determined. One great duel in Virginia and then—peace! Upon one side the cry arose "On to Richmond." Confidence was felt that the quick capture of that city would explode the secession bubble. On the other side, there was an equally strong confidence in the fighting enthusiasm of southern troops, which paid no regard to the force of numbers and superior equipment. With these thoughts gallant northerners poured into Washington. With these inspirations Georgia companies were forming and drilling every day in the presence of an excited and applauding population. The governor was pressed even to annoyance with the demands for arms, equipments and orders to march at once to Virginia and anywhere, that gunpowder could be burnt and glory won. Young blood was up to the highest mark of patriotic heat. Capt. Glenn, of Savannah, expressed the general passion in a notable public letter, in which he begged permission to go with his command "to Virginia where there was a prospect of a fight."

Hitherto the troops called out for service had been enlisted for twelve months, but in May, 1861, the Confederate congress then in session at Montgomery, Ala., authorized enlistments for the full term of the war. An incident immediately following the passage of this act to raise troops for service during the war illustrates the high spirit which at the moment was moving the men of Georgia. The name of Francis Bartow has become as immortally associated with Georgia history through this incident and his heroic death at Manassas as that of Jasper or Marion with the war of the revolution. Bartow was at the time a member of the Confederate congress and also captain of the Oglethorpe light infantry of Savannah, a splendid volunteer company which had been formed in 1856 and was superbly drilled, equipped and composed of young men of superior spirit. A detail of this splendid company had participated in the seizure of Fort Pulaski and the entire command while on active duty at or near Savannah had constantly manifested an eager desire to become participants in the pending struggle where battles might oftener take place. Bartow being at the seat of the Confederate government when the important measure passed to authorize war enlistments, wired his company at once concerning this opportunity to be placed foremost in action and received an immediate reply urging him to tender the command without delay. The gallant commander lost no time in seeing Pres. Davis, and having secured the acceptance of his company, gave them notice and then hurried away himself to take charge of their departure. Preparations were rapidly made for leaving Savannah for Virginia and Savannah honored their going with great demonstrations. Citizens abandoned all business for the hour of departure, the local military proudly escorted their comrades and artillery salutes reverberated through the city, reinforced by the enthusiastic cheering of the people. One only circumstance caused apprehension of trouble. The splendid guns borne by the company had been bought and furnished by the state of Georgia and were about to be carried away without the consent of the governor first obtained. Georgia was not yet free from fear of invasion of Savannah. The coast line was already threatened. The defenses were inadequate, the troops few and arms difficult to get. Hence the governor sought to retain in Georgia the guns belonging to the state, or at least required that the consent of the state be obtained for their removal. This neglected concession to state authority provoked a sharp controversy between Bartow and the governor in which the latter maintained the right and need of the state with strong argument, and in which the gallant officer expressed in a single phrase the pride of his company in their commonwealth itself as well as the patriotism by which they were inspired: "I go to illustrate Georgia." This was the historic burning line which alone remains of the controversy in the memory of the present age. It settled the contention. It was a noble utterance, made potent and pathetic forever by the blood of the brave hero which ebbed his grand life away on the field of Manassas not three months afterward. Wounded and dying on that battleground, when southern troops won the first great victory, Bartow added renewed pathos to his former phrase by the words: "They have killed me, but never give up the fight."

Georgia regiments were rapidly formed after this act of congress and sent to Virginia. A. R. Wright, the colonel of the Third Georgia regiment, was already in the field and facing the foe. The Sixth Georgia, commanded by Col. Alfred Colquitt, was however the first full regiment enlisted and accepted for the war. The Seventh, Col. Gartrell; the Eighth, Col. Bartow, and the Ninth and Eleventh Georgia regiments constituted the brigade led by Bartow in the battle of Manassas.

DEFENSE OF GEORGIA.

Turning attention more exclusively to the progress of the war on the soil of Georgia we observe that the fall of Fort Sumter, the threatened attack of Norfolk, the increasing naval demonstrations of the Federals, drew early attention to the defenseless condition of the long coast of the state. It appeared certain that Georgia was in danger of invasion from the direction of the sea. Therefore, it was prudent to improve its defenses as rapidly as the limited resources of the state would permit. The approaches to Savannah, Brunswick, Darien and other points were therefore put under the best protection that could be made. The little Tattnall navy was made all use of possible for its strength. The first regiment of Georgia regulars was divided and stationed at Tybee, Fort Pulaski and Fort Jackson. Land batteries were erected here and there. Fort Jackson was improved. Fort Pulaski had been strengthened and newly equipped at a cost of $80,000. The governor made frequent careful inspections of the coast and being satisfied of the peril which threatened the state prepared with all the resources at his command to put the grand seaport of Georgia in a defensible condition by encouraging fortifications and forwarding from the state all the troops that could be provided with arms not called out of the state in general Confederate service.

A Federal fleet of forty-one vessels having captured Port Royal on the coast of South Carolina, afterward appeared off the Georgia seaboard near Tybee and plainly threatened Ft. Pulaski. Other Federal movements fully justified the uneasiness felt by the governor and the inhabitants of the seaboard section. Only four small vessels, commanded by Commander Tattnall, were ready to offer any resistance to this formidable fleet. They were the "Savannah," Lieut. Maffit; "The Resolute," Lieut. Jones; "The Samson," Lieut. Kennard, and "Lady Davis," Lieut. Rutledge. Commander Tattnall had been assigned to command this little navy which hugged the coast and hovered near the inlets. He had already achieved great and merited distinction as a naval officer, but was contented to serve the state in this humble command. By his birth at Bonaventure in 1796, he was a Georgian in whose career the state had great pride. Having joined the United States navy in early life he served under Decatur, fought the Algerines and the West Indian pirates, bore a most gallant part in the Mexican war and in 1859 gave that famous and fortunate aid to the English fleet in the Chinese seas, justifying himself in the saying that "blood is thicker than water." When his state seceded in 1861 he was stationed at Locket's Harbor, N. Y., but promptly retiring, he cast his lot with its fortunes.

The coast department of Georgia extending from Savannah to the Florida line had been put in charge of Gen. A. R. Lawton by the Confederate government. This eminent Georgian was a graduate of West Point, but retiring early from military service became a distinguished jurist and statesman. His military abilities, however, had been in constant requisition and as has been stated he was fortunately in charge of the military of his city at the capture of Fort Pulaski. On receiving his commission and assignment by the Confederate government in 1861, he entered vigorously upon the discharge of his duties, co-operating intelligently and patriotically with the governor of the state. The legislature having authorized a call for 10,000 volunteers for state defense, the governor divided the state into four parts with the design of raising one brigade in each section, constituting a division of state troops, the command of which was tendered to Gen. Henry R. Jackson with the rank of major-general. This distinguished officer had the advantage of military training and experience in the Mexican war, and enjoyed the confidence of the governor, who accepted his services as an aide and military adviser in the affairs at Fort Pulaski and the Augusta arsenal, as well as in other early preparations of the state for war. At the time this important service in the state was tendered him Gen. Jackson was in northwestern Virginia, where he had been in command with the rank of brigadier-general during a short, severe campaign. He was there first apprised of the existence of the Georgia division by a telegram from Gov. Brown, informing him that the troops were already in the field and tendered him the command with the request that he accept or decline by telegram. At that moment Gen. Jackson was under orders to remain in winter quarters in West Virginia within "handling distance" of such force as he might retain for the purpose of holding the line which he then had in charge, and seeing that the service offered by the governor would transfer him from the camp to the field, from inactivity to active important duty on behalf of his state, he could but accept the honorable call. The command, however, was only for a six months' service, as that was the period for which the body of state troops was generally accepted, and hence Jackson asked the Confederate authorities for leave of absence for that term and supposed it would be readily granted. The leave of absence, however, was refused and he was compelled to resign his commission as brigadier-general in the Confederate states army in order to fill the position required of him by his state. Arriving at Savannah Gen. Jackson found one brigade of his division near that city, another on the Atlantic & Gulf railroad, and the third between the road and the seaboard near or within Camden county. Perceiving that Savannah was specially threatened Jackson at once massed his division at that imperiled city and according to the report of the Federal commander the contemplated movement against Savannah at that time was thus thwarted and abandoned. This massing of a division at a point available for ready moving to any point accorded with the policy which Jackson urged as the best for defending the seaboard line. In an elaborate letter to the governor he suggested that a strong picket of observation should be maintained along the southern coast and especially on the Georgia coast, and that divisions be massed in the rear so that by co-operation of the state forces raised by the Carolinas, Georgia and Florida among themselves and with the Confederate commands, it would be feasible to concentrate a large body upon any threatened point.

Gen. Jackson had the efficient assistance to his division of Gen. Harrison, Gen. Walker and Gen. Capers, and the full co-operation of Gen. Lawton, who commanded the department, and Gen. Mercer, commanding Savannah. In the meantime while this attention was given the coast the office of Adjt.-Gen. Wayne was busied with the organization and preparation of troops to all points. Gens. Semmes and Walker, who had at first been under state commissions, were transferred to commands in the general Confederate line. Gen. Phillips was directed to organize a brigade, which he rapidly accomplished and placed it in a camp of instruction with the view of preparing the troops for active operations. With the aid of Adjt.-Gen. Wayne and Maj. Capers, commandant of the Georgia military institute at Marietta, he soon raised his command to a high condition of efficiency. Referring to this body of Georgia military the governor said in his message to the legislature: "They were a noble, patriotic and chivalrous band of Georgians and I hazard nothing in saying--military men being the judges--that no brigade in the Confederate service was composed of better material or was better trained at that time for active service in the field." During the summer of 1861 the governor tendered this splendid brigade to the Confederate government, but the president expressed his desire that the tender should be made of the regiments only, not including the battalions, and that they should be tendered separately. Gov. Brown insisted on the acceptance of the brigade entire as officered by the choice of the men. The difference of views was at length settled, as the governor states in his message: "Finally the president agreed to accept the battalions and regiments, and in view of the pressing necessity for troops in Virginia I yielded the point and accepted Gen. Phillips' resignation and permitted the troops to be mustered with the Confederate service by regiments and battalions." Gen. Phillips subsequently did gallant and distinguished service as commander of Phillips' Legion.

A regiment of "Georgia regulars," as they were called, had been formed under command of Col. Chas. J. Williams, and another of volunteers commanded by Col.

P. J. Semmes, upon which the state was relying for defense. These two fine bodies of men, commanded by accomplished officers, were ordered by the secretary of war out of the state about the same time that the regiments and battalions of Phillips' brigade had been called into Confederate service. The arms collected by Georgia had also been generally sent with its volunteers into the general service in Virginia and elsewhere, with the result that great difficulties now arose in attempts to supply such troops as had volunteered to defend the coast. The situation grew serious as the summer of 1861 wore away and decided Federal demonstrations began to be made along the general coast line of the Confederacy. It was true that the state was not yet actually invaded at any place, but it was open to successful attacks at all points available by water. Therefore, the governor summoned more troops to the coast and appointed Geo. P. Harrison of Chatham brigadier-general, ordering him to organize a brigade of volunteers to be armed as well as possible. This meant the employment to a considerable extent of the country rifle and shot-gun. It was a curious sight to the trained military men who knew the indispensable importance of arming troops with the most improved weapons of war. But the presence of the men themselves on the coast was no little advantage. It would reassure the planters as well as the inhabitants of the towns near the sea that the state desired to defend them, and the soldiers would also grow used to camp life, pass through the usual first camp afflictions of war troops, learn something of the evolutions and acquire the habit of obedience to orders. At any rate the call was quickly heeded and the troops from all the interior country came promptly to the aid of the state, bringing with them the rifles and shotguns with which they had hunted through the Georgia forests. Some companies even provided rude bayonets forged at home shops and fastened to the barrels of the guns. Others carried the long broad-bladed knife made by the blacksmiths at the country forge from old steel files, which they carried in a leather sheath slung to their belts as a substitute for the bayonet, should any hand-to-hand encounters take place. Their uniforms had been hastily woven at the looms in the country and quickly cut and made by the willing hands of the patriotic women. Tents, blankets, haversacks and nearly every other requisite were strictly home manufacture. Thus the business of the state was on a war basis. The military use of Georgia products became a patriotic pleasure as well as a stern necessity, and the gallant young fellows esteemed nothing as being hard, or even life as dear, if they might by their sacrifice and valor save the state from dreaded invasion. Out of this splendid material, Gen. Harrison rapidly and skillfully found a fine command and the governor on receiving troops enough for another brigade, commissioned Maj. Capers brigadier-general and ordered him to take command.

FEDERAL BLOCKADE.

Toward the close of 1861 the blockade by Federal vessels increased in efficiency until its effects began to be felt throughout the state. The women of Georgia, cut off from the purchase of northern and European goods, began to exhibit a lively and skillful interest in domestic dress. Fashion courted necessity and formed a happy union. Beautiful gowns made at home out of raw material became the style. The state developed hundreds of small industries, which flourished under the blockade without the help of a tariff. Men's clothing made of mixed wool and cotton was manufactured in all counties without the aid of machinery except cards, reels and looms of home construction. Coffee and tea came to be rarities, but substitutes abounded. Cotton was unsalable, but with grim humor the farmer paid his debts in Confederate money and made an abundance of meat and grain. An enforced economy prevailed, but the necessities of life were as yet produced for all. Salt was obtained a while from the old stock on hand, then from the salt fields of Virginia, then from evaporation of the water of the sea, and at last even from the old smoke-houses as the buildings were called in which the bacon of successive years had hung and dropped its excessive salt upon the ground floor. Privations of former luxuries were little cared for in the midst of greater troubles caused by the battles where brave men were mangled and killed.

The pressure grew stronger as 1861 came to a close, and thoroughly understanding the situation, the governor urged the legislature to appropriate $3,500,000 for the year 1862. The Confederate government had issued $50,000,000 in bonds, which the people were advised to buy. The bankers of Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama and Florida met in Atlanta, and agreed to use Confederate treasury notes or currency. Gov. Brown urged the passage of a stay law, and recommended legalizing the existing suspension of banks. An armory was established in the state penitentiary for making and repairing muskets, the Georgia Relief and Hospital association was formed, and at the tender suggestion of Mrs. Williams, of Columbus, wayside homes were opened all along railroad routes for the comfort of the troops. The comptroller-general's report for 1861 showed that forty-one regiments and battalions had been sent to the field, and $1,000,000 had been expended for military purposes. But the message of the governor at the session of the legislature in November, 1861, more fully sums up the account of Georgia troops, both state and Confederate, to the number of forty-seven regiments and six battalions. "Including a few country arms, the state had armed, accoutered and equipped thirty of these regiments."

THE YEAR 1862.

When the year 1862 arrived, the hope of speedy settlement of the war had flown, and the people of Georgia faced the dreadful possibility of a protracted struggle, which would demand all their energies and exhaust their resources. The Federal army had been increased from the first call made upon the northern states to nearly 1,000,000 men on the field, while the entire Confederate forces reported less than a total of 300,000. Georgia had sent to the front over 20,000 troops, besides the state forces, and was raising more regiments to be ready for coming requisitions.

In addition to calls for men the Confederacy levied a necessary war tax, the assessed portion of Georgia amounting to $2,500,000, but this large levy was raised without delay by the sale of state bonds, and even before the time of payment arrived the entire assessment of Georgia was in the treasury. While thus meeting the requisitions for men and money for the general Confederate operations, the state continued its attention to the question of home defense. Gov. Brown issued his proclamation in March, 1862, requiring a complete enrollment and organization of the militia under the laws of the state, through which the whole body of the population capable of bearing arms were mustered in the various counties under military officers of their own selection, and constituted a valuable force of citizen soldiery for the drafts which soon became necessary. In fact the danger of invasion at several inlets on the coast required the earnest attention of the governor and military commanders. The Federal fleet now completely blockaded the port of Savannah, and Tybee island was occupied by the Union forces. Gen. R. E. Lee had been temporarily assigned to the general southern coast, and gave his skillful advice in regard to the proper fortifications. Lawton, Jackson, Mercer, and other experienced officers were fully employed in general direction of the defenses, but notwithstanding all efforts, the Federals succeeded in pushing into Warsaw. The reduction of Fort Pulaski was then determined by the Federal general, David Hunter, by batteries of heavy guns established on Big Tybee. Batteries were also located above the fort in the marsh at Venus Point and Bird Island, and still another was planted on a hulk anchored in a creek south of the fort. During these preparations to invest the fort by the Federals, Commodore Tattnall executed a bold and successful venture with his little fleet in conveying under the fire of the United States gunboats a six-months' supply of provisions to the besieged garrison. But the Union officers and men on their side displayed equally great skill and energy in providing the purpose to capture the strong Confederate works. During the month of March the Seventh Connecticut volunteers, the Third Rhode Island artillery, with two corps of engineers, were employed in transporting ordnance into position, building roads through the marshes, and constructing batteries. "Mortars of eight and a half tons weight and columbiads but a trifle lighter were moved in the dead of night over a narrow causeway bordered by swamps on either side, and liable at any moment to be overturned and buried in the mud beyond reach. The men were not allowed to speak above a whisper, and were guided by the notes of a whistle." The entire armament consisted of thirty-five guns of heavy ordnance, completely investing the fort, five batteries of which had been constructed at night under concealment in very advanced positions.

CAPTURE OF FORT PULASKI.

This important fort, held by the Confederates to the number of 389 men, commanded by Col. Charles H. Olmstead, a brave and faithful officer, was originally garrisoned to defend the river approach to Savannah. It was a brick structure of five casemated sides, walls seven and a half feet thick at the base, and twenty-five feet above water, and built to mount two tiers of guns, one in casemate, and one en barbette. A demi-lune covered the gorge face, and beyond all a tide-water ditch was cut surrounding the whole work. Its armament at this time was forty-eight guns, but only about twenty could be trained upon the batteries of the Federals.

Gen. Hunter's dispositions being all made, he sent a formal demand on April 10 for the surrender of the fort, and received from the heroic Olmstead the noble response: "I am here to defend the fort, not to surrender it." The bombardment opened with the tremendous force of the full amount of heavy guns, and mortars, and for two days Olmstead and his intrepid comrades replied to the furious fire, until their guns were dismounted and the heavy missiles from Hunter's batteries of Parrott rifle-guns began to pour in through the crumbling walls. The magazine became exposed to explosion, the fort was no longer tenable, and as retreat was utterly cut off, the brave defenders yielded to the dreadful necessity, and on April 11 surrendered upon the most honorable terms to their valorous foe.

A deed of heroism something similar to the gallant act of Jasper at Fort Moultrie, in revolutionary times, occurred during the fiercest fire of this heavy cannonading. Amidst the bombardment of the second day, while the air was thick with bursting shells, and solid shot were pounding the tottering walls, the colors of the garrison were torn down by a Federal shot that severed the staff. Seeing their flag fall, Lieut. Hussey, of the Montgomery guards, and Private John Latham, of the Washington volunteers, leaped upon a parapet, and amidst the hail of deadly projectiles raised the colors with their own hands upon a gun carriage, and there unfurled them with an heroic courage that was worthy of brave men of every country and all ages.

The fort was lost, but its fall only stimulated the Georgians to increase their remaining means of defense. The islands, with all their outer defenses were given up, and as the mainland was easily accessible, new fortifications were built at all points. In anticipation of the reduction of Fort Pulaski by the Federal forces, and the movements made possible afterward, all persons near the coast liable to military duty were ordered into service by the governor, and Gen. Jackson was required to enforce the order. The volunteer companies of Savannah were strengthened, and a general increase of the local force occurred. During all this period, when the coast was under threat of invasion, the state had the services of not only its "war governor" and his staff, but from time to time the presence of Lee, Beauregard and Pemberton, all experienced army officers and military engineers. Brig.-Gen. A. R. Lawton, commanding the coast line, and Gen. Mercer, at Savannah, as we have seen, were the first officers in charge at the beginning of hostilities. Maj.-Gen. Henry R. Jackson, with his adjutant-general, Col. Charlton Way, commanded the Georgia division of six-months' troops, composed of three brigades commanded by Gen. W. H. T. Walker, Gen. George P. Harrison, and Gen. F. M. Capers, and it was by the work of this division that new and elaborate fortifications were constructed under direction of Gen. Boggs, a most competent military engineer officer. The division had been of great service in preventing any raid upon the borders of the state by such forces as might be tempted to land from the ships and had been drilled under good officers. Its arms, as well as its quartermaster and commissary stores were ample, and of the best quality, and in all respects it had become one of the finest body of troops in the service. "The works around the city of Savannah will relate to posterity the skill, intelligence, energy and patriotism of the state troops of 1861 and 1862." And now came a pressure under the conscription law for the service of these men in Virginia. Their term of enlistment was nearly expired, and the Federals were making no further decided demonstration against well-fortified Savannah. Gen. Jackson suggested that they be tendered as an organized division, after re-enlistment, for the war. The governor had desired that these disciplined state troops should be protected from individual conscription, but telegraphed, April 15, 1862, to the secretary of war: "I propose to turn over the troops who yet remain at service with the responsibilities to you immediately on such manner as may be most agreeable to the president." On the next day the command of Gen. Jackson expired, and the brigadier-generals were directed to report to Gen. Lawton. Gen. Jackson parted with his division by a farewell order, in which he touchingly said: "While he confesses to a keen disappointment in the disorganization of his command before it had encountered an enemy in battle, he feels strengthened by the conviction that wherever, and under whomsoever, its elements may be called into action, they will exhibit, not only the heroism of Georgians fighting for their liberty, but the force and efficiency of drilled and disciplined soldiers." In a message to the legislature, November, 1862, Gov. Brown says in reference to this gallant officer: "It is but justice to Maj.-Gen. Jackson that it be remarked that he has with untiring energy and consummate ability pressed forward the preparation of the defenses and the training of the army, and that the people of Georgia owe much gratitude to him for the safety of the city of Savannah and its present freedom from the tyrannical rule of the enemy."

THE STATE ARMY.

The "state army," as the governor chose to call the troops assembled by his special call, became incorporated with the general Confederate line, and the regiments were rapidly distributed through the armies of Lee and Bragg, where they increased the luster already glowing round the soldiery from Georgia. Gov. Brown, as their commander-in-chief, says in his message: "I feel it a duty which I owe to the gallant officers and brave men who composed the state army to say that they were at the time of the transfer as thoroughly organized, trained and disciplined, as probably any other body of troops of equal number on the continent who had not been a much longer time on the field. While they regretted that an opportunity did not offer to show their courage and efficiency upon the battlefield, they stood like a bulwark of strong arms and stout hearts between the city and the enemy, and by their chivalrous bearing and energetic preparation, in connection with the smaller number of brave Confederate troops near, saved the city from attack and capture without bloodshed and carnage."

Notwithstanding the gloomy advent of 1862, the year closed with somewhat brightening prospects for the Confederates. Georgia still held its territory untouched, except a few islands occupied after the fall of Fort Pulaski. The state had in the field of infantry, cavalry, and artillery about 75,000 men, and its troops had fought through all the great battles in Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee. Already a large number had been slain in battle or tortured by wounds. Hospitals had multiplied, millions of money had been spent, and the stress of war was felt everywhere. Within the boundaries of the state 8,000 Georgians had been under arms as state troops in actual service, and over $2,000,000 had been expended in state defense, besides $2,500,000 paid into the Confederate treasury. Confederate money depreciated three to one, and all articles of produce and merchandise rose correspondingly high in price.

The legislature sitting in November and December enacted many important war measures, among them a law forbidding cultivation of cotton beyond three acres to each field hand, in order to encourage the increase of grain and meat. Cotton cards to be used in the homes of the people for domestic cotton spinning became a great want, and the manufacture and sale of them was regarded of such importance as to authorize an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose. The governor was requested to buy salt to the amount of $500,000 and have it sold to the people at nearly the cost. As a further step to prevent waste and secure supplies of food the distillation of corn into whisky was forbidden. Clothing for troops was ordered to be supplied by an appropriation of $1,500,000, and $1,000,000 was set apart for a military fund. The families of the deceased and disabled soldiers were afforded support to the sum of $2,500,000. A benevolent society having been perfected, called the Georgia Relief association, the legislature donated $400,000 toward its support. Manufactures of shoes, hats, blankets, medicines, arms and ammunition were fully encouraged by public and private aid. These large appropriations of money, amounting to over $6,000,000 in one year, were readily made by the legislature in 1862, and accepted with patriotic willingness by the people. Georgia placed its all on the altar. Suffering and loss of life had already been appalling, but the state did not falter. At this date, when less than two years of war had passed, there were 500 totally disabled soldiers and a far greater number of widows and little children to be provided for. The men were at the front in numbers almost equal to the voting population, and the people at home were nearly all employed in sustaining the army.

EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

The next prominent and significant event of the war occurred when the president of the United States celebrated New Year's Day, 1863, by issuing the celebrated emancipation proclamation, by which he declared that the negroes of the south were no longer subject to their owners. The news spread rapidly throughout the state, producing, however, no effect upon the relations existing between the white and colored races. Some apprehension was felt that the negroes would be tempted by Federal rewards to insurrection, and that the state military would be required to suppress outbreaks. But the negroes manifested no disposition to disturb the peace. History will record to their praise that while actual war was pending on the soil of Georgia they quietly awaited the issue of the fiery struggle between the south and the north. Entire communities of women and children were left in their charge, while all able-bodied white men were away on the battlefield, and the trust was faithfully kept. Instances of criminal acts were so rare that at this period none are recalled, and while this fidelity is proof of the peaceful character of the negro, it is also evidence for their owners that slavery had produced no personal hostilities between the two races in Georgia, and that the treatment of the negro by his owner under the law had been such as to maintain between them personal attachment and mutual confidence. Many negroes accompanied their owners to the seat of war, not to take part in battle, but to serve in semi-military duties without exposure to danger. Some of them marched in Maryland and Pennsylvania with the armies of Lee, voluntarily returning, although they might have remained in the free states without hindrance. They are still proud of the conduct of their race in those days of anxiety and peril.

The proclamation of President Lincoln, however, was regarded in Georgia as a strictly political war measure, designed to place the cause of war distinctly upon the sole question of slavery, for an effect to be produced upon foreign countries, and with the purpose of making use of negroes as soldiers in the Federal army. The issue of negro freedom had not been distinctly made until this proclamation created it. Hitherto it had been understood that at the furthest the Federal authorities would insist only on restriction of slavery to the limits where it already existed, and a gradual emancipation upon payment of the value of slaves held at the beginning of the war. But now it was settled that the United States proposed to enforce by arms an instantaneous emancipation without compensation.

FORT M'ALLISTER.

From this political war measure we turn to the gallant defense of Fort McAllister in March, 1863, one of the illustrious war incidents which marked the spirited resistance made by Georgia people against invasion. This fort, built at the mouth of the Ogeechee river, was a low earthwork, consisting largely of sand thrown up in parapets, which proved to be an excellent protection, and at this time it was under the command of Maj. Gallie with a small garrison. Several times its reduction had been attempted with failure, and now again seven Federal ships, among which were a number of monitors, steamed up into position to renew the attack on the devoted stronghold. For eight hours the fort was furiously bombarded, and the fire was returned with spirit. Maj. Gallie was killed early in the fight, and Capt. Anderson assuming the command, heroically continued the defense. The sand parapet walls drank up the shots which plunged into their sides, and infolded the fragments of exploded shells, while the Federal gunboats were so skillfully battered from the guns of the fort that prudence demanded their withdrawal from the unsuccessful attack. The splendid defense brought great honor to the little garrison from all quarters, and the commanding general sent flattering commendations of their heroism in orders authorizing the defenders to celebrate the victory by placing upon the flag of the fort the words: "Fort McAllister, March 3, 1863."

EVENTS OF 1863.

The legislature assembled by special proclamation of the governor in March, discussed with serious earnestness the difficulties which beset the state. It was becoming evident that suffering would grow intense. The state had been drained of its fighting men, the blockade had become strict, and cotton could not go out for sale, nor goods come in except by occasional desperate ventures in "running the blockade." Senator Ben. Hill came from Richmond to Georgia and addressed the legislature in a patriotic and impassioned speech, in which, with his wonderful eloquence, he discussed the recent conscript law, as well as the general situation of affairs. The conscript law, passed April, 1862, by the Confederate congress continued to be unpopular. It was declared that the state was already sending its volunteers, and would continue to do so, without this measure, and the appeal to patriotism was believed to be more effective than the resort to legal conscription. Mr. Hill had voted against the measure in congress, but after it was passed into law he urged the legislature with great force to co-operate with the Confederate congress and make the act effective. The governor also believed the law to be unwise and unnecessary, but he responded to every requisition made by the secretary of war. The president had written in June, 1862, to Gov. Brown: "I take great pleasure in recognizing that the history of the past year affords the amplest justification for your assertion that if the question had been whether the conscript law was necessary to raise men in Georgia, the answer must have been in the negative. Your noble state has responded to every call that it had been my duty to make on her, and to you personally as her executive I acknowledge my indebtedness for the prompt, candid, and effective co-operation you have afforded me to defend the country against the common enemy."

Under all these circumstances volunteers continued to go to the field of active operations, filling up the broken ranks of the old regiments, the new companies were likewise raised for the war and forwarded into service. The supply of munitions of war and general equipment required the establishment of manufactures to be managed by competent officers, and these were constructed and maintained at Macon, Columbus, Milledgeville, Augusta and other points. The chiefest of these were the foundry and powder works built and managed by Gen. George W. Rains, who was assisted by Col. Shaler, a highly accomplished civil and military engineer. Gen. Rains was one of the ablest among the scientific soldiers of the army, and conducted the manufacture of munitions at Augusta with such great success as to furnish a very large supply of powder and equipment for the armies of the Confederacy. The powder works at Augusta contributed an imposing array of buildings, above which towered the tall brick chimney that has been preserved as a conspicuous monument of Confederate times.

During the latter part of April, 1863, the Federal Col. Streight made a daring attempt with a cavalry force of 1,500 men to ride to the rear of Bragg's army, then in lower Tennessee, and not only to destroy Confederate supplies in northern Georgia, but also to cut off Bragg's communications. Streight marched from Tuscumbia, directly toward Rome, where a large amount of stores were in depot, which he hoped to capture and destroy. Forrest becoming quickly advised, started with a small force then immediately at hand to intercept him, and also summoned Col. Roddy with his command to engage in the pursuit by another course. Riding rapidly, Forrest came in contact with Streight at Day's Gap, and gave him immediate battle, but as it was Streight's purpose to raid rather than waste his force in battle, he merely met the brunt of Forrest's charge and withdrew toward Rome, but for three days he was pursued day and night and hotly attacked by Forrest at every opportunity. Streight was driven from his second stand at a mountain pass, and pushed on toward the Georgia line, only to be overtaken next day at Black Creek, where, after heavy skirmishes, he succeeded in crossing upon a wooden bridge which he burned at once, and placed the deep and rapid stream between his command and pursuit. Forrest found it impossible to ford the creek at that point, and was seeking some other place to cross when a handsome girl of the south, Emma Sanson, coming from her home, told him that she knew of a ford near by, and said, "I would guide you if I had a horse, but the Yankees have taken all we owned." Gen. Forrest offered her his thanks, and courteously requested her to mount behind him and direct him to the place. The patriotic girl answered, "I will go with as brave a man as Gen. Forrest," and springing on the horse behind him, and followed by a courier, soon conducted Forrest to a bend in the creek where there was an old ford which cavalry could use. When the little party dismounted and approached the creek they were fired upon by a picket from the opposite bank, and as the balls whistled by them the brave girl placed herself in front of Forrest, and said, "Stand behind me, general, and they won't dare to shoot." But Forrest could not accept such costly protection, and gently requested her to screen herself behind the roots of a fallen tree until he could reconnoiter the ford. The intrepid girl, however, would not stay under shelter, and several balls came cutting the ground around her feet, and some of them actually passing through her skirts, she lifted her sunbonnet and waved it defiantly toward the foe. The gallant cavalry in blue ceased firing, raised their caps, and gave her three hearty huzzas as she retired out of sight. Forrest at once brought his artillery into play across the ford, and drawing off the detachment, crossed his command in a few hours, and once more hurried after the Federal force. Two or three times Streight stood and skirmished, but after each battle made away toward Rome. On the morning of May 3, Forrest, with his command reduced to about 500 men, overtook Streight again and forced a pitched battle, which he managed by a show of strength, completely deceiving his antagonists, who outnumbered him nearly three to one. At the "white heat of battle" Forrest audaciously dispatched an officer to Streight demanding immediate and unconditional surrender of his whole force. Streight parleyed a very short while, but Forrest with an impatient declaration that he could wait no longer, sent couriers and staff officers to a number of imaginary batteries and to four supposed regiments of cavalry to form line and prepare for battle. Forrest had in fact only two field pieces and a fragment of a regiment, but his staff and couriers dashed off impatiently to convey his orders as he had given them. "Within ten minutes," said Forrest, "the signal gun shall be fired and the truce will end." Whereupon Streight surrendered his entire force of 1,500 men prisoners of war. The capture of this strong command by Forrest, "the wizard of the saddle," as he came to be called, excited the loftiest praises from Confederate and Federal alike. It rescued Rome from invasion, saved the foundry, machine shops and supplies, and left Bragg's communication in a secure position.

About this date, Georgians were illustrating their state in the battles of Baker's creek, and on to Vicksburg on the west, and around Chancellorsville in Virginia, and at Gettysburg. The state itself was also sufficiently threatened to require a call by the president for the organization of a special military body, to be styled Home guards, and on his call in July for 8,000 men for that purpose, the state responded with 18,000. This body was composed of men not yet in the Confederate army, and Maj.-Gen. Cobb was assigned to the command and entered upon his duties in September, with Gen. Jackson commanding the department at Savannah, and Gen. Iverson commanding another, with headquarters at Rome. And now the alarmed attention of Georgia was turned in the latter part of the summer of 1863 to the advance of the Union forces under Rosecrans through Tennessee toward the northern counties of the state. Bragg, after fighting the battle of Perryville, December, 1862, withdrew to Murfreesboro, where he was pursued and so vigorously attacked by Rosecrans, that notwithstanding the heavy slaughter of the Federals, he was forced back to Shelbyville. From this position he was also flanked and withdrew to Chattanooga, in June, 1863, where Rosecrans followed, and by the last of August occupied Stevenson and Bridgeport. During these movements of Rosecrans against Bragg, another large Federal force, commanded by Burnside, drove Buckner's little army from Knoxville, Tenn., and pressed it back into Georgia, while Rosecrans, detaching Crittenden's corps, sent it through Sequatchie valley to attack Buckner in the rear, and also ordered Thomas' corps across Lookout mountain into McLemore's cave, thus threatening Chattanooga, but hazarding his army by a separation of his forces. Moving his command from Chattanooga, Sept. 7, 1863, the Confederate commander formed his line of battle, chiefly along the road from La Fayette to Lee and Gordon's mills, the right lying between Graysville and Ringgold, upon the Western & Atlantic railroad. In this position he covered the country and held the passage through which the Federals must march in invading the state from Chattanooga. Within two days after Bragg's departure the army of Rosecrans occupied that city, and was then advanced by separate corps upon the Confederate position. These movements of the two armies soon brought them into close contact, and consequently there was severe skirmishing by infantry pickets, and short but fierce encounters occurred between cavalry all along the line between Ringgold and La Fayette for many days. On Sept. 11, Catoosa Springs was the scene of a brilliant cavalry contest, in which the Confederate cavalry were driven back to Tunnel hill, where they made a successful stand. On the same day the gray and blue met as mounted men near Ringgold, when the Confederates beat their adversaries back into the little city, and then with a dashing charge, led by Forrest in person, drove them in disorder from the place. A few days later a body of Michigan cavalry stationed at Reed's bridge for its defense crossed a part of the command to make a reconnoissance, but their advance was watched by Confederate cavalry concealed in the woods, who opened fire with two pieces of artillery, and cutting them off from the bridge, stampeded them down the river to a ford, through which they escaped, and at the time dashing across the bridge, drove back the entire detachment.

CHICKAMAUGA.

These stirring preliminaries in which the Confederate and the Union soldiers toyed with the dangers of the field, in equally conspicuous gallantry, brought on the great historic battle of Chickamauga. The meager official records show the following organization from Georgia in Bragg's army at the date of that battle:

Cheatham's Division.—Second Georgia cavalry battalion, Gen. J. K. Jackson's brigade, First Georgia battalion, Maj. J. C. Gordon; Fifth Georgia regiment, Col. C. P. Daniel; Second Georgia battalion sharpshooters, Maj. Whitely.

In Cleburne's and Breckinridge's Division—Gen. M. A. Stovall's brigade, Fortieth, Forty-first, Forty-second, and Forty-seventh Georgia regiments.

In Walker's Division—Gist's brigade, Forty-sixth Georgia, Col. P. H. Colquitt, and Eighth Georgia battalion, Lieut.-Col. Napier; Wilson's brigade, Twenty-fifth Georgia regiment, Col. A. J. Williams; Twenty-ninth Georgia regiment, Lieut.-

Col. McRae; Thirtieth Georgia regiment, Col. J. S. Boynton; First Georgia battalion sharpshooters, Maj. Shaff; Howell's battery, Capt. E. P. Howell.

In Stewart's Division—Bates' brigade, Thirty-seventh Georgia regiment, Col. Rudler; Fourth Georgia battalion sharpshooters, Maj. Caswell; Dawson's battery and Company E, Ninth Georgia artillery battalion.

In Preston's Division—Kelly's brigade, Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment, Col. Moore; Peeples' battery, Capt. Tyler M. Peeples; Wollikins' battery, Capt. A. N. Wollikins.

In Longstreet's Corps, Hood Commanding—Wofford's brigade, Sixteenth, Eighteenth, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiments, Second battalion sharpshooters; Cobb legion and Phillips legion; Bryan's brigade, Tenth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first and Fifty-fifth Georgia regiments; Benning's brigade, Second, Fifteenth, Seventeenth and Twentieth Georgia regiments; Harris' battery and Massenburg's battery.

In addition to these are the First Georgia cavalry, Col. Morrison; Second Georgia cavalry, Col. Ison; Third Georgia cavalry, Col. Thompson; Fourth Georgia cavalry, Col. Avery; Sixth Georgia cavalry, Col. Hart.

The general field of maneuvers for several days prior to the final clash of the bloody battle of Chickamauga spread over a vast extent of broken ground lying west of Ringgold, but the scene of conflict was at last compressed into the incarnadined space enclosed within the tortuous windings of the Chickamauga creek and the adjacent mountain spurs. Rosecrans commanded the Union men and Bragg the Confederates. The right wing of the Federals was held by McCook, the center by Chittenden and the left by Thomas. On the right of the Confederate line stood the splendid corps of Polk, while Longstreet's command under Hood for the first day extended to the left. By wonderful sagacity Gen. Lawton, quartermaster-general at Richmond, had transported Longstreet's corps from the Rapidan in Virginia, a distance of 800 miles over worn railroads to Chickamauga in the nick of time to take a glorious part in the impending battle.

The great encounter opened during the morning of Saturday, Sept. 18, by a demonstration from the Federal side, which was promptly met by a most resolute attack led by Polk against the extreme left of the Federal army, commanded by Thomas. The ardent southerners poured en masse against their adversaries at this point, for the purpose of turning the left of Rosecrans and thus to beat an open way into Chattanooga. The assault was made with impetuous force, and repeated with unabated courage and with only the general result of forcing back the Federal line a mile or more. The Confederates pressed their stern antagonists hard all day, winning an advantage here and there, but still failing to break down the strong Federal lines which bore the brunt of the day's battle. Meanwhile Hood, with the divisions of Kershaw, Johnson, Cleburne, Stewart and Hindman, as well as his own, battered the right wing and center with many furious assaults that several times imperiled the Federal lines, but at the close of the horrible day the advantage appeared to rest with neither side.

Thomas spent the night in strengthening his breastworks, and placing his reinforcements in position. Longstreet arrived in person, and having reported to Bragg, early next morning assumed the command of his old corps. Some slight changes were made along the position of both armies preparatory to the renewal of the struggle, and at dawn of day the two brave adverse lines of Americans rose up from troubled slumber, or laid down the pick and spade to engage again in deadly strife for the mastery of the already bloody field. Dispositions on Sunday morning showed the right wing of Bragg's army formed of divisions of Cleburne, Breckinridge, Walker, and Cheatham, under Polk. The left wing with the commands of Johnston, Buckner, Hindman, Stewart, Kershaw, and Hood, under the direction of Longstreet. The general Federal alignment was nearly as on the day before. About 8 a. m. the Confederates moved against the center and left of the fortified Union lines, and the Federal left center became at once the theater of one of the most desperate fights of the war. Charge and countercharge distinguished the morning hours, and marked the spot for perpetual fame. Hood, called "The Paladin of the fight," flushed with victories won with his division, rode headlong in the successive charges until shot by a minie-ball he fell from his horse into the loving support of some soldiers of his old Texas brigade. With him went down hundreds of men on both sides equally brave. The crash and roar of artillery and musketry, with all the gory incidents of dreadful battle, swept up and down the entire field, but it was at the left wing where Thomas still stood on his fiercely debated ground that the heaviest and hottest fire raged. Hard pressed all the morning by the veteran divisions of Walker, Cleburne and Cheatham, and with difficulty maintaining his grim hold upon the line assigned him, Thomas called in the early afternoon for reinforcements, which were promptly sent. Van Cleve's and Negley's divisions were withdrawn by Rosecrans from McCook's and Crittenden's corps for that purpose, but by a misunderstanding of orders a gap was left in the Federal lines near Davis' division. Longstreet saw the opportunity, and hurling his troops into the fissure, struck the opened Union flank and threw Davis' division into disorder and rout. Pressing their advantages the southern divisions mixed among the Federals at all angles, and charged wherever they found a foe. Sheridan was at this precise hour moving his command to the support of Thomas, but encountered the impetuous corps of Longstreet, which had penetrated the Federal lines, and after a brief, brave stand were driven back to Crawfish spring road. The flame of battle burned along Horseshoe battery, Mission and Snodgrass ridges, and victory seemed to be within the Confederate grasp. The commands of McCook and Crittenden, composing the entire Federal right, were broken and driven toward Chattanooga, pursued by Confederate infantry and artillery. Rosecrans himself hurried back amidst the retreating troops to make a stand and save his army, which now appeared to be threatened with complete destruction.

Sheridan and Davis, however, although driven to the rear, had eluded the dashing advance of the Confederates, who were pursuing Crittenden and McCook, and reforming their commands at Rossville, rallied to the support of Thomas, who still invincibly held his position, although bent to a semi-circle, with the flanks plunged deep into the spurs of a mountain. The succor was timely, for Longstreet had turned a part of his victorious column against Thomas, expecting to drive him from his line by debouching through a gap in the hills and descending upon his flank. It was a critical hour in this, the afterpart of the bloody day. Polk was pounding away with relentless force, and the infantry of Longstreet were pouring toward the gap, while field batteries were hurrying to the adjacent hills. The fighting became instantly desperate. On all sides the Confederates pushed their advantages with hot enthusiasm, but at the critical moment Gen. Granger, commanding a body of reserves, hearing the firing near by and perceiving the danger, without waiting for orders, threw Steadman's cavalry into the coveted gap, placed artillery in commanding positions, and double-quickened his infantry to meet the Confederate onset. The fearful collision came on at once. Down into the gap rode the Michigan cavalry. The artillery poured a cataract of shot and shell upon the southern columns. The fresh infantry reserves thickened the air with minie-balls. Twice and thrice did Longstreet's men charge this fresh Federal opposition, and then even after dark made the final unavailing assault. Thomas, during all this crisis, when his whole command was environed with peril, withstood every attack, and as night came on to curtain the bloody scene from sight, he was left in possession of his well-earned position. But with battered troops, reduced in numbers and scarce of ammunition, he could not remain before the valiant foe, who would certainly attack and destroy him at dawn. Therefore under shelter of the night he safely transferred his weary, wounded, brave command to Rossville, and then to Chattanooga. Victory in this great national battle may be claimed for the Confederate side, but the triumph was only partial and produced no permanent result. The reports show that the Confederates captured thirty-six guns, 15,000 small arms, a large amount of accouterments and valuable stores, with 7,000 prisoners. The battlefield became theirs by the retirement of Rosecrans to Chattanooga, but the frightful losses in killed and wounded on both sides attest the valor of all the troops and exhibit the consuming cost of war. The united nation has converted this historic spot into a national park, where patriotic Americans of the future ages will meet to observe with mutual pride the memorial monument of American valor.

After the battle of Chickamauga, the army of Rosecrans occupied the strong fortifications of Chattanooga, and Bragg, drawing his forces forward, erected works along Missionary ridge and Lookout mountain. Thus for about two months the Confederates held their opponents in siege. Longstreet's corps was now moved to east Tennessee to attack Burnside, and fought the battle of Knoxville. Rosecrans was relieved Oct. 30 and Gen. Grant was assigned to the command. Grant at once commenced an energetic organization of the army, and having reinforced his strength with the corps of Sherman and Hooker, the last week of November found him ready with a splendid army for the bold, aggressive action which characterized him as a military commander.

CHATTANOOGA.

Bragg's army now extended along the general crest of Missionary ridge, from McFarland's gap to the mouth of the Chickamauga creek, a distance of about six miles. Grant moved out of his trenches Nov. 23, and after two days' maneuvering for position, opened the attack on Bragg's line by massed columns directly driving against the opposing Confederate left flank. Hardee's corps occupying that point met the assault of the morning with courageous nerve, and the first Federal attempt ended in their repulse. Later, about noon, another charge was made with heavy infantry lines preceded and sustained by artillery by which the Union forces broke through a part of the Confederate lines, gained the crest, and turning squarely upon the disrupted ranks broke the brigades successively until the army of Bragg was forced to a full retreat. The day was lost to the Confederates. All the triumph of Chickamauga vanished at the instant the wedge of Grant drove into the Confederate position at the crest. Suddenly the whole southern army fell back, followed at first by their victorious foe, but at Taylor's ridge Cleburne turned upon the pursuers with such vigor as to win a splendid victory, capturing 250 prisoners and inflicting a heavy loss in killed and wounded, while so arresting pursuit as to permit Bragg to remove his army safely out of danger, and to bring the further operations of this patriotic body of troops upon the soil of Georgia. Notable changes in the command of both armies occurred in this juncture by the appointment of Grant as the commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, who went at once to open the Virginia campaign against Lee, leaving Sherman in charge of the forces in Georgia. Bragg was relieved in December, and Hardee was left in temporary command, but at his own request was retained in the command of his corps and Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was ordered, Dec. 27, to the command of the Confederate army.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST ATLANTA.

Two great commanders now confronted each other. Sherman, wily, aggressive, and skillful, had the advantage of greatly superior numbers and equipment. Johnston, the master of strategy, had an advantage in the privilege of selecting his ground and fighting in defense of the state against invasion. We will follow by only a general survey the deathless story which these two armies shall tell, with the thrilling tongue of many battles fought from Dalton to Atlanta, over a bloody course of 100 miles. Johnston established and fortified his line of battle in the vicinity of Dalton and Ringgold, over a broken country, where he secured a position of good defense against direct attack, but open to the objection that it could be turned without giving battle. In that position he addressed his remarkable military skill to the task of bringing the Confederate army into splendid fighting condition, with all the limited means which the state and the Confederacy were able to place at his disposal. His entire effective force (May 6) was 42,856 men of all arms, comprising Hood's and Hardee's corps, and he was confronted by Sherman with a strength of 98,787. Sherman formed his line in Johnston's front, with the right on Mill creek gap, and the left near the Cleveland road, and commencing active operations attacked, with Schofield and Thomas, but at the same time marched McPherson's corps through Snake creek gap toward Resaca. This earliest flank movement, which foreshadowed the general Federal plan of invasion, caused Johnston to withdraw from Dalton and fortify at Resaca, where the southern force was augmented by the arrival of Cauty's division and Loring's division on May 11 to 55,248 of all arms.

Sherman kept close on to his retreating enemy, but cautiously entrenched at every advance. At Resaca the passage at arms between the two armies covered scarcely more than two days, the first of which was spent in desultory but sharp fighting. On the second day the engagement, although limited to a part of the line, was noted among the participants as one of the severest in their martial experience. Sherman's general line extended across the Western & Atlantic railroad, somewhat overlapping the Confederates. The first day passed in the maneuvering of the two commanders, and on the morning of May 16 both armies were ready for action. The battle was begun during the day by a general movement of the Federal forces against Johnston's breastworks at Resaca, which failed, and a simultaneous attempt to force a crossing at Tanner's Ferry, which succeeded, notwithstanding the stubborn resistance of Avery's brigade. It was in this action that the memorable charge of Stovall's Georgia brigade was made across an open field under galling and destructive fire in order to secure a position which was regarded as important and which the Federals were moving to occupy. It was a quick, sharp, gallant charge, in which the Forty-second Georgia, Col. Thomas commanding, was especially exposed and suffered severe loss. Colonel, afterward Gen. Henderson, bleeding from a wound in the face, continued to inspire his dauntless command. Hulsey was cut down in the thick of the fray and borne from the field severely wounded. Calhoun fell with a shot in his hip, at the moment of bitterest fire, and many a brave soldier on both sides surrendered his life. It is also a worthy incident of the battle of Resaca that the young cadets of the Georgia military institute, then located near Marietta, on one of the foothills of Kennesaw Mountain, received their first baptism of fire.

The Georgia military institute, founded in 1857, was designed as an academy for military instruction and furnished the first military training of many young men who became conspicuous in the Confederate war. Among them were Hon. Gen. Pierce Young, Gen. George P. Harrison, Gen. Capers, Capt. E. P. Howell, and Capt. John Milledge. The institute continued its educational work throughout the first years of the war, and in the spring of 1864, when the campaign opened at Dalton, the cadets were eager to take an active part in the defense of the state. At length they were gratified by the "long roll" and the orders to take cars at once "for the front," then at Resaca. The gallant boys reached the field and took their place in the line of battle. The battalion was commanded by Maj. Capers and consisted of Company A, Capt. Austin, and Company B, Capt. Manget. During the advance of the Federals the cadets encountered the Ninth mounted Illinois infantry and received their charge with well directed volleys and held the line until withdrawn by order. We shall have occasion to note the subsequent service thus gallantly begun by these boy soldiers in gray jeans in many a weary march and hard battle.

Sherman's success in the movement at Tanner's Ferry enabled him once more to turn the Confederate flank and put Johnston's army in peril. Yielding therefore to necessity, the Confederate general retired from his entrenchment, and after two days of small affairs below Resaca, entered Cassville, May 18, about noon, and massed his command by brigades for a temporary bivouac. Next day a stirring announcement in general orders from headquarters informed the troops that battle would be given in this new position, and the announcement was received with enthusiasm by the gallant men who desired to meet their valiant foe and drive them from the soil of the state. Line of battle was formed along a range of hills in the rear of the town with here and there an intervening depression. Accustomed to promptly fortify their position, the army quickly threw up the ordinary rude but serviceable breastworks, but they were scarcely ready before the alert Federal troops appeared upon the opposite ridges, placed their batteries, and opened fire on the corps of Hood and Polk, continuing the cannonading until dark. The Federals found an advantageous line along an extended range of hills, nearly covering the entire front of these two commands and about thirty to fifty feet higher than the ridges which they occupied. Batteries were accordingly posted at available positions where an enfilade would sweep the open ridges of Johnston's left wing with a plunging fire. Pickets advanced to the crest could not hold their positions in some of these exposed places on account of the heavy cross-firing along several hundred yards of the Confederate lines. Observing this dangerous defect in the location, a careful examination was made before nightfall and then a consultation was called at the headquarters of Polk, at which Hood and Polk advised Johnston either to assume the offensive next morning or to change the positions of their commands. These two officers were positive that neither would be able to hold his line the next day on account of the great exposure to enfilade by the Federal artillery. It seemed evident that Sherman would attack Johnston's right flank at this weak point by moving through the open country, instead of advancing against Hardee's stronger position directly across the valley in which the beautiful town was nestled. Report was also brought at the same time that Schofield's corps was moving to cross the Etowah, and threaten the southern connections.

Johnston, having the ultimate responsibility, yielded to the views of his lieutenant-generals and at once gave orders for his army to cross the Etowah river. The movement required the utmost secrecy and celerity, for the withdrawal must be made in the immediate presence of a watchful enemy. Accordingly details were made to be deployed along the main line with orders to keep fires burning, to cut trees and to make other demonstrations while the main army moved silently away. The night was calm, and alight with stars. The two lines of battle frowned upon each other that soft night in the middle of May from the opposing hilltops. Campfires threw their weird light against the sky and dappled the foliage of the trees. The strange, muffled hum made by armies at night preparing for to-morrow's battle extended along the Confederate line. The Federal general was preparing his flank movement from the left and the wary Confederate general was preparing to elude and disappoint him. The devoted Confederates, confiding in the masterful spirit of their leader, quietly drew out of their rifle pits, scarcely leaving a trace behind except their hastily constructed trenches. The Federals either suspecting retreat or determined on a quick assault at daylight, had almost as quickly extended and advanced their lines. It is probable if Johnston had resolved on a daybreak attack and moved out his troops for that purpose before dawn, both armies would have found themselves face to face, and not many yards apart. All night the subdued sounds of moving troops crossed from side to side, and when the sun had risen the main columns of the Confederates were all on the south side of the river. The details who had been left to make the show of a line had also withdrawn and were hurriedly crossing to rejoin the army, while at the same hour the Federal infantry, cavalry, artillery and wagon trains were in full motion on the roads toward Kingston. Before noon the whole of Johnston's army was across the river and safe from immediate attack.

Sherman, in following Johnston from Cassville, moved his columns toward Dallas in order to avoid the Altoona pass, and two weeks later the two armies again faced each other and fought the little brilliant battle of New Hope church. Johnston had rested the right of his infantry upon Little Pumpkin Vine creek, with Wheeler's cavalry prolonged as a protecting curtain, and while in this position Hooker's corps was thrown against Stewart's division near the church on May 25, but were gallantly repulsed with frightful slaughter. The following two days were spent in skirmishes between both cavalry and infantry almost without cessation, and as Sherman rapidly extended to the left so as to employ his usual flank movement, Hood found his right flank threatened seriously by Howard's corps. Having secured Cleburne's division for his relief, he massed it in columns of brigades in the rear of his extreme right, with careful instructions to permit Howard to make the attack on them, and to quickly deploy into line so that the Federals would be suddenly faced by a solid line of infantry, where they expected only an open space upon the Confederate flank. Late in the afternoon (May 27) the anticipated attack was made, the cavalry pickets were brushed aside and Howard's corps came down upon Wheeler's dismounted men and Cleburne's ready division. The unexpected stubbornness of their reception caused a temporary recoil, but the attack was again renewed with chivalric vigor only to fail again. And thus the brilliant battle went on until the Confederates, taking the offensive at dark, made a gallant charge, forcing their opponents from the field and capturing 200 or 300 prisoners.

Encouraged by the successes of the two days, Johnston resolved on a general battle for May 29, but the Federals changed position during the night, drawing back across Pumpkin Vine creek, and quickly built a strong, fortified line. After these movements the two armies remained in threatening opposition for nearly a week, engaging in scattered contests every day. Sherman repeatedly assailed portions of the Confederate line, and was as often repulsed. All attempts to break over the rifle pits which Johnston's men had thrown up for protection were foiled, and the determined Federal commander again shifted his position and overlapped Johnston so thoroughly as to compel him to drop to Marietta, and occupy a succession of hills, with his right on Kennesaw mountains, his left at Lost mountain and with Pine mountain at his center. On this new line the intrepid Hood was placed to command the right, Hardee, cool, resolute, skillful, held the left, and brave-hearted Polk had charge of the center. Sherman, advancing his newly reinforced army, faced Johnston fully along the whole length of the field. McPherson, the idol of his corps, was assigned the Federal left over against Hood; Schofield, the match of Hardee, occupied the right, and the gallant Thomas, who had won imperishable fame at Chickamauga, confronted Polk in the center. At this date Johnston's effective force of all arms was less than 60,000 men and Sherman's over 100,000.

Confident of his strength, the eager Federal general began on June 9 that remarkable series of assaults, feints, and general attacks which made this one of the most memorable struggles of the long campaign. For more than three weeks the deadly strife was protracted with thrilling incidents and frequent displays of sublime courage. These were no sham battles. The skirmishes were always hot, and now and then the scourge of battle reddened the entire lines with the blood of brave men. The first week had nearly gone when Pine mountain, standing out in dangerous salient at Johnston's center, drew the special attention of the Federal commander. It became also the object of Johnston's solicitude and began to be regarded as an untenable part of his line of defense. A council upon its brow, intended to devise a plan by which it could be strengthened, was therefore held, and it was that council which cost the life of the brave and good Lieut.-Gen. Polk. On June 14 a group of Confederate generals, composed of Johnston, Polk, Hardee, and the gallant cavalry general, Jackson, rode from the front of Bate's division to select an advance position for artillery. A lull occurring in the skirmishing, these officers dismounted and walked to the brow of the hill where, standing together, within 800 yards of the Federal guns, they examined the situation with such interest as to attract the special attention of their foes. Very soon a shell discharged from the nearest battery came hurtling toward the distinguished group and exploded over their heads. Presently another tore its way to the same spot, and crushing through the body of the brave Polk, robbed the world of as noble a knight as ever made honorable battle in a sacred cause. When the mangled hero fell Johnston bent over him in anguish, and, assisted by his comrades, bore the bloody form back to the rear. It is enough to say that the true men of both armies were saddened by the fall of Bishop-General Leonidas Polk. The grief is not outworn by the years that have elapsed, and as often as Kennesaw battle is named, the distinguishing event of the three weeks' contest is stated to be that Polk was killed.

Loring succeeded to the command of Polk's corps, and the general dispositions were soon changed, for Johnston found that his line of separate mountains was untenable, and giving up Lost mountain as well as Pine mountain, he defined a shorter and stronger line of battle about Kennesaw, which baffled every assault. The Federal forces were promptly moved up to meet the situation, fortified themselves afresh, and disposing infantry and artillery to great advantage, were ready, June 27, for the terrible venture made by McPherson and Thomas to crush the Confederates under Loring and Hardee. With terrific cannonading and impetuous infantry assaults, the Union forces rolled in billows of fire against the Confederate entrenchments, and as often ebbed in broken battalions to cover of their trenches. The veteran division of Cheatham and Cleburne, in Hardee's corps, and those of French and Featherstone, in Loring's corps, bore the brunt of the furious attacks made by men equally veteran and equally brave. They had met before on many fields and knew each other's mettle. The trained troops of Thomas, who had stood their ground at Chickamauga against the fiercest Confederate charges, here met with a valor as stubbornly firm as their own. McPherson led his men to the fight, animating them by his own chivalric spirit, only to see them recoil in bloody, broken regiments. The storm of battle only subsided with the sinking of the sun, and the day's deeds satisfied both armies of the intrepid courage of each and gave to history an illustrious example of the fighting qualities of American soldiers.

As the sequel of these efforts for three weeks to batter down the living wall of Confederates, interposed between the state and a sweeping desolation, the direct attack in front was abandoned and Sherman began an adroit march toward the Chattahoochee river, intending, as he states in his reports, to "avoid the Kennesaw hill." In anticipation of this maneuver, Johnston had caused fortifications to be constructed near the river, and the governor of Georgia co-operating with the Confederate commander had forwarded to this line the state troops commanded by Gen. G. W. Smith. It has been understood in the current story of the continuous fighting from Chattanooga to Kennesaw that the governor of the state and its people manifested deeply their interest in all military operations. Every department of state government was practically on military duty and the intense strain of popular concern can scarcely be conceived. The dread of invasion with all its horrors darkened nearly every home. The boom of the hostile cannon now swelled along the hills below Marietta and rolled gloomily away south of the Chattahoochee. All along that river from Roswell to West Point the Georgia militia division had been picketed under Johnston's orders to guard the crossings until called to the support of the cavalry on the left wing at Kennesaw, where they were engaged in the fighting of the final days. "When the army fell back they were the last infantry withdrawn to the fortified position," and were assigned a place in Hood's corps. Clearly baffling pursuit and successfully repelling the minor attacks made during the withdrawal, Johnston moved his army across the Chattahoochee, July 9, and threw it on guard at Atlanta. Sherman moving eastward from his position at Marietta, crossed above Peachtree creek, and advancing parallel with that stream, marched left in front until Schofield and McPherson reached Decatur, leaving the right of the Federal army commanded by Thomas well up against the left bank of the Chattahoochee. According to Gen. Wheeler's report, made to Confederate headquarters, the entire Federal army was crossing the river July 17, and moving against Atlanta.

HOOD SUPERSEDES JOHNSTON.

Just before noon of the same day Gen. Johnston received orders from the Confederate secretary of war, relieving him and assigning the command of the army to Gen. Hood. On receiving the orders assigning to him the great trust at this critical emergency, Hood earnestly urged Johnston to retain the command and joined with other officers in telegrams to President Davis, entreating the recall of the untimely order. The Confederate president declined the request with courteous replies, assigning reasons which he regarded as his entire justification, and nothing remained to be done but the acceptance of the situation. Two days, including July 17 and 18, were wasted by the Confederates. Johnston remained with the army for nearly that time, and during these important hours the southern force appears to have been without an active directing head. Hood writes of the confusion incident to this change of commanders, announces his want of information and states that he consumed the greater part of the day in vain endeavors to adjust the existing difficulties. But in the meanwhile Sherman was marching his great armies directly across the front of Atlanta, only a few miles distant, and even exposing them to serious and dangerous assaults if made by an alert organized foe. The Federal "armies," as Sherman properly calls his command, were active on July 18, each moving separately into position. Thomas covered Buckhead and faced Peachtree creek, Schofield turned into Decatur and McPherson marched far down to Clarkston on the Georgia railroad and then turned toward Atlanta, tearing up the railroad as he came, and reaching Decatur at night, where he formed the contemplated juncture with Schofield. It thus appears that Sherman ran a great and needless risk in moving his three army corps separately within almost immediate sight and easy striking distance of his enemy, and he was perhaps saved a disastrous assault by the confusion and consequent inaction of the Confederate army. The removal of Johnston one week earlier or one week later might have entirely changed the history of all the battles around Atlanta.

Hood formally assumed command on the afternoon of July 18, and actively spent the night in getting himself in full connection with all parts of his brave little army of 50,000 men. With these he was to defend "the heart of the south," as Atlanta was officially called, against 106,000 splendid troops. Can they save the day in this last extremity of the southern Confederacy? During the night Hood began to form his line of battle fronting Peachtree creek. Throwing his right wing eastward as far as possible, so as to cover Atlanta against McPherson, he rested his left across the Pace ferry road toward the northward, and trusting largely in the Chattahoochee river to protect his left flank, employed his cavalry mainly on the right. On the morning of July 19 Cheatham's corps occupied the breastworks of the right wing, Hardee filled the center with his fine corps, and Stewart was assigned to the extreme left. The artillery was carefully posted at intervals along the hills and Maj.-Gen. G. W. Smith's Georgia state troops were put in position on Cheatham's right. While the Confederate dispositions were in progress Thomas was rapidly building a number of bridges over Peachtree creek, and purposing to cross his army to the south side where he would entrench a position with the Chattahoochee on his right flank and the creek in his rear. The army under Schofield was also moving from Buckhead for the purpose of crossing Peachtree creek east of the Buckhead road. Away on Sherman's left and southeast of the creek, McPherson was aligned near Decatur. It was the evident purpose of these movements to establish a connected line near the city from which an assault could be made without the disadvantage of the intervening creek. Hood determined boldly to attack his enemy while in motion and attempting to cross the stream. Thomas was to be the first object of assault, and after crushing that corps back against the river, the Confederates would turn upon Schofield. Explaining his plan of battle to his generals, Hood chose one o'clock in the afternoon, next day, July 20, as the hour when his attack would begin. He expected to find his enemy partially under cover of hastily constructed breastworks, but the larger body engaged either in rapid entrenching or crossing the bridges of the creek. He reckoned on the disorder of Thomas, and expected to fall with the crushing weight of Stewart and Hardee, first upon Thomas and then turn his whole force upon the remainder of Sherman's army. Sherman had the long and difficult and he had the short and easy line of communications, so that the general situation aided in his plan of battle. By this plan the battle was to begin on the right by divisions attacking in echelon at short intervals of space, and, driving Thomas back, to continue the movement down the left bank of the stream until his army would be packed in the pocket formed by the creek and the river. The orders were that where entrenchments were encountered they were to be carried with the bayonet, and every opposing division as it was met should be forced back by assault. His bold, but apparently feasible plan of battle met with the approval of his generals and accordingly they separated to prepare for the action. The hour of one o'clock arrived and the impetuous Hood was made to chafe by a delay, which postponed the beginning of the fight until four, but even at that hour the Federals were taken by surprise. Stewart after addressing his troops, while riding along the line, and arousing their enthusiastic hope of a great victory, moved out his splendid corps in the order as designated and drove line after line back with intrepid courage. But the charge from his right was not so impetuous. By a fatal error these divisions missed the points of attack, and while Stewart's corps was executing orders in a gallant style, their supporters were able to do little more than skirmish with the unbroken lines of their enemy. Gen. Sherman was not on the lookout for any assault, as he states in regard to this battle. "On July 20 I was met by Gen. Schofield near the center and soon after noon I heard heavy firing in front of Thomas' right. I soon learned that the enemy had made a furious sally, the blow falling on Hooker's corps and partially in Johnston's division of the Fourteenth and Newton's of the Fourth. The troops had crossed Peachtree creek, were deployed, but at the same time were resting for noon, when without notice the enemy came pouring out of their trenches down upon them. They became commingled and fought in many places hand to hand. Gen. Thomas happened to be near the rear of Newton's division and got some field batteries in good position on the north side of Peachtree creek, from which he directed a furious fire upon a mass of the enemy which was passing around Newton's left and exposed flank. After a couple of hours of hard and close conflict the enemy slowly retired within his trenches, leaving the dead and many wounded on the field."

These facts show a well ordered battle which should have met with distinguished success. The ground favored the assailants, the distance was short and the advance was covered from view. The assailed were slightly entrenched and to the discredit of their officers were taken by surprise in open day. "There was quite a gap," as Gen. Sherman states, "between Thomas and Schofield," into which the returning victors might have poured. The battle was a misadventure as many battles are for which there is no explanation. The sullen Confederates resumed their trenches, disappointed indeed by the issue of the day and it was felt that some vigorous movement must be made or Atlanta could not be defended. Gen. Wheeler had been active on July 20 in securing information which he imparted fully to Hood at night. He had discovered that Sherman had left a flank of McPherson unsupported, just as he had left a gap between the armies of Schofield and Thomas. McPherson's flank was thus left "standing out in air," between Decatur and Atlanta, permitting a vigilant enemy to move in the opening at night and make a successful attack at break of day.

Preparing for another sally at this exposed point, Hood ordered a new line of breastworks to be rapidly constructed, using nearly his whole force in the labor with such energy that they were ready for occupation on the night of July 21. Hoping now to gain an advantage of what he supposed to be a serious military blunder, committed by his adversary, Hood developed his plan to the corps of commanders and with remarkable energy began its fulfillment. That Gen. Sherman saw the hazardous position of his command appears at this juncture from his note of caution to McPherson, July 21, concerning which he says: "Finding that McPherson was stretching too much on his left flank, I wrote him a note early in the morning not to extend so much by the left, for we had not troops enough to invest the place, and I intended to destroy utterly all parts of the Augusta railroad to the east of Atlanta, then to withdraw from the left flank and add to the right."

Very early on the morning of July 22, Sherman saw in person that the old entrenchments of the Confederates had been abandoned the night before, and for some moments supposed that Hood was preparing to evacuate the city. He at once placed Schofield's corps in motion to discover the real meaning of the movement, and riding in advance himself he soon came in view of the new line, "strongly manned with guns in position at all intervals." At precisely the same hour Hood rode on the high hill near the right of Cheatham's corps and surveyed the Federal lines which he was preparing to storm. It was the morning of the eventful battle of July 22. Daylight revealed extraordinary movements which called the non-combatant citizens to the tops of the houses. Ladies in some numbers anxiously looked for suitable positions and watched for the coming events foreshadowed by the actions of the armies. Confederate troops had been moving all night into new positions. Hardee's corps had passed along the city's edge toward the Confederate right as if escaping southward. Gen. McPherson approaching in full view of the city from the high eastern hills saw the commotion of southern troops as well as the excitement of citizens and rashly concluded that Hood was in full retreat. At the same moment Sherman heard with some uneasiness "the sound of artillery back toward Decatur." It was Wheeler who had swept with his cavalry round the Federal right quite to the rear. Immediately afterward, heavy skirmishing broke out near to the rear of McPherson, followed almost instantly by rapid volleys of musketry and the shouts of charging men. The battle was on. The moving troops which the brave McPherson thought were in hasty retreat had turned upon his flank and were moving their way over the field. Hardee had swung round on the McDonough road in accordance with Hood's plan of battle, and was making the first drive which was designed to double the Federal divisions on each other in confusion toward their right, subject them to successive attacks by Cheatham, Smith and Stewart, until they were forced into retreat beyond Peachtree creek. But McPherson had taken the precaution to fortify his left flank and place troops in easy reach of the entrenchments. It was the entrenched line commanded by Gen. Frank P. Blair which Hardee assailed, and not the open flank of McPherson as was expected.

The Confederates encountered also, by a strange accident, a division of the Sixteenth corps which McPherson had ordered without knowledge of the pending attack to take position on the left of Blair. As this division halted on the Clay road, in the rear of Blair's division, they were suddenly assailed by the Confederates who at the same time pressed with vigorous charges both the rear and flank of Blair's entire position. It was during these irregular but fierce assaults that McPherson fell. Blair in his report says: "Gen. McPherson, under whom I served, with several other officers and myself rode out to the front to see what was going on, and if possible to make up our minds as to the nature of the movement that was being made. As we rode back to our lines Gen. McPherson repeatedly expressed his opinion that the Confederates were retreating and would abandon the city. I rode with him to his headquarters and after I had been there some half hour, we heard skirmishing in our rear immediately in the direction of Decatur. Gen. McPherson ordered me to send back to the rear two regiments to protect our hospitals. I executed this order, and as these regiments were moving to the rear one division of the Sixteenth corps which had been ordered by Gen. McPherson to take position on my extreme left made its appearance in the rear of my position on a road known as the Clay road, and at right angles with the McDonough road, along which my corps was entrenched. Just as this division halted about 500 yards in rear of my line, heavy skirmishing commenced on the extreme left of my line. I hastened toward the front of the line, and as I reached a skirt of timber, which intervened between me and the line, I saw Gen. McPherson accompanied by one orderly enter this piece of timber in front of me. In a few minutes I heard a heavy discharge of musketry, and McPherson's horse came out of the timber riderless." The gallant Federal general was attempting to reach the spot where his troops were in imminent danger. He rode forward to share their danger, to inspire them with his presence and to die with them if need be. The monument erected to his memory on the fatal field where he fell is revered by the men of the south who admired his splendid military abilities and loved him for the worth of his personal qualities. Upon the same day the gallant Walker gave up his life. Brave to a fault, generous to the extreme, the state of Georgia honors his memory and will forever cherish his fame. So with the costly price of noble blood spilled freely in trench and open field, from the veins of privates unknown to fame as well as officers of distinction, the battle went on through all the bloody day. Blair found his men struggling desperately to hold their breastworks by fighting from the reverse of their entrenchments and by the singular good fortune that the Sixteenth corps reached him simultaneously with the attack made upon him by Hardee, he was able to save his line. Around his corps and near him the battle chiefly raged during the day. The Confederates attacked and held several lines of breastworks only to find themselves involved in a network of others manned by determined Federals. Hood watched the battle near by and seeing that the purposed break was not taking place at McPherson's corps, commanded Cheatham in the afternoon to attack the position in his front, and the order was readily and bravely obeyed with conspicuous success. The Confederates in Cheatham's line and the Georgia state troops under Gen. Smith forced the Federal defenses, notwithstanding a most stubborn defense, capturing five guns and holding his ground until forced by enfilade fire to withdraw from the works he had captured.

One of the most brilliant assaults made at any time by the Confederate army and which signalizes this fierce battle occurred in the charge of Stovall's brigade, Col. Abda Johnson commanding, and the capture of DeGress battery by the Forty-second Georgia regiment, commanded by Col. Thomas. The gallant achievement won the applause of Sherman, who witnessed the attack from an elevation, and remarked afterward that it was the "grandest charge made during the war." Upon the right of this regiment the state troops under command of Col. John Brown participated in the triumphant assault in which he was mortally wounded and the command fell upon Capt. Albert Howell, whose gallantry on that day won him the commission of lieutenant-colonel. Upon reaching the Federal works a hand-to-hand fight ensued. Bayonets were found useful and club muskets did deadly work. The Union defenders gave way at last after marking the defense of their guns with Confederate dead, then afterward rallied and regained their lost position. In the shadows of the forest as well as along the heights of these entrenchments many instances of Federal and Confederate valor occurred which made mutual the renown of the men who fought the fight of their faith. Georgia was honored and illustrated by thousands of its infantry, artillery and cavalry who were foremost in the defense of their homes upon this historic day. The battle cannot be counted as a Confederate victory, but it seemed to have failed by the sheerest accident. Gen. Blair, whose defense saved McPherson's corps from rout says, "The position taken up accidentally by the Sixteenth corps prevented the full force of the blow from falling where it was intended to fall. If my command had been driven from its position at the time that the Fifteenth corps was forced back from its entrenchments there must have been a general rout of all the troops of the army of the Tennessee commanded by Gen. McPherson, and possibly the panic might have been communicated to the balance of the army."

Atlanta from this date was subjected to a daily shelling from the Federal guns and therefore bomb-proof pits rapidly became part of the domestic arrangements in the especially exposed parts of the city. Residences were constantly struck and the population of women and children necessarily remaining lived in the awful strain of hourly suspense and anxiety. The Confederate line of breastworks which had been drawn close in the suburbs on the north and east, were matched by the new commanding fortifications of the Federals, but no hostile demonstrations took place more than the disturbance of the usual shelling for several days. On July 26 and 27 Gen. Sherman shifted his line steadily to the right down the Chattahoochee on the west side of Atlanta toward the West Point & Central railroads, for the purpose of seizing and destroying "the only line by which the Confederate army was still able to secure its supplies." This important movement was inaugurated by a splendid body of Federal cavalry, which had crowded round to the right of the Confederates at Flatrock and another strong mounted force which was rapidly moving by way of Fairburn toward the Central road. To meet these threatening demonstrations Wheeler pursued the Union cavalry toward Flatrock and by a vigorous assault checked their advance. The Federal demonstration toward Fairburn was more fortunate and succeeded in destroying a wagon train at Fayetteville and tearing up a mile or two of the railroad below Jonesboro.

While these cavalry demonstrations were in progress Sherman was steadily moving his great columns of infantry southward on the west side of Atlanta to seize the railroads leading south from that city. Gen. Stephen D. Lee, who had just been assigned the command of a corps in Hood's army, was at once ordered to arrest this extension of the Federals southward and on the execution of this trust came in conflict with his enemy on the west side of Atlanta near Ezra church. The advanced Federal division had already reached the ground which Lee designed to seize, and in consequence he found himself compelled to attack at once in order to gain the desired position. The fight which ensued grew in magnitude to a battle. The Confederates charged the Federals without success, and in turn the countercharge was equally unavailing. Stewart was hurried to the field of the engagement in support of Lee and the strife was renewed in detached assaults lasting until sunset, when the firing ceased without material advantage to either side. The active operations of the Federal cavalry radiating in several directions from Atlanta, commanded earnest Confederate attention. Sherman's cavalry of 12,000 men were commissioned to raid the surrounding country, destroy railroads, capture Macon, and release the Andersonville prisoners. A powerful force of picked men under McCook moved toward Columbus and encountered the Confederate Roddy near Newnan, who held them at bay until Wheeler arriving in person, together with Jackson and his command, attacked with such relentless vigor that the Federals were forced to fly with the loss of 950 prisoners, 1,200 horses and two pieces of artillery. At the same time Iverson was pursuing Stoneman, who had destroyed many miles of the Georgia railroad, and after burning the bridge across the Oconee river was rapidly advancing on Macon. At that city he was met by the state forces under Gen. Cobb, and when Iverson arrived the splendid Confederate victory was won which induced Gen. Shoupe to say, "The first day of August deserves to be marked with a white stone." From Iverson's brief despatch next day the state learned that "Gen. Stoneman, after having his force routed yesterday, surrendered with 500 men; the rest of the command are scattered and flying toward Eatonton." These defeats of well equipped Federal cavalry by the mounted Confederate men who had fought with Bragg, Johnston, and Hood, every inch of the long battlefield through Georgia, arrested the purpose of Sherman to release the Andersonville prisoners and thwarted his plan for destroying the Confederate communications south. "I now became satisfied," says that Federal general, "that cavalry could not or would not make a sufficient lodgment on the railroad below Atlanta and that nothing would suffice but for us to reach it with the main army."

Unfortunately the partial and fruitless victories of Hood inspired him with the hope of destroying the mighty power of his adversary by the extremely hazardous and finally fatal campaign which he at this time projected. Almost duplicating Sherman's recent cavalry failures, Hood despatched Wheeler northward to break the communications of the Federal army, with a force of 4,500 mounted men. Pursuing the general's instructions Wheeler burned the Etowah bridge near Cartersville, recaptured Resaca and Dalton, destroyed thirty-five miles of the Western & Atlantic railroad, seizing large numbers of mules and horses, but was finally forced to retreat. Forrest, the Confederate "wizard," moved part of his forces from Mississippi and co-operated with Wheeler in these successes, only to participate in the ultimate failure. Sherman being on the alert sent Newton's division to Chattanooga, Corse's division to Rome, and gave instructions to Rosser at Nashville and Steadman at Chattanooga so as to meet the raiders and protect his roads. Possessing all superior facilities the well equipped Federal chief was enabled to meet these Confederate demonstrations with such ease that Hood was made to see that his cavalry could not compel Sherman to retreat.

During these incursions of the cavalry, the operations around Atlanta by the infantry and artillery grew in their lurid significance of the city's doom. Bate's division was charged Aug. 6 by two desperately determined Union assaults which it bravely repelled, and Aug. 9 became a famous date for the beginning of a most terrible bombardment of the city. The Federal batteries poured from their hundreds of brazen muzzles shot and shell in nearly every direction. Hitherto the cannonading had occurred chiefly during the progress of some battle, but now even while the troops were in the trenches the batteries rolled their red wrath against the homes of the people. Women and children flew into cellars and pits where they crouched in fear of death. Bomb proofs were hurriedly built everywhere for safety. Shell came crashing through residences and churches, and exploding along the streets threw deadly fragments on all sides. The night of Aug. 17 centered the terror of the dreadful bombardment. An eye-witness says: "The night was dark, the spectacle sublime, and but for the burning houses, crashing of timbers and the screams from wounded and frightened women and children as they fled away in terror and despair from desolate homes, might have been enjoyed as a grand pyrotechnic display." The fury of that fearful fire from Federal batteries during the dead hours of night seemed to presage the storming and sacking of the stubborn city, but its lines stood ready for the encounter and its people gave no sign of surrender. After the day dawned and the news came from various quarters, it became apparent that all this artillery outrage was merely designed to cover the Federal cavalry raids.

For nearly a month afterward Sherman cautiously but persistently extended his right west and south of Atlanta until he had secured an entire change of position, and on the morning of Aug. 26 the Confederates found the old Federal breastworks entirely abandoned. Hood at once readjusted his lines to the new situation and from scouts and cavalry learned that the Federal army was entrenched in force across the West Point railroad and revealing evidently the design to capture the railroad leading to Macon. From this new position Sherman began on Aug. 29 to move toward Jonesboro, and from his own lines near Atlanta Hood directed the brigades of Lewis, Reynolds and Armstrong to take position in the vicinity of the same town, and on Aug. 30 the Confederate line of battle was established between Rough and Ready and East Point. The opposing armies were thus converging at every step and Lewis' brigade became the first object of attack, about dark, by a Federal corps which had crossed Flint river. The battle of Jonesboro now became an impending event and Hood realized that upon his success depended the fate of Atlanta. Forming his plans for an advance on the next day, he gave the initiation of battle to Hardee's corps which was to strike its enemy from a base line at Jonesboro supported by Lee, and if the assault should be successful, Stewart's corps and Smith's state troops were to take up the attack from East Point, and with a general movement the Federal army was to be driven down the Flint river and the West Point railroad. In the afternoon of Aug. 31 Hardee made his attack and gained a part of the Federal breastworks, but failed in the general assault to carry the entrenchments which had been rapidly built along the Federal front. The following day Sherman assumed the offensive by a successful dash against Hardee's weakened corps and although the debatable ground was bravely contested the confident Federals broke through the corps and at nightfall had the important railroad in their possession. The division of Lee had been withdrawn on the night before and marched to Rough and Ready, to protect the flank of Hood's retiring columns, who were rapidly moving away from Atlanta to Lovejoy station, and in that position Lee was attacked by a large Federal force and driven back with a loss of eight guns.

FALL OF ATLANTA.

This retreat of Hardee meant that Atlanta was unavoidably abandoned to the mercy of the invaders. The unfortunate Confederate commander had attempted to prepare for this possible event by instructions to have all facilities ready for the prompt removal of stores, cars and engines, and accordingly all were saved except one valuable trainload which the rear guard blew up at night. The troops were rapidly withdrawn from their several positions and before the morning of Sept. 2 the gates of Atlanta, so valiantly defended for forty-six days, stood open without a guard to challenge the approach of a foe. Within a few days Sherman ordered his wearied forces to repose in camps and entered Atlanta as its conqueror. Mayor Calhoun, accompanied by a body of non-combatant citizens, met him on his arrival and requested protection for the defenseless inhabitants. The people of Atlanta had endured the terrible siege with wonderful fortitude and in uncomplaining submission to the dangerous and threatening situation in which they were placed by the progress of the war. Even when their homes were shelled and they were forced into their pits for safety and when their rations grew scant as well as coarse, they bravely bore their calamities and cheered their defenders. The women nursed the sick and wounded in the hospitals and even in their homes with the most delicate care and assiduous attention. The old and infirm men did humane service to friend and foe alike. All they now asked was to be protected in their domiciles and allowed to remain in their city. But Gen. Sherman thought it expedient to order the departure of all citizens, notwithstanding their protest and appeal. He considered that they could not be provisioned in Atlanta and accordingly gave Gen. Hood notice on Sept. 7 that he would send them with their baggage into his lines. The order was executed and a large number were subjected to this involuntary exile. The city was then converted into a military post and subjected to all laws of war.

The dilemma from which Hood must now choose, one of two evils, pressed sorely on his brave heart. He could not successfully attack. He could not safely wait. He could not presume that Sherman would loiter in Atlanta as long even as he did, and therefore decision must be made without delay. Those who knew well this splendid fighter of a division in Lee's army would expect him to decide just as he did. His natural impulses were to daring exploit, and during his services in Virginia he became fascinated with the military genius and strategic methods of Stonewall Jackson. This is the secret of his movements from the day he planned the battle of July 20 to the day of his fatal overthrow in Tennessee. In every plan of battle he had Stonewall Jackson in mind, and nobly aspired to repeat in his Georgia campaign the remarkable movements and achievements of that great commander. This suggestion is also evidenced by his repeated reference to Jackson in his published book. But the conditions in Georgia were different from those in Virginia. There was never but one Stonewall Jackson. No one could take his place.

While revolving in his mind the extreme perplexities of his situation, Hood received the full assurances of the governor of Georgia that all the resources of the state would be put at his disposal. Maj.-Gen. Smith, commanding the state line, was ordered to fortify Columbus, Macon and Augusta. The Georgia reserves, under Gen. Cobb, were ordered to the front, and the governor called into the field the few remaining arms-bearing men of the state. It was too true that the fall of Atlanta sounded like the first crack of doom to the Confederacy, but Georgia stood ready for whatever a patriotic people should dare to attempt. In this extremity President Davis came into the state to visit Hood's army, and a council of generals was held with the president in Palmetto, at which Hood proposed the plan on which he had resolved to act. It was not, as is generally supposed, to make a rapid march at once into Tennessee and Kentucky, but to withdraw a few miles above Atlanta, and thence to fortify a strong line and from that position descend on Sherman's communications so as to force him either to move his army south toward a new base of supplies, or retrace his steps northward and attack Hood in his new entrenchments. The march to Tennessee was the result of an afterthought. The general plan was approved in the council, and Sept. 28 Hood moved across the Chattahoochee toward Powder Springs and Lost Mountain. Stewart was then rapidly advanced to Big Shanty and captured it, taking 170 prisoners. The garrison at Acworth at the same time surrendered to Loring. French, pressing farther, attacked Corse at Allatoona, but was foiled by a splendid defense. Sherman, scarcely comprehending Hood's actions, forwarded a large part of his command from Atlanta and formed line of battle near Kennesaw, but at this juncture Hood, encouraged by his success, changed his original plan and decided to move his command further up the line of railroad, with the intention of drawing Sherman after him. The Confederate army marched rapidly through Dallas, Van Wert, Cedartown and Cave Spring to Coosaville, followed for a time by Sherman, whom the cavalry of

Wheeler and Forrest harassed at every opportunity as far as Snake Creek gap, near Rome. Hood had meanwhile reached the Tennessee river and there awaited the arrival of Forrest, and while he was making his arrangements to march through Tennessee, Sherman returned with his army to Atlanta to destroy that city and begin his "March to the Sea."

SHERMAN'S MARCH TO THE SEA.

Gen. Sherman describes the beginning of this famous march in the following words: "About 7 a. m. of Nov. 16, we rode out of Atlanta by the Decatur road filled by marching troops and wagons of the Fourteenth corps and reaching the hill just outside of the old rebel works we naturally paused to look back upon the scenes of our past battles. We stood upon the very ground where was fought the bloody battle of July 22, and we could see the copse of wood, where McPherson fell. Behind us lay Atlanta, smoldering in ruins, the black smoke rising high in air and hanging like a pall over the ruined city." This testimony concerning an inexcusable horror faintly describes the destruction even down to heaps of ashes by military order two months after its capture, of the city that now so proudly vindicates "its right to be," by its unsurpassed restoration from ruins. No description need be given of the fiery storm which swept the city and the crash of collapsing walls scattering their ruins over the streets, or of the hot, stifling air and the vast black volumes of smoke arising and falling in great somber waves. Four thousand houses were wantonly burned and the remainder were left at the mercy of marauders. But worse than all this was the human want and other suffering that followed the needless waste of Atlanta by the ruthless torch.

Sherman marched his entire army from Atlanta and spreading out his columns began to seek the sea by the shortest line. It may be observed that the course of his march from Dalton to Atlanta is a narrow strip lying close to the Western & Atlantic railroad, made rugged with fortifications and ghastly with graves. But from Atlanta southward the course broadens into a dark swath nearly fifty miles wide, sharply defined by burnt or pillaged dwellings, devastated farms and sacked hamlets. The legislature was in session and the governor communicated the information received Nov. 17, concerning the departure of Sherman from Atlanta and his advance, laying waste the towns and country in his march. The message suggested the immediate passage of the pending appropriation and military bills "and that the governor and legislature then adjourn to the front, to join in the struggle till the enemy be repulsed." The legislature at once appropriated $500,000 for the relief fund, $6,000,000 for disabled soldiers and soldiers' families, $1,000,000 for military funds and $3,000,000 more for sundry military purposes, in all $10,500,000. Never before or since were such millions voted by a Georgia legislature on such short notice. The rapid advance of Sherman's cavalry followed close by dense columns of infantry, stimulated legislation and soon brought the front to the very gates of the capitol, rendering it easy for the general assembly to adjourn according to the governor's suggestion, and shortened the distance they would have to go "to aid in the struggle till the enemy is repulsed." By the exercise of great diligence nearly all the valuable books and papers of the state were removed to the lunatic asylum, and the penitentiary convicts were released and formed into a company, except a few confined for murder, who were sent off under guard. In a short time the train moved off toward Macon loaded with refugees, and the capital of the state was left on Nov. 19 to the occupancy of the Federals, who entered, and after burning a few buildings, but sparing the old capitol, moved on. Near Macon, Gen. Cobb threw out a portion of his Georgia reserves and made a dash at the passing columns without checking its course an instant. Farther down at Griswoldville, the Georgia militia impetuously attacked numbers greater than their own and were thrown mangled and bleeding aside. Detachments of Wheeler's corps left in Georgia rode at all points night and day, seeking information and contending with their vastly superior antagonists. There was, in fact, nearly nothing to oppose the steady advancing tread of the devastating force under Sherman over the anguished state. The Georgia institute cadets, now veritably bronzed veterans, but not 100 in number, stood before the Federal army at Oconee bridge and actually gave battle at the cost of life and limb. Gen. Wayne, commanding whatsoever troops he was able to collect, could only move ahead of the destruction which followed after him. On the east side of Sherman's course a brush occurred near Waynesboro. Col. Young with a part of Gaines' command foiled the attempt of cavalry at Ball's Ferry. Huger's artillery assisting Wheeler's cavalry harassed the head of the advancing column at Sandersville. A line was fortified at Miller on Sunday, Nov. 27, from which the defenders retired before the Seventeenth corps. Toombs' First brigade state troops, with Anderson's and Phillips' brigades, made a junction on Little Ogeechee with three pieces of Pruden's battery and no cavalry. They boldly formed line of battle in the afternoon and skirmished with their enemy, but Gen. McLaws arriving from Savannah directed withdrawal at night. The Washington and Emmanuel militia companies, composed of men in advanced life, were specially commended in reports for active service. At length these futile efforts to stay the sweeping blight that burned a broad track to the sea culminated at the trenches near Savannah on Dec. 7. Sherman had exhausted twenty-four days in the march, and then after carrying Fort McAllister against the heroic resistance of the garrison commanded by Maj. Anderson fully invested Savannah. The Confederate fortifications around the city were manned by about 10,000 men under command of Gen. Hardee, who remained in their defense until the night of Dec. 20, when they were quietly withdrawn across the river into South Carolina. Sherman then entered the city unopposed and gaily telegraphed his conquest as a Christmas gift. Not long afterward he resumed his march taking a direction northeastward through Carolina, and after the surrender of Lee and Johnston, returned in person to Savannah.

Thus closed the thrilling story of active hostilities in Georgia, and as the purpose of this history is thus fulfilled we will not follow the current of history into the years of reconstruction, out of whose gloom Georgia grandly rose after a brief, determined struggle. From all the armies of the south and the prisons of the north the soldiers of Georgia returned to resume the pursuits of peace amidst unprecedented difficulties. They found the state under Federal military rule, labor disorganized, all social order imperiled, wealth destroyed and the future uncertain. But they were still young men, inured to hardships, accustomed to difficulties, and possessed of an unexampled experience which fitted them to undertake and to signally achieve the restoration of their state. Grappling bravely, intelligently and effectively with all the serious problems of their times, they rapidly bore the state, for which they had so nobly fought, back to its equal constitutional position in the Union, and conquering many antagonists uplifted themselves and families from the prostration of defeat to the constantly rising ground of material prosperity. To such valor, intelligence and patriotism promptly employed in peace the state as it now is owes an inextinguishable debt of gratitude.

AGRICULTURE.

AS early as the tenth century the grand expanse of country between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, for years known as Georgia, is reputed to have been discovered by Celtic and Irish navigators. So favorably impressed were they with this country that on their charts they designated it as Great Ireland or White Man's land. It is also asserted that in the twelfth century Madawc, son of Owen Gwyedh, Prince of Wales, visited these shores. In 1525 Jean de Verrazano was delighted with the promising appearance of the country. Jean Ribault sailed from Havre de Grace in 1562, and coasting northward from Florida reached the Georgia coast. So charmed was he with the country that in proof of his appreciation he named the rivers after those in France. To the St. Mary's river he gave the name of Seine; to the Satilla that of the Somme; to the Altamaha that of the Loire; to the Newport that of the Chareute; to St. Catherine's that of the Garonne; to the Ossabaw Sound that of Gironde, and to the Savannah river that of the Grande. But little is known of what they discovered as to the productions of the country at the time of their visits. They were deeply impressed, however, and expressed their admiration of the country.

In March, 1540, Sir Ferdinand De Soto entered Georgia at the southwest corner of the state with a large retinue of men, and traveled mostly in a northeasterly direction, through the pine barrens of Lowndes, Ware and Irwin counties, through Houston county, via Stone mountain to Hall county, and thence to the Conasauga river in Murray county. This route afforded him an opportunity to see the condition of the country. The Indians furnished them with abundant supplies of corn, mulberries, etc. As late as 1850 the remains of a fortification of rock wall could be seen on the sides of Stone mountain, which it is thought was put up by the Indians or by De Soto in 1540 to guard against apprehended attacks. The Indians at that time, by the rudest kind of husbandry, raised corn in abundance, and ponies, which pastured on the luxuriant grass that abounded in the woods. The effect of these discoveries in the new world was slow in developing for the reason that intelligence, at that period, was not so rapidly promulgated or widely disseminated as at the present time in the old world.

On March 24, 1663, King Charles II. granted to the lord proprietors of Carolina all the land lying between the thirty-first and the thirty-sixth degrees of north latitude and westward to the Pacific ocean. This grant was enlarged on June 30, 1665, by including all the land between the twenty-ninth and the thirtieth degrees of north latitude. This embraced the greater portion of the present states of Alabama and Mississippi, a territory containing 147,000 square miles, rich in natural resources and which, if it had remained a part of Georgia, would have constituted her the third state in the Union, only less in area than California and Texas. In 1802 Georgia ceded 88,020 square miles of her territory to the Federal government. A very strong effort was made in the year 1717 to improve the lands between the Savannah and the Altamaha rivers. Sir Robert Montgomery, Bart., termed it the "Margravate of Azilia" and enthused with the country, described it as "the most delightful country in the universe." In a letter to Europe he referred to it in the following strong language: "Nature has not blessed the world with any tract that can be preferable to it. Paradise with all its virgin beauties may be modestly supposed, at most, but equal to its native excellencies."

A charter was granted on June 9, 1732, constituting twenty-one noblemen and gentlemen a body corporate for twenty-one years by the name of trustees, for the establishment of the colony of Georgia, the grant specifying "all those lands, countries and territories situate, lying and being in that part of South Carolina between the Savannah and the Altamaha and westerly to the Pacific, and the islands within twenty leagues of the coast." Subsidiary to the great design of philanthropy in establishing a colony in Georgia was the further purpose of making it a silk, wine, oil and drug-growing country. The movement to establish a colony in Georgia with a colonial government met with popular favor in London. A writer in the London Magazine of October, 1735, evidenced his approbation in the following lines:

"While ripening slow, the future purpose lay,
And conscious silence planned the opening way,
Kind o'er the rising schemes an angel hung
And dropped his counsel from his guardian tongue, Wish you this way the royal pair inclined?
To Carolina be a Georgia joined,
Then shall both colonies sure progress make,
Endeared to either for the other's sake—
Georgia shall Carolina's favor move,
And Carolina bloom by Georgia's love."

The aborigines of Georgia, although possessing nothing but the rudest agricultural implements, succeeded in obtaining from the soil abundant yields of corn, pumpkins, gourds, beans and melons. They selected the richest spots in their towns and the valleys, and with but little labor secured large crops. When they took in new fields they girdled the trees with stone axes. Many of the fields had evidently been cultivated for many years, as the roots and stumps of the trees had entirely disappeared.

CULTIVATION OF SILK

In 1732 the colonists in Liberty county grew fine crops of rice, corn, peas, potatoes, pumpkins, cabbage and indigo. Silk culture attracted considerable attention in South Carolina, and on Jan. 31, 1732, Sir Thomas Lambe certified that the silk produced in South Carolina possessed as much natural strength and beauty as the silk of Italy. Gen. James Edward Oglethorpe estimated that the cost of the production of silk in Georgia was twenty-five per cent. lower than in Piedmont. All seemed to agree in the belief that the production of silk was important to be considered and fostered. The production of raw silk was then begun in Georgia under flattering auspices. It became the fashion, and in 1735, upon the king's birthday, the queen illustrated the royal approval of the industry by appearing in a full robe of Georgia silk. In 1739 Samuel Auspourquer carried the raw silk from Georgia to England and it was pronounced by John Zachary, an eminent raw silk merchant, and Mr. Booth, the great silk-weaver, to be as fine as Italian silk, and worth twenty shillings per pound. At New Ebenezer, in 1741, twenty girls made seventeen pounds of cocoons, which sold in Savannah for eight pounds three shillings. In 1747, 800 pounds of cocoons were raised in Georgia, of which one-half was raised in Ebenezer. In 1750, 1,000 pounds of cocoons and seventy-four pounds two ounces of raw silk were sold in Ebenezer for £110 sterling. In 1764, 5,514 pounds of cocoons were delivered in Savannah. In his official account of the reasons for establishing the colony of Georgia, the secretary of the board of trustees says: "The Italian, French, Dutch, Indian and China silks, imported, thrown and wrought only, may, on the most moderate computation, be reckoned to cost us £500,000 sterling per annum, which may all be saved by raising the raw silk in Georgia. The saving of this £500,000 sterling per annum is not all, but our supplying ourselves with raw silk from Georgia carries this further advantage along with it, that it will provide new or additional employment for at least 20,000 people in Georgia for about four months in the year during the silk season and 20,000 more people of our own poor here all the year round in working the raw silk."

Gen. Oglethorpe in his "new and accurate account" of the colony, says: "We shall be the market for great quantities of raw silk, perhaps for wine, oil, cotton, drugs, dyeing stuffs and many other lesser commodities. It must be a weak hand indeed that cannot earn bread where silk worms and white mulberry trees are so plenty. In Georgia the working hand will have the benefit of all his labor." He was very enthusiastic in his description of the climate, soil, productions and beauties of Georgia. To give an idea of the general climate he quoted the following lines as applicable:

"The kind Spring which but salutes us here,
Inhabits there, and courts them all the year;
Ripe fruits and blossoms on the same trees live,
At once they promise, when at once they give.
So sweet the air, so moderate the clime,
None sickly lives, or dies before his time.
Heaven, sure, has kept this spot of earth uncursed,
To show how all things were created first."

Lucerne was planted in Frederica in 1735. Indigo was planted on Bermuda, now known as Colonel's island, and its culture was profitable until the invention of the cotton gin in 1792 stimulated the culture of cotton and consequently the culture of indigo was abandoned. The Salzburgers at Ebenezer, in 1738, made a limited experiment in growing cotton. The yield was abundant and the quality excellent, but at that time the trustees of the colony favored silk and wine, and did not give any encouragement to the culture of cotton. In 1749 the principal exports were pitch, tar, rice, deerskins and indigo. History is silent as to the individual who first introduced the seeds of the cotton plant into America. In 1736 cotton was cultivated as an object of horticulture in Talbot county, Md. The earliest and most decided proof of the practicability of raising cotton crops to advantage was first received in a letter from Mr. Leake of Georgia, to Gen. Thomas Proctor of Philadelphia.

THE SOILS OF GEORGIA.

The cession of a large part of her territory to the Federal government by Georgia left her in a compact form, strictly a southern state. Georgia lies between thirty degrees, twenty-one minutes, thirty-nine seconds and thirty-five degrees north latitude; her northern boundary is south of the lowest parallel of Europe—thirty-six degrees. The variety of soil and climate in Georgia makes the cultivation of almost any product a possibility. Georgia is essentially agricultural, but her resources are so abundant that she may be considered a variety state. Artificial agricultural progress is of very slow growth. Experiment and demonstration must precede development. Agricultural progress has been slow in Georgia, and necessarily slow when all its environments are considered. In considering the lines of progress in agriculture the quality and character of the soil is a factor worthy of attention, and in that consideration the geological formations of the state present themselves in the following order:

The Metamorphic, representing the archæan of middle and northern Georgia; the Paleozoic, in the Silurian, Devonian and the Carboniferous of northwest Georgia; the Cretaceous, lying south and east of Columbus, on the western boundary of the state, representing Mesozoic; the Tertiary and Quaternary of southern Georgia, representing the Cenozoic.

Middle and Northeast Georgia.—The Metamorphic covers the larger part of the agricultural divisions of middle and northeast Georgia. The southern limit of its exposure may be correctly defined by a line drawn on the map of the state from Augusta through Milledgeville and Macon to Columbus. North of this, with the exception of the ten counties of northwest Georgia, the formation covers all the country. Approached from south Georgia the change is from a rolling region of sandy lands to one of a more broken character, with a rocky or gravelly surface; from pine lands to lands covered with a growth of oak and hickory. In approaching it from northwest Georgia there is a change from a region of parallel valleys and ridges that are usually continuous for long distances, to a generally broken country—from a limestone to a freestone. The topography is that of a broken region. The country gradually rises toward the north and is generally hilly, with few elevations rising to the proportions of mountains in middle Georgia, but becoming quite mountainous in some parts of north Georgia. The country rises to the very general level of 2,000 feet above the sea near the northern line of the state, with mountains from 3,000 to 5,000 feet. The soils of this division are red, sandy and clayey; gray, sandy and gravelly, and granitic lands.

Under the designation of red lands are included both red, sandy and clayey soils, from whatever source they may be derived. The color and character of the soil are as varying as is the proportion of hornblende and associated minerals in the rock. The surface of the country occupied by these red lands is rolling or undulating, and often somewhat hilly, there being but few level areas, and then not in very large tracts. Very little is too broken for cultivation. The red lands are usually sandy for a depth of several inches and hence are rather easily cultivated, especially in dry weather. Decayed vegetation frequently gives to them a dark, "black" surface, but the subsoils and underclays are very red. The latter being in place and derived from the disintegrated and decomposed rocks, are variegated, showing different colored strata. They are generally difficult to till in wet weather, being sticky, and in dry seasons are very hard and compact. Except perhaps in southern counties these red clay lands are considered best for small grain, especially oats, as they are cold and their cotton crops are late in maturing. A large portion, probably one-third of these lands under cultivation, is devoted to cotton. The disintegration of the quartz, feldspar and mica of the gray gneiss rocks produce a loose, sandy, gray soil, more or less clayey, and covered or mixed with gravel and loose quartz rock. The subsoil is usually a yellowish clay. The surface of the country covered by the gray lands is always more or less rolling and hilly, but has broad, level areas either on the ridges or in the valleys. The slopes of the ridges are so gradual as not to interfere with their successful cultivation, excepting of course in the more mountainous districts. Their light, sandy nature makes them very liable, when opened up to cultivation, to wash into gullies and flood the lowlands with sand. There is comparatively little of the gray lands too broken for cultivation outside of the Blue Ridge mountain region. The soils are coarse, gray and sandy, frequently colored dark for an inch or two with decayed vegetation, are more or less gravelly, from three to twelve inches deep and have a yellow, clayey subsoil. From this intermixture of the soil and subsoil in cultivation a yellow mulatto soil is obtained.

Of the gray lands under cultivation, from one-half to two-thirds is devoted to the culture of cotton. Though these lands are said to produce late crops of cotton, they are preferred to the red clays as being more productive and because they enable the stalk to stand the drought better. They are also easy to till, and a larger area can be cultivated than of the red lands with the same labor. Fresh lands yield from 500 to 700 pounds of seed cotton per acre, as do also old lands by the aid of fertilizers; without fertilizers the latter yield 250 or 300 pounds of seed cotton per acre. Large and small areas of gray, sandy soils, having out-cropping, underlying granite rocks, are found in many counties of the Metamorphic region, but chiefly in the southern half and cover about 2,600 square miles. The surface of the country is generally rolling and broken, with sharply-defined and rounded hills in localities which have the granite boulders or rounded masses, and broad, level areas when only the flat rock underlies the land. The soil is often a coarse, gray or gravelly sand from three to six inches deep, with a subsoil of yellow or red clay more or less sandy, or sometimes a whitish, impervious clay. The soils are cold, but are easily tilled and well adapted to cotton culture. About two per cent. of the entire granite lands of the state are untillable, either from their broken character or because of the exposure of the granite or its near approach to the surface. The yield per acre on these lands is about 800 pounds of seed cotton when fresh and unmanured. Cultivation reduces the yield to 350 pounds of seed cotton per acre. A notable feature in the soils of the granite region is the increase of both potash and lime over that of other Metamorphic soils, both derived doubtless from the feldspars of the granite.

In the high and mountainous districts of the Blue Ridge region, especially in Towns and Rabun counties, there is comparatively a small amount of the land suitable for tillage. The farms are small and are found principally along the water courses. In the entire group of ten counties the average of land under cultivation is only seventy-nine acres per square mile. The lands have a dark or red loam soil, very rich and durable; those of the Little Tennessee valley in Rabun county being especially noted for fertility and excellence; but in those counties which lie chiefly outside, or south and west of the mountains, the lands are gray, sandy and gravelly, with a yellow or red clay subsoil. Cotton is not cultivated because of the distance from market, want of transportation facilities, severe climate and short seasons. In the counties of Franklin, Hart, Madison, Banks, Hall, Forsyth, Cherokee and Pickens, south of the Blue Ridge counties, the acreage in cultivation is about thirty-eight per cent.

The lands north of the Chattahoochee river on the northeast have almost entirely gray, sandy soils with but few strips of red clay. The subsoils are almost universally clays. The yield per acre with fair cultivation is: Corn, twenty bushels; wheat, fifteen bushels; oats, twenty-five bushels; hay, two to three tons; sorghum syrup, seventy-five gallons. Tobacco, buckwheat and German millet can be grown with great success. The fruits adapted to this section are the apple, pear, cherry, grape, plum, peach, raspberry and strawberry. In that part of the Metamorphic region geographically called "Middle Georgia," cotton, corn, oats, wheat, all the grains and grasses and tobacco can be grown successfully. This division was settled after the coast country and has long been the most populous section of the state. The exhaustion of the soil by injudicious culture has reduced the yield, and the yield of the ordinary crops per acre is: Corn, twelve bushels; wheat, eight bushels; oats, twenty-five bushels; barley, thirty bushels; rye, eight bushels; sweet potatoes, one hundred bushels. In the northern counties, near the Blue Ridge, the acreage in cotton is naturally small. Southward the acreage increases rapidly, until it reaches the percentage of the total area of ten or fifteen per cent. on the east and fifteen to twenty per cent on the west, with Clayton, Pike and Troup above twenty per cent.

The Central Cotton Belt.—There are three distinct belts within the central cotton belt, differing very widely from each other. These are: First, the sand hills and pine belt on the north and bordering the Metamorphic region of the state; its sands also extending northward and covering some of its rocks. Second, the red hills adjoining the first belt on the south. Third, the sandy loam upland with clay subsoils, forming a transition belt from the red hills to the sandy wiregrass region of the south and gradually falling in elevation from the hills to the level lands of the latter.

The northern limit of the sand and pine hill belt extends from a very few miles north of Augusta and Thomson, a few miles south of Warrenton and Sparta, to Milledgeville, Macon, Knoxville, Geneva and Columbus, at which point the Metamorphic rocks are found outcropping in the beds of the streams, while the sand hills extend northward a short distance along the uplands. The southern limit is defined by the somewhat abrupt clay hills along its border. The area embraced in the sand hills is about 2,950 square miles. Its width varies greatly, but is greatest on the east and west, about twenty-five miles from each of the large boundary rivers. Between the Ogeechee and the Flint rivers it is rather narrow, but widens to the west to twenty-five miles or more in the counties of Marion and Taylor. On the Chattahoochee river its southern limit is near the mouth of Upatoi creek. The surface of the country embraced in this belt is high and rolling, and especially is this the case near its northern limit, where the altitude is from 500 to 600 feet above the sea and sometimes 100 feet or more above the metamorphic region adjoining. Southward the country falls to the foot of the line of red hills, which often rise abruptly from its limit. In other localities, as between the Flint and the Ocmulgee rivers, the lower part of the belt presents a broad plateau which gradually declines southward. In the western portion of the belt the transition of the red hills is gradual. The country is hilly and broken, with a height of from 100 to 150 feet above the streams, and is interspersed with deep gullies formed by the washing away of clays and sands. The lands of the sand hill region have a soil of white sand from six to twelve inches deep, and usually a sandy subsoil underlaid by variegated clays, and are not very productive except where fresh or highly fertilized. The yield of cotton after a few years of cultivation will not exceed 300 pounds of seed cotton per acre. The red hills region is characterized by a high, rolling or broken and well-timbered surface, covered with deep red clay lands, more or less sandy. The red lands are very generally associated with siliceous shell rocks and friable ferruginous sandstones, and are found in isolated areas over the entire yellow loam region. The beds have a thickness of sixty feet at Shell bluff on the Savannah river and fifty feet at Fort Gaines on the Chattahoochee, but between these two points they thin out to ten or twenty feet as they approach the central Atlantic and gulf-water divide.

The lands of these red and clay hills are usually somewhat sandy and have a depth of from twelve to twenty-four inches in the eastern counties and from six to twelve inches in the others. The subsoil is a heavy clay loam, deeper in color than the soil and more clayey, which sometimes overlies a variegated and plastic pipe-clay. The lands of this belt lying on the Savannah and Flint rivers are the best of this region, and not only occur in large areas, but are more productive and durable and easily tilled. The subsoil is stiff and tenacious and hard to break up. The lands yield from 800 to 1,000 pounds of seed cotton per acre when fresh, and 500 pounds after a few years' cultivation. After being in cultivation fifty years it yields 300 pounds per acre. These lands are preferred for small grain.

The yellow loam region forms a belt across the state between the Savannah and Chattahoochee rivers, and extends in width from the sand hills south to the pine barrens and wiregrass region. Its width varies greatly. Between the Savannah and the Ocmulgee it is narrow and confined almost entirely to the country south of the red hills from fifteen to twenty-five miles. Westward to the Flint river it is wider, and in Houston county the lands are found north of the red hills. On the west the area widens still more, one narrow belt extending southwest to Albany, while the lower limit of the rest of the region extends to the Alabama line, a few miles north of Fort Gaines, and the northern passes west to the Alabama line at the mouth of Upatoi creek. The entire area embraced by the yellow loam region, including the red hills, is about 6,650 square miles. The soils of the eastern part of the belt are gray and sandy, except on the immediate surface, where they are dark from decayed vegetation. Black, brown and yellow ferruginous gravel is abundant in some of the counties on the surface and mixed with the soil. The subsoil, at a depth of from three to nine inches from the surface, is either a yellow clay loam or yellow sand. Lands having the latter are poor and unproductive, except for a year or two, and the use of fertilizers is almost a necessity. The growth is almost exclusively the long-leaf pine. The better class of soils, with their clay subsoils and a mixed growth of long-leaf pine, oak and hickory, are easy to cultivate and well drained, and yield an average of 500 pounds of seed cotton per acre when fresh and 250 to 300 pounds after a cultivation of ten years. The upper counties, and those along the Chattahoochee river as far south as Clay county, are hilly and usually covered with a heavy deposit of sand. Underneath the sandy soil are the red and yellow clays over variegated and joint clays with cretaceous marls.

Southern Oak, Hickory and Pine Region.—The area embraced in this region is 2,317 square miles, comprising portions of the counties of Brooks, Decatur and Thomas, lying along and near the Florida line. The country for the most part is high and rolling, and is about 75 feet above the wiregrass country on the north or 130 feet above the river. It presents a bolder front to that region in Decatur county than in the other counties; the ascent from a point seven miles south of Bainbridge thence eastward to near Attapulgas and northward to Climax being quite abrupt. Eastward it gradually assumes the wiregrass feature and the line of separation is not so well marked. The surface of the country for the most part is very open, with a tall timber growth of long pine. The soil is very generally sandy, from six to twelve inches deep, with mostly a clayey subsoil, underlaid by white limestone. A peculiar feature of this region is the presence of a red clay loam in localities where the timber growth is oak and hickory. The yield is from 600 to 800 pounds of seed cotton per acre after four years' cultivation.

Lowlands of the Central Belt.—The bottoms and hammocks of the streams and gallberry flats comprise the lowlands of the central belt. The bottoms of the larger streams are usually liable to yearly overflows and are, therefore, but little in cultivation. Their width varies from 209 to 1,500 yards and even more in the sharp bends of the streams. The soil is a dark loam, more or less sandy, red in some of the streams and from one foot to six feet deep to a tenacious pipe-clay. On the Chattahoochee river there is but little bottom land proper, the uplands approaching to the water's edge and forming bluffs. Corn and oats are the chief crops, as cotton crops on all of the bottom lands are liable to injury from early frosts and rust. The gallberry flats are lowlands along the very small streams which have a light sandy soil and a dense growth of gallberry bushes about three feet high and a large growth of cassine and a few cypress. They are somewhat marshy and are not cultivated. The hammocks, or second bottoms of the larger streams, are very extensive. They are very level and have a growth similar to the bottoms. The soil is rich, sandy loam from twelve to twenty-four inches deep, with much decayed vegetation, and is considered the most productive lands of the belt. When fresh the hammocks yield 1,400 pounds of seed cotton per acre, and after cultivation for a few years from 800 to 1,000 pounds. Heavy clay underlies these lands, and as they are cold and ill-drained, they are not considered the best for cotton, as that crop is liable to injury from early frosts and rust.

The alluvial lands of the Savannah river are very level and wide. The soil is fine, brown loam mixed with scales of mica, is from two to three feet deep, with a putty-like, tenacious pipe-clay which is hard to till and breaks up in clods. These lands are well adapted to cotton, corn and grain. On fresh land the yield is 1,500 pounds of seed cotton per acre, and after a few years' cultivation 1,000 pounds. Along the Chattahoochee river, south from Columbus to Georgetown, there are many level valleys of open prairie occupying a position similar to the second bottoms of the other streams, higher but without their growth. In Muscogee county these valleys are very broad and open, and have a very fine, sandy, loam soil from five to twelve inches deep and a heavy clay subsoil. In the counties south, where the blue clay marls approach near the surface these prairie valleys are richer, the soil being darker and more tenacious. The sand and red clays of the adjoining hills enter more or less into its composition. In the southwestern part of Stewart county this valley is two or more miles wide. These lands when fresh yield from 800 to 1,200 pounds of seed cotton per acre, and after ten years of tillage from 600 to 800 pounds.

Long-Leaf Pine and Wiregrass Region.—The region of the long-leaf pine and wiregrass covers a large portion of southern Georgia, south of the oak and hickory pine lands of the central cotton belt, extending from the Savannah river on the east to the Chattahoochee on the west, including in its area eighteen whole counties and large parts of others. The entire region is, as it were, a vast plain nearly level, except in the north, and covered with a growth of long-leaf pine. The surface of the upper and western portions of this region is somewhat undulating, with a few long ridges or hills, and is elevated from twenty-five to fifty, or even seventy-five feet above the streams and from 200 to 500 feet above the sea.

The Lime-Sink Region.—The lime-sink region lies chiefly on the west of the Atlantic and the gulf-water divide. The soft limestone underlying this section, instead of sandstone, is accompanied on the surface and sometimes in beds, by masses of a siliceous and aluminous and often flinty shell-rock. The eastern limit is marked by a line of low ridges branching off southward from the main divide and separating the water of the Allapaha and Withlacoochee rivers from those of the Flint river. This line passes through the eastern side of Worth and Colquitt counties and southeastward into Brooks and Lowndes. The region embraces 7,020 square miles and includes the following counties and parts of counties: Screven, except a strip along the eastern and northern side of the county; the lower part of Burke, the upper part of Bulloch, all of Miller, Mitchell, Colquitt and Worth; the southern part of Pulaski, Dougherty, Baker and Early; the northern part of Decatur, Thomas, Brooks and Lowndes; the eastern part of Dooly, Lee and Dougherty and the western part of Irwin, Berrien, Dodge and Wilcox. This is a better cotton-producing region than the pine barrens, and Decatur county was at one time the banner county in total production. Four per cent. of the land is irreclaimable swamp and twenty-six per cent. of the remainder has been cleared. The uplands, with their long-leaf pine and wiregrass, have a gray, sandy soil, which is from six to twelve inches deep and a red or yellow, sandy clay subsoil, and contains some ferruginous gravel. These lands are not as productive or as durable as in other sections and the country is so sparsely settled that the farms are located on the better classes of land. At first these lands yield from 500 to 800 pounds of seed cotton per acre, but after cultivation for eight or ten years without fertilizers the yield is reduced to 350 or 500 pounds. The bottom lands lying along the rivers and hammocks of the creeks have a dark, loamy soil with a clay subsoil at the depth of from ten to twenty inches. They are very durable and yield when fresh from 800 to 1,000 pounds of seed cotton per acre, and nearly the same after several years of cultivation.

The Pine Barrens.—The pine barrens proper cover an area of over 10,000 square miles and include parts of the following counties: Tattnall, Montgomery, Emanuel, Telfair, Appling, Coffee, Effingham, Bulloch, Johnson, Laurens, Wilcox, Irwin, Berrien, Lowndes, Pierce, Wayne, McIntosh, Liberty and Bryan, and areas of Jefferson, Washington, Dodge, Ware and Clinch. It has a general level or slightly undulating surface and is underlaid in many places by a sandstone that juts out in bold bluffs in some of the streams. The soil is usually fine and sandy, with a yellow, sandy subsoil, though clay frequently underlies it. The surface of the country in the upper counties is undulating, but becomes quite level southward; the soil also becomes less sandy. The land contains much ferruginous gravel or brown pebbles. The wiregrass region terminates near the coast, forming the second terrace. From this terrace there is a descent of fifteen to twenty-five feet to the savannas and pine flat and palmetto lands. While this is not properly a cotton-growing section, about eighteen of the counties are devoted to the culture of cotton. The introduction of fertilizers has made the cultivation of cotton profitable and to some extent has broken up the old method of throwing away old lands and taking in new. Six per cent. of this area is irreclaimable swamp and only fifteen per cent. has been cleared for cultivation. The soil of the uplands is sandy and gray or ash-colored, twelve inches deep and has a subsoil of yellow or orange-colored loam. In the higher regions there is sometimes a clay subsoil approaching the surface, giving to the land greater fertility and durability as indicated by the oak and hickory growth. The soil is frequently covered with gravel, either of quartz or ferruginous concretions, yellow or of dark brown externally and either smooth or rough, with a black exterior. These sandy soils, while producing a good crop of cotton when new and fresh, very soon wear out. On fresh sandy uplands, without the aid of fertilizers, the yield is 500 pounds of seed cotton per acre. After cultivation for several years the yield diminishes to 300 pounds of seed cotton per acre. Corn, oats and sorghum do very well. In some counties the bottom lands are considered better than the uplands, but are more or less liable to overflow. In the northern section, owing to the liability of cotton to suffer from rust and early frosts, corn is raised instead. The soil is very sandy and colored nearly black by decayed leaves and other vegetation. Its depth is twelve inches or more, and it is sometimes underlaid by clay. The second bottoms of hammocks differ from the bottom only in being above overflow.

Pine and Palmetto Flats.—Lying in the southeastern part of the state, around Okefenokee swamp, and embracing mainly the counties of Charlton, Clinch and Echols and large portions of Pierce, Ware and Wayne, is the region designated as the pine and palmetto flats. It is considerably higher than the belt of the coast region that extends across other counties to the Savannah river. The country is very level and open and sparsely settled, and is covered with many swamps having a dense growth of trees, all interlocked and frequently tied together with bamboo briers, forming an impenetrable thicket. This region is about 125 feet above the sea, the descent being very rapid on the east from Okefenokee swamp to Trader's hill at the head of the tide-water on St. Mary's river. Hence there is a level second terrace to the edge of the savanna lands, fifteen miles east of Colerain. This terrace is covered in places with deep, white sand, and is very similar to the third or Okefenokee uplands. But little cotton is planted in this entire section. The lands are sandy though firm and the roots of the saw palmetto not only make traveling disagreeable, almost forbidding the use of four-wheel vehicles, but give trouble in farming operations. The lands wear out rapidly. In the swamps the white, sandy bottoms are covered with a muck several inches deep, while streams of dark and even black water flow sluggishly among the roots and cypress knees and across open spaces. The creek bottom lands and hammocks of this pine flat region are not very wide and have a dark loam soil from eight to twelve inches deep, with a clayey subsoil underlaid by a blue stratum of clay. This latter is found in the wells of the uplands north of Homerville in Clinch county, at a depth of nine feet from the surface. These lands, while considered the best for cotton, are not devoted to its culture except in a limited area, because of the danger to it from early frosts.

Savannas.—The region properly designated the savannas occupies a belt of country from ten to fifteen miles wide, between the pine barrens and the wiregrass region on one side and the coast live-oak lands on the other, extends from the Savannah river to the St. Mary's river and embraces nearly all parts of the counties of Chatham, Bryan, Glynn and Camden and large portions of Liberty and McIntosh. The surface of the country is very level and ten or fifteen feet above tide-water and comprises what is known as the first terrace. Its northwestern limit is the bluff of the second or wiregrass terrace, passing through the lower part of Effingham county, twenty miles north of the city of Savannah, into Bryan county, where it is fifty feet high. Southward through Liberty county this bluff forms the gravel hill south of Hinesville, which has an elevation of fifteen to thirty feet above the sea; deep-sea sands are found here. Thence the limit extends through McIntosh county to Waynesville and on the eastern side of the Satilla river into and across Camden county at a distance of about fifteen miles east of Colerain. At this last point this rise is twenty-five feet. Within this region adjoining the marsh lands there is a belt of live-oak lands having a width of several miles which properly belongs to the savannas. This region along the first or lower terrace is noted for its beautiful meadow lands, which are broad, flat and open plains, having no growth other than sparse and tall long-leaf pine, flat and thick undergrowth of saw palmetto, with here and there bunches of wiregrass that have found its way down from the upper terrace. The savannas at one time covered a large portion of these counties, but the custom of burning off the lands to cause a growth of young grass for grazing purposes has also produced a scrub undergrowth of trees and bushes. The soils and subsoils outside of the live-oak lands are sandy and are not cultivated to any extent.

Live-Oak and Coast Lands.—From the Savannah river to the St. Mary's river, along the coast as well as occupying the islands, there is an irregular and interrupted bed of yellow or mulatto sandy lands about ten miles wide, whose characteristic feature is the growth of very large live-oak trees. There are properly three divisions of this live-oak belt, viz.: upland or ridge, middle or lower bottom lands, each comprising about one-third of the area. The first has sandy soils and subsoils, which are not remunerative. The bottoms are very rich and have a dark soil underlaid by a blue clay. They are adapted to sea-island cotton, the yield being 400 pounds of seed cotton per acre.

Coast Tide Swamp Land.—Occupying a narrow belt along the Atlantic coast, not continuous, but bordering on the various inlets and streams to the limit of tide-water is the region of the coast tide swamp land. On the Savannah river the bodies of tide swamp land are extensive and are cultivated upward of twenty miles from the brackish marsh up the river. On the Altamaha river these lands equal in width those of the Savannah river, but from the marshes upward their extent does not exceed sixteen miles, where the freshets forbid their being of any value except for timber. The soil is more of decayed vegetable mold than the land of the Savannah river and is more easily cultivated. The tide lands of the Ogeechee river extend from the marshes about ten miles. Those of the Satilla river, not as broad as those mentioned, extend from the marshes twenty miles up the river and are liable to freshets. On the St. Mary's river the swamp lands on the Georgia side extend only to the foot of the second terrace, fifteen miles east of Colerain, though the tide-water reaches Trader's hill. These are rich lands, devoted almost exclusively to the cultivation of rice, although other crops do well. The black seed of Florida sea-island cotton was at one time the principal crop of these low swamp lands. The soil of these swamp lands along the streams and island is ash-colored and clayey, from one foot to six feet deep to a blue gray stratum. There is very little of what may be properly called sea marsh along the Georgia coast. Very small areas are found at the mouths of some of the rivers.

The Sea Islands.—Along the coast there lies from one end to the other a perfect network of islands, large and small, having a rolling surface, not exceeding fifteen feet above the tide. Their united area amounts to 560 square miles. The soil is usually sandy and well-adapted to the production of sea island cotton, corn and sweet potatoes, and lemons, figs, pomegranates, olives, oranges grow finely. Formerly these soils yielded 400 pounds of sea-island cotton per acre, but the introduction of commercial fertilizers has caused more attention to be paid to the cultivation of upland or short staple cotton.

The Limestone Region.—Economic geology gives a knowledge of the soils and the distribution of the mineral fertilizers, which is essential in forming a correct judgment as to the measure of progress. The limestones and calcareous shales form the brown and red loams. These lands are perhaps the richest uplands in the state. They lie well, but when hilly they are inclined to wash. The blue limestone areas are on the eastern and western sides, and the rotten limestones in the central part of this division of the state. In the blue limestone region the soil varies in color from a light to a dark brown and black, a dark or chocolate brown being the most characteristic color, with a subsoil approaching to red. The soil of the rotten limestone belts is a dark red color, with a red subsoil. There is a striking difference in the appearance of these lands, though in the more important characteristics of productiveness and in adaptation to various crops there is little difference. Lands that have been in cultivation for thirty years or more will often produce from thirty to fifty bushels of corn per acre. For the culture of wheat these lands are not so well adapted, yet, by the growing of clover and turning under the crop, a yield from ten to twenty bushels of wheat per acre is possible. Cotton in the counties of Floyd and Polk yields on an average 600 pounds of seed cotton per acre. In the regions where the rocks are of limestones, arenaceous shales and siliceous or cherry limestones, the lands are rolling generally, but sometimes nearly level where the valleys are broad, the soil being brown, calcareous and siliceous or sandy, with sufficient clay in the subsoil to give it a somewhat retentive character, and admit of good drainage, even where the lands are nearly level. The areas of this character are in the valleys immediately around Lookout, Pigeon and Sand mountains, in the broad valleys immediately east of Taylor's ridge and of Horn's mountain, in the following valleys: West Armuchee, in Walker county; Sugar valley, in Gordon county; Dirt town, in Chattooga county; Texas, with a large portion of the county to the west of Coosa river, in Floyd county. These are the best uplands for the culture of cotton in this part of the state, often yielding, without commercial fertilizers, from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds of seed cotton per acre. Corn, oats and wheat do well. In Dade county, along the eastern side of Lookout mountain and around Pigeon mountain, in Walker county, the soil is yellow or orange colored, rather argillaceous in character, though there is an admixture of fine sand and gravel that renders it easy of tillage. The rocks consist of green calcareous shales that outcrop in the hills or on the slopes of the ridges around these mountains, and the lands to which they give rise are rich. The steepness of the slopes and character of the soil predisposes the land to wash, rendering horizontal hillside plowing necessary. These lands are well adapted to corn and wheat.

There are in Georgia about 400 square miles underlaid by a series of shales or indurated clay and limestones 2,500 feet in thickness and occupying in belts of from half a mile to two or three miles in width, and found in all the counties of the limestone region, except in Dade county. The soil is argillaceous and of an orange or light color, the entire area nearly being slightly rolling or nearly level lands. It contains more clay in general than most of the good lands of this region, but is more or less calcareous, and contains a sufficient amount of sand or fine gravels derived in part from bordering cherty ridges, to promote easy culture. The clay beneath the soil has varying depths from a foot or two to fifteen feet down to the shales, but rarely less than four or five feet. These lands rank as about third-rate upland for the culture of cotton; with fertilizers they yield 500 pounds of seed cotton per acre. Corn, oats, wheat, clover and the grasses grow well, and on land that has been cultivated for thirty years, with little if any return to the soil for its improvement, an average of twenty bushels of corn, ten bushels of oats and six bushels of wheat per acre will be obtained. These lands are capable of a high degree of improvement.

Gray Gravelly Lands of the Ridges.—The gray lands of the ridges have a gravelly soil, varying in color from light to dark gray, with generally a porous gravelly subsoil; but in some places there is a good clay subsoil, with a gravelly soil of a brown or red color. These lands are among the most profitable for the culture of cotton, giving a better immediate return for manures than the richer valley lands. The cotton crop is less subject to injury from continued wet weather in the spring than on most other soils, and come to maturity early, rarely failing to open well. With the use of fertilizers the production is 1,200 pounds of seed cotton per acre. Except in the very rainy seasons corn does not do so well after a few years' cultivation. Wheat, when fertilizers are used, tills well and matures better developed grain, and is less subject to disaster than in the richer valley lands. Although these lands are hilly, they are less liable to injury from washing than most of the uplands, being protected by the pervious character of the soil, and the gravel and small stones with which the surface is covered. The tops and slopes of the ridges have an immunity from late spring frosts, making them well suited to fruit culture. These lands are remarkably rich in potash and phosphoric acid, and a sufficiency of lime to insure their availability for the present.

Sandy Lands of the Mountain Summits.—On the tablelands from 1,000 to 1,200 feet above the valleys the soils are yellow, sandy land, more or less gravelly and rocky. The total area of these lands is 200 square miles, embracing Sand mountain in Dade county, Lookout mountain in Chattooga, Walker and Dade counties, and Little Sand mountain in Chattooga county. The topography varies from nearly level to rolling and hilly. Owing to the average low temperature it is not suitable for the culture of cotton, but is well adapted to the culture of fruit and a great variety of vegetables.

The Flatwoods.—The topography is diversified with mountains, hills, and nearly level flatwoods. The soils everywhere are of one general character of sterility. The most extensive area of these lands is that of the flatwoods near the Oostanaula and Coosa rivers, in the counties of Floyd, Gordon and Polk, and a mountainous section south of the Coosa river, in Floyd and Polk counties. It occurs again in a belt of hills in the southern part of Murray county, extending southward nearly across the county of Gordon, and in a narrow belt extending southward from the eastern part of Catoosa county into Whitfield county. The soil is thin, of a gray or light-brown color, with but little depth, and of little value for cultivation.

Alluvial Lands.—In the mountains, where the streams are rapid, the alluvial lands have little extent, but in the valleys the creek and river bottoms are comparatively broad. The bottom lands vary from one-eighth of a mile on small streams to two miles on the larger ones, the greater part of their width being generally on the western side of the stream. The alluvial deposits of the small streams vary much in character, those of the larger ones in general being more productive. Where a large proportion of sand is contained in these alluvial lands, cotton has been grown with success. Some of the best cotton lands in this part of the state are along the Coosa and Etowah rivers.

THE CROPS OF GEORGIA.

The adaptability of Georgia to successful diversified agricultural pursuits is evidenced by her geographical position and geological formation. Elevations and longitude help each other in supplying a range of climate and productions. The productions, both natural and cultivated, are varied, and the ranges between the coast and mountains very great. Cotton, corn, wheat, oats, rye, barley, rice, sugarcane, sweet potatoes, Irish potatoes, melons, peas, ground peas, vegetables of all kinds, all kinds of grasses and forage crops, oranges, figs, bananas, apples, pears, plums, peaches, cherries, grapes, berries and nuts are produced in Georgia.

Indian Corn.—How long prior to 1540 Indian corn was cultivated in Georgia history does not give us any data. Ferdinand De Soto in his "marching through Georgia" was given thousands of bushels of Indian corn by the Indians, who then occupied a portion of the soil of Georgia. Even with the crude system of culture employed by the Indians the soil made handsome returns. With good seasons and proper culture a fair crop is always possible. The following authenticated yields have been reported: 125 bushels per acre in Cobb county, 123 bushels in Wilkes county, 119 bushels in Thomas county, 115 bushels in Crawford county, 100 bushels in Gwinnett, Walker and Hall.

Oats.—While very much depends upon the season in the cultivation of oats, it is a very important and valuable crop. The following yields have been reported by reliable parties: 137 bushels per acre in Wilkes county, 131 bushels in De Kalb county, 121 bushels in Floyd county, 115 bushels in Coweta county, 100 bushels in Schley county, and 75 bushels in Brooks, Newton, and Putnam counties.

Wheat.—Before the system of railroad transportation was introduced the culture of wheat was conducted on a more extended scale in Georgia than for the last few years, and the return was remunerative. That wheat can be produced here profitably is evidenced by the experience of many. Among the yields reliably reported are: 65 bushels per acre in De Kalb county, 40 bushels in Carroll county, and 28 bushels in Cherokee, Walton, Clark and Morgan counties.

Sweet Potatoes.—Sweet potatoes can be grown in almost any section of Georgia to the profit of the grower, especially in the middle and southern parts of the state. Authenticated yields are reported as follows: 800 bushels per acre in Berrien county, 600 in Richmond county, 500 in Brooks county, 400 in Fulton county.

Irish Potatoes.—The culture of Irish potatoes in Georgia yields fair returns for the labor employed. In Wilkes county a yield of 420 bushels per acre is reported, 108 bushels in Walker county, 100 bushels in Rabun. In the vicinity of Savannah the truck farmers grow them on an extensive scale for market.

Rice.—Along the coast of Georgia rice has been cultivated for many years with decided profit to the producers. On the uplands its culture is growing in favor and extending in territory. One hundred bushels per acre is reported in Pike, White, Hall, Talbot, and Early counties.

Clover Hay.—Clover can be grown with success. As an evidence of this fact there are yields reported of 10,000 pounds of clover hay in DeKalb and Greene counties, 6,000 pounds in Cobb county, and 4,862 pounds in Hancock county.

Other Hay.—The adaptability of Georgia soil to the growing of the grasses and forage plants is a settled fact. In Bibb county 8,046 pounds of crab grass was gathered from an acre. In Spalding county 10,720 pounds of peavine hay, in Greene county 13,953 pounds of Bermuda grass hay, in Gordon county 9,400 pounds of lucerne were housed as the product of a single acre each.

Syrup and Sugar.—That syrup and sugar can be produced on the soil of Georgia from the ribbon cane and sorghum is well known. The following yields from the ribbon cane are reported: Six hundred and ninety-four and a half gallons from one acre in Thomas county, 700 gallons in Bulloch county, 600 gallons in Thomas county, and 480 gallons in Burke county. In sugar 21 barrels per acre in Bulloch county.

Cotton.—Cotton is the most extensively cultivated crop in Georgia. The following yields of seed cotton before it is ginned are reported: 6,917 pounds per acre in Washington county, 4,595 pounds per acre in Troup county, 4,500 pounds per acre in the counties of Clay, Schley, Carroll and Burke; 4,000 pounds per acre in Crawford county, 3,500 pounds per acre in Bulloch, 2,700 pounds in Brooks, 2,200 pounds in Coweta and 2,000 pounds in De Kalb.

The value of the cotton crop has been materially increased in consequence of the utilization of the cotton seed in the production of oil, meal and hulls. Between the years 1874 and 1894 the farmers of Georgia used $100,000,000 worth of commercial fertilizers, which vast sum had to be paid out of the proceeds of the cotton crop.

Tobacco.—Tobacco has never been a staple crop in Georgia, yet repeated tests have demonstrated that it can be successfully and profitably grown. The great drawback to the successful culture has been and is at present the want of convenient warehouses and proper barns. In 1842 141,523 pounds were grown in Georgia; in 1880, 228,590 pounds, and in 1890 263,752 pounds. In 1786 a tobacco warehouse was erected by Dionysius Oliver in the fork between Broad and Savannah rivers, near the town of Petersburg.

Average Annual Productions.—The lack of adequate and reliable data as to the gross annual productions of the state renders it almost impossible to give the correct figures. The best possible information, however, fixes the average annual productions as follows: Cotton, from 750,000 to 950,000 bales; corn, 30,000,000 bushels; oats, 5,000,000 bushels; wheat, 3,000,000 bushels; sweet potatoes, 5,000,000 bushels; rice, 35,000,000 bushels.

Compared with Italy.—In respect to climate there is great resemblance between that of Italy and Georgia. The soil and climate of Italy are congenial to the staples which have engaged the attention of Georgia agriculturists. Indian corn and rice have long been grown by the Italians, and during the continental system of Napoleon the culture of cotton was commenced in the south of Italy, but abandoned with the fall of that system and its author. That silk, wine and oil can be made on Georgia soil as well as in Italy is a settled fact.

The soil of Georgia is capable of sustaining as large a population to the square mile as that of Italy. The Italians have been successful in solving the problem of how to gather the largest portions of the most valuable products from a given surface of land in any given number of years. In the northern part of Italy the three divisions of her system are often displayed at one view—the plain, the hill and mountain farms. The grape and the olive are seen clustering in the richest abundance on the highest and bleakest spots. Golden harvests of corn are to be seen on the sides of the hills and the most luxuriant meadows on the plain. A specially notable fact is that the sides of the hills are girdled by terraces of the most substantial masonry. Did this prevail in Georgia the lands would be benefited and the yield increased.

Defects in Georgia Agriculture.—Prior to 1860 the aim of the cotton planter was to get the cream of the soil converted into cotton, and then abandon the fields used for fresher soil. It was the general rule to “clear up more land to purchase more slaves” and “to purchase more slaves to clear up more land.” The improvement of the soil was not considered. After the “War Between the States” the planter had to begin anew, without anything save the soil and without slave labor. Under the system that existed before 1860 the planter made his supplies on his farm, but under the new order of things the planter had to obtain his supplies on time, and gradually a system was adopted, pernicious in its influence and disastrous in its results, viz.: purchasing supplies and fertilizers on time, and depending upon one cotton crop to pay off the entire indebtedness. Under the operation of this system the fertility of the soil has been nearly exhausted, the cost of production increased, and the condition of the farmer made worse. Improvement cannot possibly obtain under such a pernicious system.

Needs of Georgia Agriculture.—Agriculture in Georgia needs for its full development the inauguration of a system based on improvement of the soil as the primal consideration. The development of the fertility of the soil is possible when there exists a soil. The thorough tillage and pulverization of the earth is the first step to secure increased fertility in the soil. The judicious terracing of hillsides and lands subject to washing away is important to preserve the soil of fields in cultivation. Diversified and intensive farming are essential factors in improving the condition of the soil and those who till it. Rotation of crops, and the planting of crops suitable to the location of the particular plat of land, will be found of great practical benefit. The limit of the productive capacity of an acre of Georgia soil has never been reached or determined. A system that will return to the soil more fertility than has been taken from it and keep and maintain it in proper condition at all seasons will enable the farmer to approximate the capacity of the soil to produce. The possibilities of Georgia soil under a wise and comprehensive system are great.

MANUFACTURING IN GEORGIA.

Silk Raising.—The policy that led to the establishment of the royal colony of Georgia was the same that in ancient times led to the founding of Carthage by the mother cities of Tyre and Sidon. England wanted to increase her trade and her power. She was contesting with Spain the supremacy of land and sea; and she was engaged in her long and marvelous struggle, decided a century ago in her favor, for the commerce of the world. Spanish fleets from the West Indies continually threatened the devastation of her colonies along the Atlantic coast, and she was paying to Piedmont $3,000,000 annually for importation of silk. It was thought by English statesmen that a colony founded to the south of Charleston could be made to perform the double duty of setting bounds to Spanish aggression from the martial province of Florida, and of transferring the silk trade with Piedmont to the American plantations. With the military feature of the colony we are not concerned in this sketch; but the attempt to establish the silk industry in Georgia is of peculiar interest, because it is the beginning of our history of manufacturing, and because of the vast expectations and visions of remunerative commerce it excited in English minds. It was the heroic age of American industry; and although the production of silk in the plantations was doomed to an early fate, it bears for us the charm of being one of the chief causes that led to the foundation of Georgia, and presents to our imagination all the elements of romance.

It was the dream of English economists that the mother country could save millions of sterling annually if the American colony would produce silk. Joshua Gee, a noted populist, had written: "As this nation (England) very much inclines to the wearing of silk garments in imitation of the French, to the great discouragement of our woolen manufactures, the manufacture of silk from our plantations would not only make us to supply ourselves, but to be capable of exporting very great quantities of silk fully manufactured."

Twelve years after the founding of Jamestown, Va., eggs of the silk worm were sent to that colony, and the cultivation of mulberry trees was enforced by fines and rewarded by bounties. Every planter, by an act of colonial assembly of 1656, was fined if he did not have at least ten mulberry trees to each hundred acres of land. Hartlib, in an essay published in 1652-5 says that the "bottoms," or cocoons, raised in Virginia were so large as to be the wonder of the world; to the glory of the Creator and exaltation of Virginia." But all efforts failed, and the silk industry in Virginia died, partly for want of encouragement from England, and partly from the lack of trained workmen, who were prevented from coming to America by Cromwell's navigation laws. The culture of silk in the Carolinas also met with an early fate. These two colonies exported only 251 pounds of silk in the twenty-five years from 1731 to 1755. When the revolutionary war put a stop to English bounties it also put an end to silk culture. The experiment in Georgia was more successful. When, in 1732, Georgia was separated from Carolina and made a distinct province, it was the aim of the trustees that silk should be raised as the principal article of export. On every ten acres of cleaned land 100 white mulberry trees were to be planted. The colonial seal consisted of a device showing the silk-worms weaving their cocoons and bearing the motto:

Non sibi sed alias. "Not for ourselves but for others." Oglethorpe was of the opinion that 40,000 or 50,000 people might be profitably employed in the silk industry, and that the cost of production would be 25 per cent. less than the cost of its production in Piedmont. In 1734-35 the general carried to England a package of eight pounds of Georgia raised silk, which Sir Thomas Lambe, by the royal command, had woven at his factory. This was made into a robe for Queen Caroline, and worn by her majesty on the king's birthday in 1735. The trustees sent over a number of skilled workers from Piedmont to teach the colonists the art of manufacture. Every colonist had to plant mulberry trees or keep them standing where they had been planted, and liberal bounties were offered by England for the production of silk. This latter greatly stimulated the industry. The colonists soon became very skillful in the business. In 1739, as we find recorded in "An Impartial Inquiry into the State and Utility of the Province of Georgia," printed in London in 1741, "Some was brought over by one Mr. Samuel Auspourquer, who has made an affidavit that he saw the Italian family winding it off from the balls. It was viewed by Mr. Zachary, an eminent raw silk merchant, and Mr. Booth, one of our greatest weavers, who affirmed it to be as fine as any Italian silk, or any they would wish to use, and that it was worth at least twenty shillings per pound." Here we are given an expert opinion upon the quality of Georgia silk.

The muse was summoned to celebrate the triumph of Georgia silk. Upon the occasion of Gen. Oglethorpe's visit to England bearing the eight pounds of silken thread that was thought to be an augury of the success of British trade, the muse did not hesitate to predict a great commerce from the new colony:

"The merchant hence unwrought the silk imports, To which we owe the blaze of queens and courts," which may very probably be an allusion to Queen Caroline's robe of Georgia silk. Another poet prophesied that

"Hence annual vessels shall to Europe sail
With the gay treasures of the silky spoil."

But the colonists must not rest satisfied with the production of a few pounds, and the statesmen and poets of the mother country united in an effort to encourage the colonists to greater activity. The author of "A True and Historical Narrative of the Colony of Georgia" says that they could instance a hundred hackney muses, "but confined themselves to the celebrated performance of the Rev. Samuel Wesley, where we might well expect a sufficient stock of truth and religion to counterbalance of poetical license." After commanding Georgia merchants to "bring wine no more, or from the Iberian or the Tuscan shore," and inviting France herself to "drink her best champagne," as all these were to be produced abundantly in the "young province," Mr. Wesley cautions the general against neglecting the golden possibilities of the silk-worm:

"Nor less the care,
Of thy young province, to oblige the fair;
Here tend the silk-worm in the verdant shade
The frugal matron and the blooming maid."

Under the stimulus of a poetic policy on the part of the statesmen, and a politic poetry on the part of the bards, the colonists devoted their best energies to the production of silk. The town of New Ebenezer, one of the "dead towns" of Georgia, where the "wandering emigrants," as the persecuted Protestants of Salzburg were called, had settled, led in the culture of silk. In 1747 these Salzburgers produced one-half of all the silk of the colony. They continued the industry several years after the other colonists had abandoned it for the more profitable raising of cotton and rice. The reels used by them were of their own manufacture, and were so admirably adapted to the work that one of them was sent to England as a model, and another to the East Indies. The following table, which is compiled from Jones' "Dead Towns," McCall's History, and from the United States census reports, gives the production of silk in Georgia, as far as it can be ascertained, from 1735 to 1772:

SILK PRODUCTION IN GEORGIA.

- 1735—Enough to make a robe for Queen Caroline.
- 1747—847 pounds of cocoons.
- 1748—850 pounds of cocoons (estimated).
- 1749—762 pounds of cocoons and fifty pounds of spun silk.
- 1750—6,300 pounds of cocoons at filature.
- 1750-54—Value of raw silk exported, $8,800.
- 1756—268 pounds of raw silk exported.
- 1757—1,052 pounds of cocoons received at filature.
- 1758—7,040 pounds of cocoons received at filature.
- 1759—Excess of 10,000 pounds of cocoons at Savannah.
- 1764—15,512 pounds of cocoons produced.
- 1766—20,000 pounds of cocoons produced.
- 1768—1,084 pounds raw silk sent to England.
- 1758-68—In ten years 100,000 pounds of cocoons at filature.
- 1770—291 pounds raw silk produced.
- 1771—438 pounds raw silk produced.
- 1772—485 pounds raw silk produced.
- 1755-72—In seventeen years 8,829 pounds of raw silk exported.

It will be seen that the industry reached its most productive period in 1766, when 20,000 pounds of cocoons were produced. From 1770 the industry was confined to New Ebenezer. Operations at the filature in Savannah ceased in 1771, and Sir James Wright, the royal governor, suggested to the common house of assembly in 1774 that the building should be used for some other purpose. The cessation of the royal bounties, which was the immediate result of the war with England, was the finishing stroke, and the prediction ventured upon by Judge Law in his oration at the celebration of the first anniversary of the Georgia Historical society, in 1840, that "silk is doubtless destined to bring again into utility our exhausted soils and greatly to increase the wealth and capital of our state" has not been fulfilled. But the effort to establish the silk trade had given an interesting and instructive page to the history of Georgia, and may serve to teach the needful lesson that bounties and tariffs cannot secure for an industry successful competition with other countries more favorably conditioned for its pursuit.

Among these futile efforts to legislate against the laws of nature and create prosperity by decree, may be mentioned the act of George II., 1749, which provided that raw silk from the American plantations should be admitted free of duty and that Georgia and South Carolina should be known as the "Silk Colonies," a right they have long since forfeited. In 1754 George II. directed that a silver seal should be made for Georgia with the device of a figure presenting a skein of silk to his majesty and the motto: "Hinc laudem sperate coloni." All this royal solicitude was in vain. By the time of the revolution the industry was in its last stages of decay. During that war it is recorded by Thomas McCall that French settlers at New Bordeaux, seventy miles north of Augusta, supplied "much of the high country" with sewing silk spun from their own cocoons. In 1790 two hundred-weight of raw silk was purchased in Georgia for export, the price paid being eighteen to twenty-six shillings a pound. This is the last mention of the silk industry.

GENERAL MANUFACTURES.

The "frugal matron and the blooming maid" no longer tend silk-worms on the white mulberry trees which were the pride of the trustees, the dream of England, and the despair of the colonists. They have turned their hands and cares to more profitable pursuits. It was inevitable that the industry should fail; and it has yielded room for other occupations better suited to our climate, latitude and soil. As soon as Georgia devoted her attention to such industries as were adapted to her condition and resources, she began a development which increases in greater proportion than her population, and which is destined to put her in the foremost rank of the states of the Union. It is an error to suppose, as is too often done, that manufactures were neglected in the "Old South" and that they are of recent development and largely due to the inflow of northern energy since the war. In thousands of homes throughout the south the "frugal matron and the blooming maid," of the Rev. Mr. Wesley's poem, who had abandoned the unprofitable silk reels, spun and wove cotton and wool into clothing for their households. They had laid their hands to the spindle and their hands held the distaff. Cotton manufactories, blomary iron forges, naileries, smithies, and little unpretentious factories, wherein were made the few implements and manufactured articles that were needed in those days of "plain living and high thinking" were springing up everywhere. There is no record of them and the world no longer accepts traditions without sustaining documents. But they were the germs of the stupendous manufacturing industries of the south of to-day, and the greater south of to-morrow.

In 1810, at the third census enumeration, the national government made the first attempt to get statistics of the manufacturing industries of the country. That year, therefore, is the era of manufacture, the dawn of authentic history. It was ascertained by the census that in 1810 the manufactured products of Georgia and the two Carolinas were greater, both in variety and in value, than the manufactured products of all New England. What a change has taken place in eighty years. To-day the south operates 2,774,087 spindles—to limit the comparison to one industry, and the very one in which the south should lead the world—while New England operates more than 12,000,000. From 1810 to 1860 the growth of manufacturing at the south was rapid. In the latter year out of a total value of what was known as home-made manufactures of $24,300,000, the south was credited with $16,500,000. The war not only put a stop to all development, but involved the south in such disaster that manufacturing was impossible. New England eagerly took advantage of the situation. She had capital and labor, the south had neither. The raw products of the south went to New England factories, and the south by reason of helplessness suffered a second spoliation at the hands of her late enemy. Conditions are rapidly changing, however, and the growth of manufacturing is now more marked at the south than it is in any other section of the country. The situation has been admirably summed up by a recent writer who says: "It (the south) has accumulated capital enough to undertake very extensive manufacturing. It has demonstrated that the southern man makes a successful manufacturer and as skilled a mechanic as the northern man or the Englishman, and that the climate is rather advantageous than otherwise to successful and profitable work. In iron, cotton and lumber manufacture it is not a question whether the south can hold its own against other sections, but whether other sections can compete with the south."

What is true of the south is doubly true of Georgia, because in variety of climate, soil, natural resources, products of agriculture, and in the energy and thriftiness of the people she is the heart of the south. She was founded as a manufacturing colony, a history that no other state can boast. She led her sister colonies in the manufacture of silk, and her development since the war has been such as to indicate that she will be the center of southern industries. The list of manufactures in Georgia, as disclosed by the census of 1810, is remarkable. It shows that manufacturing has sprung up in small industries everywhere, and that its extent was very much greater than is generally supposed. As given in the report, the list includes "cotton goods in families, etc., cotton manufacturing establishments, flaxen goods in families, etc., mixed goods and hempen, chiefly mixed; blended and unnamed cloths and stuffs, woolen goods in families, etc.; bagging for cotton or hemp, flaxen and mixed goods, stockings, carding machines, spinning wheels, looms, labor-saving machinery, drawing and roving machines, mules, billies, jennies, looms with fly shuttles, spinning frames, spindles, blomaries, forges, naileries, soap and candles, tanneries, deer-skins, distilleries, breweries, gun-powder mills and saw-mills," which last are classed as "articles of doubtful nature." We can see in this list, which has great historic interest and value, the early beginnings of our manufactures of the present day. We do not find fertilizers, cotton-seed oil and meal, marble, stone, crackers, confections and "patent medicines," which constitute a large proportion of the manufactured products of Georgia at the present time. The first was not needed in the virgin soil, and the others are products created to supply new demands in the world of trade.

The following table shows the growth of Georgia manufactures since 1850, the earliest date from which definite statements are obtainable:

Year.	No. Establishments.	Capital Invested.	Hands Employed.	Wages Paid.	Value Material.	Value Products.
1850	1,422	$5,456,183	8,368	$1,709,664	$3,404,917	$7,082,075
1860	1,890	10,890,875	11,575	2,925,148	9,986,532	16,925,564
1870	3,836	13,930,125	17,871	4,844,508	18,583,751	31,196,115
1880	3,593	20,672,410	24,875	5,266,152	24,143,939	36,440,948
1890	4,285		56,383	17,312,196	35,774,480	68,917,020

From 1880 to 1890, the increase in value of the manufactured product of the United States, was 69.31 per cent. During the same period the increase in the value of these products in Georgia was 90 per cent. In 1880, wages in Georgia were $211.70 per capita; in 1890, $307.04; an increase of 45 per cent. The percentage of increase in wages for the United States for the same period was 39. The increase in population in Georgia during the same decade was 19.14 per cent., showing that the growth of manufacturing is greatly in excess of the growth of the population.

The development in manufacturing was also far greater than the growth of wealth. In 1860, the real and personal property of the south was worth

$6,332,456,289. In 1870, after the loss of all property in slaves, in cotton, in the general devastation of war, the value of all property was $4,401,462,507. The war had cost the south about $2,500,000,000. In 1880, the south had slightly more than recovered her lost ground, and the value of all property was $7,641,000,000. In 1890 the value was $11,534,261,685. Taking this rate of increase as a basis for the estimate, the present value of all property is not less than $15,000,000,000 in 1894. The rate of increase in property is over 50 per cent; while the increase in manufactures in Georgia is 90 per cent. In other words, while the population of Georgia will double in about forty years—at the present rate—the value of all property will double in about twenty years; and the value of manufactures will double in about ten years.

At this point, before we taken up the history and development of separate industries, it will be of interest to consider the general condition of manufacturing in the state in 1860. In that year the state was at its highest point of ante-bellum prosperity. The old order, in which the most prominent features were slavery and the extensive plantations, had more than doubled the wealth of the southern states in a single decade, from 1850 to 1860. It had, possibly, done its greatest work, because the old order was already passing away. For these reasons the condition of every southern state in 1860 will always be the basis for future comparisons to illustrate development and prosperity. In Georgia, in 1860, the true value of all property according to the national census, was $645,895,237. In 1870, it was only $268,169,207. In 1880, it was $606,000,000. In 1890, it was $852,409,449.

The following table shows the condition of manufactures in every county in the state that had any to report, and the condition in the state as a whole. It is given in its entirety because of its great historic value.

NOTE—No returns from twenty counties.

Cotton.—When the manufacture of silk ceased to be profitable, or to give hope of profit, the colonists of Georgia turned their attention mainly to agriculture; but found it necessary and economical to make at home many things that they had been getting from England. The separation from the mother country greatly stimulated these small home industries, and the people of the state, making a virtue of necessity, began the manufacture of farming implements, nails, utensils of the home and office, clothing for the household, and iron from the ores of the northern hills. The census authorities say in their compilation of their last reports that all information upon cotton manufacture prior to 1840 is “meagre and not altogether trustworthy.” Nevertheless it is fair to assume that the manufacture of cotton soon took the place occupied by silk in the old colonial days. The staple that has for a half century been the king and ruler of the destinies of the south, was brought to this country from Cyprus and Smyrna in 1621, at which time a few seeds were planted, as an experiment, in Virginia. It was twenty years after this first planting of cotton seed in Virginia that cotton began to be used in the manufacture of textile fabrics in England. The cotton used, however, was not from the American plantations, but imported from the Levant. The experiment did not promise well, as at the time of the revolution the cotton crop of the south consisted in a few thousand pounds raised in little garden patches for home use. It was not until 1784 that cotton was exported. In that year 1,200 pounds were shipped to England. For the same year the total consumption of cotton in England was 11,250,000 pounds. In 1894, the southern states exported to England 2,761,306 bales, or 1,365,130,388 pounds; the total crop of the south being 7,527,211 bales, or 3,478,422,352 pounds; and England's consumption being 4,100,000 bales, or 1,640,000,000 pounds.

The south itself consumes 839,000 bales; the United States, 2,830,000; and the entire world, 11,714,000. These figures show the tremendous growth of our cotton crop, and at the same time indicates the danger to which the south is exposed. We now raise within 2,000,000 or 3,000,000 bales of the world's consumption. Adding to this crop the product of Egypt, India, China and Russian Asia, the world is raising more cotton than it consumes. This year's crop leaves an excess of nearly 2,500,000 bales.

In 1800 the south produced 40,000,000 pounds of cotton. By 1820, the crop had grown to 160,000,000 pounds; by 1830, to 350,000,000 pounds; by 1840, to 790,000,000 pounds; by 1850, to 978,000,000 pounds, or 2,469,093 bales. In 1860, the total crop was 2,154,820,800 pounds, or 5,387,052 bales. Southern planters who got fabulous prices for cotton just after the war declared that the south would never raise another 5,000,000 crop. In 1867, the crop was only 2,230,000 bales. In 1870 it reached 3,011,996. In 1880 it got up to 5,755,359, or back to the figures of 1860, just twenty years after the golden era. The consumption of cotton and its manufacture has not either in this state or in the United States, kept pace with the crop. As early as 1640, nineteen years after the planting of the first cotton seed in Virginia, and a year before England herself began to manufacture cotton, Massachusetts offered bounties for the manufacture of cotton goods. The first factory was established at Rowley, Mass., in 1743. In 1791, only 5,500,000 pounds were manufactured in the United States. At the beginning of this century, 1801, 9,000,000 pounds were consumed; in 1811, 17,000,000 pounds; in 1821, 50,000,000 pounds; in 1831, 77,500,000 pounds; in 1841, 97,500,000 pounds; in 1850, 245,250,000 pounds; in 1860, 422,704,975 pounds, or 1,094,762 bales of 400 pounds each; in 1870, 1,109,000 bales; in 1880, 2,118,000 bales; in 1890-91, 2,958,000; and in 1894, 2,830,000 bales. The south raised in 1894, 7,577,211 bales, and consumed 718,515 bales; Georgia raised

1,125,000 bales, and consumes 176,303 bales. The increase for consumption in the south has been 55 per cent. since 1889. In an address delivered in Baltimore, Aug. 14, 1894, Mr. R. H. Edmonds made the following statement as to the general condition of cotton manufacturing in the south:

"There are about 15,000,000 cotton spindles in the United States. They represent an investment, including all classes of cotton manufactures, of over $400,000,000. Of this number the south has in round numbers one-sixth or 2,700,000 spindles, and the capital invested is about $97,000,000. The world has about 85,000,000 spindles. If the capital invested were in the same proportion as in this country the aggregate would be over $2,300,000,000, but the capital of European mills is less in proportion to the number of spindles than in this country. The south produces nearly 60 per cent. of the entire cotton crop of the world, and if it manufactured this it would need over twenty times as many spindles as it has, or about 50,000,000, and the capital needed would exceed $1,300,000,000. The total annual value of the product of these mills would be equal to the value of three full cotton crops. In the last eighteen years the cotton crops of the south have been sold for an aggregate of nearly $6,000,000,000. Before they reach the consumer their value has increased to $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000. This enormous business, creating wealth wherever established, is the prize for which the south has now commenced to contend."

GROWTH OF COTTON MANUFACTURE IN GEORGIA SINCE 1860.

Notes to table on cotton: (a) Number of pounds given for 1860, 1870 and 1880; (b) number of bales for 1890 and 1893; the number of pounds for 1890 were 69,139,410, and for 1893, 78,722,979; (c) operatives estimated on the basis of one to every 43.19 spindles; (d) estimated.

While the figures for 1893 cannot be given in regard to operatives, capital, wages, and value of product, yet a very close estimate is possible. For instance, the average number of spindles to the operative in Georgia is 43.19; this would give 12,370 operatives. Other estimates are based upon such averages, and the information gathered through correspondence with the mills of the state. A glance at the table will be sufficient to show that the rate of increase in the manufacture of cotton has been very marked and rapid. We should not go back to 1860 for comparison, because between 1860 and 1870 there is a gulf which comparative statistics cannot cross. We should begin the comparison at 1870. The figures for 1860 are given for their historic interest, and to give a basis of contrast between ante-bellum prosperity and the prosperity of the present day. Taking the figures for 1870, therefore, we see that in the manufacture of cotton

Georgia's increase has been nearly 500 per cent. in twenty-three years. A few more years of such growth will place her in the front rank in this industry. Everything points to an even more rapid advance. The mills, as has often been said, are coming to the cotton. New England and Great Britain cannot successfully compete against the south in the manufacture of southern cotton. England has the advantage of a century's start ahead, and so has New England. But the natural conditions at the south cannot be met by artificial conditions. The south has 20,000,000 horse-power comparatively idle; she has cheaper labor than can be found elsewhere, and this labor is equal in industry and skill to any in the world; she has a climate in which work can be performed with comfort and safety all the year; and she has the cotton at the doors of her mills. In middle Georgia there is a cotton mill driven by water power, situated by the side of a railroad, and within a field of cotton. The picture of this mill tells the whole story, and is itself a clear prophecy of the future of the cotton manufacture. It is claimed, however, that while the southern mills can control the markets of the world with regard to coarse goods they cannot do so with regard to fine goods. What is true in the one case is true in the other. The skill necessary will soon be forthcoming, and the day is not far distant when the southern states will manufacture their own cotton, and control the markets of the world in all varieties of cotton manufactures. To the $300,000,000 of the cotton crop will be added at least $800,000,000 invested in cotton manufacture, and the south will become one of the richest portions of the globe.

Georgia does about 25 per cent. of all the cotton manufacturing of the south. She will hold this proportion for years to come, and will probably increase it within the next few years. The prospect is that cotton manufacturing in this state will grow with tremendous rapidity, and will soon have an invested capital of upward of $100,000,000. From 1880 to 1890, the increase in value of the product of the cotton mills for the whole United States was 39.51 per cent. and for Georgia 85.52 per cent.

Wool.—The manufacture of wool is so closely related to that of cotton that it might be well included in the statistics and accounts of the latter industry. While the manufacture is still of considerable importance, it has not fulfilled the rich promise it gave of rapid development and growth. Its history goes back dimly to 1810, when it was entered into the census list of industries in Georgia as "woolen goods in families." But there is nothing authentic prior to 1840. At that time Georgia is credited with one woolen establishment with a capital of $2,000, and with a product value of $3,000. By 1850, there were three establishments, with capital of $68,000, and a product value of $88,750. In 1860, the industry showed a very great development. There were eleven establishments with a capital of $242,500 and a product of $464,420. In 1870, it reached its highest point of growth. The establishments numbered forty-six, the capital invested was $936,585, and the product $471,523. In 1880, there were thirty-two establishments, capital $180,733, and product $239,390. In 1890, there were only fourteen establishments, but the capital had risen to $298,539. The product still decreased in value and was reported as $173,245. The condition in 1894 remains probably as in 1890. The growth of the business in the west has somewhat overshadowed the industry in the southern states, although a prominent operator in this state reports the outlook as encouraging, and predicts a substantial and satisfactory advance.

Cotton Seed Oil.—Within recent years a new industry of very great importance to the farmers of the south has sprung into existence. A few years ago the only revenue the farmer received from his cotton was from the sale of the lint. The seed, except what was needed for replanting and the little used for feeding stock, was almost a waste. It was not even understood and appreciated as a fertilizer. The seed is now utilized to the farthest degree, and has added a large and growing industry to the southern states, and many thousands of dollars to the scanty revenues of the cotton planters. It is estimated that there are in every bale of cotton thirty bushels of seed. Two bushels are needed to plant an acre, and as it requires three acres to produce a bale, six bushels out of these thirty must be saved for the next crop. This leaves twenty-four bushels of seed for every bale of cotton, which constitutes the raw material of the new industry. This year's crop of cotton was 7,427,211 bales. Multiplying this by twenty-four and we have 180,653,064 bushels of cotton seed. Twenty bushels of cotton seed weigh 720 pounds. There are, therefore, 5,419,591.920 pounds of cotton seed from a single crop that may be made into oil, meal and fertilizer. To the farmers who sell to the mills, this means at the usual price paid for seed, 15 cents a bushel, or $10 per ton—$30,000,000 a year. The average value of the cotton crop may be stated as about $300,000,000. The value of cotton seed is about one-tenth. In other words, the southern farmer has added to his income by 10 per cent. of what he was making from his cotton. The industry has a brilliant outlook, as the oil is being more and more extensively used in the manufacture of lard and the various substitutes for butter, and for mixing with olive oil.

In 1860, cotton seed oil is mentioned for the first time in our national census reports. At that time there were seven establishments, with a product valued at $741,000 for the whole country. In 1870, there were twenty-six establishments, with a product worth $2,205,610. Louisiana led with six establishments. New York, Rhode Island and Ohio together had seven. All the rest were in the southern states. Georgia had not one. In 1880, there were forty-five establishments, with a capital of $3,862,300, and a product valued at $7,690,921. With the exception of one establishment each in Connecticut, Rhode Island and Ohio, and two in Missouri, all were in the south. Georgia was still without a report. In 1890, there were 119 establishments, with a product valued at $19,335,947. Georgia's share is reported as seventeen establishments, and a product valued at $1,670,196.

The development in this state since 1890 has been marvelous. There are now twenty-five establishments, which crushed this year 200,000 tons of seed. The product of a ton is as follows: Forty gallons of oil at 40 cents, $16; 700 pounds of meal at $20 a ton, $7; 25 pounds of lint at 3 cents, 75 cents; 900 pounds of hulls at $3 a ton, $1.25. Total, $25.10. This gives the following result: Eight million gallons of oil, $3,200,000; 5,000,000 pounds of lint, $150,000; 180,000,000 pounds of hulls, $270,000; 140,000,000 pounds of meal, $1,400,000. Total, $5,020,000.

If this estimate, which is furnished by thoroughly informed men engaged in this industry, may be relied on, the manufacture of cotton seed oil and its attendant industries has increased 300 per cent. in four years. The "crush" of the present year in Georgia was about one-third of the seed produced.

Iron.—In the history of manufacturing in Georgia, the iron industries follow close upon the manufacture of cotton. As early as 1810, we find the census report mentioning blomaries, forges and naileries. It is more than probable the colonists had found it both necessary and economical to make nails and farming implements, but there is no record of the industry, which was confined, perhaps, to the plantation, each supplying itself with such tools and iron implements as were necessary. In 1810, however, it is recorded that there was a nailery in Chatham county, a forge in Elbert, and a "blomary" in Warren. A blomary is "the first forge in an iron works through which the metal passes after having been melted from the ore, and in which it is made into blooms." As the iron ores of Georgia were all in the upper part of the state, they could not be got at until after the Indians had vacated portions of the mountainous region. It was not until 1838 that the Cherokees abandoned their claims to the territory. The iron industry, therefore, labored under many disadvantages in its early history.

The Sequee blomary forge was built in 1830, three miles south of Clarkesville, Habersham Co., but was abandoned in 1835. In the same county Hodge's forge was established, probably about the same date, if not earlier. Blomary forges were built in Cass county (now Bartow) in 1838, 1841 and 1846. In Union county one was built in 1839 and one in Murray county in 1843. Blomaries were also built in Dade and Walker about the same date. The first furnace built in the state was the one at Sequee, 1832, abandoned about five years later. Others were built in Cass and Walker counties about the same period. Rising Fawn furnace, in Dade county, has the distinction of being the first furnace in the United States to use the White-well hot-blast stove. The first blowing in iron was on June 18, 1875.

The iron industry has been re-established in this state within the last twenty-five years, and gives promise of a much greater development. The following table shows the industry since 1870. The census report for 1860 does not give figures:

Year.	Number of Establishments.	Capital.	Product.
1870.....	7	$ 228,060	$903,068
1880.....	14	1,135,900	990,850
1890.....	5		471,757

This table, compiled from the census, would indicate a decided decrease in the iron production, but such is not the case. In 1892 Georgia produced 9,950 tons of pig iron. In 1893 she produced 39,675 tons. This advance is remarkable because only three states showed an increase in iron production in 1893—Colorado, Maryland and Georgia. The percentage of increase in Colorado was .40, in Maryland .52, and in Georgia within a fraction of 300. It may be well to call attention here to the great increase in industries using iron and steel as material in manufacture. The manufacture of agricultural implements increased from a product of $601,935 in 1880 to $793,825 in 1890; foundry and machine-shop products from $1,299,491 in 1880 to $2,272,653 in 1890.

Marble and Granite.—The marble and stone industries are of recent development. The census report for 1870 gives a record of marble and stone work (not specified) as two establishments, with a capital of $60,000, and a product of $25,000, while "monuments and tombstones" are recorded as having seven establishments, a capital of $62,300 and a product of $104,800. Paving material is not given at all. In 1860 none of these industries is mentioned.

The report of the United States census for 1880 gives the condition of the paving-stone industry for Georgia as two establishments, with a capital of $7,500, and a product of $13,100. By 1890 it had grown to five establishments, with a product of $513,648. In 1881, less than twenty carloads of paving stone, building and monumental stone were shipped out of Georgia. For the last three years, that is, for 1891, 1892 and 1893, the average has been from 8,000 to 10,000 carloads, and a product of upward of $1,000,000 a year. In 1893 Georgia did as large a business in this one industry as the entire country did ten years before. By the census report of 1880 the entire granite product of the United States was $5,188,998. By 1890 the industry had almost trebled its product. In 1880 Georgia ranked twelfth among the states in stone-producing industries. In 1890 she had advanced to fifth rank in paving material, and sixth in building stone. In the cities of Baltimore, Cincinnati, Columbus, O., Dayton, Louisville, Chattanooga, Nashville, Memphis, Montgomery, Birmingham, New Orleans, Savannah, Augusta and Atlanta there are 1,845,000 square yards of granite paving—equal to 130 miles of roadway—furnished by the quarries of Stone Mountain and Lithonia in this state.

While the marble industry dates from 1840, when F. T. Simmons opened a small quarry in Longswamp valley, near Tate, no extensive product was made until some years after the war. In 1850 two mills were erected on Longswamp creek, and the output was very largely increased. But it was not until 1885 that quarrying was conducted on an extensive scale. A company was organized in 1884, with a capital of $1,500,000, for the purpose of quarrying marble. Another large company was organized in 1885. Since that date the business has grown very rapidly. In 1886 a third large company was organized. Georgia produced $261,666 worth of marble in 1893, and now ranks next to Vermont in the amount of product. Marble is found in Fannin, Pickens and Gilmer counties, though Pickens is the only one now actively producing. The work of dressing marble constitutes an auxiliary industry which has a capital of about $200,000 and is an important and thriving business.

Fertilizers.—A number of industries have sprung up within recent years or have assumed large proportions. Among them is the manufacture of fertilizers. In 1870, when this industry makes its first appearance in the census statistics, there were six establishments, with a capital of $51,500, and a product of $163,950. In 1880 there were three establishments, with a capital of $240,000, and a product of $246,500. In 1890 the business showed an increase of 2,000 per cent. for the decade. There were forty-four establishments having a product of $5,026,034. It is estimated by the manufacturers that 225,000 tons were produced in the state during the past season. The state chemist inspected about 315,000 tons, and the amount consumed by the state was about 325,000 tons. The state uses probably 100,000 more tons than is manufactured in it.

Crackers and Candy.—Another industry of recent and rapid development is the manufacture of crackers and candy. Ten years ago the candy and cracker industries employed $150,000 capital, and had a product of $400,000. This year the capital employed is $400,000 and the product about $1,000,000.

Patent Medicines.—The manufacture of patent medicines has become a very important industry in the state. In 1880 there were twelve establishments and a product of $138,500. By 1890 there were fourteen establishments and a product of $837,495. The product is now very greatly in excess of these figures, as may be inferred from the development of one of these manufactories. In 1880 the retail value of the product of this single preparation was only $1,843. In 1889 it was $13,894; in 1890, $56,672; in 1891, $126,918; in 1892, $226,404; in 1893, $309,932, and in 1894, $367,993. Atlanta has the reputation of doing the largest business in patent medicines of any city in the south, and as much as all others south of Louisville combined. One firm in 1890 did a business of $500,000.

Industries have not yet grouped themselves in certain places as they have in other states. Georgia has no Lowell or Pittsburg. But the process has begun. Cotton manufacturing is mostly confined to Augusta and to Columbus, where water power is very cheap, convenient and exhaustless. Savannah is the largest naval-store market in the world, and Brunswick is following her development rapidly. Atlanta is remarkable for diversified industries. Only Lowell and Lawrence, Mass., outrank her in the proportion of population engaged in manufacturing pursuits. She had more than 840 manufacturing establishments in 1885, the variety extending to fifty-two different industries.

The following table gives the conditions of manufactures in the state for 1880 and 1890, with aggregates for 1860 and 1870.

Lumber and naval stores are treated in another article following this.

LUMBER AND NAVAL STORES.

The lumber industry, if we include in it all its legitimate branches, is the most important of the manufacturing industries of the state. And yet almost nothing is known of its extent and condition. It is very difficult to get accurate information, as the census reports on this particular industry are totally untrustworthy. Recourse has been had to private sources of information, to the scattering articles on special branches of the business, and the entire work has been done from the start, or originally, as there was nothing to be had better than very general and very unsatisfactory accounts. Since 1860 the value of the product of the lumber industries has been above $3,000,000 annually, and has comprised about one-seventh of the entire manufacturing business of the state. We have just begun, however, to appreciate the extent and value of the industry, and to realize that we have, in our ignorance and blind race after immediate profit, been killing the goose that laid the golden eggs. The pine forests are going, just as we are beginning to understand their tremendous value. It will require from thirty to fifty years for the pine forests to grow to their maturity; and half a century is necessary to repair the injury done by the greed of a single generation. Fortunately there yet remains a vast amount of pine timber in the state; enough to constitute a source of great natural wealth, if properly protected. The great dangers that threaten the pines are the recklessness of the mill men, who do not seem to care how much they destroy in their efforts to increase their "cuts" and profits, and the blind desire of the small farmer to have the timber cut down in order that he may impoverish himself by planting the land in "cotton-patches." Instead, therefore, of the mature trees being cut, and the young growth allowed to remain for future milling, the whole forest is swept away. In its place spring up here and there "patches" of cotton, which are cultivated until the natural fertility of the soil is exhausted, and the patches are moved to other fresh land, and so on, and so on, leaving barren acres of land that once grew the most valuable timber of the world. It is to be hoped that proper care will be exercised by the state over this great natural resource, and that it will be preserved as a constant and boundless source of revenue.

The value of Georgia yellow pine is increasing year by year. Its uses, its qualities of endurance, and its ornamental value, are becoming better understood and appreciated. It is known all over the world, and serves for luxurious street pavements in Berlin, and for ornamental woodwork in the halls of the nobility of Europe. In every country of the old world forests of valuable timber are cared for as if they were orchards, from which they expect future crops. They are not destroyed for one harvest. It is sheer folly to sweep away the forests of yellow pine in this state, and deprive ourselves of our greatest source of wealth.

In 1860 the census report gave to Georgia, in the lumber industries, 429 establishments, with a capital of nearly $2,000,000, and a product valued at $3,000,000. In 1870 there were, according to the same authority, 543 establishments with a capital of about $2,000,000, and a product of $4,700,000. In 1880 there were 682 establishments, with a capital of about $3,500,000, and a product of $5,612,510. In 1885 the establishments had increased to about 800, the capital to something like $5,500,000, and the value of product to about $8,000,000. In 1890 the estimate of the census enumerators was that there were 516 establishments and a product valued at $9,855,067. No estimate has been made as to the capital invested. Although these figures would seem to indicate a decrease in the number of establishments, the value of the product has increased nearly 100 per cent. over 1880.

The figures given by the census must, however, be taken with several grains of allowance, especially with regard to this industry. In 1890 the forestry division of the agricultural department estimated 101,760,550,000 feet of long and short leaf timber were standing in the forests of this state, about half of it being "long leaf" or "yellow" pine. The figures of the yellow pine standing in 1880 were given as 16,778,000,000 feet. A careful estimate was made in 1890, through members of the legislature from the pine section of the state, as to the condition of the yellow pine timber. It was pretty definitely determined by this method that the estimates of the census were far from the truth. A statement of the result will show both the vast wealth the state possesses in her pines and the fearful vandalism of speculators which is so rapidly destroying this abundant source of revenue.

There are 15,000,000 acres of yellow pine timber in Georgia. It is calculated that here are, on an average, 3,000 feet of lumber to the acre, or 45,000,000,000 feet of standing yellow pine. A careful calculation shows that this timber, when marketed, is worth $37.50 to the acre; that there is a profit in cutting and marketing this timber at $12 per acre. The yellow pine timber of Georgia, as it stood in the forests in 1890, was worth $562,500,000; or more than the assessed valuation of all the property, real and personal, of the state. The profit in marketing this would be $180,000,000. This land, bearing a crop worth $37.50, or a clear profit of $12 to every acre, is assessed for taxation at from twelve to thirty cents an acre.

For the purpose of a general article, and as denoting the respective value of the different kinds of timber in Georgia, the yellow pine may be considered as constituting one class, and all other varieties of our timber as embraced in another class. The value and importance of the pine timber far exceed that of all other varieties.

WOODS OF GEORGIA.

The other and less known and less utilized timbers are, however, very abundant and valuable. Along the range of the mountains in northern Georgia are extensive forests of oak and hickory. These varieties of timber are found in great abundance in the counties of Rabun, Habersham, Union, Lumpkin, White, Pickens, Towns, Murray, Fannin, Gilmer, Walker, Dade, Catoosa, Chattooga, Bartow, Cherokee, and other counties comprising what is known as northern, or upper Georgia. Large quantities of these woods are now being used in the manufacture of carriages, buggies, wagons, plow frames, tool handles, etc., and the oak is becoming more and more popular for finishing and ornamental material in interior and cabinet work. There is no wood in the forests of this country, with the possible exception of bird's-eye maple, walnut, and cherry, which are all rare and costly, that is more ornate and durable than the Georgia oak. Our oak has the tremendous advantage of being abundant. The red oak, the white oak and the mountain oak are the most familiar varieties.

The oaks and hickories, while generally indicative of a clayey soil and a high country, are yet found continuously from the northern to the southern boundary of the state. In central Georgia and in the upper part of southern Georgia, where the yellow pine reigns supreme, the oaks and hickory disappear; but they are found again along the southernmost bound of the state, in Thomas, Decatur, Lowndes and Brooks counties. Along the western side of the state they extend almost unbrokenly from Lookout mountain to the Appalachian. On the east, also, they are found from the North Carolina line to the ocean. Along the Atlantic coast, in a strip of about twenty miles in width and about one hundred miles long, are found forests of live oak. This wood is the toughest of all our varieties, and is very valuable in shipbuilding. It cannot be split, as its fibers and grain are so knit as to be as strong as iron. The live oak is a beautiful and picturesque tree. One who has seen the oaks of Bonaventure, near Savannah, can never forget their grandeur, their solemnity, and their inexpressible beauty. Their long, knotted and twisted branches, frequently larger and longer than the main trunk or stem, extend over the paths and avenues and the gray moss trails from them almost to the graves below. They seem draped in perpetual mourning for the dead who sleep beneath their boughs. It is under such trees, bending their branches until they rest refreshed in the damp marsh, that Henry Lee, "Lighthorse Harry," lies "buried by the upbraiding shore" on Cumberland island, at Dungeness, the seat of Gen. Greene.

Along the coast, also, and in the swamps on the banks of the rivers near the sea, are extensive forests of cypress, one of the most valuable of all woods. Cypress lumber is the material of a large industry in that section of the state. The lumber is more expensive than pine, and the shingles made of it are the best and most durable. It is also excellent for use in places where it will be subjected to dampness. Heretofore a large part of this timber was inaccessible, growing as it does in almost impenetrable swamps. But the draining of Okefenokee swamp, and the use of improved machinery for hauling the logs out of the very heart of the swamp on long cables of wire or rope have made cypress lumber more abundant in the market. Prior to 1886 cypress was almost unknown as lumber, but since that time its use has steadily increased. There is quite a good deal of cedar in what is known as the lime-sink region of southern Georgia, and in the limestone country of the northwest. In the northern and northeastern parts of the state the ash, white pine and spruce are found, but not in very large quantities. The gathering of oak bark for tanning purposes constitutes quite an industry in this part of the state. Scattered all through the state are occasional groups of poplars, growing to tremendous size and height; but the poplar is no longer abundant enough to make any show as lumber. It was once one of the most common trees of our forests, but it is fast disappearing.

There are some other hardwoods in the Georgia forests and swamps that are slowly becoming recognized as timber woods. These are the persimmon, the holly and the gum. They will be utilized some day, and, as they are rapid growers, will form quite a valuable addition to the timber wealth of the state. These woods constitute one class of our lumber trees. The yellow pine, forming a class by itself, is yet more valuable than all the other woods of the state.

The yellow pine is at once the glory and the benefactor of Georgia. This majestic tree, bearing its crown of fadeless green upon its lithe, straight stem, 100 feet high, like a temple column with Corinthian capital, is the most beautiful object to be seen in our forests. Its trunk offers to the avarice of man the most valuable lumber to be found on this continent, and its balsamic leaves are "for the healing of the nations." It should be put upon the seal of the state, and be made our emblem. It has given us already enormous revenue, and the pine forests still hold a greater wealth than is stored in all the farms, railways, mines, manufactories and cities of the state.

HEALTH-GIVING PROPERTIES OF GEORGIA LUMBER.

While we are considering lumber only, and looking at the pine tree as if its beauty and perennial freshness were destroyed and the columnar stem cut into a blank square representing so many feet of board, and so much profit, we may pause to glance at the tree as a benefactor in a higher sense. The pine forests are natural sanitariums. Under the pines health reigns and sickness disappears. The invalid, whose throat and lungs have become diseased in the cold climates of the north and west, finds relief and health in the breath of the pines. The pines neutralize the unwholesome vapors rising from the swamps and purify the air. This enables us to enjoy perfect health and strength in a warm and almost Italian climate. In the entire pine section of the state, which embraces about 25,000,000 acres, or more than one-half of the state, is found health and an invigorating climate. This, too, may be considered from a commercial point of view. The salutary and curative virtues of the pine bring thousands of people yearly to Georgia, increasing the traffic of railways, enabling hotels to pay dividends, supporting stablemen, creating a market for fruit and vegetables, and helping physicians, who would starve and die upon the natural healthfulness of the region, to find a practice among sojourning invalids. The pines around Thomasville and in the other sections of Georgia have increased the average length of life in this country by adding years to many a life that had been despaired of in the icy north. It is to be hoped that this consideration, in its double aspect of profit and healing, will aid in the work of preserving our pine forests from total destruction.

The yellow or long-leaf pine, is more abundant than any other timber tree on the continent. This constitutes its third claim to primacy among our forests and timber trees—its value as lumber and its curative properties being the other two. It will long outlast the big redwoods of the northwest, the maple, ash and poplar of Tennessee and Kentucky, the cypress of the southern coasts, and the white pine of the north and east. If the forests of Georgia and the south are properly cared for the time will come when the only profitable lumber tree of this country will be the yellow pine.

Attention has already been called to the statistics of lumber cut and milled in this state, and to the growth of the lumber industry. The pines of Georgia now standing occupy about 15,000,000 acres, and are to be found in paying quantity in seventy-nine of the 137 counties. The pine belt may be said to begin as high north as Chattooga, and thence it sweeps in an ever-widening curve toward the Atlantic, until it embraces the entire middle and southern part of the state. Over this extensive area the quantity of pine forest varies greatly. In Lincoln county it is estimated that there are 2,000 acres of pine timber, while in Coffee county there are about 548,000 acres. At 3,000 feet to the acre, this would give to Coffee county 1,644,000,000 feet. Three other counties—Charlton, Clinch and Tattnall—have each more than 500,000 acres in pine. Three others—Appling, Berrien and Montgomery—have between 400,000 and 500,000 acres each. Four—Bullock, Decatur, Laurens and Liberty—have between 300,000 and 400,000 acres each. Fifteen—Brooks, Burke, Camden, Colquitt, Dodge, Dooly, Effingham, Emanuel, Lowndes, McIntosh, Mitchell, Ware, Washington, Wilcox and Worth—have each from 200,000 to 300,000 acres. Twelve—Baker, Bryan, Crawford, Early, Echols, Glynn, Irwin, Johnson, Pulaski, Screven, Taylor, and Telfair—have between 100,000 and 200,000 each. These thirty-eight counties have about 10,500,000 acres of the entire forests of the state, or, say, 31,500,000,000 feet of lumber.

Along the lines of railroad and navigable streams the timber has been very much thinned, and the saw-mills, accompanied by "spur" tracks, are now penetrating to the very heart of the forest. There is a great deal of waste in the milling and marketing of the pine lumber. The thrifty New Englander would utilize all pieces of timber that are not marketable as lumber; but nearly all this is wasted at the southern mills. This will probably continue until the lumber begins to grow scarce, and closer profits must be looked for in the use of everything. But small industries that could utilize this waste timber would increase the profits and the importance of the lumber industry.

YELLOW PINE.

The yellow pine has borne the name and fame of Georgia farther than has the reputation of her greatest statesmen. This is a commercial age, and fame now sits in the market-place. In Paris, in Berlin, in Africa, the Georgia yellow pine has established for itself "a local habitation and a name." And yet its merits have alone carried it into the markets of the world. The more energetic and commercially minded lumbermen of the north and east have pushed an inferior wood ahead of our pine into the markets of this country. But the long-leaf pine has won its way alone. Its uses are manifold. It is durable, light, easily worked and easily cut and put upon the market, and is, withal, one of the most ornamental woods of the world. For the general purposes of house-building, and, indeed, for the most common uses of lumber, the yellow pine has no peer. No other wood combines so many good qualities, and pine will always be the standard lumber of this country. The outside markets have not been systematically, or energetically, or properly looked after. The demand for pine could be increased in England, France, and in the countries to the south of us, and while this is being done we should learn to regard our pine forests as a lasting source of revenue, and guard them from ruthless spoliation, so that they may be left as a heritage to the future citizens of the commonwealth.

SHIPMENT OF STORES.

Connected intimately with the lumber interests, and, indeed, a part of it, is the naval stores industry. Before the pines are cut for lumber they are generally "boxed" for turpentine. Of the 15,000,000 acres of pine in Georgia, about one-third or, say, 5,000,000 acres, have been boxed, and there is about one turpentine still for every saw-mill. It was long thought that boxing the trees injured them for lumber, but it has been found that it improves rather than injures the quality of lumber got from the tree. For almost all purposes to which our pine lumber is now applied, its value is enhanced by the turpentine of the trees.

It is usual to abandon turpentine the land after three years. The cost of turpentine an acre is about $7 to $7.50 for the three years. The estimated average yield per acre is $11.42; or a profit of $4 to the acre for three years, or $1.33 a year. It will be seen, therefore, that a Georgia pine forest has a double crop. It yields, in turpentine and rosin, $3.81 a year for three years, and then has 3,000 feet of lumber to the acre. The profit on "farming," that is extracting the spirits of turpentine from the trees, is $4 an acre, and the profit on marketing the lumber is $12 an acre. These figures have been established by data furnished by mill men of long experience. This part of the lumber industry, or the preparation and handling of naval stores, has been a very important factor in the prosperity of Savannah and Brunswick. Savannah has risen to the rank of the first naval stores market of the world, and the growth of Brunswick as a naval stores market and as a port has been remarkable.

The movement of naval stores at Darien, Brunswick and Savannah shows both the bulk and importance of this industry, and the rapidity of its development. At Darien the year 1880 marks the commencement of the shipment of naval stores in considerable bulk. In that year the value of the shipment of stores from this port amounted to $12,000. By 1885 the value of the annual shipment had run up to $66,000, or upwards of 500 per cent. in five years. In 1886, the shipment was valued at $85,000. The first complete cargo was shipped in 1886, which was followed by two other cargoes the same year. The export has rapidly grown since 1886, and amounted to more than $125,000 in 1894. The securing of better railroad facilities is expected to result in the doubling of the receipts and shipment of naval stores from this port during the year 1895. The growth of Brunswick has been remarkable in every way, and her rather sudden development has been very largely due to her business in naval stores. Prior to 1880, the business amounted to very little. At that time it began to increase rapidly. The following table shows the receipts of stores at this port from 1880 to 1893, both inclusive:

Year.	Bbls. Rosin.	Bbls. Spirits Turpentine.
1880.....	39,495	9,261
1881.....	70,297	13,730
1882.....	119,584	25,559
1883.....	99,769	18,305
1884.....	120,858	24,342
1885.....	100,974	22,510
1886.....	82,874	23,647
1887.....	145,225	30,571
1888.....	127,421	32,408
1889.....	166,210	41,204
1890.....	205,000	50,000
1891.....	168,852	47,457
1892.....	189,683	56,243
1893.....	160,755	45,269

The increase in the receipts of rosin has been, for the fourteen years, a little over 400 per cent. The increase in the receipts of spirits of turpentine has been, for the same time, nearly 430 per cent. At Savannah, while the growth has not been marked by such great percentages as at Brunswick, the business has increased steadily and rapidly. The period for which figures are obtainable opens with Savannah having a very large business. The trade was organized here much earlier, as it was the most considerable port and the first commercial city of the state.

The following table gives the movement of naval stores at Savannah from 1883 to 1893, both inclusive:

Year.	Bbls. Rosin.		Bbls. Spirits Turpentine.
	Received.	Shipped.	Received.	Shipped.
1883.....	564,026	559,628	133,139	129,835
1884.....	478,834	491,998	117,291	121,028
1885.....	450,106	424,490	107,369	106,925
1886.....	582,539	566,952	147,352	146,925
1887.....	643,532	654,286	169,961	168,834
1888.....	584,428	577,990	158,208	159,931
1889.....	683,077	716,658	183,558	181,542
1890.....	758,448	770,311	196,166	196,227
1891.....	873,678	862,292	234,986	235,496
1892.....	1,032,198	1,002,659	277,617	273,566
1893.....	957,027	915,623	261,080	256,889

It will be seen that the growth of this industry has been remarkable at these three ports. In 1892, the receipts at Savannah being 1,032,198 barrels of rosin and 277,617 casks of spirits of turpentine, making an aggregate of 1,309,815 packages, exceeded the combined receipts of all other primary ports by 100,000 casks of spirits and 600,000 barrels of rosin, or by 700,000 packages. The outlook for both the lumber and naval stores industries is very promising, and with proper care, will remain for generations a source of profitable trade and of revenue to the state.

THE MINERALS AND MINERAL RESOURCES OF GEORGIA.

The difficulties attending any attempt to write up the mineral resources of a state, when no adequate survey has been made, cannot be conceived until one attempts the work. The state of Georgia, everywhere known as one of the most progressive of the southern states, is behind in systematic investigation of its geological resources. This is not due to a lack of interest on the part of the people as to the importance of such work so much as to an unfortunate series of adventitious circumstances, explanation of which need not here be attempted. Prior to 1874 some work in general geology was undertaken in a private way, including a survey of Burke and Richmond counties, by John R. Cotting, in 1836, under the patronage of the two counties. The first systematic survey undertaken by the state was organized in 1874, with Dr. George Little as state geologist. A short report of progress, thirty-six pages, was made in 1875 by Dr. Little, and another, sixteen pages in 1876. During the same year a hand-book on Georgia was published, in which a report of the geological survey was included. In 1878 Dr. Little issued a catalogue of ores, rocks, and woods, selected from the geological survey collection, for the Paris exposition. This pamphlet contained sixteen pages. In 1879 the survey was suspended because the legislature refused to make further appropriations for maintenance.

In 1885 a book entitled "The Commonwealth of Georgia" was published under the direction of Judge Henderson, commissioner of agriculture. One hundred and fifty-six pages of this book, with geological and mineralogical maps, were devoted to the topography, geology, etc., of Georgia, the matter having been prepared by Mr. A. R. McCutchin, assistant geologist under Dr. Little, from data collected by the survey. Nothing more was done by the state in the way of advertising its mineral resources to the world, until the legislature, which met in the fall of 1889, passed a bill re-organizing the geological survey and making an appropriation for its maintenance for five years, to date from July 1, 1890. Dr. J. W. Spencer, who was appointed state geologist, submitted a report of progress in 1891, of 128 pages, which was devoted to the geology of the Cretaceous and Tertiary formations of southwest Georgia. This was followed in 1893 by a report by Dr. Spencer on the Paleozoic Group of Georgia, of 406 pages. In March and April of 1893 a complete change in the personnel of the survey was made by the geological board. Since then the policy of making systematic surveys of the economic mineral deposits and other geological resources, wherever they may be found in the state, has been followed, by which the public will be able to get monograph reports on each subject, without having to wait for an areal survey to be made of any particular section. This policy is by far the most practical for giving to the public complete information as to the economic mineral resources of the state at the earliest possible data. In pursuance of it, a bulletin on the marbles of Georgia was issued in November, 1894, and one on its Corundum deposits came from the press a few months later. Field work is in progress by the geologist and his assistants preparatory to issuing a series of such bulletins on the gold, phosphate, marl and bauxite deposits and the water-power and artesian-well systems of the state. The plan of making an economic survey of the geological resources does not preclude a final report which would include both the general and economic geology of the state. The demand for information, as to the economic mineral resources, has been very strong, and the plan adopted for the survey has seemed to meet with universal approval.

In compiling this article, free use has been made of "The Commonwealth of Georgia," "Mineral Resources of the United States," "Report on the Mineral Industries of the United States at the Eleventh Census," "The Paleozoic Group of Georgia," "The Mineral Springs of Georgia," by J. R. Duggan, Bulletins 1 and 2 of the Geological Survey of Georgia, and such other publications as were available.

GEOLOGICAL CHARACTER OF THE STATE.

The ten counties lying in the northwest corner of the state, namely, Dade, Catoosa, Walker, Whitfield, Chattooga, Murray, Gordon, Floyd, Bartow, and Polk, constitute all the territory in the state known at present to belong to the Paleozoic Group. On the south and east of this lies what is now called the Crystalline Belt, for its true position in geological history is a matter of doubt, the earlier classification as Archaean being at present questioned, at least in part, by many of our most eminent geologists. The southern boundary of this belt is an almost straight line, from Augusta through Macon to Columbus, separating it from the Tertiary and Cretaceous formations. Along the line, separating the Paleozoic from the Crystalline, is a series of metamorphic rocks, including the marble deposits of the state, and the roofing slates of Rockmart and other places in that region. Adjacent to the Crystalline Belt on the south, extending from Columbus to a point about fifteen miles southwest of Macon lies a triangular area, constituting all the Cretaceous exposed in the state, except two small patches, one a fork, whose east limb extends from Macon southeast for about fifteen miles, and whose west limb extends about the same distance in a northwest direction, until it ceases at the line of contact with the Crystalline Belt. This prong is about two miles wide, and its fellow about twice that width. The other patch, about three miles wide and ten miles long, with a northwest and southeast direction, lies between the first and the main area. The western boundary of the Cretaceous is the Chattahoochee river for probably forty miles south of Columbus. A very jagged line from the extreme northeast point of the main area to the southern end of its west boundary constitutes the dividing line between the large area of this formation and the Tertiary which bounds it on the south and east. The Tertiary covers the largest area in the state. It lies south of the Crystalline Belt and the Cretaceous formation, and is bounded on the west and south by the state lines, and on the east by the state line and the Quaternary formation of Georgia. This latter occupies a narrow strip along the coast of Georgia, about 100 miles long and 25 miles wide. Beginning a little north of Savannah, its western boundary extends to a point not far east of Trader's Hill on the Florida line, running parallel with its sea line, which is the eastern boundary of the formation. The Paleozoic Group contains deposits of coal, iron ores, lead ore, aluminum ore (bauxite), manganese ore, ochers, graphite, barite, soapstone, roofing-slates, limestones, sandstones and clays. The Crystalline Belt, which extends from Nova Scotia through Georgia into Alabama, is the gold-bearing formation in Georgia. These rocks are also rich in other minerals, such as corundum, mica, marble, granite and kaolins; and copper, lead, iron and manganese ores, asbestos, graphite, novaculite, pyrite, and soapstone occur in profitable quantities. The Cretaceous formation produces marl, sandstone and limestone, while the Tertiary produces millstone, limonite, marl, hyalite and fire-opal, and the Quaternary, marls and sands.

ECONOMIC MINERALS IN WORKABLE QUANTITIES.

Of the above minerals and rocks, the following are found in good paying quantities:

Graphite	Asbestos
Pyrite	Garnet,
Gold	Muscovite
Chalcopyrite	Steatite
Hematite	Kaolin
Magnetite	Barite
Compact Limonite	Marble
Yellow Ocher	Limestone
Chromite	Sandstone
Bauxite	Granite
Pyrolusite	Gneiss
Chert	Roofing-slate
Massive Quartz	Shales
Tripoli	Phosphate
Infusorial Earth	Marl

The number of minerals which produce gems and precious stones are comparatively few, so far as they have been reported, as occurring in this state. The following have been found:

Diamond (g)	Beryl
Sapphire (g)	Garnet
Ruby (g)	Zircon
Rock Crystal (g)	Kyanite
Amethyst (g)	Chrysolite
Fire-opal (g)	Tourmaline
Rutile	Pyrite
Spodumene

Only those marked (g) have been found as gems and precious stones, but, so far as known, none of these are in workable quantities.

RARE MINERALS.

A number of comparatively rare minerals have been reported from the state and a few which are very rare.

Diamond	Hyalite
Tetradymite	Sapphire
Automolite	Ruby

Molybdenite	Ilmenite
Chalcocite	Rutile
Harrisite	Diaspore
Covellite	Lanthanite
Cantonite	Andesite
Pyromorphite	Spodumene
Clausthalite	Smaragdite
Plumbagumite	Zircon
Hitchcockite	Lazulite
Cassiterite	Allanite
Bauxite	Margarite
Millerite	Pyrochlorite
Genthite	Halloysite
Amethyst	Pyrophyllite
Fire-opal	Wavellite
Milk-opal	Xenotime

Of the above, harrisite from the Canton mine in Cherokee county, is a pseudomorph of chalcocite (a copper sulphide) after galena, and cantonite is said by Dana to be covellite, another sulphide of copper from the Canton mine, occurring in cubes, with a cubical cleavage. It was regarded by Dr. F. A. Genth as a pseudomorph of covellite after harrisite.

The following minerals and rocks are, or have been in recent years, mined in Georgia:

Asbestos	Limestone
Barite	a. Marble
Bauxite	b. Common
Chalcopyrite	Limonite
Chert	a. Brown Iron Ore
Clay	b. Yellow Ocher
Coal	Marl
Corundum	Muscovite (Mica)
Galena	Pyrite
Gold	Pyrolusite
Granite	Roofing Slate
Graphite	Shale
Halloysite	Steatite
Hematite	Serpentine
Kaolin

ECONOMIC MINERALS.

Iron Ores.—Hematite.—Hematite, when crystallized or crystalline, has a hardness of from 5 to 6.5, and its specific gravity is from 4.5 to 5.3. When in this form its luster is metallic and its color steel-gray. It also occurs in an earthy condition, the color then being brownish-red. In composition it is iron sesquioxide, containing, when pure, 70 per cent. of metallic iron and 30 per cent. of oxygen.

Fossiliferous hematite occurs in northwest Georgia in large quantities. Here it has resulted from the alteration of limestone, by infiltration of iron oxide derived from the alteration of other minerals. It retains the structure of the original limestone, essentially a mass of broken shells, intermingled with small flattened circular and lenticular concretions. Above the drainage level the calcareous matter of the limestone has been leached out, leaving the ore soft and porous. Below this level the ore still retains most of its calcareous matter, and is compact, being known as "hard" ore. The more compact material, which may be called a ferruginous limestone, contains from 10 to 40 per cent. of iron, while the soft ore contains as high as 60 per cent. of iron.

The fossil ore beds in Georgia are mostly confined to the Red mountain series, a part of the Silurian formation.

Localities.—On Dirt Seller mountain, about one and a half miles from Lyerly, in Chattooga county, active operations are being carried on in mining and shipping this ore to Rome, Ga., where it is smelted. The deposit is near the top of the mountain and it is carried from the mine by an incline railroad to the valley below, where it is dumped into cars, which convey it to Lyerly, and thence to Rome. On Shinbone ridge, entering the state from Alabama, the first mines occur at Menlo, where the ore bed is divided into beds of nearly equal thickness, the thickness of the whole deposit varying from two to three feet. The strata dip at 20° north, 50° west, and the ore lies near the surface of the ridge, upon its western side, though the ore-beds are found dipping at an angle of 75°, a short distance from the exposures referred to. The ore continues northward through Shinbone ridge, and dips under the mountain to the west. At Bronco the hard ore is worked by a shaft over 200 feet deep. As this mine goes below the drainage level, the soft ore gradually gives place to the compact variety. The soft ore averages 55 per cent. in metallic iron, while the "hard" ore ranges from 40 per cent. downward. At certain depths in this mine several beds of limestone occur, containing no iron.

The ore formation gives rise to ridges about the northern end of Pigeon mountain. It is found in workable quantity on the property of Mr. Dougherty and Mr. Clarkson, at the head of McLamore's cove, where the exposed beds have a thickness of from six to eighteen inches. These beds are more or less covered with shaly soil and the full extent of the deposits is not known, as there are few natural exposures. The ore belts continue northward, along the eastern side of Lookout mountain, almost to the Tennessee line. A short distance south of the Chickamauga & Round Mountain railway the Wessboro mines are in operation. Here the soft ore has a thickness of two feet. The superincumbent earth is removed from the ore until the limits of profitable working are reached; but deep mining is not continued far into the hillsides. East of High Cliff postoffice a separate basin of the Fossil ore bounds an anticlinal valley. The ore here occurs in the red shale and has a thickness of from six to ten inches. In Lookout valley, the Red mountain series, in which the Fossil ore occurs, forms a series of serrated hills, along both sides of the valley. In these rocks the ore is generally met with, and in many places the soft ore near the surface has been extracted to as great a depth as would be permitted by removing the superincumbent earth. Only at Rising Fawn has underground mining been resorted to. On the ridges here most of the soft ore has been exhausted, but the hard ore passes down at low angles beneath Lookout mountain. The total thickness of the hard ore beds is seven feet. In one locality only, on Pudding ridge, north of Rising Fawn, is the surface ore as thick as seven feet. The principal layer is only three feet, with the remaining four feet interbedded among shaly seams. In a boring at Rising Fawn the compact ore was found to be seven feet thick at a depth of eighty feet. Throughout the whole valley there are many workings in the foot ridges beneath the table-lands. The soft ore east of New England city has a thickness of seven feet, and is largely used for the manufacture of red ocher.

A limited amount of ore is found near the Alabama line, on the eastern side of Kincade, or Simm's mountain, a part of Taylor's ridge. Some iron bearing sandstones occur at Kitchen's gap, east of Holland. At High Point the ridge has been preserved from erosion by the presence of heavy bedded sandstones. At various points to the northward the ore is also seen, where it is said to be nearly three feet thick. Northeast of Summerville there is a fossil ore bed of good quality from sixteen to twenty inches thick owned by Mr. Cleghorn. This bed dips 26° S. 40° E., and is somewhat steeper than the eastern face of the mountain, from the summit of which the ore descends thinly covered with shales, which have been removed by sheets in several localities, thus exposing the ore. On the Greenbush-Lafayette road the ore is seen on the eastern side of the mountain and in ravines, attaining a thickness of twelve inches. In Dick's ridge, to the northward, on Mr. Hamilton's land, the ore beds are found from ten to twelve inches thick. Blocks of ore are also found on Dick's ridge at Gordon Spring, near Ringgold. The ore crops out on Mr. Simm's land, on the ridge above West Armuchee creek, near Subigna. The ore horizon of Taylor's ridge has suffered from erosion, which has removed much valuable ore from Horn's, Rocky Face and John's mountains, the strata of which reach to the horizon of the fossil ore series.

Analyses of Fossil Hematite.—A partial analysis of the soft iron ore from Shinbone ridge is here given: Iron, 60.72; silica, 8.28; phosphorus, 0.131. In addition to these components small quantities of alumina and lime were present. This analysis is said to be above the average in quality, both as to the percentage of iron and the small amount of phosphorus, the latter being usually higher in quantity.

The following partial analyses of hard ore, taken from the Bronco mines, on Shinbone ridge, were made by Dr. Gustave Bidel: I.—Metallic iron, 40.65; silica, 6.30; alumina, 7.00; lime, 21.00; phosphorus, .42. II.—Metallic iron, 41.30; silica, 6.10; lime, 18.64; phosphorus, 3.51. III.—Metallic iron, 45.33; silica, 31.67; lime, 13.62; phosphorus, 9.58.

In the case of analyses II. and III., which, with analysis I., are taken from the report of Dr. J. W. Spencer on the Paleozoic group of Georgia, it is probable that the high percentage of phosphorus is due to clerical or typographical error, and that the amounts should be, respectively, 0.351 and 0.958.

The following analyses were made by Dr. Gustave Bidel, for the Dade Coal & Iron company, from hard ores mined at Rising Fawn:

Iron.	Insoluble Residue.	Caustic Lime.	Phosphorus.
30.38	8.21	26.79	.331
28.34	10.64	25.71	.289

28.87	8.07	26.88	.304

Soft ore from Rising Fawn yielded the following partial analysis: Metallic iron, 59; silica, 9.11; phosphorus, .092.

The following complete analysis of the fossiliferous hematite from Iron ridge near Burnt Mill in Walker county, is from the first report of progress of the geological survey of Georgia, by Dr. George Little:

Water and organic matter at red heat.....	1.91
Iron	54.69
Oxygen	23.44
Insoluble matter.....	12.57
Alumina	7.42
Phosphorus	.19
Sulphur	Trace

Specular Hematite.—In some of the foot hills of the mountains in the eastern part of Bartow county, gray, compact, crystalline hematite occurs in stratified beds. A micaceous hematite is found associated with quartz in veins of the crystalline rocks in the Cherokee ridge.

LIMONITE.

Large deposits of compact limonite, commonly known as brown iron ore, are found principally in a broad belt of country between Lookout mountain and the Cohutta range. It occurs in detached beds resting on the concrete rocks of nearly all geological ages. It is probably derived from the alteration of silicates containing considerable iron, which has been washed down and deposited in low places. The beds are more numerous and extensive east of the Chattoogata range. Most of them are confined to a series of cherty ridges; but some of the most extensive beds are in the Chattoogata range, in Snake creek gap, where they occur in the Silurian sandstone. The most westerly occurrence of the brown ore beds is in the ridges, which pass through Lafayette, Walker Co. It is found in this range, a few miles northeast of Lafayette; also near Graysville in Catoosa county, and again near the South Carolina camp ground in Chattooga county. In Bartow, Floyd and Polk counties the brown iron ores are found in large deposits, and have been extensively worked. Extensive beds occur also in the Cohutta range, and in a belt of country east of this, from Fannin to Cherokee. It also occurs in some localities, much farther southeast.

THE BROWN IRON ORES OF POLK COUNTY.

Six belts of brown iron ore in Polk county are well established, viz., first, that in the fault basin north of Indian mountain; second, one running from Etna to Caye Spring; third, the Cedartown belt; fourth, that southeast of Cedartown; fifth, the Fish creek belt; sixth, the Long Station belt. It is true that there are outlying deposits of brown iron ore, especially along the chert ridges; but the deposits in the belts above named are the most valuable. West of Little Cedar creek there is a basin two miles wide and eight miles long, extending from Indian mountain up into Floyd county. In this basin there are several deposits of brown iron ore. On the property of Mr. Linton Sparks, on lots 139 and 140, seventeenth district, there are pockets of good and indifferent ore, side by side. On the ridge near by there are several exposures of thick siliceous beds, some of which contain brown ore, rich in iron. These exposures occur on the Stott-Folger and other properties. In addition to these, there are other ferruginous beds, the ores of which are not so rich as those of the ore banks; but they have an advantage over the latter, in that they can be more economically worked. Some of this ore is manganiferous. "Hematite," a siding station on the western system of the Southern railway, is the outlet of these deposits.

On the east side of the valley a chain of ore-bearing ridges, coming in from Alabama, enters Georgia at Etna, on the property of Col. Hamilton. On the western side of the valley, except near Oredell, the hills are slaty and barren. The bottom of the valley is generally underlaid by Cambrian shales or slates; but the ridges to the east are composed of overlying decomposed Knox dolomite. Along the west side of these ridges there are subordinate ore banks. Extensive workings have exposed the ore on the state line to a depth of sixty or seventy feet, without reaching its bottom. While it is throughout a heterogeneous mass, still it contains thick beds of solid ore. This ore is less concretionary and more massive in form than is generally seen farther east in other Knox deposits, and contains more or less included quartz. Beyond Etna, similar ore occurs at Pryor's and Oredell. In an artesian well sunk at Oredell, the ore was found to continue to a depth of 180 feet. The ridges on the eastern side of the valley are characterized, to some extent, by accumulations of hard brown iron ore; but there are also other deposits associated with the quartzose beds of the gray lands. These deposits are generally inferior to those on detached ridges farther from the cherty beds. All these ore beds are convenient to the Southern railway. Farther north, on the eastern side of the railway, other workable beds of the ore are found, before reaching the Floyd line. Thus it is seen that the whole chain of ridges bounding the valley east of the railway constitutes a belt of rich ore ridges. The great iron deposits of the Cedartown district enter Georgia at Esom hill, near which are the Brewster and other banks. These ore banks re-occur at various points, as for example, on Mr. Rice's property near Berry station. The largest group of ore banks is two or three miles south and west of Cedartown, chief among which are the Reed, the Ledbetter, the Peek, the Wood, and other ore deposits, many of which are now included in the properties of the Augusta and the Central mining companies. The ore also appears at Mr. Waddell's and Mr. Frank Shefflet's, two and a half miles north of Cedartown, and on other lands. These ore banks rise from a few feet to fifty or a hundred feet above the valley. The ores are usually small, concretionary masses; but there are some blocks or boulders of large size. Southeast of Cedartown these ore banks are not continuous throughout the belt. Two of the ore-bearing ridges rise up through overlying Chickamauga shales two miles south of Cedartown. Another iron-bearing locality occurs east of the shale basin south of Cedartown, near Young's mills, and at the Cleveland, the Pittman, the Cox and the Ray ore banks, between Young's and the Crystalline belt, to the south. A few miles east brown ore beds of the Knox series again come to the surface, near Fish creek. At Grady there is a group of extensive ore deposits, belonging to the Cherokee Iron company and the Central Mining company. Other iron-bearing ridges extend southward, as at Hickman's and Simpson's mines (lot 1015, twenty-first district), W. O. Morris's (lots 1088 and 1133), Mrs. Morgan's and Mr. Winn's (lot 1060, twenty-first district). This belt continues northward, with interruptions, to within a mile or two of Seney, and thence into Floyd county. Ore occurs in this belt on the lands of T. H. Peek and others adjacent, lying north of Grady; also on several lots belonging to Messrs. T. Colbert, B. F. West and others, making a continuous belt across the county. Another belt lies adjacent to the Southern railway, between Rockmart and Seney, and especially in the vicinity of Long Station is it abundant. From these beds large quantities of ore have been shipped, the principal mines being those of the Central Mining company, the Randall and the Cochrane.

The Deaton mine, situated near Taylorsville, represents the principal working of the Deaton ore series. It is on lots 64 and 81, eighteenth district. The Central Mining company has similar deposits on and adjacent to lot 1076 of the same district, and they also occur on lots 714, 715, 868, 869, 870 and 932, all of the eighteenth district. These accumulations represent residual beds of the series, which rest upon the Chickamauga limestones, and at the edge of the hills of the Rockmart slates; they belong to the sub-carboniferous formation. The back part of the Deaton mine is an almost solid mass of iron ore. The favorable conditions of occurrence, and the situation directly upon the railroad permit the loading of the ore at a less cost than any other ore in the state.

BROWN IRON ORES IN FLOYD COUNTY.

As in the case of the Polk county limestone, so the deposits of Floyd county belong to the Knox series. Entering Floyd county from Polk, the belt from Etna continues northeast, and, with many breaks, does it extend across the country among the Knox ridges eastward of Van's valley. This region is more broken than in Polk county, exposing more ore beds; but they are of inferior size. The ore is also frequently seen among the cherty ridges. Of the property lying between Cave Spring and Rome, on which the ore beds occur, that of Dr. Montgomery, north of Cave Spring, on lot 620, where the ore is mined, may be mentioned as a type.

The Little Cedar creek belt enters Floyd county, and extensive deposits in this belt crop out on the properties of Maj. James M. Couper, of Atlanta. Continuing onward, the features of the country are rounded adjacent to Cedar creek, and there is a considerable number of ore banks. Mr. J. W. Asbury's lot, about two miles northeast of Cave Spring, has an extensive bank situated in the valley. Near by, ore occurs on the land of Mr. Wiggins (lot 948), on that of Mr. Simmons (lots 923 and 924), and on other properties. Ore also occurs near the creek, on the farms of Messrs. Roberts and J. R. Scott; but it is here associated with much chert. In the district northeast of Cave Spring, near Six-Mile Station, there is an ore-bearing ridge, on the farm of Mr. Gibson. Again, ore is found in many places near the western Knox ridges; and, in some cases, the deposits are large.

On lot 692 and adjacent properties there is a large development of brown ore. Further south, on the Cave Spring road, a large outcropping of siliceous brown ore occurs, just back of New Prospect church. It also outcrops at the top of the red ridge back of this church. This ore occurs on R. S. Brammon's land (lot 14, twenty-second district); and, near J. A. Howell's bauxite beds, large deposits occur on lot 610, twenty-second district.

Near Seney are several brown ore deposits, of greater or less importance, and the same is the case in the vicinity of Silver Creek postoffice. Between Spring and Silver creeks, large deposits of ore are found on the lands of Dr. Boyd, Messrs. C. Ivens, T. Cochrane, L. Mathews, S. Hoffman and J. B. Alexander. The valley of Spring creek forms another belt of ores. This is a continuation of the Long Station belt in Polk county. Several deposits occur about Chulio, and large deposits east of Rounsaville, passing into Bartow county. On the Blastock and other properties, north of the Etowah river, and in the northeastern corner of the county, adjacent to Armstrong mountain, many deposits of the ore occur, forming a continuous belt.

THE BROWN IRON ORES OF BARTOW COUNTY.

In the western part of this county, the brown iron ores of the Knox Dolomite series occur, mostly near the Floyd county line. North of the river, the largest developments are adjacent to, and mostly west of, the Western & Atlantic R. R. The country is broken by ridges; but these are continuations from Polk and Floyd counties. A few miscellaneous ore deposits in the central part of this county cannot be correlated with the other belts, except that they are a part of the Knox Dolomite series. The Spring Creek belt enters Bartow southwest of Rounsaville. Extensive beds are found near Ligon, and the ore is in abundance, the conditions being similar to those at Cedartown. North of the Etowah river, in Tom's creek valley, the ore occurs in an excess of chert. West of Linwood and west of Adairsville, and in the Connesenna valley, ore crops out at many places, at some of these in considerable quantity. Small quantities of the ore occur in the upper part of Cedar creek in the northeast part of the county, and near Roger's station (W. & A. R. R.). In the Petty's creek valley, about five miles north of Cartersville, brown iron ore covers some of the Knox Dolomite ridges. The brown ores are extensive in the eastern part of the county; but they belong to the semi-crystalline rocks, on the border between the Crystalline Belt and the Paleozoic Group. As an instance of the importance of this group of brown ores, it may be stated, that, between Oct. 1, 1890, and Nov. 1, 1891, one company alone shipped 30,000 tons of the ore.

BROWN IRON ORES OF GORDON, MURRAY, WHITFIELD, CATOOSA, CHATTOOGA, WALKER AND DADE COUNTIES.

In Gordon, Murray, Whitfield, Catoosa, Chattooga, Walker and Dade counties, brown iron ores of the Knox Dolomite series are found in small quantities; but, as yet, no extensive deposits have been discovered. A peculiar brown ore, which is pseudo-specular, with smooth surface and sub-metallic luster, belonging to the Deaton ore series, occurs in the ferruginous rocks extending from a point east of Varnell to the Tennessee line, and are to be seen at the Catoosa company's property, one and a half miles from Varnell, and near Red Clay, on the land of Mr. W. K. Shedd.

In the extreme southeastern part of Walker county, sub-carboniferous brown ores occur in large quantities, upon the east side of Horn's mountain, extending into Gordon county, west of Sugar valley. These ores also occur upon the western side of Big Texas valley; and similar ore is seen at many points, where the Fort Payne chert comes to the surface, as at Fox Ridge.

The following analyses of some of the brown iron ores will be of interest:

In 1890, of the brown ores from the Knox series, 200,000 tons were shipped outside the state. Besides this quantity, about 60,000 tons were consumed in furnaces in the districts. Many of the deposits are too far from the railway, as yet, to be brought into market.

Yellow Ocher.—Yellow Ocher of very good quality occurs at Rockmart and at Cartersville. Ocher works have recently been established at Rockmart for the manufacture of paint from these ferruginous clays, and at Cartersville an establishment has been in operation for some years. It is to be regretted that these deposits have not, as yet, been surveyed, and for this reason fuller data cannot be given.

MAGNETITE.

Magnetite is iron proto-sesquioxide, and has a composition of: Metallic iron, 72.4; Oxygen, 27.6, equalling 100.0. This mineral, which is commonly called magnetic iron ore, is iron-black in color, and has a metallic luster splendent to sub-metallic. Its hardness is from 5.5 to 6.5, and the specific gravity of the crystals is from 5.168 to 5.180. It crystallizes in the Isometric system, and is usually found, when in crystals, as octahedrons. There are six varieties known to mineralogists, only one of which is common. This is what is known as magnetic iron ore, or ordinary magnetite, occurring in massive crystals, and as loose sand. When massive, it ranges from very coarse to fine granular, and the sand is what is known as black sand, usually found in the pannings from placer gold mines. It is also found in places where rocks have decomposed, leaving the fine magnetic crystals unchanged. Magnetic iron ore is in great demand for the making of steel, and many occurrences of it, extensively worked, are to be found in the United States. In Georgia it is found in a number of places in the Crystalline Belt, but principally in two belts extending across the state, one along the west base of the Blue Ridge, from a point where it enters the state from North Carolina, passing through Gilmer, Cherokee and Cobb counties. The other follows the Chattahoochee ridge along its entire length. This ore also occurs, in scattered fragments, over large areas. It is so abundant in some places, where little or no prospecting has been done, as to point to the probable existence of large deposits. There is said to be a large deposit of it near the city of Atlanta.

LEAD.

Lead occurs in Georgia, as galena, in a number of widely separated localities, both in the Crystalline Belt of middle and northeast Georgia, and in the Paleozoic formation of northwest Georgia. Galena, the most common ore of lead, contains: Lead, 86.6; sulphur, 13.4, equalling 100.0. It belongs to the Isometric system, and usually occurs as cubo-octahedrons. It has a highly perfect cubic cleavage, and readily breaks into cubes. Its color is lead-gray, and its luster metallic. Its hardness ranges from 2.5 to 2.75, and its specific gravity is from 7.4 to 7.6. It occurs at the Magruder gold mine, in Lincoln County, Ga., associated with gold, silver and chalcopryite, and other gold mines in that section of the state. It is also associated with gold near Cartersville, and with silver and chalcopryite it is found at the west of the Cohutta mountains, in Murray county. It is found in considerable quantity in Wilkes county, disseminated in quartz. In small quantities it occurs in a limestone bluff on the side of the road running from Toccoa to Clarkesville, in Habersham county; also in Union, Fannin, Floyd, Bartow and Catoosa counties. At Graysville, in Catoosa county, a small vein was exposed by a cut in the Western & Atlantic R. R. Again, in this county, five or six miles northeast of Ringgold, it occurs in a sandstone ridge. In Bartow, small quantities have been found associated with barite.

COPPER.

Several species of the compounds of this metal are found in Georgia, especially in the counties of Union, Towns, Fannin, Cherokee, Paulding, Harralson, Carroll, Murray, Fulton, Lincoln and Greene. It has been found native with its compounds at the Magruder mine, in Lincoln county. The principal copper mineral occurring in Georgia is chalcopryite, a double sulphide of iron and copper. As such it occurs in veins in Fannin county, being an extension of the celebrated Ducktown deposits, across the state line in North Carolina. It is said that these deposits in Fannin are equally as rich as those at Ducktown, and would pay well for working. The veins can be traced for several miles. They have also been worked to some extent near the North Carolina border. A copper vein has been opened up on the top of the Blue ridge, in Lumpkin county. This vein can be traced several miles northeast and southwest, following the trend of the mountains. At the Canton mine, in Cherokee county, cantonite and harrisite are found associated with chalcopryite, which is mined for copper. Chalcopryite is also mined by the Paulding Copper company, at Dallas, Paulding Co.; by the Tallapoosa Mining company, in Harralson county, and it is found at other localities in Lumpkin, Fannin, Towns, Fulton, Carroll, Murray, Greene, Lincoln, Habersham and Rabun counties. In the latter good mineral specimens have been found.

SILVER.

This metal has been found associated with ores of lead, copper and gold in many localities; but not in sufficient quantity for profitable mining, except as a bi-product. It is said to have been found in the form of native silver; but it is usually contained, as a sulphide, in galena. It is exceedingly rare to find galena which does not contain at least a small percentage of silver. The principal localities for silver are given under the subject, "lead." Many stories of rich deposits of silver in the northern portion of the state have had free circulation; but they have usually been traced to peripatetic self-styled experts, who have come into the state as adventurers, and who have been able to get a sufficient number of people to believe their stories, and thereby create some excitement, from time to time.

GOLD.

Gold has been found in paying quantities in certain belts in the great Crystalline area, running northeast and southwest. Two of these are continuous across the state, coming in from North and South Carolina, and continuing into Alabama. It is probable that when field surveys have been made, and sufficient judicious prospecting has been done, other belts will be found to be continuous, though at present they are arranged by irregular patches, usually lying parallel to the large belts referred to. Investigations are now being carried on by the geological survey of the state, which, when finished, will give the proper areas in which gold is found in paying quantities. Of the two large belts referred to, one enters the state in Rabun county, and passes through Habersham, White, Lumpkin, Dawson, Forsyth, Cherokee, Cobb, Paulding and Carroll counties. The other enters Habersham from South Carolina, and passes through Hall, Forsyth, Gwinnett, Milton, DeKalb, Fulton, Campbell, Fayette, Coweta, Meriwether and Troup counties. In the first of these is located the noted locality lying in and around Dahlonega; also the well-known mines of White county and Cherokee. In the latter is the Franklin mine, which is so well known. Another important but short belt, coming into the state on the line between Columbia and Lincoln counties, runs into McDuffee and Warren. The mines of this belt have produced over $1,000,000. The gold fields north of the Chattahoochee river were the first discovered in the state, and they have been the most extensively worked. As indicated above, the other gold belts in the state have been imperfectly prospected; and in extensive areas, where gold may be expected to occur, it has not been looked for at all. Prospecting with the pick, pan and shovel ceased to a great extent at the outset of the California excitement. The mining operations now conducted are on a more extensive scale than they were when the pioneers ceased work; and, when modern improvements in machinery and methods of working are introduced into the state, much better results may be expected. There are very few places in the crystalline area of the state where gold may not be found in more or less quantity. In 1882, according to the report of the director of the United States mint for that year, Georgia produced gold as follows:

Rabun county	$ 10,000
White county	25,000
Lumpkin county	225,000

Dawson county	15,000
Cherokee, Cobb, Paulding, Carroll, Towns, Union, Fannin and Gilmer counties	30,000
Hall county	2,500
Miscellaneous	5,000

The reports were not all official, and in some cases the amounts were thought by the director to be overstated, and after careful reviewing the total amount was placed at $254,500, which shows an increase over that of 1881 of $120,500. In 1883 the gold product fell off to $199,000, and the next year to $137,000. In 1885 it was $136,000, and in 1886 $152,500, an increase of over $16,000 over the year before. In 1887 the gold product was $110,000, and in 1888 $104,000, while in 1889 there was a slight increase, the product being $107,000. In 1890 the gold product was $100,000. In 1891 it was $80,000. In 1892 it was $94,734, and in 1893 it was $97,200. Many causes have been assigned as reasons why the gold miners of this state did not receive more encouragement. It is stated that a great deal of disastrous mining was caused by bad management, and a lack of good judgment as to the methods used in mining. In some cases, extravagant plants were put up at a cost, sometimes, of several hundred thousand dollars; and not enough return being made to the stockholders, work would be discontinued, as the property would not prove a paying one for such extravagant investments. If better judgment had been used at the outset, the plants would have been started in an economical way, and, as the output would justify, the amount of money invested would be increased. This plan has paid in working the marbles of the state, and marble plants, which began in a small way, have now increased in size as the output justified. In 1889, according to the statistics of the eleventh census, 173 foremen or overseers, 250 mechanics, and 228 laborers, were employed in Georgia in gold and silver mining above ground, while in underground work, seventeen foremen or overseers, forty-one miners and ninety-three laborers were employed. The average wages paid foremen was $1.60, miners, $1.05, and laborers eighty cents.

The following are the names of some of the principal gold mines in the state: The Cherokee, the Franklin and the McDonald mines, in Cherokee county; the Hand, the Barlow, the Pigeon Roost, the Ivy, the Singleton, the Lockhart, the Chestatee, the Boly Field and the Findlay mines, in Lumpkin county; the Loud and the Calhoun mines, in White county; the Magruder mine, in Lincoln county; the Columbia and the Walker mines, in McDuffie county; and the Glade, the Currahee and the Mammoth mines, in Hall county.

OCHERS.

In composition, the ochers are impure earthy varieties of several mineral species, being soft and pulverulent, instead of forming compact masses. Red ocher is a mixture of earthy hematite and clay in varying proportions. Yellow ocher is a similar mixture of limonite and clay. Bog manganese and iron form an unber, and bog manganese and graphite with clay form black pigments. The red fossil hematite found in northwest Georgia is frequently free from grit, and is easily ground, yielding a very fair red ocher. In many parts of northwest Georgia yellow ocher occurs with the limonite ores. A very fine quality occurs in workable quantities at Stegall station near Cartersville, and was mined a few years ago by the Cherokee Ocher and Barites company. This material occurs with barite on the banks of the Etowah river, near the railroad bridge. A very good deposit of light yellow ocher occurs near Sandersville, in Washington county. An earthy ocherous concretion is found in south Georgia in small, round pebbles that have covered the surface of the earth. When free from grit, as it is in some localities, it may be utilized as an umber. Graphite with clay, forming a black pigment, is found in a number of localities in the state, which are mentioned under the subject of graphite.

BARITE.

Barite is used alone and mixed with white lead, when ground, as a paint; and, owing to its high specific gravity and white color, it is well fitted for such purpose. There are several beds near Cartersville, and one east of Spring Place in Murray county. This mineral occurs both crystallized and massive in these localities, and is associated with yellow ocher.

ASBESTOS.

This is a variety of hornblende, very finely fibrous; it is used for many purposes in the arts. It was used by the ancients, and is still used, for making fireproof cloth. It is used for making all kinds of fireproof material, such as steam-packing, ropes, board, paint, linings for iron safes, etc. Of late years, a very fine silky variety of serpentine, mineralogically known as chrysolite, has been used for asbestos; and it has, to a very large extent, supplanted the true asbestos. This material occurs in large quantities in certain localities in Canada. It is more easily fusible than the true asbestos; but it is better for practical purposes, in that it is much more easily woven into cloth. Asbestos is found in Towns, Rabun, White, Habersham, Hall, Cherokee, Douglas, Carroll, Fulton, DeKalb, Clayton, Walton, Heard and Troup counties, in this state.

A very important industry has recently sprung up in Habersham county, where asbestos of short fiber is mined at the top of Sal mountain, ground into pulp, and all the impurities thoroughly washed and leached out of it. It is then put into a compress; and a very fine grade of fire-brick, pipes and other articles are made from it. Near Clarksville, in this county, an asbestos of even better quality is said to have been recently found very convenient to the Blue Ridge & Atlantic railroad. Lately, fine specimens of asbestos have been taken from a locality in Hall county, the fiber being much longer than that in Habersham county.

COAL.

All the coal measures of Georgia are found mostly in Dade, Walker and Chattooga counties, extending over an area of 200 square miles. Five distinct beds of bituminous coal of very good quality are found near the top of Lookout mountain. At Coal City, in Dade county, this coal has been extensively worked by the Coal City Mining company. A narrow-gauge railroad was constructed to the mines, which are 800 or 900 feet above the valley. The fine coal was coked, and the balance was shipped, to be used for steam and grate. Of the two principal beds worked here, the Castle Rock vein yielded the hardest coal, best suited for the grate. Of the five beds known to exist in Lookout mountain, one is below the surface beds of sandstone and conglomerate, constituting the brow of the mountain. This is the greatest in areal extent; but it is of inferior quality at most of the points where it is exposed. Above this bed, there are found beds exposed in and around Round mountain, a horse-shoe shaped eminence, of a few hundred feet, on the top of Lookout mountain. The beds differ much in thickness, as does each bed of the different localities of its exposure, varying from one to five feet. For nearly twenty miles south of Round mountain, the sandstones and shales, which form this eminence, are spread out in a nearly level plain, and probably contain beds of coal, though not exposed. In Chattooga county, some of the beds are exposed near Little river. The coal mining in Georgia is carried on by the Georgia Mining Improvement & Investment company, of which Mr. Julius L. Brown is receiver, and the Chickamauga Coal & Iron company, P. J. Murphy, receiver. In 1893, the Dade Coal company, a division of the Georgia Mining Improvement & Investment company, mined at Coal City, Dade Co., 199,682 short tons of bituminous coal, and manufactured 90,726 short tons of coke. During the same year the Chickamauga Coal & Iron company mined at Chickamauga, Ga., 172,509 short tons of coal, the cost of mining which was 64 cents per ton.

Lignite is an inferior coal of brown color, constituting the transition stage between the original wood and bituminous coal. It has been found in small quantities, near the probable limits of the tertiary formations in Georgia.

PYRITE.

This mineral, which is an iron sulphide, has a composition of iron, 46.7; sulphur, 53.3. It is extensively employed in the manufacturing of sulphuric acid and copperas. It is found in large quantities in this state. A large number of veins were opened before the war in different parts of the state by people who were searching for copper. Most of the shafts sunk for this purpose exposed pyrite, with only a small percentage of copper, derived from chalcopyrite associated with the pyrite. Considerable deposits are found in Fannin, Cherokee, Paulding, Harraleson, Carroll, Fulton and Lumpkin counties. It has been worked near Dallas, in Paulding county, and the ore was shipped to Atlanta, for the manufacture of sulphuric acid. It is said that the vein of this mine averages five or six feet, increasing in size and in the quality of the ore, with the increase of depth. It yields from 40 to 42 per cent. of sulphur and 5 per cent. of copper, with some silver and a little gold. A very fine deposit of pyrite in Lumpkin county is now being worked, with the view of bringing the ore to Atlanta for the manufacture of sulphuric acid. A deposit of pyrite in Fulton county, near Atlanta, has been worked; but it is not there in sufficient quantities to be remunerative.

MANGANESE.

This material occurs in northwest Georgia, usually as the minerals pyrolusite and psilomelane, more or less mixed. Some of the most beautiful specimens of the former have been taken from these deposits. Pyrolusite is a manganese dioxide. It is blue-black in color, steel-gray when crystallized, and has a metallic luster. It belongs to the orthorhombic system, and has a hardness of from 2 to 2.5, and specific gravity of from 4.73 to 4.86. It occurs, sometimes, in needles; but usually in Georgia, when crystallized, the crystals are small prisms with rounded pyramidal terminations. The theoretical composition of pyrolusite is manganese, 63.3; oxygen, 36.7.

Psilomelane is a heavy mineral, with hardness ranging from 5 to 6, and specific gravity, from 3.7 to 4.10. It is black or steel-blue in color, and usually occurs in botryoidal, stalactitic or irregular shaped masses, the cavities of which are often lined with the crystals of pyrolusite. In composition, it is a hydrous manganese manganite, in which part of the manganese is often replaced by barium or potassium. According to Laspeyres, its composition is $H_4 Mn O_5$. The barite contained in it varies from a trace to 17 per cent., and the potash goes as high as 4 per cent. When free from clayey matter, the ore contains from 45 to 60 per cent. of the metal.

Braunite is a mineral, whose hardness varies from 6 to 6.5, and its specific gravity from 4.75 to 4.82. It crystallizes in the tetragonal system, and occurs both massive and crystalline. Its color is black and brownish-black, and its luster is sub-metallic. In composition, it is a siliceous oxide of manganese, containing silica, 10.0; manganese protoxide, 11.7; manganese sesquioxide, 78.3.

Manganite has a hardness of 4, and its specific gravity ranges from 4.2 to 4.9. It crystallizes in orthorhombic prisms. It also occurs crystalline massive. Its color is black, and its luster is metallic. When pure it contains oxygen, 27.3; manganese, 62.4; water, 10.3.

Wad or bog manganese is a light, earthy brown or black mineral, containing considerable impurities. In manganese, it varies from 15 to 45 per cent. While the two first named minerals, named here, occur most abundantly, yet mixtures of all these, with braunite and manganite, are often found in Georgia. The principal ore is psilomelane. These manganese ores occur in masses, from the smallest particles to a ton in weight, besides the larger pockets in beds. With all the manganese ores, more or less silica is included, even in the concretionary and stalactitic, and in the prepared ore more or less clay adheres to the grains and lumps. Besides this ore, there are in Georgia many mixtures of manganese and iron ores, which are of value. A valuable deposit of manganese ores occurs south of Cave Spring, where it was mined, until recently, by Maj. James M. Couper, of Atlanta. Some of the better quality of the ore yielded the following analysis, made by Mr. J. Blodgett Britton:

Metallic manganese	53.440
Ferric oxide	2.830
Baryta	8.620
Water	1.560
Silica	7.790
Alumina	1.520
Lime	0.080
Phosphoric acid (Phosphorus .064).....	0.147
Oxygen with manganese, undetermined, etc.....	24.013
	100.000

In this case potash was not determined. Other samples contained a larger amount of water. For commercial purposes, the analysis of carload lots is of more value than those of picked samples. On Dec. 1, 1889, a carload of 30,200 pounds, from Maj. Couper's mine, yielded the following results:

Manganese	46.749
Iron	1.746
Silica	13.050
Phosphorus	0.059

On Mr. Asbury's property, northeast of Cave Spring, surface ore sent to Carnegie & Co. gave the following results:

Manganese	45.189
Iron	7.840
Silica	7.620
Phosphorus	0.053

Ore from the Barnsley estate gave the following partial analysis to the Pittsburgh Testing company:

Manganese	43.730
Iron	1.010
Silica	3.530
Phosphorus	0.129

The presence of phosphorus has an important bearing on the value of ore, as its greatest use is in steel manufacture. Good ore should not contain over 0.2 per cent. of phosphorus. However, the manganese ores of Georgia are usually as low in this objectionable element as those of Virginia, which yields the largest supply. A large number of shipments of ore from Georgia show only 0.05 to 0.167 per cent. of phosphorus, and the ores are consequently low in this element.

Manganese ores occur in the Crystalline Belt, near Mount Airy, in the semi-crystalline rocks east of Cartersville, and in the Knox dolomite series of the Paleozoic group. The Cartersville ores have been extensively worked for many years, their product in 1887 being 9,024 tons, and in 1888 5,568 tons. There are three principal districts of manganese in the Knox dolomites of northwest Georgia. These are on ridges extending from south of Cave Spring northward to near the Etowah river; a belt near the border of Bartow and Floyd counties; north of the Etowah river in the region of Woodlands, and the Tunnel hill district, on the border of Whitfield and Catoosa counties. These districts are of broad extent, and include the distribution of the belts occupied by parallel ridges.

Cave Spring District.—In this district manganese ores occur with the iron in many localities, but the most important deposits are on a belt commencing in Polk county and extending eight or ten miles northeastward, with occasional scattered deposits, to a point near the Etowah river. The largest deposits which have been worked are those of the Georgia Manganese and Mining company, commencing in Polk county, about two miles south of Cave Spring, and extending two and a half miles northeastward. The principal works are on a hill 195 feet above the valley of Cedar creek. The summit is covered with red or brown clay, varying from two to four feet in thickness, and containing manganese gravel. The ore of the surface clay is mostly in small grains and nodules, although masses of a ton in weight have been met with. Through the clay there is also much coarse manganese powder, which is not of value at the present time. Beneath the clay covering is brecciated cherty clay, the remains of the decomposed manganiferous cherty limestones. Through this clay some layers appear to be entirely free from manganese. But other seams contain lenticular masses or pockets of manganese ores, and the general position is probably that of the original beds of dolomite, dipping at about 20 degrees southeastward. A shaft has been sunk to a depth of fifty feet, penetrating large masses of ore. Stringers of manganese ores extend irregularly through the ore-bearing lands. As far as the shaft has been sunk there is no appearance of the original solid rock. Near by, on the side of the hills, the partially solid strata appear with the beds, dipping in some cases as low as 10 degrees nearly eastward. Layers of manganese ore are seen especially in the clays of the decomposed limestone, above and below some of these beds. Much of the ore is concentrated by the removal of calcareous matter, although part of the manganese has also been lost. Some of the manganese concretions in the clay may have been segregated from the mineral dissolved out of the original rock, and thus a portion of the "shot-ore" pellets and gravel nodules may be accounted for, especially in the surface clays.

Northeast of the Georgia Manganese and Mining company's (Maj. J. M. Couper, president) property the surface ore is shown on the lands of Mr. Asbury, on lot 922, on the lands of Mr. Simmons and others. On Mr. Asbury's the lower part of the hill is cherty, and the manganese accumulations are scattered over the red or chocolate-colored clay. Again, to the northeastward, manganese occurs on ridges of red land belonging to Mr. W. I. Taylor, on lot 840, third district, and on other adjacent banks. On a ridge to the eastward of the last deposit are the Rice or Hatchett manganese beds (lot 822, third district), near Prospect church. The localities given are only a few of the known deposits in the district. There are many places where explorations have been made, by sinking pits, and more or less ore has been taken out. The ores in this belt are not confined to one series of ridges, but they occur on several parallel hills, and extend on the county line between Polk and Floyd, from Maj. Couper's mine to near the Chattanooga, Rome & Columbus railway, the belt of country having a breadth of several miles. The geological conditions for the occurrence of the manganese ores continue from the northern part of Polk county to the Etowah river, although they narrow somewhat in breadth as they pass northward. Laterally the belt extends from Van's valley to near Spring creek. Manganese and manganiferous iron ores also occur in the narrow Knox basin, west of Cave Spring, on the property of Mr. Simmons and others. These deposits are about two miles west of Hematite station, on the Southern railway.

Woodlands, or Barnsley District.—Manganese is also found in deep red or chocolate-colored loam on the low ridges adjacent to the valley of Tom's creek. The occurrence is similar to that near Cave Spring. One pit, twenty feet deep, was opened, and fifty tons of ore were taken out of it. In part, the deposit resembles breccia, with manganese oxides for the cement. In this locality there is a large number of unworked deposits exposed to the surface.

Tunnelhill District.—From a point west of Tunnelhill, a narrow belt, mostly a chain of ridges, extends northeastward into Tennessee. The ore in the surface pits in these ridges is mostly in a residual clay, which is of variable depth. Upon this belt, about three miles from Tunnelhill, some extensive openings have been made by the Catoosa Mining company. One shaft is said to go down into the residual cherty clays to a depth of 210 feet. Manganese often closely resembling that in the deposits east of Cartersville, is seen on the surface about this mine. Manganese ore has been seen, to a limited extent, upon the Knox dolomite ridges, southwest of Tunnelhill, and at other points, but the quantities are not large.

The first serious attempt at working these manganese deposits was inaugurated by Maj. James M. Couper, at the mines near Cave Spring. An improved plant was constructed at this place, with two Cornish rolls, double log washer, screen, five giggers, etc. The water for washing was brought from Cedar creek, a mile away. It is only by means of the improved methods of washing that the separating of the siliceous matter from the ore can be satisfactorily accomplished.

At Tunnelhill a still more extensive plant has been constructed. The deposit in Bartow county is probably the finest in the United States, outside of those of Arkansas.

MAGNESIA.

Large quantities of dolomite, in the form of crystalline marbles, and hard magnesian limestones occur in northwest Georgia. Dolomite, which is a double carbonate of magnesia and lime, is used for the manufacture of magnesia and its salts. These are very extensively used in pharmaceutical preparations, and these deposits may, in course of time, become a source of revenue. The mineral, magnesite, a carbonate of magnesia, has not yet been found in Georgia.

PHOSPHATES.

Besides the mineral, apatite, a calcium phosphate, large deposits of the calcium phosphate are found, which are of fossil origin. They are largely used in the manufacture of fertilizers, and the large deposits of apatite in Canada and in Norway are used for the same purpose. The phosphates, which are of organic origin, are found in nodules and fossil bones in southern and southeastern Georgia. Some of these deposits have become very compact, and form a cryptocrystalline rock. Considerable work was done at Boston, near Thomasville, in southwest Georgia, a few years ago, but on account of the scarcity of material, and the inferior quality of the phosphate, which contained considerable sand and clay, work was discontinued at this place. Some of the marls contain a small amount of calcium phosphate, and when these are used a good fertilizer should result. The mineral, apatite, has been found associated with corundum and phlogopite, at the Laurel creek corundum mine, in Rabun county, Ga. Six months' work was done during the first part of the years 1894 and 1895, by the geological survey of the state, in the southern part of Georgia, in making a survey of the phosphate and marl deposits. Material has been obtained for the first of a series of bulletins on this subject, and it is probable that it will be issued during the fall of 1895.

GYPSUM.

This mineral, when ground, is used under the name of land plaster. It is also calcined and becomes the plaster-of-paris of commerce. The finer varieties, such as alabaster, are used for statuary and for other ornamental purposes. The majority of the statues and other ornaments made of white and mottled stone, brought to this country from southern Europe, and sold as marble, are made of this material. In composition it is a hydrous calcium sulphate. It is found in the tertiary deposits of Georgia to a limited extent, also in Wilson's cave, in Walker county, as incrustations on some of the limestone, and in efflorescent crystals on the floor of the cave. It is not known to occur in the state in workable quantities.

GRAPHITE.

This mineral is carbon. The finer varieties of it are manufactured into pencils. The inferior grades are used for imparting luster to iron; and with this in view, much of it is made into stove polish. The grades of graphite which are free from grit are used as a lubricant for machinery, and the more common grades are used for the manufacture of crucibles used in the liberal arts. In Elbert county there is a mine of very fair quality which has been worked to some extent. This is the largest deposit of this mineral yet opened in the state. Graphite is said to be found in the same belt in Madison and Clarke counties. It occurs also in small pockets at the base of the itacolumite along the county line between Pickens and Gilmer. An impure variety is found in Hall, Douglas, Cobb, Paulding and Troup counties, as well as in many other localities in north Georgia. This variety will serve for stove polish, or when thoroughly washed it will make a fair lubricant.

MICA.

Large masses of crystals of muscovite occur in the gneissoid rocks in the northern part of the state, along with quartz and feldspar. This mineral is the mica which is used in stoves and for a variety of other economic purposes, even the scraps and refuse having a market value. It is found in Rabun, Union, Fannin, Gilmer, Pickens, Cherokee, Paulding, Carroll, Jasper and Morgan counties, and lately it is said that a large deposit has been found in Hall county, which will produce very large sheets. The mineral has been mined to some extent in many of the counties mentioned, but no work of production is at present being done.

CORUNDUM.

This mineral, which plays so important a part in the manufacturing enterprises of present civilization, has been found in a greater number of localities and in greater abundance in Georgia than in any state in the Union, except North Carolina. So far as is at present known no gems of this species have been found here except two or three quite small in size and of inferior quality. The massive variety occurs in large masses in the widely-known Laurel creek corundum mine in Rabun county. Other mines and unworked deposits occur in this county and in Towns, Union, Lumpkin, Habersham, Hall, Forsyth, Cherokee, Cobb, Paulding, Douglas, Carroll, Heard, Troup, Walton and Upson counties, many of which could be mined at a fair profit. The industry in this state is yet in its infancy.

TALC.

This mineral is a magnesium silicate, having three varieties. The first is foliated talc, which is little used in commerce; the second is steatite or soapstone, and is of massive compact form; the third is pseudomorphous. Steatite or soapstone plays an important part in the arts as a material for lining furnaces and for making hearths, fire-places, stationary wash-tubs, etc. As a lubricator it is used for reducing friction in machinery and by shop-keepers in the form of a powder for fitting gloves and shoes. It is cut into little square thin blocks and is known as "French chalk," used by tailors. When finely ground and perfumed it constitutes many of the cosmetic powders now on the market. A very coarse variety called pot-stone was many years ago used by the Indians for making pots and other rude vessels for their domestic uses. A beautiful light green talc has been mined in Murray county, near Spring Place. White talc is said to occur in the marble belt running from Fannin to Cherokee county.

SANDSTONE AND SAND.

Sandstone is sand which has been compacted; geologically they are the same. Loose sand is used for making up mortar and for other building purposes; also for making molds for foundries. Quartz sand is used for the making of glass, etc. Large quantities of excellent quartz sand are found in various parts of the state. Sandstones are found in great varieties in northwestern Georgia, but very little, so far as is known at present, is of commercial value.

Within a few miles of Graysville, in Catoosa county, is found a deposit of brown sandstone, owned by the Southern Brownstone company. The Chattoogata mountains contain sandstones of various shades and colors, many of which are white, gray and even brown and red. Some of these exist in massive compact bodies, while others have a jointed structure, which makes them easily quarried. The thickness of the entire series of sandstone is about 800 feet. Building stone of this character may be had also on Lookout and Sand mountains and in the Cohutta range. Large deposits of itacolumite, a thin bedded sandstone, often flexible, occur in the Chattahoochee ridge and in Pine mountain.

FLAGSTONES.

Many of the stratified beds in middle and north Georgia contain thin layers, well suited for sidewalks and street crossings. The banded gneiss, found so abundantly along the southern slope of the Chattahoochee ridge and south of it, has been much used on the streets of Atlanta and is well-suited as a flagstone. In Dade, Walker and Chattooga counties excellent flagstones occur about the base of the coal measures. The rock is a compact sandstone of great strength, with a smooth cleavage corresponding to the bedding. The only uses yet made of this stone is as hearths for fire-places. Slabs can be obtained from the quarries in any desired size or thickness. The bed is found covered by debris from overlying rocks, but it is well exposed in the Lookout gulf, near Trenton, in Dade and at Eagle cliff and Pigeon mountain in Walker county. Hard sandstones that cleave readily into thin slabs are found in the Cohutta range, in the eastern parts of Murray, Gordon and Bartow counties.

SLATES.

The important requisites for a good roofing slate are durability and the capacity for splitting readily and evenly into thin plates. The fine-grained varieties are used for writing slates and softer kind for pencils. Cleavable slates are found in great quantities along or near the line of contact between the Silurian and Metamorphic groups, near the Cohutta, Silicoa, Pine Log and Dug Down mountains. The most noted locality in which roofing slates are found in the state is on the eastern side of Polk county. The slates outcrop in steep hills, apparently in beds of great thickness and have been extensively worked at Rockmart. These slates are of a dark color, approaching closely to black, and are very fine-grained, cleaving readily into thin plates. Dark colored slates are also found in Bartow, Murray, Gordon and Fannin counties. Slates of buff and light green shades are found in large quantities near the northern portion of Bartow county.

MARBLE.

The marble belt enters Georgia from North Carolina, in Fannin county, and runs in a southwesterly direction through Gilmer, Pickens and Cherokee counties. The quarrying and working of marble constitutes one of the most important industries in economic geology in the state of Georgia. The first quarrying was done on a small scale in Longswamp valley, near Tate, Pickens Co., in 1840, by Fitz. T. Simmons. Previous to this time, however, the marble was worked in a small way for bowls and other utensils by the Cherokee Indians, the original inhabitants of this section of the country. About two years after Simmons began work he erected a mill with one gang of saws on the east branch of Longswamp creek, near Marble hill. This mill is said to have been rather primitive, but the same methods of cutting the marble are now employed in our best mills. In 1850 Tate, Adkinson & Company opened a quarry in the vicinity of what is now the Georgia marble works, and erected two mills on the creek, one above and the other below the quarry.

In 1854, Summy & Hurlick, who ten years before had opened a quarry two miles east of Jasper, again renewed work at that place. Immediately after the war this quarry was worked by Robinson, Richardson & Besinger for nearly two years, but it was afterward abandoned until 1885, when the property was opened up by the Perseverance Marble company, with James P. Harrison as president. This company erected a steam mill and opened up new quarries, using steam drills and all the machinery necessary to carry on a first-class quarry. These works, which employed a number of hands, continued operations for only about three years, turning out a great deal of marble, which was used for various purposes. At the end of this period the greater part of the machinery was moved to what is now the Piedmont marble works, where railroad facilities were immediately at hand.

The Georgia Marble company, which works the Creole, the Etowah and the Cherokee quarries near Tate and the Kennesaw quarry at the foot of Marble hill, was organized in the spring of 1884, with a capital of $1,500,000. Previous to this time Georgia, which is now recognized as the second state in the Union in the production of marble, was practically unknown to the trade, but the energy and businesslike methods of this and other companies soon organized, with the good quality of the marbles produced, soon brought the state into the front ranks as a marble producer. The first work of the Georgia company, after securing the control of nearly 7,000 acres of marble property, was to construct and equip a branch railroad from the quarries to the main line of the Marietta & North Georgia railroad. This road was extended up to the Kennesaw marble quarry, and is the outlet for the produce of the Piedmont and Southern Marble companies.

The Southern marble quarries were opened in 1885 by Miles & Horne, contractors for the state capitol of Georgia, in which they used some of the best of the stone for the stair steps and the principal part of the tiling. Since the first quarry was opened three new quarries have been opened, and a good mill has been erected. Only one of these quarries is at present being worked.

The Piedmont Marble company opened up its quarry a short distance from the Kennesaw quarry; but in the latter part of 1893 they opened up a new quarry, close by the first. Both these quarries produce an excellent grade of white marble, with much of it almost free from blemish. The value of the output in 1893 is estimated to have been $261,666. During the first six months of that year the marble industry in Georgia was said by leading producers to be in the most flourishing condition it has ever enjoyed. In the latter part of the year, however, the demand was light and business dull, owing to the terrible financial depression existing all over the country. About the first of 1894 the Piedmont Marble company secured a large contract for marble for the building of the new St. Luke's hospital in New York city, the contract amounting to about $240,000. In addition to the true marbles occurring in the counties above named, there are semi-crystalline limestones in Murray, Whitfield and Floyd counties, which take a high polish and afford a very good ornamental stone. Large enough pieces for practical use have not yet been found; and these deposits have not produced any marble of economic consequence. The marble belt, running from Fannin to Cherokee, is about sixty miles wide, and lies on the border line between the well known Paleozoic group and the broad belt of crystalline rocks. Constant streams are everywhere abundant; the larger ones are rapid, and furnish fine water-power. The Marietta & North Georgia railroad runs parallel with the marble belt, throughout its entire length; and at no point is the outcropping at a greater distance than three miles from this road.

The marbles enter Fannin county from North Carolina in two almost parallel lines of outcroppings, about two miles apart. The eastern line makes its first appearance on the head-waters of Hamestring creek, a small stream flowing to the northeast and emptying into the Notteley river. The marble here is composed of small crystalline grains of dark or light gray color. One mile southwest of this exposure, on the same creek, marble is found on the Polk-Patterson property. It underlies for nearly a quarter of a mile the western base of High Top mountain, and is one of the most extensive surface exposures in Fannin county. The indications are that this deposit must be at least eighty feet thick. It is evidently a continuation of the outcropping mentioned above. A limited amount of work has been carried on here to ascertain the extent and character of the stone and to secure specimens for exhibition. A large slab of this stone was sent to the Piedmont exposition at Atlanta in 1887 and attracted a good deal of attention. In color it is light or dark gray, more or less banded with black; but marble of a flesh color tinged with green, and quite similar to the Etowah marble, also occurs. The crystalline grains are small, of a uniform size, firmly cemented, and afford a high polish. Small crystals of chalcopyrite, and here and there a few scales of mica are found; but neither is in sufficient quantity to seriously injure the marble for architectural purposes. As far as examined, the deposit is comparatively free from seams and cutters; but its general soundness can only be determined by further prospecting.

On J. M. Garrison's property, one and a half miles southwest of the Patterson property, marble is found near Cutcane creek, a small stream flowing parallel with Hamestring creek, but in an opposite direction. The marble lies here in a narrow valley, about five feet beneath the alluvial soil. Only one excavation has been made, at which the marble can be examined. The color and general appearance of the stone are quite similar to the marbles above described, being, however, of a somewhat coarser texture. This property has not been prospected sufficiently to reveal anything definite as to the extent or soundness of the stone.

In the immediate vicinity of Cutcane postoffice, on the property of D. L. Gray, marble occurs in the creek bottoms, overlaid by four or five feet of alluvial soil. This marble has been used to a limited extent for making lime for local consumption, but no regular quarrying has been attempted. Two miles farther down Cutcane creek, on the property of Mrs. Dean, marble outcrops in the creek bottom. This has been used for making lime. In places the marble is quite cleavable, owing to parallel layers of mica; but the exposures are not sufficiently extensive to be able to tell whether this mineral extends throughout the deposit. Near the junction of Cutcane and Hemptown creeks, on what is known as the Park property, considerable prospecting work has been done for marble. A quarry was opened here, and many cubic yards of stone were removed, the work being finally abandoned, before any of the marble was marketed. The texture of this stone is well suited for ornamental purposes; but on account of its unsound condition it is a question whether or not it can be quarried with profit. The prevailing colors are white and light gray, with an occasional band of black. Mica and tremolite are the principal accessory minerals, forming long masses of crystals, which are quite conspicuous on the weathered surface.

One mile east of Mineral Bluff marble is found in a somewhat hilly section, close to the road leading to Morganton. Two excavations, only a few yards apart, each about twenty feet square and ten feet deep, have been cut into the marble by channeling-machines, and large blocks have been taken out. The marble from one of these openings has a very fine texture and snow-white color, but mica occurs in some of the layers in such abundance as to cause them to split quite easily along certain lines. In the other opening the marble seems to be of pure quality, though of a dark color, but even this contains mica and tremolite. The white varieties of stone here resemble in texture and color some of the Italian marbles, and, were it not for the impurities, it would command a high price as an ornamental stone. However, the extraneous minerals in marbles are frequently quite local, and sometimes disappear in a few feet, when a stratum is being penetrated. The soundness, also, may vary at different depths.

On Weaver creek, about one mile east of Blue Ridge, marble occurs on the Cox property, outcropping at two or three places along the creek. The deposit covers quite an area in the creek bottom, lying only a few feet beneath the alluvium. The texture and color of the stone is similar to that found near Mineral Bluff, having the same impurities, with an addition of some crystals of chalcoppyrite. In the neighborhood of Sweet Gum postoffice, the western line of outcroppings enters Fannin county from North Carolina, occurring first near the state line, in a narrow valley along Rapier Mill creek, on lot seven, eighth district, first section. Just across the state line, near Culberson, N. C., a quarry is in operation, and a great amount of valuable stone has been shipped to eastern and western cities, where it always commands a high price, because of its superior quality. The marble at both these places is similar in texture and color, the crystalline grains being small and firmly united, forming a dense, compact marble, which admits of a brilliant polish. Ordinarily the color is dark gray, but black and light gray with black bands occur. Mica and other impurities are less abundant here than at other places, described above in Fannin county. At Arps' Spring, one mile southwest of Sweet Gum postoffice, on lot 42, eighth district, first section, marble again appears in the Rapier Mill creek valley, occurring in a depression about the spring, underlying an area of about half an acre. Drill-holes put down here a short time ago to the depth of thirty feet do not pass through the stratum. The core was generally sound and free from impurities. The stone differs but little in texture and color from that of lot No. 7. A similar marble is said to have been recently found on Youngstone creek, near Cole's crossing.

On the Dickey property, at Toccoa river, a large pit about thirty feet square and fifteen feet deep has been sunk near the railroad bridge, exposing the marble. It here appears to be in large boulders, though on the opposite side of the river the marble is said to underlie a considerable area about the mouth of Youngstone creek. No attempt has been made to develop this. Specimens from this deposit contain numerous cutters and seams, being generally unsound. Further development, however, might bring to light a better quality of the stone.

On the poorhouse farm, one mile southwest of Blue Ridge, near the Marietta & North Georgia railroad, marble occurs along a small stream, showing at two exposures a dark gray marble of coarse texture with less mica than is usually found in the marbles of Fannin county.

GILMER COUNTY.

Gilmer county, while containing extensive beds of marble, has not produced any either for building or ornamental purposes that would be of consequence from an economic standpoint. The stone has been used to a limited extent for making lime, but no quarries of any kind are at present in operation. Prospecting has been carried on to a limited extent, and a few pits and drill-holes have been sunk, but not to an extent sufficient to give very definite information as to the deposits.

On Rock creek, near Cherry Log postoffice, on the property of J. L. Lacey, it is found in the bed of the creek and in the adjacent bottoms, covering an area of less than an acre. One or two pits have been sunk, but no attempt, by boring or otherwise has been made, to ascertain the thickness or general soundness of the stone. Specimens from this deposit are usually of a light or dark gray color, and are of fine texture. Weathered surfaces show but little mica or other impurities. The water-power of Rock creek and the closeness of the railroad would be special advantages in the development of this property.

Near White Path marble is found on the property of P. B. Whitaker, outcropping along White Path creek below the railroad trestle and on both sides of the railroad, underlying an area probably of three acres. The cores taken from two or three drill-holes ten to thirty feet in depth are said to have been generally sound throughout their entire length, though the stone taken from the creek was somewhat laminated, on account of the considerable amount of mica it contained. In color and texture the character of the stone is similar to that found on the Lacey property, though some of the layers on the east side are quite black, and likely to be taken for slate. On the Holt property adjoining there are several outcrops of marble about the junction of Big and Little Turniptown creeks, and it is said to underlie a number of acres in the immediate vicinity. The property is practically undeveloped. The general appearance of the stone is similar to the lighter varieties found on the Whitaker property, though a pale-blue variety also occurs. The texture is fine, and the grains are difficult to distinguish with the unaided eye. The outcroppings at some places show somewhat laminated structures, while at other places the stone seems to be apparently free from impurities. The appearances indicate an extensive deposit at this place, and much valuable stone is likely to be found. Big Turniptown creek is a stream of considerable size, and would furnish fine water-power for operating quarries on this property.

Near the headwaters of Tolona creek, five miles south of Ellijay, on John Ray's property, a series of outcroppings extend along the creek for about six miles, with only one or two interruptions. The stone is fine-grained, and light-gray or white in color; but no work has been done in testing the extent or the quality of the stone. On lot 260, tenth district, second section, a few hundred yards south of the last exposure, a somewhat extensive outcropping occurs near the creek, as a twelve-foot bluff. A small quarry for lime making was opened here some years ago; but has since been abandoned. Much of this marble seems to be quite solid and free from mica, weathering evenly on the exposed surfaces. Its color and texture are similar to the texture and color of the stone found on the Ray property. On lots 142 and 143, eleventh district, second section, one and a half miles south of Tolona postoffice, marble forms a line of cliffs as far south as Price's creek, being mostly light colored and fine grained, though a dark or mottled variety, closely granular, occurs, both varieties containing more or less mica, especially the fine-grained variety. Quartz in the form of veins and nodules appears on the weathered surfaces, though the marble which has been exposed in the cliffs for a long period ordinarily shows even weathering. An eighty-foot drill-hole was put down into this marble near the railroad trestle on lot 142, two or three years ago, without passing through the marble. This property has not been sufficiently developed to reveal its character as to soundness or freedom from impurities.

Marble bluff, the property of Henry Gartrell, joins lot 142, and lies along the east side of Tolona valley, just below the mouth of Price's creek. An eighty-foot bluff, almost perpendicular, is exposed along the Marietta & North Georgia railroad. This is one of the most extensive natural exposures of marble in the state; but, so far, it is practically undeveloped. The thickness at this place is about 175 feet. The stone varies greatly in texture and color, pink, white and dark-gray prevailing. The white, however, is most abundant. The gray is rather coarse in texture, but the grains are so firmly cemented as to form a very solid marble. The white and pink have a very fine texture, and when free from mica they admit of a fine polish. A small quantity of chalcopyrite and quartz occur as inclusions, but they are not present in sufficient quantities to be injurious. About a year and a half ago, a company began quarrying, but the work was afterward temporarily suspended. No previous work of development had been done on this property, except the digging of one or two pits in the creek bottoms to ascertain the extent of the stone. This property is more favorably located for the production and shipping of marble than any other in Gilmer county, having all the advantages of railroad facilities, suitable grounds for the location of mills and marble yards and a mountain stream of considerable volume to furnish the necessary water-power. This stream for the first two miles above where it enters Tolóna valley, has a fall of nearly 100 feet, and the narrow valley becomes so contracted that retaining dams could be constructed with little expense.

PICKENS COUNTY.

While there are possibilities in the marble deposits of Fannin, Gilmer and Cherokee counties, yet the real value of the Pickens county deposits has been proven by their successful working. Large plants have been established, and large quantities of marble of good quality have been shipped to market. These marbles, which are in the same belt as those of the counties above mentioned, enter Pickens from Gilmer on lot 140, fifth district, second section, adjoining the Gartrell property. The bluffs here are almost as high and precipitous as those on the lot adjoining; the only apparent difference in the character of the stone being the absence of the flesh-colored layers. A few hundred yards farther down the creek, on lot 139, a considerable quantity of marble has been quarried for lime-making. The capacity of the mill, which is located on the east side of the railroad on a siding, is about 1,000 barrels per month. A drill-hole has been put down thirty feet in the marble on the opposite side of the railroad from the lime-kiln, and the core is said to have been quite solid, throughout its entire length.

On the Godfrey property, near the mouth of Fisher's creek, is an extensive exposure of marble which seems to be the southern terminus of the deposit in Tolona valley. Between this property and the lime-kiln the marble continues throughout lot 138, forming high bluffs. A small quarry, long since abandoned, was opened on the Godfrey property more than forty years ago in order to secure marble for tombstones. These stones, which are to be found throughout the country in various graveyards, are little affected by atmospheric agencies after so long an exposure. The color of the marble is usually light or dark-gray, and its texture varies from coarse to fine-grained. The coarser, which predominates, is sounder than the fine-grained, and contains scarcely any mica. About half a mile south of this exposure, running parallel with it, is another line of marble outcroppings, belonging to an entirely different stratum. It is an impure, dark-colored stone with a somewhat slaty cleavage, forming a bluff thirty or forty feet in height near Fisher's creek. The same stratum seems to outcrop opposite Tolona school-house, and is found near the state line in Fannin county; but only in the vicinity of Ball Ground and Canton, in Cherokee county, is it likely to be of any economic value.

On the headwaters of Fisher's creek, four miles northeast of Talking Rock station, several hundred dollars were spent a few years ago in prospecting for marble, on the Eager property; but no quarry was opened. The prospecting consisted mainly in stripping the earth from the marble, with the view of determining the extent and character of the deposit. The crystalline grains making up the stone are somewhat irregular, though usually small. The coarse and fine-grained varieties, however, generally lie in different strata, the light colors on top.

Two miles east of Jasper, on Longswamp creek, is the property of the Perseverance Marble company. This is an almost continuous series of bluffs forty or fifty feet in height and nearly a mile in length. Four quarries have been opened, one of which was extensively worked a few years ago and produced much marble. For lack of suitable railroad facilities the greater part of the machinery of these quarries was moved to the Piedmont works. The stone of these quarries is of a snow-white color, and has a fine texture. However, seams are of frequent occurrence, making it difficult to quarry large blocks. Some of this stone weathers uniformly, and some, containing more mica, has rough and irregular weathered surfaces. The texture is fine and close, admitting of a brilliant polish, and making it valuable for ornamental purposes. Two diamond-drill holes, one 111 feet and the other 130 feet deep, respectively, failed to pass through the stratum of marble, the cores showing the character of the stone to be similar to that exposed in the outcroppings. The thickness of the deposit is about 200 feet. Longswamp creek, which divides on this property, has a good fall, and could be easily utilized in furnishing water-power for an extensive quarrying plant, at a comparatively small outlay of money. The marble continues south from these quarries, along the east bank of the creek for about two miles, to a point near Tate's mill. Some prospecting has been done at two places along the bluff where the stone very closely resembles in color and texture that which is found farther up the creek.

Marble occurs on both sides of the east branch of Longswamp creek, on the Disheroom property, one mile east of Marble Hill postoffice. The outcropping on the south side of the branch runs west until it reaches the junction of the two branches of the creek, where it turns abruptly to the south, following the east side of the main stream for nearly two and a half miles, finally disappearing in the overlying gneiss. It is along the east and west line of this series of outcroppings that the Southern marble quarries, the Kennesaw quarries and the Piedmont quarries lie, in the north side and at the base of Marble hill. There are only two natural exposures of marble on the Disheroom property, and these are so limited as to admit of only a very imperfect idea of the general character of the stone. However, the indications do not seem to be very good. On the lot owned by William Pool, adjoining this property, the marble seems to be much more extensive. The stone, which has been slightly prospected, is very similar to that found at the Southern marble quarries. These quarries are located on the north side of Marble hill, four miles east of Tate, with which it is connected by a branch road from the main line of the Marietta & North Georgia railroad. Four large quarries have been opened here, each of which has been extensively worked. Quarry No. 1, lying farthest to the east, is situated on the hillside and is connected with the mill by an incline railway, about 100 yards long. An excavation, eighty feet square and thirty feet deep, in the upper part of the stratum has been made, and a great deal of stone has been taken out at this point. The stone taken from this quarry is very solid, rarely showing any seams or lines of stratification, and, as a consequence, blocks of almost any size can be secured. The natural outcroppings show a remarkably uniform mode of weathering. The crystalline grains making up the stone are usually large and semi-transparent, giving the surface of the marble a somewhat mottled appearance, rather than a uniform white. In places a number of accessory minerals are found, the most common being mica, which seriously interferes with polishing. The marble attains at this place a thickness of nearly 200 feet, dipping to the south at an angle of about 20 degrees. Quarries Nos. 2 and 3 are a short distance farther down the creek, on the same hillside, but nearer the valley, each about the same size as quarry No. 1, and producing a similar marble, though not of such uniform white color. Quarry No. 4, which is the only one worked at present, is still farther down the creek, and well up on the hillside, in the upper portion of the stratum. The marble here appears to have less mica and other impurities than that from the other quarries, but it retains about the same texture and color as that from quarry No. 1.

The mill, located in the valley near quarry No. 1, is connected with the quarries by an incline railway, so graded that the cars, when loaded, run by reason of their own weight, directly to the mill. The company has an excellent plant, with a capacity for turning out a large amount of marble at a comparatively small expense.

The Kennesaw quarries, owned by the Georgia Marble company, are located three-quarters of a mile west of the Southern company's plant, at the base of the hill. Two excavations, near each other, have been made on this property, one 72x90 feet at the top, gradually increasing in size by channeling, to a depth of eighty feet. The other one, recently opened, is 110x90 feet at the surface. The stone is snow-white, with an occasional blotch of black or dark gray, resembling very closely the marble from the Southern quarries in texture, being generally sound and free from impurities. There is a large annual output of stone for monuments, furniture, interior decorations, etc., from these quarries.

The Piedmont quarries are only about 200 feet west of the Kennesaw quarries, on the same portion of the stratum, the amount of marble found here being practically inexhaustible, its thickness, while difficult to determine with any degree of accuracy, being at least 200 feet. The color and texture of the stone are practically the same as the Kennesaw marble. Seams frequently occur in the stone, however, and cause considerable waste. Otherwise it is comparatively free from defects. One of the best equipped marble mills in the south is owned by the Piedmont Marble company, and is located at these quarries. The company is now turning out a large quantity of marble, under a $240,000 contract for the building of St. Luke's hospital, in New York city. This is probably the largest single contract which has been secured by any of the marble companies in Georgia.

The Herndon property, owned by James P. Harrison and others, is located in the valley south of Marble hill, opposite the Piedmont quarries. There are two or three places of natural exposure, but the deposit lies under alluvial soil, at a distance varying from two to six feet from the surface, and more than an acre in extent. At one point a quarry has been opened and large blocks have been taken out, of very superior quality, being white, almost free from blemish, and of texture much the same as the marble of the Southern Marble company's quarry No. 1, except that the accessory minerals, especially mica, are not so abundant. The dip here is near 12 degrees southeast, indicating only a slight change from the original perpendicular position of the marble. For this reason, the stone will probably be found to be generally sound. Nearly half a mile below this opening, toward the northeast, where the valley becomes contracted, marble outcrops at several points on the south side of Marble hill. A few narrow bands of flesh-colored marble have been observed here, but otherwise it is similar to that found at the quarry just described. A branch road was begun in 1893, to connect this property with the Piedmont quarries. When finished, the company proposes to begin work on an extensive scale.

The Griffin property, at present controlled by the Georgia Marble company, lies immediately west of the Piedmont quarries, on the same line of outcroppings.

A number of exposures occur on this property, extending along the east side of the creek, and on the hillside for about two and a half miles. The lower part of the stratum, near the creek, is, at places, of a flesh-color, while that on the hillside is white, with blotches of dark gray. At a number of places along this line of outcroppings a limited amount of prospecting has been done, but no regular quarrying has been attempted.

Two miles northwest of the Piedmont works, and on the opposite side of a high ridge, marble occurs on S. A. Darnell's property. This is an entirely different line of outcroppings from the one above described, though the structure of the marble and the character of the associated rock both show that it belongs to the same stratum. For nearly two miles these two lines of exposures run almost parallel with each other, but they seem finally to unite in the lower end of Tate's bottom. The marble found on the property above mentioned, near the juncture of the two branches of Longswamp creek, is of a somewhat finer texture than that found at the other exposures in the vicinity, yet in color and structure it is quite similar. Very little prospecting has been done here, though across the creek, on the adjoining lot, owned by Dr. Tate, a number of drill holes have been put down to a depth of eighty or ninety feet, the cores showing the marble, it is said, to be generally sound, with a texture and color much like the Creole from the Georgia works. Some prospecting has been done, by boring and sinking pits, on a third line of outcropping, a few hundred yards west of the Darnell property, separated from it by a narrow ridge. This marble does not seem to form so thick a stratum as the other exposures farther west, but the general appearance of the stone remains the same.

The quarries of the Georgia Marble company are located in the valley of Longswamp creek, one and a half miles east of Tate station, on a fold in the stratum of marble, whose upper portion has been removed by erosion. The Creole and Cherokee quarries are located on the east side of this fold, while the Etowah is on the west side.

Of the Creole quarries, there are two within a few feet of each other, designated, respectively, as Creole No. 1 and Creole No. 2, the former, which was the first opened, being 80x85 feet at the surface, and gradually increasing by channeling to a depth of 130 feet, where it is 110x115 feet; and the latter 80x90 feet at the surface and ninety feet deep. The marble from these quarries is a beautiful white, mottled with blue and black, and is quite free from impurities and seams. The texture is quite coarse, and the bluish-gray clouding and banding gives variety to the white, and affords striking contrast. This stone, on account of the pleasing mottled effect and the brilliant polish it takes, is extensively used throughout the country for monuments and interior decoration.

The Cherokee quarry, 80x90 feet at the surface and forty feet deep, is near the Creole quarries. The marble here, however, is of a more uniform color than the Creole. Otherwise it is quite similar.

A few hundred yards east of the Cherokee quarry and near the creek, are the Etowah quarries, one of which has been extensively worked while the other has only recently been opened. In structure and texture the stone is much like the Creole, but it contains more impurities, finely distributed iron oxide in it giving it a pink or flesh color, while graphite, hornblende and a black mica produce a more or less banded appearance, with dark or light shades of gray. This marble is in great demand for interior decoration, and the company finds it difficult to meet the demand. Wainscoting, tiling, furniture and other ornamental subjects are worked up from this beautiful material. Fine examples of this marble are to be seen in the wainscoting of the first floor of the state capitol.

A branch railroad, owned and operated by the Georgia Marble company, connects its quarries with the main line of the Marietta & North Georgia railroad. The company's plant, including its mills, is well supplied with the latest improved machinery, all of which is kept in an excellent state of repair by a well-equipped machine shop. The mills are among the largest, as well as the most completely furnished in the country, from 150 to 200 hands being regularly employed at the works.

At Nelson, the first station south of Tate, marble outcrops near a spring located 200 yards south of the depot. A few outcroppings whose weathered surfaces resemble in general appearance the light-colored and fine-grained marbles in Longswamp valley, constitute the exposure of this property, on which some prospecting has been done. The quantity and quality of the stone, however, have not been sufficiently promising to justify the opening of a quarry.

CHEROKEE COUNTY.

Cherokee county, while long known to contain more or less marble, has never as yet become an active producer. The marbles in this county constitute the southern end of the belt entering the state in Fannin county, but the exposures are not so extensive nor so continuous as in the other counties. Here the dark and rather impure marble first noticed in Pickens and Gilmer counties is quite well developed, forming at places beds of considerable thickness. A limited amount of prospecting has been done at a number of localities in the county, though no regular quarries have been opened. The so-called green marble which has been worked near Holly Spring as an ornamental stone, is serpentine. Beautiful slabs of this have been gotten out. The stratum of dark-colored marbles makes its first appearance in Cherokee county, at the bridge on the road leading to Dawsonville, four miles northeast of Ball Ground, forming a series of outcroppings about ten miles long and extending in a southwestern direction by way of Ball Ground to within a short distance of Canton, where it seems to gradually thin out. It is exposed on both sides of the road west of the creek and has been used in constructing the piers of the bridge mentioned above. Some of the layers are very impure, forming micaceous sandstones, cemented with calcium carbonate and weather into a porous, sandy mass. Other layers have few impurities, are of a light-gray color and weather more evenly. This stone is hardly suited to building and ornamental purposes on account of the too great lamination and its many impurities.

The dark-colored marble again makes its appearance on J. Holbert's property, southwest of the bridge, on the right bank of Longswamp creek, being exposed at a number of places along the creek and in the field near Mr. Holbert's house. The stratum attains a thickness here of at least 100 feet. No prospecting of any consequence has been done on this property, and the quantity and quality of the stone can only be surmised from its natural exposures. In these the stone varies considerably both in structure and composition, in some places being more or less slaty in structure on account of the quantity of mica contained, while at other points it is solid and comparatively free from mica and other impurities. While the color is usually dark-gray, yet a light-gray and black are also found. The latter seems well suited for tiling, but on account of impurities it does not weather evenly.

A coarse-grained, white marble has been recently discovered on lot 296, fourth district, second section, on the opposite side of the creek from the Holbert property, being exposed at only one place in a small stream near the point where it empties into the creek. The stone here resembles the marble in the vicinity of the Georgia marble quarries, and it is probable that it belongs to the same stratum. Nothing is known of the extent of the deposit, as little prospecting has been done on the property. Along the road between the Holbert property and Ball Ground, the dark-colored marble is exposed in a number of places, showing up especially well at Farmer's Spring, the general character of the stone being about the same as that at other exposures. An exposure of marble occurs on Mrs. Stern's property, near the road leading to Canton, three-quarters of a mile south of Ball Ground, and at a number of places along a small branch, being usually unevenly weathered, due to mica and other impurities, more or less abundant in the stone. It is dark-gray or black in color and is fine-grained and compact, admitting of a fair polish. It, however, has a more laminated structure. Other outcroppings belonging to the same stratum may be seen at a number of places along the road leading to Canton. Six miles northeast of Canton, near Mabel station, is quite an extensive deposit of marble, outcropping in two small streams on property owned by G. W. Crain. The marble is exposed for more than 100 yards by one of these streams, running at almost right angles to the strike of the marble. The total thickness of the deposit at this point must be at least 120 feet. In color it is dark-gray or black, the colors sometimes alternating with each other, giving a banded appearance to the marble. Mica and magnetite with an occasional crystal of pyrite, the general impurities of the stone, frequently become so abundant along certain lines as to cause a slate-like cleavage and irregular weathered surfaces. The portions of stone which are more solid admit of a fair polish and seem well suited for tiling, etc. About two miles west of Canton, on the Chattahoochee Mining company's property, is another exposure on this line of outcropping, where the stone is used for making lime. The deposit is here very greatly reduced in thickness and has no economic importance as a building-stone.

Two miles west of Ball Ground, on Sharp Mountain creek, is a second line of marble outcroppings, which appears to be a part of the same stratum which has just been described. This extends in a southwesterly direction, parallel with the first line of outcropping, as far south as Hickory Log creek, where it has been prospected on the property of P. W. Stafford, the marble found being much like that found in the vicinity of Ball Ground, but of a much whiter color.

On L. E. Cowart's property, three miles southeast of Ball Ground, an exposure occurs along a small branch, near Sharp Mountain creek, which in texture and color resembles very closely that occurring in Longswamp valley. It probably belongs to the same stratum. It is rather coarsely granular and white or light-gray in color, banded with black, a flesh color much like the Etowah also occurring, but not appearing to be very abundant. The outcropping is so limited that definite information as to extent and general soundness of the deposit cannot be had. Surface indications, however, are favorable and would seem to justify a limited outlay of money in prospecting. Marble outcrops on the lot owned by T. J. Carpenter, on Ragsdale creek, six miles northwest of Canton. The stone is quite similar to the Cowart marble and evidently belongs to the same stratum. The deposit is not thick and is usually unsound.

About eight miles northwest of Canton quite an extensive outcropping of marble occurs on property owned by J. M. White, at the junction of Lost Town and Shoal creeks, exposed for fully a quarter of a mile along the left bank of Lost Town creek, in places forming bluffs some ten or twelve feet high. The marble occurring here is generally sound, though it contains fine sand. It is of a light-gray or pale-blue color. Judging from the exposure and the top of the deposit the stratum must be nearly eighty feet thick.

THE SEMI-CRYSTALLINE MARBLES OF NORTHWEST GEORGIA.

In a number of counties within the Paleozoic area in northwest Georgia limestones occur which are partly crystalline in character. They are found heavy bedded, and admit of a good polish. At a few places, in the counties of Murray, Whitfield and Floyd, this stone may become of importance for ornamental purposes.

MURRAY COUNTY.

At the base of Cedar ridge, five miles west of Spring Place, in this county, a great deal of work has been done in opening a quarry in the so-called black marble, but no marketable stone of any consequence has been shipped. The stone is a jet black carbonaceous limestone, belonging to the Oostanaula shales, and occurring in beds from six inches to two feet in thickness. There is little of it of crystalline structure, but the stone admits of a fair polish. Exposed to the atmosphere for any length of time it undergoes a change of color, due, evidently, to some change in the carbonaceous material. This, together with its occurrence in thin beds, is a serious drawback to its ever becoming important as an ornamental stone.

WHITFIELD COUNTY.

In the northwestern corner of this county is a narrow belt of dark chocolate and grayish marbles, highly fossiliferous, entering the county from Tennessee, about one mile east of Red Clay, and extending nearly parallel with the Southern railway for about ten miles. A good exposure of it occurs one mile east of Varnell's station, on the Eslinger farm. This marble belongs to the stratum which traverses the valley of east Tennessee, and which is so extensively worked in the vicinity of Knoxville. The quality of the stone is quite variable, and in color it is generally of a dark chocolate, variegated with white. There also occurs, in more or less abundance, a light gray and a beautiful pink. These various colors are frequently found at the same place, occupying different layers in the same stratum, or they blend into each other, so that almost any shade or color, from a dark chocolate to a light gray, may be secured. The light gray, which is always the most completely crystallized, is generally traversed by dark irregular lines, which give variety to an otherwise monotonous light gray surface. The exposures are mostly in the form of boulders, or large disconnected masses, which appear to be due to the surface weathering of thick layers of marble, with a somewhat jointed structure. Since this peculiar mode of weathering has been caused by surface waters, carrying carbon dioxide in solution, we may reasonably suppose that the boulders and disconnected masses unite and form continuous beds at no great depth. These beds, making up the stratum of marble, as shown by the outcroppings, are from two to eight feet in thickness. It is difficult to determine the exact thickness of the marble deposit at any point along the belt, on account of the overburden of earth and the limited outcrops. However, one would be safe in putting the minimum thickness at from thirty to forty feet. On the Haskin farm, one mile southeast of Red Clay, it probably attains more than twice this thickness, but it is not all salable stone.

The chemical and physical properties, together with the smooth surface of the stone, after being exposed for years in its natural bed, are conclusive proofs that the marble is well suited for building and ornamental purposes. The dark chocolate variety contains less calcium carbonate than the other, and its coloring matter is due to iron sesquioxide, in a rather coarsely divided condition. This variety contains numerous fossils, and is only partly crystalline. Owing to its beautiful color and brilliancy when polished, it is well adapted for furniture and interior decoration. The marble was worked many years ago, to a limited extent, on the Eslinger farm for tombstones, some of which are still to be seen in the church yards of the vicinity, in a fair state of preservation. At other places along the line of outcropping where the marble becomes thin bedded and easily quarried, it has been used locally for making chimneys, foundations for buildings, etc. The marble belt of this county is quite favorably located for the shipment of stone, as branch lines can be easily constructed from the main line of the Southern railway, along the numerous small streams which cut their way through the ridges, separating the marble belt from the railroad. Some of these streams will afford considerable water-power, which can be used in operating quarry machinery.

FLOYD COUNTY.

Near Six-Mile station, south of Rome, a considerable amount of money was invested a few years ago in an attempt to develop the black semi-crystalline limestone which belongs to the same formation as that at the base of Cedar ridge in Murray county. The stone found here, however, seems to have been much shattered and broken up by some great dynamic force, and to again have been united by white veins of calcite, which penetrated the stone in every direction, which give it a pleasing effect when polished. A branch road, nearly two miles in length, was graded from this quarry to the main line of the Southern railway, and quarrying machinery was purchased and put in operation; but the works were finally abandoned, before any stone was shipped, the principal trouble being due to its unsound condition and its variable physical structure.

MARBLE DRESSING WORKS.

In addition to the mills at the several quarries described, three companies are doing an extensive business in dressing marble for the market. They operate no quarries, but depend for material nearly altogether on the products of the Georgia quarries. One of these is the Kennesaw Marble company, which was organized in the latter part of 1891 with a capital of $72,000. Its plant was erected at the junction of the Western & Atlantic and Marietta & North Georgia railroads, just outside the city of Marietta. Another is the Blue Ridge Marble company, which was organized in 1886, with a capital of $100,000, and whose plant is located at Nelson, Pickens Co., on the Marietta & North Georgia railroad; while the third is the firm of George B. Sickles & Company, located within a few hundred yards of the Georgia Marble company's works near Tate. This firm was organized in 1886, with a capital of $10,000, but since then its plant has been greatly enlarged, in order to supply a rapidly increasing trade. All three of these companies are supplied with excellent mills, fitted up with all the best and latest improved machinery for dressing marble. They turn out all kinds of interior decorative work, such as tiles, wainscoting, pillars, etc., and columns, monuments, and other outside objects.

Physical Tests.—The microscope has been recently used in studying the structure of the marbles of Georgia, with interesting results, showing the most minute impurities, which might give rise to uneven weathering or to rapid disintegration, and the crystalline structure, whether it be pheno-crystalline or crypto-crystalline. In the recent investigation of the marbles of the state by the geological survey of Georgia, microscopic sections were made, some of which showed the grains of calcite to be very small and compact, besides showing whatever mica or magnetite or other impurities were in the stone. Other specimens showed the individual grains to be moderately fine-grained, with inclusions of mica, carbon, etc.; while some others showed the crystalline grains to be of considerable size. It is interesting to note that the pink marble from the Etowah quarries entirely lost its color, so finely distributed was the iron sesquioxide which gave it color.

Crushing Tests.—In the crushing tests one-inch tubes were used, or as near that size as were to be had. All the cubes showed very high resisting power, especially so in the cases of the Creole and Etowah marbles, from the Georgia company's quarries. A cube of the Kennesaw marble showed a compressive strength of 11,400 pounds per square inch; a cube of the Creole marbles, a compressive strength of 13,900 pounds per square inch; a cube of the Etowah marble, 13,200 pounds per square inch; and a cube of the Southern marble, 11,300 pounds per square inch. The cubes which burst formed a double cone, whose bases were the original compressed faces of the cube, thus showing the specimens to be sound, and that the weight was distributed equally over the entire surface.

Absorption Tests.—The absorption tests were made by drying the cubes for twenty-four hours, and afterward immersing them in water for seventy-two hours. The approximate percentages of absorption are:

Kennesaw	.008
Creole	.004
Etowah	.005
Southern, No. 1.....	.006
Southern, No. 2.....	.008

CLAYS.

Materials suitable for brick are to be found in almost all parts of the state, and need not here be amplified. A fine pottery clay occurs in large beds in the counties immediately south of the great belt of crystalline rocks. This clay is worked at Stevens' pottery, in Baldwin county, for fire-brick and tile, sewer pipes, flower pots, jugs, and other earthenware, it being white, quite soft and free from grit and other impurities. It was said by the proprietors of the Stevens' pottery that their clay-bed covered many acres of land, varying in thickness from four to ten feet. They also have one bed of pure fire-clay and two of pipe-clay, one of latter having the consistency of putty, while the other is not so tenacious. A belt of clays runs from Augusta, southwest through Richmond, Columbia, McDuffie, Warren, Glascock, Hancock, Baldwin, Wilkinson, Jones, Twiggs and Bibb counties; while another, still larger, beginning south of this in Washington county, and running in the same direction parallel with the first, passes through Wilkinson, Twiggs, Houston, Dooley, Macon, Schley, Sumter, Webster, Terrell, Randolph, Quitman and Clay. A third belt, smaller than either of these, begins in Polk county, and, passing through Tatnall and Appling, ends in Coffee county. By far the largest proportion of clays are mixtures of the several mineral species; but deposits of halloysite, kaolin, newtonite, etc., are occasionally found, especially kaolin, which is at times found in large beds. Kaolin is generally associated with large mica crystals, and masses of quartz in decomposed granitoid rocks, the kaolin resulting from the decomposition of feldspar. This mineral occurs in a number of localities in the central and northern parts of the state, at times snow-white and free from impurities. Halloysite, another clay species, has been found in the Devonian formations of Dade, Chattooga and Whitfield counties. This clay has been tested for pottery purposes with excellent results, and has been shipped from Dade county and used in the manufacture of alum, for which it seems especially adapted. An analysis of halloysite from Dade county, gave the following:

Silica	40.4
Alumina	37.8
Magnesia	0.5
Water	21.8
	100.5

In northwestern Georgia there are several types of clay: First, the kaolin-like clays; second, the clays derived from the decomposition of limestones and calcareous shales; third, those formed from the disintegration of shales; fourth, alluvial deposits. The kaolin type, in the Paleozoic group, occurs as "horses," or in sheets or pockets in the residual earths, derived from the decomposition of the Knox dolomite and Fort Payne chert series. They are at time pure white, stained occasionally by iron oxides; or this material may color the mass in streaks. In the cherty remains of other portions of the Knox dolomite, white siliceous, chalky clay occurs near Cave Spring and in Lookout valley in the Fort Payne chert. From this siliceous matter, the white clay could be mechanically separated, if the demand were great enough to warrant the expense. Halloysite occurs under similar conditions in the Fort Payne chert, and can be used for the manufacture of fine porcelain.

GRANITE.

Valuable deposits of granite and gneiss are to be found covering large areas in the state, and the quarrying industry in granite is probably one of the best-paying economic mineral industries in the state. Small areas are found in Rabun, Habersham, Troup, Meriwether, Harris, Muscogee, Talbot, Taylor and Crawford counties, while larger areas lie in Douglas, Campbell, Coweta, Heard, Elbert, Oglethorpe, Lincoln, Wilkes, Taliaferro, Greene, Hancock, Putnam, Columbia, Richmond, McDuffie, Warren, Glascock, Baldwin, Jones and Bibb counties. A very large area, the largest, in fact, in the state, lies in Jackson, Walton, Gwinnett, DeKalb, Rockdale, Newton, Henry, Butts, Clayton, Campbell, Fayette, Spalding, Pike and Monroe counties. It is said that the deposits of granite in Baldwin county are very fine and very extensive. The stone is bluish-gray and compact. At present, however, no quarrying is being done in this deposit. A grade of granite, of excellent character as a building material, is found near the Chattahoochee river, along its course across the state. This appears at intervals in the northeastern part of the state, and separates it from the large area south of Atlanta. This is from fine to medium-grained feldspathic granite, specked with black mica. It is worked at Stone mountain, one of the best known deposits of Georgia granite, and at Lithonia, by Messrs. Venable Brothers, of Atlanta; and the stone is used, in large slabs, for side-walks in cities; as Belgian blocks for road-paving in city streets, and for buildings. There is a large demand for this stone, and Messrs. Venable Brothers are kept constantly busy, in order to supply the demand. The granite at Lithonia is a continuation of the formation at Stone mountain, though lying at a lower level, and, having, perhaps, a greater proportion of hornblende and feldspar, which add to its value for street-paving purposes. There are at this place 500 acres, nearly all granite, a supply sufficient to meet any demand that may arise for centuries to come. The extent of the deposit is practically inexhaustible. The Stone mountain deposit is said to be the largest deposit of merchantable granite in the world. There are some 2,200 acres, of which 563 acres are granite, a solid granite mountain, measuring seven miles in circumference at its base, and containing, as estimated by competent engineers, 7,543,750,950 cubic feet of exposed granite above the level of the plain. The remaining acreage, at this point, is in part a virgin forest, and partly farming lands, affording ample space for any additional facilities for carrying on the extensive business, which is being carried on there. The Stone mountain quarries can be worked to a total capacity of 25,000 paving blocks per day, while those at Lithonia will yield 30,000 per day. The yield at Stone mountain can be increased to any desired output; but the Lithonia quarries are limited to a maximum of 40,000 or 50,000 blocks per day. The granite found in these two properties is of a light-gray color, of uniform grain and free from lamination. It is well adapted to all structural and street work. To facilitate the transportation of the output of the quarries, the proprietors own and operate two locomotives and fourteen miles of railway, besides numerous plants, consisting of boilers, engines, steam-drills and other machinery and appliances, the equal of any large quarrying outfit in the world. This company has furnished 1,700,000 square yards, laid in different cities in the north and south. Besides the immense shipment of granite blocks from the quarries at Lithonia and Stone mountain, curbing and cross-walking have been shipped during the same time, making in the aggregate near 100 square miles of dressed stone. Of this amount, Atlanta has used 436,490 feet. A number of buildings in Atlanta have been erected, in part, or whole, of this stone. Much of it presents a unique appearance, the layers of mica in it being so disturbed and distorted as to make very beautiful and pleasing effects, not in any way, however, interfering with the solidity of the stone. This variety comes from Lithonia.

Crushing tests were made of four two-inch cubes of the Lithonia granite, for the board of public affairs of Cincinnati, Ohio, by the engineering department of that city. One cube crushed under a pressure of 76,800 pounds; the second, under a pressure of 83,400 pounds; a third failed to crush under a pressure of 85,000 pounds, as did also the fourth. This work was done under the personal supervision of Lieut. Morrill, of the United States navy.

Compressive tests of four two-inch cubes of the Stone mountain granite are quoted from the official report on the compressive strength, specific gravity and ratio of absorption of the building stones of the United States by Gen. Q. A. Gilmer: No. 1 was not hurt under a pressure of 85,000 pounds; No. 2 was crushed by a pressure of 50,325 pounds; No. 3, by 48,760 pounds, and No. 4, by 65,610.

At Lexington, in Oglethorpe county, extensive granite quarries are worked by the Lexington Blue Granite company, of which Mr. S. H. Venable is president. This company was organized in 1892 with a capital of $80,000; but it has recently been reorganized, and active operations have been begun. The stone quarried by this company is fine-grained biotite-muscovite granite of light color, and susceptible of very high polish. It is used for building purposes and for monuments, pillars and other purposes requiring a fine grade of granite. The lower grades are used for curbing, flagging, crossings and Belgian blocks. The company owns seventy-five acres of land, of which about forty acres consist of a solid bed of granite, said to be practically inexhaustible. The company also owns a well-equipped broad-gauge railroad, running from Crawford, on the Georgia railroad, to Lexington, and thence to the quarries. There is an abundance of water running all the year round on the company's property, which can be utilized for running machinery, etc. This is one of the finest monument granites to be found in the United States; and, when it is better known, it will rank second to none. Its fine grain, fine color and freedom from blemish alike distinguish it.

Four two-inch cubes of this granite were submitted for tests at the United States navy yard; and, according to the report of Capt. W. T. Sampson, inspector of ordnance, United States navy, the following results were obtained:

No. 1, at 45,000 pounds, small piece spawled off of the corner. At 80,000 pounds, one corner spawled off badly. Did not crush. Pressure, per square inch, 19,801 pounds.

No. 2, at 80,000 pounds, small piece spawled off of one corner. Did not crush. Pressure, per square inch, 20,000 pounds.

No. 3, at 80,000 pounds, one side spawled off very badly. Did not crush. Pressure, per square inch, 19,900 pounds.

No. 4, at 60,000 pounds, commenced to spawl off. At 80,000 pounds, crushed. Pressure, per square inch, 19,801 pounds.

The greatest crushing power of this machine was 80,000 pounds. This company is furnishing the granite for building the new postoffice at Savannah.

MISCELLANEOUS BIOGRAPHIES.

THE FOLLOWING MISCELLANEOUS BIOGRAPHIES ARE GIVEN HERE BECAUSE IT WAS FOUND DIFFICULT TO ASSIGN MANY OF THEM TO THE PROPER COUNTIES:

O GLETHORPE, GEN. JAMES HOWARD, founder of the colony of Georgia, was born in London, Eng., Dec. 21, 1688, and was the son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, of Godalming, Surrey. At the age of 16 he entered Oxford college, but soon left to take the position of ensign in the Guards. Under Prince Eugene, he was in the campaign against the Turks in 1716-17, and took an active part in the siege of Belgrade. When twenty-four years old he entered parliament, and continued a member for thirty-two years. In November, 1732, Oglethorpe, with 116 settlers, embarked for Georgia, and in January, 1733, he arrived at Yamacraw and marked out a town and called it Savannah. In April, 1734, he returned to England, taking with him several friendly Indian chiefs. During his visit he sent to the colony 150 Scottish Highlanders and a number of German Protestants from Salzburg. He returned to the colony in 1735. Under his rule the colony prospered, but much trouble was had with the Spaniards, then in possession of Florida. This culminated in war, and in 1741 Oglethorpe made an unsuccessful attack on St. Augustine. A year later the Spanish invaded Georgia, but were compelled to retire by spirited resistance on the part of the colonists. In 1743 he returned to England to answer charges preferred by Capt. Cook, one of his officers. The court martial resulted in a vindication of Oglethorpe. He did not return to Georgia, and in 1752 resigned his charter of the colony to the British government. When, in 1775, Gen. Gage returned to England, the command of the British forces in America was offered to Oglethorpe, but he refused to accept, unless given authority to make concessions, and to pursue a plan of conciliation he thought proper with the colonies. Oglethorpe was a man of natural refinement and of culture that commanded the admiration of such men as Alexander Pope, James Thomson and Samuel Johnson. Oglethorpe's life has been written by Thaddeus M. Harris (Boston, 1841), Robert Wright (London, 1867), by W. B. O. Peabody, in Sparks' American Biographies. Gen. Oglethorpe died July 1, 1785.

S TEPHENS, WILLIAM, president of the colony of Georgia (1743-50), was the son of Sir William Stephens, Bart., and was born on the Isle of Wight, Jan. 28, 1671. His education was obtained at Winchester school and King's college, Cambridge. He came to South Carolina in 1712, and located at Charleston. Upon the recommendation of Gen. Oglethorpe, Stephens became secretary to the trustees of Georgia in 1737. In 1741 he was made president of the county of Savannah, and in 1743 president of the whole colony. He died in August, 1753, at the age of 82.

P ARKER, HENRY, president of Georgia (1750-54), was born near Savannah, Ga., about 1690. He was bailiff of Savannah in 1734, which office at that time was identical with that of magistrate, and shortly afterwards he colonized the Isle of Hope. When the province was divided into two counties, in 1741, he became an assistant to Sir William Stephens, president of the Savannah province, succeeding him in 1750. In that year he presided over the first assembly in Georgia in which the executive and the members addressed each other according to parliamentary formalities. When the province surrendered the charter in 1754 he resigned the governorship. He died at an advanced age on the Isle of Hope.

REYNOLDS, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1754-57), was born in England about 1700. He entered the British navy and became captain, and upon the surrender of the charter of Georgia by the British trustees, he was assigned by the king of England to the colony, with the title of "Captain-General and Governor-in-Chief of His Majesty's Province of Georgia, and Vice-Admiral of the same." He reached Savannah Oct. 29, 1754, and a new system of government was inaugurated. The first legislature was created, consisting of a council of twelve advisers to the governor, and a house of commons. Gov. Reynolds established friendly relations with the Indians, but soon became involved with the assembly in a dispute, and in 1756 was recalled to England. Failing to satisfy the board of commissioners with his explanations of his conduct, he resumed his position in the navy. He died in England, January, 1776.

ELLIS, HENRY, governor of Georgia (1757-60), was born in England in 1721, and was appointed to succeed Gov. Reynolds in the management of the colony of Georgia, in 1757. His administration was a wise and successful one, and the colony prospered in number and condition. He organized a defense and obtained arms and a ship. He made conciliations to the Indians and a treaty with the Spanish in Florida. During his term the province was divided into parishes. The differences between the crown and the assembly were settled. Gov. Ellis, at his own request, was succeeded in 1760. He died Jan. 21, 1806. He was a scientific scholar and geographical student and author, and conducted an expedition in 1746-47 in search of a northwest passage to the Pacific. He was the author of several works in connection with the subject of a northwest passage, which secured him a fellowship in the Royal society.

WRIGHT, SIR JAMES, Bart., governor of Georgia (1761 to 1776, and 1779 to 1782), was born in Charleston, S. C., about 1714. His grandfather was chief justice under King James II., and his father was chief justice of South Carolina. At twenty-one James Wright was attorney-general of South Carolina, and in 1760 lieutenant-governor of Georgia, and royal governor in 1761. His administration was wise and successful. With the passage of the stamp act came trouble. The colonists opposed it, and Gov. Wright loyally tried to enforce it. In 1768 he dissolved the assembly, on the ground that it was revolutionary in claiming the right to petition for redress of grievances. At the same time he was urging the British government to make concessions to the colony. The year 1772 he spent in England. Returning, he found the spirit of revolution steady. He was arrested by a party of rebels, but escaped Feb. 11, 1776, and went to England. He returned July 14, 1779, and resumed gubernatorial office, the city of Savannah being in control of the British. At the close of the war he returned to England, dying there Nov. 20, 1785.

HABERSHAM, JAMES, governor of Georgia (1769-72), was born in England in 1712. He was a true democrat in principle, and though of distinguished descent, refused all titles and sought his fortune in the colonies, arriving in Savannah May 7, 1738. With the celebrated evangelist, George Whitefield, he established the Bethesda Orphan Home, still in a flourishing condition. In 1744 he resigned the presidency of the school and established the mercantile house of Harris & Habersham. He was made, with Pickering Robinson, a commissioner to promote silk culture in 1750; secretary of the province and a councilor in 1754. From 1769 to 1772 he acted as governor in place of Gov. Wright. He raised the first cotton in the colony and exported the first bales to England. His death occurred Aug. 28, 1775.

EWEN, WILLIAM, governor of Georgia (1775), was born in England about 1720. From an apprentice boy to the colony trustees, by his industry, honesty and fixedness of purpose, he rose to the position of head of the province. During the year 1775 he was chairman of the "council of safety," which ruled affairs so long during the war. He was active in supporting the patriots in the great struggle, and died after seeing independence achieved, amidst friends and relatives.

BULLOCH, ARCHIBALD, governor of Georgia (1776-77), was born in Charleston, S. C., about 1730. Possessing a thorough education, and after being admitted to the bar, he settled in Savannah about 1755. In 1772 he was elected member of the provincial assembly and speaker of the house, but the body was dissolved by Gov. Habersham, because of differences growing up between the colonies and Great Britain. Mr. Bulloch was elected a member of and president of the provincial assembly of 1775-76, and the same year was a delegate to the continental congress. He served as commander-in-chief and president of Georgia under the provisional assembly, up to the meeting of the first regular state convention, Feb. 5, 1777, and was thus the first republican president of Georgia. On Aug. 6, 1776, Gov. Bulloch had the honor of receiving a copy of the Declaration of Independence, by special messenger from John Hancock, president of the continental congress. Gov. Bulloch died at Savannah, Feb. 22, 1777. He was a patriot and statesman, and one of the most important men of his time. His name is linked with the great events of that period. Mr. Bulloch was the son of Rev. James Bulloch, of Wilton, S. C., clergyman and planter, and of Jean Stobo. He married in 1760, in Savannah, Mary De Veaux, a daughter of James De Veaux. In his biographical sketches of the delegates from Georgia to the continental congress Mr. C. C. Jones, Jr., says: "Of all the patriots who encountered peril and made strenuous exertions to deliver Georgia from kingly dominion and pave the way for her admission into the sisterhood of the confederated American colonies, no one was more earnest, self-sacrificing, valiant, or influential than the Hon. Archibald Bulloch. Of irreproachable character, firm in his convictions, brave of heart, bold in action, wise in council, jealous of individual and political rights, and thoroughly identified with the best interests of Savannah and of the province of which it was both the capital and commercial metropolis, at an early age of the revolutionary proceedings he became an acknowledged leader of the rebels, and was by them rapidly advanced to the highest posts of danger and of honor."

GWINNETT, BUTTON, governor of Georgia (1777), congressman and signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in England about 1732. He located in Savannah as a general trader in 1765 and in 1772 became a farmer on St. Catharine's island, Ga. He wavered at the opening of the revolution, but through Dr. Lyman Hall was converted to patriotism. He was elected delegate to the continental congress and afterward to the convention that framed the state constitution in 1777. He was elected by the council of safety president and commander-in-chief of the colony—practically governor—in March, 1777, but was defeated for governor at the regular election in May of that year. Personal difficulties growing out of political rivalries led to a duel between Gov. Gwinnett and Gen. Lachlan McIntosh on May 15, 1777. Both were wounded, McIntosh dangerously and Gwinnett fatally, and he died in his forty-fifth year, and in his greatest usefulness, a victim to the laws of false honor and of mortified pride. He left a widow and several young children, none of whom long survived him, and none of his direct descendants ever blessed the land of his adoption.

TREUTLEN, JOHN ADAM, was governor of Georgia (1777), and one of the foremost revolutionists. He was a member from the parish of St. Andrew of the first provincial congress of Georgia, which met in Savannah July 4, 1775. He was elected governor May 8, 1777, over Button Gwinnett, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, by a large majority. He was described as a "rebel governor" by act of the royal government of Georgia in 1780. It is claimed his death was caused by tories in 1780, and that he was murdered at Orangeburgh, S. C.

HOUSTON, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1778 and 1784), was born at Waynesboro, Ga., Aug. 31, 1744. In 1774 he called the first meeting of the "Sons of Liberty" and acted as its chairman. He soon became a popular leader. He was a member of the continental congress of 1775 and 1776. He was appointed a member of the executive council May 8, 1777, and elected governor Jan. 8, 1778. As governor he invaded east Florida with Maj.-Gen. Robert Howe, but the movement failed. During his administration the British captured Savannah, and he was invested by council with almost dictatorial power, the exigencies of the occasion requiring it. He was again elected governor in 1784. He was one of the first lawyers of his time and was a remarkable figure in Georgia history of his period. He died at White Bluff July 20, 1796.

WEREAT, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1779), was born about 1730, and was an early and ardent champion of liberty. He was a member of the first provincial congress of Georgia and speaker of the congress of 1776. After Savannah fell into the hands of the enemy the legislature dispersed without appointing a governor for the succeeding year. Mr. Wereat, as president of the executive council, continued the operation of the functions of the government. In 1782 the people west of Augusta suffered from famine and Mr. Wereat found relief for them. He was remarkable for his financial talents, which he exerted with much usefulness to his country. He died in Bryan county in 1798.

HALL, LYMAN, governor of Georgia (1783), and signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Connecticut in April, 1724, graduated from Yale in 1747 and located in Sunbury, Ga., in 1758. He achieved great distinction in the practice of his profession, and being active in promoting the revolution, was elected to the provincial congresses of 1774-75 in Savannah, Ga. He was sent as a delegate to the continental congress by St. John's parish, and being the only representative from Georgia, he was admitted to this body as the representative of his parish and not his colony. He declined to vote, but took part in the debates, and had a potent influence in carrying his province into the revolution. He served in the continental congress from 1776 to 1780 and was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was elected governor in 1782, and after serving one year retired to private life. He died in Burke county, Ga., Oct. 19, 1790. Gov.

Hall was a great friend of Button Gwinnett and attended that statesman when he was fatally shot in a duel by Gen. McIntosh. Although Gov. Hall never bore arms, or won the distinction of an orator, he hazarded everything in the cause of humanity and liberty, on every occasion manifesting an exalted patriotism conscious of the blessings to be secured and jealous of the rights to be defended.

MARTIN, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1782-83), first appeared in the public service as naval officer at the port of Sunbury, being appointed to that position by Gov. Wright in 1761. He was a warm patriot and the people of Savannah chose him as a representative in the provincial congress of 1775, and on the important council of safety. In 1781 he was a lieutenant-colonel in the continental army and the same year was elected to the legislature from Chatham county. As governor of Georgia in 1782 his administration saw the British evacuate Savannah July 11, 1782, and the commonwealth given her full power as a sovereign state. While governor so great was the distress of affairs that he had to apply to the legislature for relief to keep his family from starving, not being able to get his salary. In 1783 he was appointed a commissioner to make treaty with the Cherokee Indians and the same year was elected treasurer of state.

HAWLEY, RICHARD, governor of Georgia and congressman, was born near Savannah about 1740. He obtained a good education and met with success in law. First representing Liberty county in the state assembly, he rose to distinction and in 1780 was elected governor. He also represented his state in the continental congress in 1780-81. During his executive term the state was overrun by the British and on advice of the legislature Gov. Hawley and his council fled the state for the time. When it looked as if Georgia would be delivered to Great Britain, he with others of the delegation in congress published a remonstrance which was given to the press in 1781 at Philadelphia. He died in Savannah December, 1784.

HEARD, STEPHEN, was born in Ireland and was governor of Georgia in 1781. He fought with gallantry in the French war and in 1773, with other Virginians, settled in Wilkes county, Ga., being attracted by the fertility of the lands in the "Broad river county." He served in the revolution under Col. Elijah Clarke and distinguished himself at Kettle creek. Feb. 18, 1781, he was elected president of the council, in the absence of Gov. Hawley, and thus became governor de facto until Gov. Brownson was elected, Aug. 16, 1781. He retired to private life after the war and became one of Wilkes county's most influential citizens. He died Nov. 15, 1815.

BROWNSON, NATHAN, governor of Georgia and congressman, is supposed to have been born about 1740. In 1761 he was graduated from Yale, and studied medicine. Introduced by Dr. Dunwoody, a revolutionary patriot, he began practice in Liberty county and was the first physician to practice south of the Ogeechee before the revolution. He was a surgeon in the Georgia brigade, a member of the provincial congress of Georgia in 1775, of the continental congress in 1776-78 and member of the legislature and speaker of the house in 1784. He was elected governor by this body. He was senator and president of the senate, 1789-91. Gov. Brownson was a man of a retired disposition, dignified in demeanor and of a forceful character. He died in Liberty county, Ga., Nov. 6, 1796. He was a surgeon in the continental army and took much interest, when governor, in the establishment of the state university.

ELBERT, SAMUEL, governor of Georgia (1785), was born in South Carolina in 1743 and at an early age engaged in mercantile business in Savannah. He was made captain in June, 1774; a member of the council of safety June 22, 1775; lieutenant-colonel Feb. 4, 1776, and colonel of a battalion of continental troops the same year. He was the head of an expedition organized by Gov. Houston against Florida in 1777. In 1778 he captured three British vessels at Frederica. He was taken prisoner during the war and on being exchanged joined Washington, winning his chief's highest commendation for brave service at Yorktown. He was promoted to be brigadier-general in 1783, elected governor of Georgia in 1785 and appointed major-general of the militia. He died Nov. 2, 1788.

HANDLEY, GEORGE, governor of Georgia at the early age of thirty-six, was born near Sheffield, England, in 1752. He came to the colonies in 1775, and at once joined the continental army, becoming captain and soon rising to lieutenant-colonel. He was captured at Augusta and sent to Charleston, S. C., as a prisoner. After the war he became sheriff of Richmond county, state representative, inspector-general and then governor of the state in 1788. He was one of the commissioners to the state of Franklin in 1786. He died at Roe's Hall, Ga., Sept. 17, 1793.

WALTON, GEORGE, governor of Georgia (1789-1790), and signer of the Declaration of Independence, was born in Prince Edward county, Va., in 1749. He was left an orphan at an early age and served an apprenticeship at carpentering. He made rapid advancement in knowledge, by the judicious use of his evening hours, eagerly perusing all books he could borrow from friends or neighbors. When about twenty years of age he migrated to Savannah, when he began the study of law. He was soon admitted to practice, and his success was immediate. In 1777 he married Dorothy Camber. He was one of the leaders in the patriotic party in Georgia and was the secretary of the first provincial congress of Georgia, which convened July 4, 1775. He was president of the Council of Safety in 1775, and with Archibald Bulloch, Lyman Hall and Button Gwinnett was elected a delegate to the continental congress from Georgia by the provincial congress Jan. 20, 1776. With the exception of an interval in 1779, when he was governor, he was continued as a member of congress until October, 1781. In association with Gwinnett and Hall he signed the Declaration of Independence. As a member of the treasury board of the committee on naval affairs and of other committees he rendered intelligent service. He was a colonel of the militia formed for the defense of Georgia and in the battle at Savannah was wounded and then captured. He was appointed chief justice of the state in 1783 and elected delegate to make a constitution for the United States. In 1795-6 he represented Georgia as senator in the congress of the United States. He was a member of the Union society of Savannah, and a trustee of the Richmond academy. He was twice elected to the Georgia assembly and was a United States commissioner to make a treaty with the Cherokee Indians in Tennessee. Without adjunct of education or fortune, George Walton won and maintained his right to preferment by conscientious endeavor, consecutive study and unquestioned ability. His life and success well illustrate what in this country can be achieved by honesty of purpose, natural talent and earnest effort.

IRWIN, JARED, fourth governor of Georgia, served his country faithfully many years during the latter part of the revolutionary war, and afterward in campaigns on the Georgia frontiers against the Indians. He was born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., in 1750. In 1788 he moved to Washington county, Ga.; was elected a member to revise the state constitution in 1789; a member of the first legislature convened under the present form of government in 1790; a member of the state convention in 1795; governor of Georgia in 1796; member and president of the state convention of 1798 that formed the permanent constitution. After thirty years of distinguished and almost continuous service, during which he attained the military rank of brigadier-general of militia, he died at Union Hill March 1, 1818.

MATHEWS, GEORGE, governor of Georgia in 1787 and 1794-95, was born in Augusta county, Va., 1739. His father, John Mathews, was a native of Ireland. George won distinction in the incursions made against the Indians of the north-west territory. In 1775 he became a colonel and fought under Washington at Brandywine and Germantown. He was under Gen. Greene as colonel at the close of the war. He located in Oglethorpe county in 1785, and was elected in 1786, in one year's residence, governor of the state and representative in congress. He was re-elected governor in 1794-95, and during the last term was called on to sign the celebrated "Yazoo act." He did so, and his political death followed. In 1811 President Madison appointed him commissioner of the United States to negotiate for the annexation of Florida, but the president disavowed the treaty. While on his way to Washington for the avowed purpose of chastising the president, whose action he deemed a reflection on his integrity, Mr. Mathews was taken sick, and died at Augusta Aug. 30, 1812.

JACKSON, JAMES, governor of Georgia (1798-1801), was born in England Sept. 21, 1757. An orphan at fifteen years he came to Savannah in 1772, where he found John Wereat, an old friend of his father. He was elected clerk of the court in 1776, by the provincial congress, when only nineteen years old. In 1788, when elected governor, he modestly refused the office on account of his age. He was elected to the state convention that adopted the first constitution of Georgia; was a representative to the first congress held under the Federal constitution, 1789-91; a United States senator, 1793 to 1795, when he resigned; state representative in 1796; governor of Georgia, 1798-1801; and United States senator from 1801 to March 16, 1806. He was defeated in a close contest for congress by Gen. Anthony Wayne in 1791. Gov. Jackson won distinction as a soldier; entering the revolutionary army at the age of seventeen he became successively lieutenant, captain, major and colonel, and was made brigadier-general after the war. He shared gallantly in the defense of Savannah and then repaired to South Carolina. He was with Col. Elijah Clarke in 1780, was on Gen. Sumter's staff during the resistance to Tarleton's attack on Blackstock's house, signalized himself at Cowper's under Gen. Pickens, and risked his life in 1781 in seizing the colors of the Seventy-first English regiment. Savannah was surrendered by the British to him July 12, 1782, and his gallant conduct was recognized by the people, who voted him the Tattall house and lot for his "great and useful services." One of the most important of Mr. Jackson's public acts was defeating the big land steal scheme known as the "Yazoo fraud." The Georgia legislature sold 20,000,000 acres of land extending to the Mississippi river for $207,000. Gov. Jackson then in the United States senate denounced the scheme, resigned, came home, was elected to the legislature and had passed a "rescinding act" declaring the "Yazoo fraud" null and void. This territory was afterward ceded to the United States for $1,250,000. In March, 1780, Gov. Jackson fought and killed in a duel Lieut.-Gov. Wells. He was a prominent Mason and a member of the Society of Cincinnatus. He died March 16, 1806.

EMANUEL, DAVID, came to Georgia about 1768 or 1770 and settled in Burke county. This part of the state was the scene of some severe skirmishing with the British and Mr. Emanuel participated in a number of them. He was a member of the legislature a number of terms and president of the senate. He was elected governor in 1801 and died in 1808. It is related that during the revolutionary war Emanuel was captured together with two companions by loyalists. All of them were sentenced to be shot. The execution took place and his companions were killed, but Emanuel escaped through the bad marksmanship of the soldier entrusted with the taking of his life.

TATTNALL, JOSIAH, governor of Georgia and United States senator, was born at Bonaventure, near Savannah, Ga., in 1762. He was educated near Nassau. His father and grandfather were Tories and fled to England during the war, their estates being confiscated. The son ran away from England and at the age of eighteen he landed without a shilling in his pocket, on the north side of the Savannah river, and traveling alone on foot through the country, arrived at Parysburg, when he crossed into Georgia and then joined the army of General Wayne at Ebenezer. He was captain of the Chatham artillery in 1792, colonel of the First Georgia regiment in 1793, and brigadier-general of militia in 1800. He was a member of the Georgia legislature 1795-96, United States senator 1796-99, and governor of Georgia 1802. He died at Nassau, New Providence, W. I., June 6, 1830.

MILLEDGE, JOHN, eighth governor of Georgia (1803-1806), was born in Savannah, Ga., in 1757. His ancestors came to Georgia with Oglethorpe. His early education was the best the colony afforded. Though at the outbreak of the revolution he was studying law in the king's attorney's office, he became active in the cause of liberty and was one of a party of seven that rifled the crown's powder magazine at Savannah and captured Gov. Wright in his own house. Mr. Milledge participated in the futile assaults upon Savannah and Augusta, and in other engagements in Georgia and South Carolina. At the age of twenty-three he was appointed attorney for the colony. He served in the legislature and was elected to the continental congress, resigning to become governor. In 1806 he was elected United States senator. In 1802 he was associated with James Jackson and Abraham Baldwin as a commissioner for ceding to the United States government certain portions of the territory of Georgia. Mr. Milledge was one of the first with whom the idea of establishing the state university originated. He died on Feb. 9, 1818.

MITCHELL, DAVID BRADIE, ninth governor of Georgia, was born in Scotland, Oct. 22, 1766, and arrived in Georgia at the age of seventeen. He read law under Gov. William Stephens. He was elected solicitor-general in 1795; representative to the legislature in 1796; major-general of the militia in 1804, and governor in 1809 to 1815, resigning in 1817, to accept an appointment from the president of the United States as agent to the Creek Indians. He died at Milledgeville, Ga., April 22, 1837.

EARLY, PETER, tenth governor of Georgia, was born in June, 1773, in Madison county Va., and migrated with his father, Joel Early, and family, about the year 1795 to the county of Greene. He was graduated from Princeton college in 1792. In 1802 he was elected to congress and supported the bill to prohibit the African slave trade, and voted for the impeachment of supreme court judge, Samuel Chase. He was elected judge of the superior court in 1807 and served until 1813. In the fall of that year he was elected governor. His entire administration, civil and military, met the approbation of all classes up to the day on which he returned with his official veto to the house a bill continuing in force what was called "the alleviating law." He was defeated for re-election; returned to his estate in Greene county and, with the exception of two or three years as senator of that county, never took any part in the political affairs of the country. Gov. Early was married to Miss Smith of Wilkes county, sister of Colonel, afterward Gen. Thomas A. Smith of the United States army.

RABUN, WILLIAM, eleventh governor of Georgia (1817-18), was born in Halifax county, N. C., April 8, 1771, and removed to Wilkes county, Ga., in 1785. He was given the usual backwoods education, but acquired great information by reading and observation. For many years he represented Hancock county in both branches of the legislature. Being president of the senate in 1817, upon the resignation of Gov. Mitchell, he became governor. During his administration a tart correspondence took place between Gen. Jackson and himself relative to an attack on an Indian village called Cheha. Mr. Rabun died while governor, Oct. 24, 1819. Rabun county, Ga., was named after him.

TALBOT, MATTHEW, twelfth governor of Georgia (1819), was a Virginian by birth and settled in Wilkes county in 1785. He was a member of the legislature from Wilkes county, and was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of Georgia. In 1808 he was elected to the senate and was president of that body from 1818 to 1823. By the death of Gov. Rabun he became governor, acting until the election of Gov. Clarke. He died in Wilkes county, Sept. 17, 1827.

CLARKE, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1819-23), was born in North Carolina in 1776. At the age of sixteen he was appointed lieutenant of a company and afterward captain of the continental militia. Under the command of his father, Gen. Elijah Clarke, a revolutionary hero, he fought and distinguished himself at the siege of Augusta and the battle of Jack's creek in 1787. He rose to be major-general, and at the dangerous period of the second war with Great Britain had command of the forces to protect the sea coast. In 1819 and 1821 he was elected governor over George M. Troup. In 1827 Gov. Clarke retired from public life and moved to West Florida, where he died Oct. 15, 1832. He was a friend, patriot and statesman whose warmth of heart, fixedness of purpose and inflexible virtue lives in the memory of his countrymen.

TROUP, GEORGE MICHAEL, governor of Georgia (1823-27), senator and congressman, was born at McIntosh's Bluff, Tombigbee river, in the part of Georgia now Alabama, Sept. 8, 1780. His father was born in and educated in England and was a successful merchant and planter. His mother, Catharine McIntosh, came of a family distinguished in colonial days and the revolution. He was graduated from Princeton in 1797, and admitted to the Savannah bar in 1800. He was a member of the legislature (1801-03); representative to congress (1806-12); U. S. senator (1816-18). He was defeated for governor in 1819 and 1821 and elected in 1823 and 1825. Mr. Troup retired from the government in November, 1827, with a popularity unsurpassed by that of any former chief magistrate. In 1828 he was recalled to the United States senate, an appointment he accepted with regret. Gov. Troup was a great champion of state rights and sovereignty. It was under the conviction that these were imperiled that he declared, in 1823, that he would have been carried on his death bed to the capital rather than not have given his vote against the force bill. He retired from public life in 1833. He was the same year nominated for the presidency by a Georgia state rights convention. He died in Montgomery, Ga., April 26, 1856.

FORSYTH, JOHN, governor of Georgia (1827-29) and United States secretary of state under Jackson and Van Buren, was born in Frederick county, Va., Oct. 22, 1870. His father was a revolutionary soldier, and with the son settled in Georgia in 1784. Mr. Forsyth graduated from Princeton college in 1799, and was admitted to the practice of law in 1802, and a short time afterward was appointed attorney-general for the state. He was elected to congress in 1811, and to the United States senate in 1818. In 1819 he resigned to accept an appointment as minister to Spain. In 1823, while in Spain, he was again elected to congress, and again in 1825; governor of Georgia in 1827, and United States senator in 1829. He resigned in 1834 to become secretary of state under President Jackson, and was reappointed by President Van Buren, serving until 1841. Mr. Forsyth was one of the most brilliant of Georgia's many bright statesmen. He was an orator, diplomat, and statesman. He championed President Jackson in the debate on the removal of deposits from the United States banks, and as the premier of two able presidents he carried on some of the most important transactions with foreign powers that the government had engaged in since the war of 1812. He died in Washington, D. C., Oct. 21, 1841. Mr. Forsyth married a daughter of Josiah Meigs, at one time president of Franklin college, and to them were born several children. Before his death the legislature of Georgia had named a county in honor of Mr. Forsyth, and the county seat of Monroe also bore his name thirty years.

GILMER, GEORGE ROCKINGHAM, governor of Georgia (1829-31 and 1837-39), and congressman, was born in that part of Wilkes, now Oglethorpe county in 1790. His parents were of Scotch descent, and they located in Georgia in 1784. George was educated at Wilson's school at Abbeville, S. C., and at Dr. Waddell's Georgia academy. On account of his health soon after being admitted to the bar in 1813, he was appointed first lieutenant in the regular army. He served in the Creek war with distinction. He was elected state representative 1818-20; representative to congress, 1821-23, and governor in 1828, being defeated in 1830. He was a member of congress in 1833-34, presidential elector on the Hugh L. White ticket in 1836, a second time governor of Georgia in 1837-39, presidential elector for Harrison and president of the electoral college in 1840, trustee for thirty years of the state university of Georgia. He died at Lexington, Ga., Nov. 15, 1859.

LUMPKIN, WILSON, governor (1831-34) and senator, was born in Pittsylvania county, Va., Jan. 14, 1783. When he was one year old his father removed to Georgia and settled in that part of the state then known as Wilkes county, now Oglethorpe. He received a common-school education, and picking up the elementary points of law by serving as clerk to his father, clerk of the court, he studied the profession. At the age of twenty-one years he was elected to the state legislature, serving a number of terms between 1805 and 1815. He was elected to congress in 1815, and again in 1827 and 1829, and governor in 1831 and 1833. He was appointed by President Jackson, in 1835, one of the first commissioners under the Cherokee treaty. He was elected United States senator in 1837, in place of John P. King, resigned, serving until March 3, 1841. Mr. Lumpkin was one of the most active and useful men Georgia has had. He died in 1870.

SCHLEY, WILLIAM, governor (1835-37), was born in the city of Frederick, Md., Dec. 10, 1786. His education was acquired in the academies at Louisville and Augusta, Ga. He was admitted to the bar in 1812, and continued the practice of law until 1825, when he was elected judge of the superior court of the middle division of Georgia, the duties of which he ably discharged until 1828. In 1830 he was elected a member of the legislature from Richmond county, and in 1832 was elected a member of congress. In 1835 he was elected governor of Georgia. During his administration the Creek war broke out, and in his first message to the legislature, in 1836, he strongly recommended the construction of the Western & Atlantic railroad. Mr. Schley was a public-spirited citizen in every relation and a man of advanced ideas. He was a prominent democrat, believing in the strictest construction of the United States constitution, and the withholding of all powers from congress which were not expressly delegated to it. He died at Augusta, Ga., Nov. 20, 1850.

CRAWFORD, GEORGE WASHINGTON, was born in Columbia county, Ga., Dec. 22, 1798. He was graduated from Princeton college in 1820, and was admitted to the bar in 1824. From 1827 to 1831 he was attorney-general of Georgia, and then was elected to the legislature, serving from 1837 till 1841. In 1843 he was elected governor, on the whig ticket, and in 1845 he was re-elected. His administration was an excellent one, distinguished for the adjustment of the state's finances and the restoration of its credit. In securing this end Gov. Crawford pledged his personal estate to the extent of $150,000. In 1849 he entered the cabinet of President Taylor, as secretary of war, but resigned in 1850, when the president died. In 1861 he presided over the Georgia secession convention. He spent several years in Europe, and on his return lived in retirement at his home in Richmond county, where he died after the war.

MCDONALD, CHARLES JAMES, nineteenth governor of Georgia (1839-43), was born in Charleston, S. C., July 9, 1793. In his early infancy his parents moved to Hancock county, Ga. He received an academic education under the direction of Rev. Nathan S. Beman, and was graduated from Columbia college, South Carolina. He was admitted to the bar in 1817, and a few years later was in the enjoyment of an extensive practice. He was elected solicitor-general of Flint circuit in 1822, judge of the superior court in 1825, state representative in 1830, state senator in 1834 and 1837, and governor in 1839 and 1841. In 1850 he was defeated for governor by Howell Cobb. He was elected judge of the supreme court of Georgia in 1857. As governor, Mr. McDonald was fearless and guided by practical wisdom and integrity. He took an issue with the legislature which caused much excitement. In 1838 the state was suffering from the panic of 1837, and an obligation of $300,000 had been protested. The legislature refused relief, but, on the contrary, reduced the state taxes 20 per cent. Gov. McDonald promptly outlined and carried out a policy that alleviated the financial distress. He vetoed the act reducing taxes, and when the legislature was about to adjourn, and leaving $110,000 of expense unprovided for, he boldly closed the treasury and suspended payments. He held his ground, and the measure of relief he recommended was passed. He died Dec. 16, 1860.

TOWNS, GEORGE WASHINGTON, governor of Georgia (1847-51), was born in Wilkes county, May 4, 1801. The family was from Virginia, and the father was a soldier of the revolution. The boy educated himself by perusing books and studying at night, and when he attained his majority he had a good foundation in science and in literature. He began life as a merchant, then turned his attention to law and began its practice in Talboton, Talbot county, Ga., in 1826. He was elected from that county to the state legislature and senate, and in 1834 was sent to congress and served until 1839. He was again elected to that body in 1845. He was elected as a democrat, governor, in 1847, over Gen. Duncan L. Clinch. Gov. Towns was a Chesterfield in address. Nothing could exceed the suavity of his disposition and the ease of his manner. He was truly a refined gentleman, courteous and unpretending with the plain, and diplomatic with the precise, just as the society he was in for the time being demanded such an exhibition of character. He had a friendly word, a kind recognition for each individual. The charm was complete; he satisfied all. At the bar his rank was decidedly high as an advocate. He possessed all the requisites of an orator to control the jury. Of him, Stephen F. Miller says: "His return to the bar was hailed by his professional brethren with universal cordiality. All within his attendance looked forward to much enjoyment in his society, to much improvement by his example. There had been a Forsyth, with his fluent simplicity and inimitable sneer; a Berrien, with his musical phrase and classic gesture; a Wilde, polished in diction and lofty in thought; a Colquitt, with the arrows of nature barbed for the rhinoceros or softly edged for the hare; there had been such advocates in Georgia, honored, glorious; yet it was the prestige of Gov. Towns to differ from them all, perhaps to excel them all, in the spontaneous gushings of the heart, in the electric sympathy that, kindling with the orator, burst out and blazed in every bosom; court, jury, bar, audience, all melted, all subdued by the occasion." Gov. Towns was married to a daughter of the Hon. John W. Jones, of Virginia, speaker of the United States house of representatives. He died in 1854.

COBB, HOWELL, governor of Georgia from 1851 to 1853, was born at Cherry Hill, Jefferson county, Ga., Sept. 7, 1815. His father was Col. John H. Cobb, of Greenville, N. C., who removed to Georgia when young, and his mother, Sarah Roates, of Fredericksburg, Va. Howell Cobb was graduated at Franklin college, Athens, in 1834, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and chosen an elector on the Van Buren ticket the same year. He was elected solicitor-general in 1837, representative to congress in 1842, 1844, 1846 and 1848, and speaker of the house in 1849; governor of Georgia, as nominee of the Union party, in 1851, and representative in congress in 1854. In 1857 he was appointed United States secretary of the treasury, by President Buchanan, a position which he resigned in 1860. He was president of the confederate provisional congress, and brigadier and major general in the army of the Confederate states. Mr. Cobb's familiarity with the rules, skill as a debater, and his bold championship of slavery, made him the leader of the southern party in the house in 1847, and he was elected speaker in 1849 after a long contest. He demanded the extension of slavery into California and New Mexico by federal authority, and advocated the compromise measures of 1850. Upon the latter issue he boldly antagonized the extreme men of his own state, and accepting the nomination for governor from the Union party (1851) took the stump and was triumphantly elected. After his term of governor he resumed the practice of law, though continuing to take an active part in politics. He stumped the north in 1856 for Buchanan, and in 1857 became his secretary of the treasury. He found the treasury full and the bonds representing the national debt at a premium of 16 to 18 per cent. He used the surplus funds in the treasury in purchasing this indebtedness at this high premium, but the approach of the civil war so affected the national credit that he was compelled to attempt to borrow at an exorbitant discount the money necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the government. On Dec. 10, 1860, he resigned, giving as a reason that the state of Georgia (then about to recede) needed his services. His name was mentioned before the Charleston convention for president, but a division in the Georgia delegation caused him to withdraw it in a good-tempered but patriotic letter. He warmly advocated secession and was author of those much-quoted words, "The hour of Georgia's dishonor in the union should be the hour of her independence out of the union." He was elected permanent president of the convention of seceding states, which met in Montgomery, Ala., Feb. 4, 1861. He was not a favorite of President Davis of the Confederacy, and so withdrew to private life. On the demand of Georgia members of congress that body appointed him brigadier-general in the Confederate army and soon promoted him to a major-generalship. After the close of the war Gen. Cobb opposed reconstruction vigorously, maintaining its effect would retard the restoration of the south to the union, keep back its prosperity, and destroy the negro race. He died in New York city Oct. 9, 1868.

JOHNSON, HERSCHEL VESPASIAN, governor of Georgia and senator, was born in Burke county, Ga., Sept. 18, 1812. He was graduated from the state university at Athens in 1834 and a year later settled in Augusta and began the practice of law. He entered public life during the presidential campaign of 1840, taking the stump, after declining a congressional nomination. He was defeated for congress in 1843, canvassed the state as presidential elector in 1844 on the Polk ticket, withdrew his name when urged for governor in 1845, and in 1847 was appointed to the United States senate to fill the unexpired term of Walter T. Colquitt, February, 1848, to March 3, 1849. He was delegate to the Baltimore national convention in 1848, and was elected judge of the superior court in 1849, delegate to the Pierce democratic national convention, and elector for the state at large in 1851. Resigning his judgeship upon his nomination for governor in 1853, he was elected to the latter office, and re-elected in 1855. He was nominated for vice-president on the Douglas ticket in 1860; elected Confederate state senator in November, 1862; president of the state constitutional convention that repealed secession, repudiated the war debt of $18,000,000, and abolished slavery in October, 1865; and in January, 1866, after the restoration of the state to the union, United States senator, though he was disfranchised by acts of congress and did not serve. He was appointed, in 1873, judge of the superior court, an office which he held until his death, Aug. 16, 1880. As an orator, a constitutional lawyer and jurist Judge Johnson took high rank. He was a master of classical diction, his state papers being the most finished in the state archives. Originally a strong "southern rights" man, he nevertheless acquiesced in the compromise measure of 1850, and later opposed secession. He married Mrs. Annie Polk Walker, a niece of President Polk, and a highly intellectual and beautiful woman.

BROWN, JOSEPH EMERSON, was born in Pickens district, S. C., April 15, 1821. His paternal ancestors were Scotch-Irish. The grandfather, Joseph Brown, was a whig rebel, and took an active part in the war for Independence. The father, Mackey Brown, was a native of South Carolina, and served under Jackson, in the campaign of New Orleans, in the war of 1812. He married Sally Rice, of Virginia ancestry, in Tennessee, and then moved to South Carolina. During the boyhood of Joseph, the Browns removed to, and settled in, Union county, which is in northeastern Georgia. He labored in the field and attended stock to aid in the family support until nineteen years of age. He had mastered the elementary branches in the country schools, when he heard of the educational advantages offered at Calhoun academy, in Anderson district, S. C. It was 130 miles distant, and his sole possessions consisted of a yoke of steers. He borrowed a horse and drove them to the vicinity of the school, where he traded them for eight months' board, and entered the college, going in debt for the tuition. By teaching school he got through the second term, when, in January, 1844, he took hold of the town academy at Canton, Ga. While teaching this school he read law of nights and Saturdays without an instructor. In 1845 he pursued the study of law with a view to its practice, and, at the same time, earned his board by teaching the children of Dr. John W. Lewis. The latter, appreciating the mind and energy of the young man, loaned him money to attend the law school at Yale college, where he entered in October, 1845. In addition, he took a literary course, and was graduated in 1846, when he returned to Canton, and entered into practice, which soon became extensive and lucrative. Joseph Brown's first election to public office was in 1849, when nominated by the democrats of the senatorial district of Cobb and Cherokee counties, he was elected by a big majority. This general assembly was a body of the first significance and importance on account of the state's rapid development, and embraced many men of mark and merit. In the debates and matters attending the alleged fraudulent organization of the territory of California, Mr. Brown, while "not a disunionist or secessionist, was firmly in favor of such a course as might lend to aggression and preserve the Union and constitution by providing safeguards, or enforcing those we had, for the rights of the states, and the honor and interest of the householding people of the south." He was chosen presidential elector on the Pierce ticket in 1852, and in 1855, was elected judge of the superior courts of the Blue Ridge circuit over Hon. David Irwin. He was nominated and elected governor over Ben. H. Hill in 1857, and re-elected in 1859, defeating Hon. Warren Akin of Bartow county. In 1861 he was the third time elected defeating Hon. Eugenius A. Nesbit, and in 1863, he was elected over Joshua Hill, a Union candidate, and an old whig, and T. M. Furlow, a strong secessionist, who was supported by the faction not approving of Governor Brown's opposition to President Davis' policy. Governor Brown was an active secessionist and on Jan. 2, 1861, ordered Colonel Alexander R. Lawton to take possession of Forts Pulaski and Jackson, near Savannah, which was done on the 3d. He put two regiments in the field before the Confederacy was organized, and personally seized the government arsenal at Augusta, and held it under the authority of Georgia. During the war he was a vigorous supporter of the Confederate government, but disputed with Mr. Davis the constitutionality of the conscript measures. During Sherman's invasion he put into the field an army of 10,000 men made up of state officers, youth, aged men and others usually exempt from military duty, but refused to send them out of the state when requisition was made for them by the Confederate government. The collapse of the Confederacy abruptly closed his fourth term, and he was arrested, carried to Washington and confined in a military prison. In a few days he was released and returning home, went to work to upbuild his state. During the reconstruction era his course was criticised, but the final conclusion of affairs vindicated his patriotism and purity of motives. He strongly advised his state to accept the situation, and comply with the terms of reconstruction. This position made him unpopular, and for a time, to sustain his views, he voted with the republicans, openly supporting General Grant for president in 1872. Under Governor Bulloch he was appointed chief justice of the supreme court for the term of twelve years, a position he resigned in 1870 to accept the presidency of the company that had leased the Western & Atlantic Railroad for the term of twenty years. The only political defeat of his life was in 1868 when Joshua Hill was elected United States senator by the legislature. After 1872, he acted with the Democrats, and in 1880, was chosen United States senator to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of General Gordon. In 1884 he was re-elected with but one vote against him. After his election in 1880, he made a speech before the assembly justifying his course in 1866, and declaring the results of the war must be accepted as final. Governor Brown as president of the Western & Atlantic railroad pursued a progressive and liberal policy, which built up and developed the interests of the road, and protected it against the intrigues and machinations of immense and pushing systems. Governor Brown was married in 1847, to Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. Joseph Grisham, a Baptist clergyman of South Carolina. To them have been born the following children: Julius L., prominent in the legal profession of Atlanta; Joseph M., engaged in the railroad business; Elijah A., engaged in agriculture; Mary, the wife of Dr. E. L. Connally of Atlanta; George M. and Sarah. Franklin Pierce Brown and Charles M. Brown, deceased. Governor Brown's career was one of success in every field. He was a statesman, jurist, lawyer, railroader, financier, manufacturer, miner, business man and farmer. No man has more impressed his brain and will upon the events with which he has been connected. He died in 1895.

JENKINS, CHARLES JONES, was born in Beaufort district, S. C., Jan. 6, 1805. He removed with his parents to Jefferson county, Ga., in 1816, and was educated at the state university and at Union college, where was graduated in 1824. He studied law in Savannah under Hon. J. M. Berrien and was admitted to the bar in 1822. He became a member of the Georgia assembly in 1830, was attorney-general of the state in 1831, and again a legislative member from 1836 to 1850. He was speaker of the house in 1840, 1843 and 1845. He was a firm advocate of the principles of state rights, but supported Harrison in 1840 and Clay in 1844, for president. He was a Union member of the Georgia convention of 1850 and voted for the famous "Georgia platform of 1850." President Fillmore offered him the secretaryship of the interior in 1850, but he declined it. In 1860 he was appointed to the supreme court bench, to fill the vacancy caused by Linton Stephens' resignation. He was elected member of the Georgia reconstruction convention called by President Johnson and became governor in 1865, but was removed by Gen. Meade in January, 1865, for refusing to draw a voucher on the treasury to pay the state convention, without an appropriation. Gen. Meade detailed Gen. Thomas H. Ruger to fill the executive chair. Gov. Jenkins left the state carrying with him the seal of state and did not return until 1869. In 1872 when the democrats were in possession of the gubernatorial chair and general assembly Gov. Jenkins delivered over the seal, books and money to the state. For years he was president of the board of trustees of the state university and in 1877 he closed his public life as president of the constitutional convention. He died near Augusta, Ga., June 13, 1883.

CONLEY, BENJAMIN, governor of Georgia from October, 1871, to January, 1872, was born in Newark, N. J., in 1815. At fifteen years of age he removed to Georgia and entered mercantile business in Augusta, of which city he was mayor in 1858. He was a republican and a champion of the congressional plan of reconstruction, holding various public positions until January, 1869, when he was elected to, and president of, the senate. On Oct. 30, 1871, Gov. Bullock having resigned, Mr. Conley by virtue of his office succeeded to the gubernatorial chair. The question arose whether he was entitled to hold the office as his term as senator expired Nov. 1. The democrats maintained that L. N. Trammell, president of the new senate, was the one to be elected governor. Mr. Trammell declined the office and his party permitted Mr. Conley to serve until December, when a special election was held and Mr. Smith chosen to fill out the unexpired term of Mr. Bullock. President Grant appointed Mr. Conley postmaster of Atlanta, a position he held for several years. Mr. Conley was a strong partisan, but showed himself a person of integrity at times when his party associates were bad men. He was a prominent Odd Fellow and a member of the Episcopal church. He died in Atlanta in 1885.

SMITH, JAMES MILTON, governor of Georgia (1872-1874), was born in Twiggs county, Ga., Oct. 24, 1823, and in his boyhood days was a helper in a blacksmith shop. Culloden academy in Monroe county furnished him with an education, and in 1846 he commenced the practice of law in Columbus, Ga. As an independent state's rights democrat he was defeated in 1855. He served in the Confederate army and became colonel of the Thirteenth Georgia infantry. He was engaged in all the battles of the Virginia army until 1863, when he took a seat in the Confederate congress. He resumed law after the war, and aided in the defense of the Columbus prisoners charged with murdering Ashburn. Mr. Smith was elected a representative to the legislature and speaker of the house in 1870, governor in 1872 to fill out Mr. Bullock's unexpired term, and again in October, 1872, for four years. In 1877, he was defeated for United States senator. Gov. Colquitt appointed him chairman of the railroad commission of Georgia in 1879. In 1888 he was made judge of the superior court. He died Nov. 20, 1890.

STEPHENS, ALEXANDER HAMILTON, was born on a farm near Crawfordsville, Ga., Feb. 11, 1812. His grandfather, a native of England, was a brave soldier in the French and Indian war, and in the war of independence, serving with distinction under Gen. Washington. He had eight children, of whom Andrew B., the father of Alexander, was the youngest son. Andrew B. was permitted to attend the school of Rev. Hope Hull, at Washington, a famous institution of learning in that day. When fourteen years old he was recommended by his instructor as competent to teach, and was placed at the head of a school on Little Creek. His first earnings were used in purchasing the 100-acre tract of land upon which his parents lived, and this tract was the nucleus of that homestead, which, except for a few years after the death of Andrew B., has ever since been in the possession of the family. Andrew B. married Margaret Grier, whose parents were natives of Ireland, and took up the avocation of a farmer. To them were born four children: Mary, Aaron, Grier and Alexander. The mother was of a frail constitution, mild, industrious, charitable, intelligent and a great help to the husband. She died soon after Alexander's birth. Andrew B. Stephens again married, his wife being Matilda Lindsay, the daughter of Col. John Lindsay, distinguished in the revolutionary war. From the second marriage four sons sprang: John L., Andrew Baskins, Benjamin F. and Linton. Until he was fifteen years old Alexander Stephens had few opportunities for schooling. He was the general messenger boy and errand-goer, at ten he worked in the fields and at eleven he handled the plow. His childhood was passed in sickness and menial toil. Upon the death of his father and mother, he was taken to the home of his uncle, Gen. A. W. Grier, of Warren county. He placed him in a school at Washington, presided over by Rev. Alexander Hamilton Webster. This tutor, a most worthy Christian gentleman, took great interest in the pupil. His extremely frail physical organization, his delicate health, the loss of his parents, and his poverty had produced a frame of mind of habitual melancholy, which, associated with his constant Bible reading, had induced Mr. Webster to see in Alexander the subject of religious convictions. This prompted him to send the youth to Franklin college, now the state university, and in so doing he gave to Alexander his middle name. His tuition and expenses were paid by the Presbyterian Educational society, but before he was graduated, Alexander reimbursed them from a small patrimony. He was graduated in 1832, and was employed two years in Liberty county teaching the children of Dr. Le Conte and those of Mr. Varnadoe. In 1834 he decided to adopt the profession of law, and three months of study enabled him to be admitted, upon examination by Joseph H. Lumpkin and William H. Crawford. His first political speech was made July 4, 1834, and in this he distinctly took the grounds from which his convictions never afterward wavered. While denying the asserted right of nullification, the right of a state to remain in the Union and yet disobey the Federal laws, he insisted upon the sovereignty of the states, and the right of any to withdraw from the Union, if the compact should be violated by others. Though his health was delicate he was immediately successful in law. On a platform opposing nullification he was elected to the legislature from Taliaferro county, in 1836, and re-elected in 1837, 1838, 1839, 1840. In 1842, he was elected state senator and in 1843, at the age of thirty-one, to congress on the whig ticket. He was re-elected continuously until 1849. When the whig party was disorganized and the know-nothing party framed in 1855, he made an independent canvass for congress in opposition to the principles of the new party, which was one of the most remarkable political fights in his career; and was elected by 3,000 majority. He retired in 1859, and in a farewell address congratulated the country upon the peaceful settlement at that time of all the agitating questions which were disturbing the country when he entered congress in 1843. These were settled on the principles set forth in the Cincinnati platform, he said, and by adherence to those there was a bright prospect of peace for the country; but if they departed from them they might expect disaster. His name was mentioned in connection with the democratic nomination for the presidency, but he declined the use of his name in the Charleston convention, supporting Mr. Douglas. In a speech before the legislature of Georgia, in November, 1860, he advised against secession, and voted against it in the convention at Milledgeville, when the ordinance was adopted, though he signed the same. He was chosen a member of the Confederate convention to organize a provisional government, and was elected successively provisional and permanent vice-president of the Confederacy. He was one of the commissioners from the Confederacy to the celebrated Hampton roads peace conference in 1865. After Lee's surrender, in May, 1865, he was arrested and incarcerated at Fort Warren, Boston. In 1866, after much persuasion, he accepted the election to the United States senate, but was not allowed to take his seat. He was a delegate to the National Union convention at Philadelphia, and was defeated by Joshua Hill for the United States senate in 1868. He was again defeated for the senate by Gen. J. B. Gordon, in 1873, but was elected to congress that year, and continuously up to and including the term beginning in 1882, when he resigned shortly after taking his seat, having been elected governor. He died March 4, 1883. For forty-five years Alexander H. Stephens held a foremost place in state and nation. His career was remarkable, and unequalled in the history of the nation. At any time during his life his death would not have been a surprise, and yet his physical weakness never impaired his usefulness. Although a giant, intellectually, he was a pigmy physically; he never even in his prime attained a weight over ninety-four pounds, and on leaving college his weight was but seventy. Mr.

Stephens was strong by his moral intrepidity. No public opinion could frighten him, nor public frenzy awe him. He fought know-nothingism when it threatened the state, battled against secession and spoke for Union when it was hopeless. In congress he opposed Polk on the Mexican war; favored California's admission as a free state, and was one of the authors of the "Georgia platform of 1850." In 1840, though a state's rights man he voted for Harrison. He desired Texas annexed, but was for Clay, who said if annexed it would cause war. In 1848, he supported Taylor over Clay for the whig nomination for the presidency, and though generally acting with the whigs he refused to vote for Scott, casting his ballot for Webster, who was then dead. He voted to admit Texas. In 1854, he defended the Kansas-Nebraska act. He was for Douglas—against Breckinridge. During the war he opposed President Davis' conscription policy. He was a great orator and during his life made many historical addresses. He once challenged Gov. Herschel V. Johnson to a duel, and at another time Senator Benj. H. Hill, but they declined to meet him. In his life he educated more than a hundred young men. He published in 1867-70 The War Between the States; and 1870-71, a School History of the United States. He died a few months after his inauguration as governor, having caught cold from exposure attending the trip to Savannah, when he made his greatest speech at Georgia sesqui-centennial celebration.

COLQUITT, ALFRED HOLT, was born in Walton county, Ga., April 20, 1824. He was graduated at Princeton college, New Jersey, in 1844; was admitted to the bar in 1845, and served in the Mexican war as a staff major. In 1855 he was elected to congress, and in 1859 was sent to the state legislature. He was the same year on the Breckinridge and Lane electoral ticket, and was a member of the Georgia secession convention in 1861. He was prominent in the advocacy of secession, and entered the Confederate army at the outbreak of the war, serving with distinction until its close as captain, colonel, brigadier-general and major-general. In 1876 he was chosen governor of Georgia for four years, and in 1880 for two years. In 1883 he was elected to the United States senate, and again in 1888, serving until his death in 1893. For thirty-five years Senator Colquitt was a democratic leader, advocating with courage, eloquence, and energy democratic principles. His public career and private life have been alike stainless. As a lawyer he showed himself learned and profound, a skillful pleader and successful advocate. Mr. Colquitt was a temperance and Sunday school leader of signal power and national reputation, winning celebrity at the intellectual centers of the country. The debates which have transpired during Mr. Colquitt's membership of the senate show his ability, his comprehensive view of public questions, his zeal for the equal rights of citizens, for the moral conditions of society and his recognition of the elements of true progress so unceasingly manifest in the history of his country.

CRAWFORD, WILLIAM H., like many other distinguished Americans, owed nothing to the influence of family or wealth. He was born in the state of Virginia Feb. 24, 1772, of poor but reputable parents. When about fourteen years old he emigrated with them to Georgia. His father was dependent on the labor of himself and sons for the support of a large family. William, after following the plow until about the age of twenty-one, was sent into the world without fortune or patronage. He had received, while at home, a good English education, but aspiring beyond the sphere to which his humble attainments as a scholar would have confined him, he determined by his own efforts to repair the deficiencies of fortune and to qualify himself for one of the learned professions. In 1794 he was able to place himself under the tuition of Rev. Dr. Waddell, and by employment as teacher he was enabled to support himself and read law, being admitted to practice in 1799. In 1800 he was appointed, with two others, to revise and digest the laws of the state. While at the bar his reputation as a lawyer was unrivaled in that state, and his professional attainments were accompanied and adorned by an irreproachable moral character. He supported Jefferson for president in 1800, and in the canvass his commanding talents and political firmness led to quarrels, followed by two duels, in one of which he had the misfortune to kill his antagonist, and in the other to be himself severely wounded. In the first his opponent was Peter L. Van Alen, then solicitor-general of the western circuit of Georgia, and in the latter, Gov. Clarke. In 1804 he was elected as a republican in the legislature, and in 1807 to the senate of the United States, as sufficient proof of the estimation of his talents and industrious application to the public business. While Mr. Crawford continued in the senate he was one of the most useful and distinguished members of that body. From 1808 to 1813 he took a conspicuous part. He voted in 1811 in favor of the United States bank, and in consequence of the sickness of Vice-President Clinton was elected to the important station of president of the senate pro tempore, being the youngest man ever elected to the chair. On the resignation of Mr. Eustis as secretary of war in 1812, the place was offered to Mr. Crawford, but he declined it. At the close of the session of congress, in March, 1813, Mr. Crawford was made minister to France, a station which had become vacant by the death of Mr. Barlow. He returned in 1813 and took charge of the war department, an appointment which had been conferred on him in anticipation of his return. Under his administration an extensive system of fortifying the sea-coast was planned and commenced. In March, 1816, a nomination of president and vice-president was made by the republican members of congress. So elevated, even at that early day, was the standing of Mr. Crawford, that he was the only person named as the competitor of Mr. Monroe. He declined to be considered a candidate, yet he received fifty-four votes out of 119. On the resignation of Mr. Dallas, in October, 1816, Mr. Crawford was transferred to the treasury department. He was continued in this station on the accession of Mr. Monroe in March, 1817, and served until 1825. He was nominated for the presidency in 1824 over Mr. Calhoun by the democratic party, and in the election that followed he received the electoral votes of Virginia, Georgia, with scattering votes from New York, Maryland and Delaware, in all forty-one. No choice having been made by the electoral college, the election reverted to the house of representatives, when John Quincy Adams was elected over Jackson and Crawford, a result said to have been brought about by Henry Clay, who as a candidate threw his support to Adams. Crawford's administration of the treasury was criticised and was made the subject of an investigation. The committee, headed by Webster and Randolph, reported sustaining Mr. Crawford. After receiving his wound his health was badly impaired and rendered it impossible for him to continue in public life, and, although he recovered his strength partially, he took no part after this date in politics. Returning to Georgia he became circuit judge, and occupied this office until 1831. He was opposed to the nullification movement, and his last days were spent in retirement. Though powerful as a debater, the merits of Mr. Crawford were more in the closet and on committees. Gifted with a vigorous, expansive and discriminating mind—a mind guided by discretion and governed by integrity—he forced his way by patient application and persevering industry from obscurity and indigence to the highest stations in the public service. In private life Mr. Crawford was unostentatious in his manners, mild and conciliatory in his deportment, plain and regular in his habits, correct in morals, frank and honest in his intercourse with society—a friend of religion and public virtue.

HILL, BENJAMIN HARVEY, was born at Hillsborough, in Jasper county, Ga., Sept. 14, 1823. His father, John Hill, was a man of limited means and little education, but of a flawless reputation and possessed of any amount of good common sense. His mother was a Miss Parham, a Christian lady whose example and teachings had a potent influence in forming the honorable characters of her children. Both parents were consistent members of the Methodist church. When Benjamin was about ten years old his father moved to Long Lane, Troup Co., which was his home until the day of his death. Benjamin grew up on the farm, joining with his brothers in hard labor, and helping his father in the support of the large family, and his only educational advantages were those found in a few months of the country schooling. When eighteen years old, through an arrangement by which his father contributed one-half of the expense, and his mother and an aunt furnished from their slender savings the other half, Benjamin was sent to the state university. He graduated there, taking first honor, also the honors of his literary society. So keen was his intellect that within a year he was admitted to the bar and began practice at La Grange. Here, soon after the commencement of his great career, he was wedded to Miss Caroline Holt, of Athens, a young lady belonging to one of Georgia's old families, of fortune, beauty and accomplishments. Mr. Hill grew rapidly at the bar and his professional fame soon extended all over the state. He began life as a whig and was elected to the legislature in 1851 on that ticket. When that party dissolved he became a know-nothing, or strictly American, and as such was defeated for congress by Judge Hiram Walker, the democratic candidate. In 1856 he was nominated on the Fillmore ticket as an elector-at-large and stumped the state with great ability. At this time he assumed the leadership of the American party, and became their candidate for governor in 1857, being defeated by Gov. Joseph E. Brown. In 1859 he was elected to the state senate as a unionist, and in 1860 his name was on the Bell electoral ticket. He was an open Union man, and in the state secession convention at Milledgeville in 1861 strongly opposed the ordinance of withdrawal from the Union, but on account of the threatened division of his people he afterward voted for secession. He was a member of the Confederate provisional congress and Confederate senate, and was regarded the ablest supporter of Mr. Davis' policy in the senate. In May, 1865, after Lee's surrender, he was arrested by the United States government and confined in Fort Lafayette, N. Y., but was soon released on parole. Returning home he resumed his activity in politics and was vigorous in his opposition to the reconstruction acts of congress, a speech he made at Atlanta attracting wide and marked attention. During this time he published his Notes on the Situation, being a severe arraignment of the constitutional government of the states. In 1870, after the congressional plan of reconstructing the states was completed, and the constitutional amendments were adopted and incorporated into that instrument, Mr. Hill, believing further resistance useless, advised the people to accept the result. He resumed the practice of law with great success. He supported Horace Greeley for president in 1872 and in 1876 was elected to congress from the ninth district. He supported the electoral commission bill in an eloquent address. His celebrated discussion with Mr. Blaine from Maine was one of the most memorable that has ever occurred in the house of representatives, and gave him a national reputation. In 1877 he was elected to the United States senate, where he served till Aug. 16, 1882, the date of his death, which was caused by cancer.

TOOMBS, ROBERT, was born in Wilkes county, Ga., about five miles from Washington, July 2, 1810. William Toombs, the great-grandfather of Robert, was the first of the English family to come to America, about 1650, and he settled in Virginia. Gabriel, a son, fought with Braddock. His son, Robert Toombs, the father of the distinguished statesman, commanded a Virginia regiment during the revolution and rendered great service against the British in Georgia. He came to Georgia in 1783 and received a rich tract of 3,000 acres of land in Wilkes county. He settled on Beaverdam creek, five miles from Washington. He first married Miss Sanders, of Columbia county. She died without issue and he then married a Miss Catlett, of Virginia. His third wife was Catherine Huling, and of this marriage these children were born: Sarah, who finally became Mrs. Pope; James, who was killed by accident while hunting; Augustus, Robert and Gabriel. Catherine Huling was of Welsh ancestry, a devoted Methodist and a most excellent woman. Robert Toombs was, in his youth, of slender build, and of a rather stunted instead of fragile growth. His physical development was after he had reached the age of fifteen. His first training was at what was known as an "old field school," taught by Welcome Fanning. Afterward a private tutor, Rev. Alexander Webster, the preceptor of Alexander Stephens, gave instructions. About 1840 young Toombs entered Franklin college, now the state university, located in Athens, Ga. His college days are replete with stories of mischievousness, and he left the school without receiving his diplomas. Later in life, in his characteristic way, he refused an honorary degree, though a director of the college. In 1828 he finished his classical course and received his A. B. degree at Union college, Schenectady, N. Y. He studied law at the university of Virginia, and on March 18, 1830, was admitted to the bar of Elbert county, his license being signed by William H. Crawford, judge of the superior court. During the first five years of his practice he did not give a bright promise. His work was that of the average country lawyer. Then he developed forth, with an impetus that carried him to a height in his profession never attained by a lawyer in Georgia. As a lawyer Mr. Toombs had a thrilling delivery, which, coupled with a noble presence, carried his audience or jury from the start. A thorough knowledge of his cases, a lightning-like perception of the weak and strong points of controversy, a capacity and willingness to perform intellectual labor, with charming conversational powers were his master points and contributed to an immense success in his profession.

Robert Toombs cast his first vote for Andrew Jackson in 1832. He almost immediately thereafter joined the whigs. In 1837, just after his return from the Creek war, in which he was a captain, he was elected as a whig from the democratic county of Wilkes to the legislature. He was returned at the annual elections in 1839, 1840, 1842 and 1843. In the big campaign of 1844 he was the chief orator of the whigs in Georgia, and combated the great McDuffie in South Carolina. He took his seat in congress in December, 1845. His first speech was on the Oregon question, and placed him among the first debaters and orators of that body. He opposed the acquisition of Texas, and was active in the compromise measures in 1850, and greatly contributed to their passage. On Nov. 10, 1851, he was elected to the United States senate after serving eight years as congressman. As a senator he was unfaltering in his belief in state rights, and advised secession as soon as Lincoln was elected, and in a passionate speech informally left the senate, which action was followed by his expulsion in 1861. He advocated disunion with all the force of his oratory, and when the state convention met in 1861 was chiefly instrumental in carrying the resolution of secession. He was elected to the Confederate congress and would have been elected president of the Confederacy but for old political enemies who opposed him in the last hour. He accepted the portfolio of state under President Davis, but resigned after a short service on account of differences with Davis, and receiving a commission as brigadier-general, on July 21, 1861, joined Gens. Beauregard and Johnston at Manassas. In January, 1862, he was elected to the Confederate States senate, but declined it, preferring to remain in the field. He fought at the second battle of Bull Run and Antietam, but later resigned and returned home. In 1864 he was adjutant and inspector-general of Gen. George W. Smith's division of Georgia militia. He was present during the battles before Atlanta and the engagement at Peach Tree Creek. The four men whom the Washington government wanted to arrest and hold responsible for the war were Toombs, Davis, Slidell and Howell Cobb. Gen. Toombs' escape was accomplished only after thrilling adventures, and he passed two years in Cuba, France and England, but returned in 1867 and resumed the practice of law. As he refused to take the oath of allegiance he was debarred from citizenship. After the war he acted principally with the Democratic party, but Mr. Toombs' great power always made him independent. He criticised Pierce, Buchanan and quarreled with Jefferson Davis. The last years of his life were spent in a war on the railroads. The legislature of Georgia in 1874 taxed railroad property the same as other property, and those corporations resisted. Gen. Toombs, for the state, carried the case to the Supreme court and recovered $300,000 taxes. He was the originator of the state commission railroad law. Gen. Toombs married Julia A. Dubose, a South Carolinian. A man of great deeds and great temptations, great passions, and glaring faults, his domestic life was a model one. His life-long home at Washington was the scene of proverbial hospitality. Three generations have accorded him the distinction of being one of America's greatest men. He was a strongly marked southerner of the old school. Mentally he was distinctively great, eloquent, and personally, upright, brave and obstinate. He died Dec. 15, 1885.

COBB, THOMAS W., was born in Columbia county, Ga., in 1784. He studied law under William H. Crawford, and practiced in Lexington, Ga. In 1817 he was elected to congress, serving until 1821, was again elected in 1823, but resigned in 1824 to succeed Nicholas Ware, deceased, in the United States senate. In 1828 he resigned and became a judge of the superior court. He was a brilliant orator, and during his public life was prominent in all debates on important questions. He died in Greensborough, Ga., Feb. 1, 1830.

HILL, JOSHUA, was born in Abbeville district, S. C., Jan. 10, 1812, and removing to Georgia when a lad, he studied law and began its practice at Madison. He was a member of congress, being elected as an American, from 1857 until Jan. 23, 1861, when he resigned on command of his people, he being opposed to secession. He took no part in public affairs during the war, save accepting a nomination for governor and being defeated by Gov. Brown in 1863. He was a member of the constitutional convention called by President Johnson in 1866, and was defeated for United States senator. During the reconstruction period he defeated Gov. Joseph E. Brown for United States senator, serving until 1873.

COLQUITT, WALTER T., was born in Halifax county, Va., Dec. 27, 1799, and soon after his parents moved to Georgia and settled near Mount Zion, where Walter was sent to the school of Mr. Beman. He went to Princeton, but was called home by the sickness of his father before he graduated. He read law in the office of Col. Samuel Rockwell of Milledgeville, and was admitted to the bar in 1820. He first located at Sparta, and then moved to a village called Cowpens in Walton county. In the meantime he had been elected brigadier-general by the legislature when twenty-one years old. In 1826 he was a candidate of the Troup party for congress, and in a district which contained a majority of 2,000 Clark voters he was only beaten by the Hon. Wilson Lumpkin, their candidate, by thirty-two votes. At the age of twenty-seven he was elected judge of the Chattahoochee superior court. In 1836 and 1837 he represented Muscogee county in the state senate. He was elected to congress as a state's rights whig man in 1838. He resigned upon the nomination of Harrison for the presidency, and supported Van Buren. His course was indorsed by his constituency, and he resumed his seat in congress, serving till March, 1843, when he was sent to the United States senate. He supported the Polk administration and the Oregon question and the Mexican war issue, and opposed the Wilmot proviso. As an advocate Judge Colquitt stood alone in Georgia, perhaps in the whole south. No man could equal him in vigor and brilliancy where the passions of the jury had to be led. He was a Christian and a member of the M. E. church. Of a magnificent constitution, Judge Colquitt was prodigal of his health, and died in the prime of life, aged 56 years. He was first married on Feb. 23, 1823, to Nancy H. Lane, daughter of Joseph Lane, of Newton county, by whom he had six children. The second marriage was in 1841 to Mrs. Alpha B. Fauntleroy, formerly Miss Todd. She lived but a few months, and in 1842 he married Harriet W. Ross, daughter of Luke Ross, of Macon.

BERRIEN, JOHN M'PHERSON, was born in New Jersey, Aug. 23, 1781, and was the son of Maj. John Berrien, a distinguished officer under Washington, and his mother, Margaret Macpherson, whose brother, John Macpherson, was aid-de-camp to Gen. Montgomery, and fell with him at Quebec. In the house occupied by Gen. Washington as headquarters, whence he issued his farewell address to the army, John McPherson Berrien was born. He graduated at Princeton at the age of fifteen, and was admitted to the bar of Georgia in 1799, having read law under Hon. Joseph Clay. In 1809 he was elected solicitor-general, and the next year judge of the eastern circuit. Judge Berrien commanded a regiment of cavalry during the war of 1812. He left the bench in 1821, and was elected to the state senate in 1822. His abilities were so conspicuous there that he was elected in 1824 to the senate of the United States. His eloquence gave him the name of the "American Cicero," and Chief Justice Marshall called him the "honey-tongued Georgia youth." In March, 1829, he became attorney-general under President Jackson. A quarrel in the cabinet, caused by social jealousies on the parts of families of certain members, led to Mr. Berrien's withdrawal. He was elected to the senate again in 1840, and supported the policy of the whigs, and modified his views on the tariff so as to support "incidental protection." He was a delegate to the convention at Baltimore that nominated Henry Clay for president. He became dissatisfied with the whig party in 1845 and resigned from the senate. In 1847 Mr. Berrien had been re-elected by the legislature of Georgia for a new term in the senate, to expire March 4, 1853, and during this service he supported the compromise measures. In 1852 he resigned and returned to his home. He had had fame enough to satisfy even the proudest ambition. In all offices, in all trusts, in all emergencies, his fidelity was acknowledged. Besides, he had a reputation beyond the borders of his own country for scholarship, eloquence, and refinement. He was president of the American party convention held at Milledgeville in December, 1855, and died a month later at his home in Savannah. A writer has said of him: "He was, indeed, a man whose equal in many respects the world has not produced since the days of Cicero. America has had her Henry, one of nature's thunderbolts, her Clay, of grand and surpassing gifts, to electrify the public by their soul-stirring eloquence; but neither of them had the polish of the Roman school, with its rich stores of learning and classic beauties gathered from every epoch and every clime. It was reserved for John McPherson Berrien to stand alone as an example in the nineteenth century."

DAWSON, WILLIAM C., was born Jan. 4, 1798, in Greene county, and died May 5, 1856. He graduated at Franklin college about 1816, and studied law in the school at Litchfield, Conn. He commenced practice in Greensboro in 1818, and soon won for himself a high reputation as an advocate. He was clerk of the house of representatives of Georgia for about twelve years. He was several times elected a senator and representative from Greene county in the legislature, and was a member of congress from 1836 till 1842. He commanded a brigade against the Cherokee Indians in 1836. In 1841 he was beaten for governor by Hon. Charles J. McDonald, and in 1845 was appointed judge of the Ocmulgee circuit. In 1847 he was elected United States senator, and served until 1855. He was a vigilant senator, watching the interests of the whole country, and no constituents were ever more faithfully served in the various trusts committed to his care. As a member of the Masonic order Judge Dawson had reached the highest elevation, and upon his death 200 subordinate lodges draped their rooms in mourning. He was married first to Miss Henrietta M. Wingfield, who died in 1850, then in 1854 to Mrs. Elizabeth M. Williams, of Memphis, Tenn. His eldest son died while at school, the second in infancy; the third son was George Oscar, who frequently represented Greene county in the legislature, and the fourth child was Henrietta Wingfield, who married Joseph B. Hill, of Columbus; the fifth was Edgar Gilmer Dawson, who became a lawyer of Columbus; the sixth child, Emma Caledonia, married Edward W. Seabrook, a nephew of Gov. Seabrook, of South Carolina; the seventh child was Lucien Wingfield Dawson.

TAIT, CHARLES, was born in Louisa county, Va., in 1768, and at an early age located in Georgia. He was associated with William H. Crawford in the management of the Richmond academy. He was judge of the western circuit court of Georgia from 1803 till 1809, and was elected that year to succeed John Milledge in the United States senate. He served till 1819, when he removed to Alabama, dying Oct. 7, 1835.

WALKER, FREEMAN, was born in Charles City county, Va., Oct. 25, 1780. He began the practice of law in Georgia in 1802, and soon became distinguished at his profession. In 1807 he was elected to the legislature, and in 1819 to the United States senate. A speech on the Missouri compromise question won him distinction. He resigned 1821 and retired to private life, dying Sept. 23, 1827.

KING, JOHN PENDLETON, was born in Barren county, Ky., in 1799, and was taken by his parents to Tennessee, where he resided until 1815, when he removed to Georgia. He was admitted to the bar in 1819 and then spent two years in Europe completing his education. He returned to Augusta where he practiced his profession with great success. In 1833 he was a member of the constitutional convention of Georgia and distinguished himself as an orator in debate with W. H. Crawford, Mr. King being a Jackson democrat. The same year he was elected United States senator to fill an unexpired term, and, in 1834, for the full term, serving till Nov. 1, 1837, when he resigned. In a speech before the senate he attacked Van Buren's administration, and being criticised for it by a newspaper he retired from public service. In 1842, he took charge of the Georgia railroad and under his management the road was finished and prospered. His daughter, Louise Woodward, established the Georgia society for prevention of cruelty to animals, and was the founder of the Louise King Home for widows at Augusta.

WARE, NICHOLAS, was born in Carolina county, Va., in 1769, and accompanied his father, Capt. Robert Ware, to Edgefield, S. C., thence to Augusta, where he studied medicine. He finished his studies at the Litchfield, Conn., law-school, and located in Augusta. He represented Richmond county in the legislature, was mayor of Augusta, and United States senator from Georgia in 1821-24. At the time of his death, Sept. 7, 1824, he was trustee of the state university of Georgia, and president of the board of trustees of Richmond county academy.

TELFAIR, EDWARD, second governor of Georgia, was born in Scotland in 1735, and came to America in 1758 as an agent of a mercantile house. He resided in Virginia and then North Carolina, settling in Georgia in 1766. Throughout the revolutionary struggle he bore a conspicuous part, and was intrusted by his fellow citizens with the highest offices. In February, 1778, he was elected delegate to the continental congress, and on July 24 signed the ratification of the articles of confederation. In May, 1785, he was re-elected a member of congress, but did not take his seat. He was governor of Georgia from 1787 to 1789, and from 1791 to 1793. Gov. Telfair was a successful business man. Telfair county, Ga., is named after him. He died Sept. 17, 1807.

PRINCE, OLIVER HILLHOUSE, was born in Connecticut about 1787, moved to Georgia in early years, studied law and practiced at Macon. He was elected to the United States senate, in place of Thomas W. Cobb, serving from Dec. 1, 1828, till March 3, 1829. He was the author of many humorous sketches and of Digest of the Laws of Georgia to December, 1820. He perished in the wreck of the steamer "Home," on the coast of North Carolina.

CUTHBERT, ALFRED, was born in Savannah in 1786, was graduated at Princeton college in 1803 and began the practice of law in Monticello, Jasper Co., in 1803. He was a member of the legislature and then elected to congress in 1813, and 1815, when he resigned. He was again elected in 1821, serving to 1827, when he was chosen senator to succeed John Forsyth, resigned. After filling out the unexpired term he was re-elected, serving till March, 1843. He died near Monticello, July 9, 1856.

CHARLTON, ROBERT M., was born in Savannah, Jan. 19, 1807. In 1828 he was elected to the state legislature and afterward became United States district attorney under President Jackson. In 1834 he was appointed and afterward elected judge of the supreme court for the eastern district of Georgia. In 1852-53 he was United States senator. He was an elegant orator, possessed fine literary accomplishments, being the author of several works of prose and poetry. He was twice mayor of Savannah and died in that city Jan. 18, 1854.

BIBB, WILLIAM M., was born in Virginia, Oct. 1, 1780, was graduated at William and Mary college and received the degree of M. D. in 1801 at the university of Pennsylvania. He located in Georgia and was elected for two terms to the legislature, a member of congress from 1807 to 1813 and United States senator 1813 until 1816. He removed to the territory of Alabama and was elected governor there 1817, and 1819, and was the first executive 1819-21, after its admission as a state. He died July 9, 1820.

DUNN, JAMES, was born of humble parents in Virginia in 1739. Receiving the benefits of a common school education, he applied himself to the study of law, and was admitted to the bar. He joined the continental army and as captain of dragoons he participated, under Gen. Wayne, in the movement for the relief of Savannah, in 1782. After the war he selected that town as his home and resumed the practice of law. He became a colonel of the state militia and subsequently brigadier-general. He was elected a member of the continental congress but never took his seat. He was a member of the first congress under the constitution of 1787, and a United States senator from Georgia, in 1795 and 1796. He was forced from office by his connection with the "Yazoo Frauds" and died in Louisville, Ky.

IVERSON, ALFRED, was born in Burke county, Dec. 3, 1798, was graduated at Princeton and began the practice of law at Columbus. He was a member of the legislature for eight years and was for seven years judge of the superior court for the Columbus circuit. In 1846 he was chosen to congress as a democrat and in 1855 took his seat as a United States senator, withdrawing in 1861 when his state seceded. During the war he was colonel of a Confederate regiment and was commissioned brigadier-general in 1862. In a speech in the senate, before his withdrawal, Mr. Iverson said the southern states would never be satisfied with any concession "that does not fully recognize, not only the existence of slavery in its present form, but the right of the southern people to immigrate to the common territories with their slave property, and their right to congressional protection, while the territorial existence lasts." He died in Macon, March 4, 1873.

JOHNSON, JAMES, was born in Robinson county, N. C., Feb. 24, 1810. He was of Scotch descent, his grand-parents being natives of Scotland. He was graduated from Georgia state university in 1832, and was admitted to the bar in 1835. He practiced in Columbus with great success and in 1857 was elected to congress, but was defeated two years later by A. H. Colquitt, he then being the nominee of the unionists. He was a member of the Georgia know-nothing convention in 1857 and of the Georgia American convention in 1858. By appointment of President Johnson he was provisional governor of Georgia from June 7 to Dec. 19, 1865. He was appointed United States collector of customs at Savannah in 1866, serving until 1869; was made a judge of the superior court in 1870 and in 1872 was an elector on the Grant ticket. It was a high tribute to his qualities as a firm and devoted unionist that he was selected for the delicate duty of restoring Georgia to the Union after the war.

AKERMAN, AMOS TAPPAN, was born in New Hampshire in 1819. In 1842 he was graduated at Dartmouth college, and settled in Elberton, Ga., in 1850, practicing the profession of law. He went with his state in secession and was quartermaster-general in the Confederate service. He joined the republican party after the war and supported the reconstruction acts. He was district attorney for Georgia in 1866, and attorney-general of the United States in 1870, resigning in 1872.

BULLOCH, WILLIAM BELLINGER, was born in Savannah in 1776 and was the son of Archibald Bulloch, the first republican president of Georgia. He received a finished education and was an eminent lawyer. He was mayor of Savannah in 1809, then collector of its port. He served in the war of 1812 and succeeded William H. Crawford in the United States senate, officiating from May 24, 1813, to Dec. 6, 1813. From 1813 to 1843 he was president of the state bank of Georgia. He died March 6, 1852.

BALDWIN, ABRAHAM, was born in Guilford, Conn., Nov. 6, 1754, and his collegiate course was pursued at Yale college where he graduated in 1772. From 1775 to 1779 he was a tutor in that institution, and during the revolutionary war, was chaplain in the continental army under General Greene. In 1784 he moved to Savannah and was admitted to the bar. Three months afterward he was elected to the legislature, where he originated the plan of the university of Georgia, drew its charter, and indicated the lines along which this institution has ever since moved. He was a delegate to the continental congress from 1785 to 1788, and as a member of the convention of 1787, which framed the constitution of the United States formulated some of the essential clauses of that memorable instrument. He was a federalist. He was elected United States senator from Georgia, and served from 1799 to March 4, 1807, his death occurring on the last date. In private life Abraham Baldwin was correct in all his habits, and given to benevolent deeds. Never having married, he expended his accumulations in assisting worthy young men in acquiring an education and in establishing them in business.

WALKER, WILLIAM H. T., was born in Georgia in 1816, was graduated at West Point, 1837, served in the Florida war and was wounded three times at the battle of Okeechobee, and was brevetted first lieutenant for his gallantry there. He served in the Florida war of 1840-42, and became captain in 1845. He was in all the principal engagements of the Mexican war, and won his star as major by heroic conduct at Cantreras, and was made lieutenant-colonel for bravery at Malino del Rey. He was instructor in military tactics at West Point and in 1860 resigned his commission in the United States army. He was made major-general in the Confederate army and was killed at the battle of Decatur, July 26, 1864.

M'LAWS, LAFAYETTE, soldier, was born at Augusta, Jan. 15, 1821, attended the schools of that city and entered the university of Virginia, from which place he was appointed to the United States military academy. He was graduated in 1842 and gained his final experience on the Indian frontier. He was under Gen. Taylor in the Mexican war and was at the occupation of Corpus Christi, the defense of Fort Brown, the battle of Monterey, and the siege of Vera Cruz. In 1851, he was made captain of infantry, and took part in the expeditions against the Mormons and Navajo Indians. He resigned his commission to enter the Confederate army as a brigadier-general. His services in the battle of Lee's Mill, his maneuvers on the retreat to Richmond and at the battle of Williamsburg brought his advancement May 23, when he was made major-general. At the battles of Savage's station and Malvern hill, he commanded divisions, and on the retreat of the Federal army from the Virginia peninsula, his division watched the operations at Harrison's Landing. His division was with the army of northern Virginia in its march into Maryland. He captured Harper's Ferry and Maryland Heights and rejoined the main army at Sharpsburg in time to restore the Confederate line. He was at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg and Knoxville. He defeated Gen. Sedgwick's assault at Salem church, and was in the command of Georgia and opposed Sherman's march through the state. Gen. Johnson's surrender included his command, and after the war Gen. McLaws established himself in business at Augusta. He was appointed collector of internal revenue in 1875 and collector of the port of Savannah in 1876.

FEW, WILLIAM, was born in Baltimore county, Md., June 8, 1748, and was a descendant of William Pfew, one of the Penn colonists. He received a good education from private tutors in North Carolina, and coming to reside in Georgia in 1776, he began the practice of law in Augusta. The following is a summary of the more prominent positions filled by Mr. Few during his long, busy and useful life, as given by Mr. C. C. Jones, Jr.: 1777, member from Richmond county of the Georgia legislature; 1777, member of the executive council; 1778, engaged in the expedition conducted by Gen. Robert Howe and Gov. John Houston, for the subjugation of East Florida; 1778, elected surveyor-general of Georgia; 1778, appointed commissioner of confiscated estates, and senior justice of the county of Richmond; 1779, appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Richmond county militia, and actively employed in the field in resisting the advance of Col. Campbell upon Augusta, and guarding the frontiers of Georgia, and in resisting the predatory attacks of British, Tories and Indians; 1779, a commissioner on the part of Georgia to bring about a pacification of the Creek and Cherokee Indians; 1779, a member of Georgia assembly; 1780, a member of continental congress; 1781, by will of congress, present in Georgia to reconstruct state government; 1782, member of congress; 1783, member Georgia legislature; 1784, admitted to bar of Savannah; 1786, re-elected to congress; 1787, delegate from Georgia to the Philadelphia convention for revising the constitution of the United States; 1788, member of the Georgia convention which ratified the constitution of the United States; 1789, United States senator from Georgia; 1793, member Georgia legislature; 1796, appointed judge second judicial circuit of Georgia; 1799, removed to New York city; 1801-1804, member general assembly of New York; 1804, commissioner of loans; 1813-14, alderman New York city.

HABERSHAM, JOSEPH, was born in Savannah, July 28, 1751, and was the son of James Habersham, governor. Joseph was a member of the council of safety during the war and served in the continental army, being a lieutenant-colonel at its close. He was a delegate to the continental congress, and speaker of the state assembly in 1785 and in 1790. He was postmaster-general under Washington, John Adams and Jefferson until 1801, when he resigned to become president of the United States branch bank at Savannah. He died in 1815.

YOUNG, PIERCE MANNING BUTLER, was born at Spartanburg, S. C., Nov. 15, 1839. At thirteen years of age he entered the Georgia military institute, at Marietta, Ga., and in 1857 was appointed to West Point. He left the school and entered the Confederate army as second lieutenant, was attached to Gen. Bragg's staff and was aide at the same time on Gen. W. H. T. Walker's staff. By frequent promotions he became brigadier-general of cavalry in 1863 and major-general of cavalry in 1864. After the war, he was elected from Bartow county to congress, in 1867, 1869, 1871, 1873. He was delegate to the democratic national conventions that nominated Seymour, Tilden and Hancock. He was appointed by President Hayes, a commissioner in 1878, to the Paris International exposition, and in 1885 by President Cleveland, consul-general to St. Petersburg, resigning in 1887. Gen. Young was a brilliant soldier in the war, and at twenty-three years of age was made major-general. He was wounded three times in battle and three times mentioned for gallant conduct by Gen. J. E. B. Stuart.

COBB, THOMAS R. R., was born in Cherry Hill, Jefferson county, Ga., April 10, 1823. In 1841, at the head of his class he was graduated from the University of Georgia. He was admitted to the bar and was reporter of the supreme court from 1849 till 1857. He was a member of the Confederate congress and became a general in the southern army, being killed at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., Dec. 13, 1862. Mr. Cobb gave much attention to religious and educational matters. He published Historical Sketch of Slavery, from the Earliest Periods; Digest of the Laws of Georgia; and several essays in behalf of a state system of education. He was married to Marion, daughter of Judge J. H. Lumpkin.

STILES, JOSEPH CLAY, was born in Savannah, Dec. 6, 1795. He was graduated at Yale in 1814, and began the practice of law in Savannah, but left it to study theology, graduating at Andover in 1825. The presbytery ordained him in 1826 and he served as an evangelist in Georgia and Florida up to 1835. In 1835, he removed to Kentucky and for nine years labored in the west. After serving as pastor in Richmond, Va., and New York city, he resigned, and, in 1850, became general agent for the American Bible society in the south. In 1853 he became pastor of the South church in New Haven, Conn., and from 1860 to 1875 he labored as an evangelist in the south. He received the degree of D. D. from Transylvania university in 1846, and that of LL. D. from the University of Georgia in 1860. Dr. Stiles was the author of several works on the slavery question. He died in 1875 at Savannah.

HARDEE, WILLIAM J., was born in Savannah about 1818. He entered the army as second lieutenant in 1838, after he was graduated at West Point in the class with Gen. Beauregard. His advancement was rapid and the United States secretary of war sent him to the military school of St. Maur, in France. He returned to America and was one of the officers who crossed the Rio Grande with Gen. Taylor in 1846. He was taken prisoner at Curricito, but was afterward exchanged. For gallantry on the field he was made brevet major March 25, 1847. He was appointed to the command of the cadets at West Point, with rank of lieutenant-colonel in 1855. In 1861 he resigned his commission in the United States army to enter the Confederate service as brigadier-general and was promoted to major-general. Gen. Hardee was in command of the Third corps at Shiloh in 1862, and at the battle of Perryville, Oct. 8, he commanded the left wing of Gen. Bragg's army. He distinguished himself at Murfreesboro and Chattanooga and was made lieutenant-general for services at Perryville and other engagements. He was subsequently assigned to commands in South Carolina and Georgia, surrendering to Gen. W. T. Sherman with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army at Durham, N. C., April 26, 1865. He died in Virginia Nov. 6, 1873.

CRAWFORD, MARTIN JENKINS, associate justice of the supreme court of Georgia, was born in Jasper county, Ga., March 17, 1820. He was admitted to the bar and entered public life as a member of the state legislature of 1845-47. He was appointed judge of the superior courts of Chattahoochee circuit in 1853, but resigned to go to congress, where he held his seat from 1855 to 1861. He was one of the three commissioners sent by the Confederacy to Washington to treat with the government for the peaceful separation of the states. He served gallantly in the Confederate army on the staff of Gen. Cobb. After the war he was appointed to the superior court bench of the Chattahoochee district and then to the supreme court.

STILES, WILLIAM HENRY, was born in Savannah in January, 1808, studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1831. He was solicitor-general for the eastern district of Georgia in 1833-36, and was elected to congress as a democrat in 1843. In 1845 he was appointed charge d'affaires in Austria, serving till 1849. At the beginning of the war he raised a Confederate regiment, in which he served as colonel, but on account of his health resigned. He was the author of a History of Austria, 1848-49.

CLAYTON, AUGUSTINE SMITH, was born in Fredericksburg, Va., Nov. 27, 1783, and with his parents removed to Georgia before 1800. In 1804 he was graduated at the university of Georgia, was admitted to the bar and elected to the legislature. In 1810 he was appointed to compile the statutes of Georgia from 1800. In 1819 he was elected judge of the superior court of the western circuit of Georgia, serving six years, and then again, from 1828 till 1831. In 1831 he was elected to congress, and opposed the tariff and United States bank measures. He served two terms in congress and retired in 1835. He died at Athens June 21, 1839.

M'INTOSH, LACHLAN, was one of two officers furnished by Georgia to the continental army, who attained the rank of brigadier-general. He was born near Raits, in Badenoch, Scotland, March 17, 1725, and when only eleven years old he accompanied his father, John More McIntosh, to Georgia. While still a lad he was enrolled by Gen. Oglethorpe as a cadet in his regiment. He was educated chiefly by his mother, with a military training under Gen. Oglethorpe. At the age of seventeen he entered the counting room of Hon. Henry Laurens, of Charlestown. He subsequently returned to his home near New Inverness, where he married, and adopted the calling of a surveyor. He was made colonel of the First Georgia battalion, formed in January, 1776, and served in behalf of the colonies until independence was achieved. As a result of a clash of jealous ambitions he fought a duel with Button Gwinnett, which resulted in the latter's death. Following this he served during the war in the districts of Virginia and Pennsylvania, but on personal request he was transferred by Gen. Washington to Savannah, where he served gallantly in the siege of that place. He died in 1806 rich in the esteem, the friendship and the gratitude of his fellow-citizens.

WARD, JOHN ELLIOTT, was born in Liberty county, Ga., Oct. 2, 1814. He attended Amherst, then studied law and was admitted to the Savannah bar in 1835. In January, 1836, he was appointed solicitor-general for the eastern district of that state, and in 1838 was appointed United States attorney for Georgia. He was elected to the legislature several times and in 1854 was elected mayor of Savannah. In 1856 he presided over the democratic national convention that met in Cincinnati. In 1858 he was appointed United States minister to China. He moved to New York city in 1866 and practiced law there for many years.

BAKER COUNTY.

B. H. ASKEW, merchant and postmaster, Milford, Baker Co., son of David R. and Eliza Ann (Jordan) Askew, was born in Spalding county, Ga. His Grandfather Askew came from North Carolina and settled in Georgia in the early part of the present century. Mr. Askew's father moved to Griffin to educate his children, where he remained until 1873. That year he removed to Baker county and settled at Haggard's Mills, and later moved to Plattville, Early Co., where he engaged in merchandising until 1876, when he moved to Milford—where our subject now lives—and continued his business until his death, in 1878, aged fifty-eight years. In early life he was a whig, but later became a democrat, and served four years in the Confederate army. His wife survived him some years. To them three children were born: Tallulah Virginia, wife of S. B. Chancy; B. H., the subject of this sketch; Elizabeth, wife of Mr. Thompson. The maternal grandfather of Mr. Askew, Willis A. Jordan, was born in Hancock county, was a physician of fine reputation, and a Methodist preacher. He moved to Spalding county, where he successfully practiced his profession and preached until called "to that bourne whence no traveler returns." Mr. Askew passed his early life in Griffin, where he was educated, attending a school taught by Prof. W. F. Slaton, now superintendent of the public schools of Atlanta. In 1879 he embarked in a general merchandise business at Milford, continuing in it until now, carrying a large and varied and well-selected stock, and is the leading merchant and postmaster of the place. Mr. Askew married Miss Mary L., daughter of Dr. I. H. Hand, of Baker county, and to them seven children have been born: Ben Hill, Birdie May, E. Bower, Fannie Roslin, Gladys, and Floy and Laura, deceased. Mr. Askew is a master Mason, and financially and socially he and his family rank with the best in the county.

B. F. HUDSPETH, clerk of county court, Newton, Baker Co., son of William and Mary (Pool) Hudspeth, was born in Wilkes Co., Ga., May 22, 1833. His paternal grandfather, Richard Hudspeth, was born and raised on a farm in North Carolina, and, when a young man came to Georgia and settled in Wilkes county. After living there many years he moved to Henry county, Ala., where he died at a very advanced age. He was a member of the Primitive Baptist church. His wife survived some years, and was very old when she died. They raised ten children to be grown, two of whom are yet living: Richard T., Henry county, Ala., and Mrs. Elizabeth Parks, Pike county, Ala. Mr. Hudspeth's father was the oldest of the children, and was born in Wilkes county, Jan. 2, 1802, where he grew to manhood and married. He was an "old-line whig," and quite active in politics, and served as major in the Florida war. About 1840 he moved to Meriwether county where he farmed, but lived in Greeneville. Six years later he went to Arkansas and settled on a farm about eighteen miles west of Camden, Ouachita county, where he remained but a year. From there he went to Vicksburg, Miss., and organized the firm of A. M. Boyd & Co., for the sale of western implements; but in 1852 he sold his interest in this business and went to Ouachita county, La., and engaged in farming. Not liking the county he returned to Florida and settled in Baker county. He lived here until 1861 when he moved to Chicot county, Ark., where he remained until after the war, when he came back to Baker county, where he died Jan. 16, 1877. He was a member of the Methodist church. He was married twice. His first wife—the mother of our subject, died in Wilkes county, and was the mother of six children, of whom Mr. B. F. Hudspeth is the only survivor; Eliza J., wife of Dr. J. T. Glover, died in Newton; Mary Ann, died in Memphis, Tenn.; Mattie, wife of John B. Heard, died in Baker county; two died young. His second wife was Miss Caroline Hill, of Meriwether county, Ga., by whom he had one child: Julia T., wife of Columbus Brooks, Albany, Ga.

Mr. Hudspeth during his boyhood attended school in Greeneville, Ga., and spent his youth in Vicksburg, Miss., where, at the age of seventeen he began life for himself as a clerk for A. M. Boyd & Co. Later he bought an interest in the business, but sold it in 1852 and went to New Orleans, and engaged in steam-boating on the Mississippi and Red rivers until 1854. That year he returned to Newton and settled for life, and has been almost continuously in the employ of the people. In 1859 the people of Baker county elected him sheriff; they next elected him judge of the county court; then, in 1868, they elected him ordinary. In 1871 he was elected clerk of the county court, and the next year he bought the ferry across Flint river at Newton—and still holds the office and ferry. In May, 1861, he enlisted in and was made lieutenant of the "Baker Fire Eaters," which afterward became Company H, Sixth Georgia regiment, Colquitt's brigade. He resigned in a short time to accept the colonelcy of the 111th Georgia militia, to which he was elected. He saw much arduous service, particularly during the siege of Atlanta, when the command was almost continuously under fire. His command dug nearly all the trenches around, and from Atlanta to Peachtree creek. After the war he engaged in merchandising in Newton, and as has already been related, in serving the people. Enterprising, progressive, and public spirited, his official positions afforded him the opportunity and the influence to be an eminently useful citizen—an opportunity he has been quick to avail himself of.

Mr. Hudspeth married Miss Sarah A., daughter of Israel Maples, a prominent farmer of Baker county, by whom he has had three children: Emma; Mattie, and Kate—all three at home. He is a master Mason, a member and secretary and collector of the American Legion of Honor,—a position he has held since 1880—and an exemplary member of the Methodist church.

I. H. HAND, physician, Milford, Baker Co., son of Henry Harrison and Charity (Thompson) Hand, was born in Burke county, Ga., in 1822. The family descended from one of two brothers who emigrated from Holland to America and settled first in New York. Afterward the descendants of one of the brothers scattered from New York eastwardly and westwardly, and the descendants of the other scattered from Maryland and Virginia southward. Mr. Hand's grandfather, Rev. Henry Hand, was born in Virginia, where he migrated to South Carolina, and thence to Georgia. He settled first in Columbia county, but later moved to Talbot county, where he died in 1835 or 1836, aged eighty-two years. He was ordained a minister of the Baptist church when a young man, and was an earnest and zealous worker in the Master's vineyard until within a few years of his death, when the infirmities of old age compelled him to retire. He was very active in his efforts to prevent a division of the Baptist church on missionary work. He was a man of more than ordinary ability, self-educated and self-made; and a man of large influence. He was the father of ten children, seven of whom were sons: William, John, Henry Harrison, James, Rev. Thomas, Joel and Rev. Joseph. Mr. Hand's father was born in Columbia county, but was raised principally in Burke county, Ga., where he married and lived until he had quite a family. From Burke he moved to Houston county, Ga., where he lived about twenty years, when he moved to Sumter county, where he died some years later, aged seventy-eight years. He was a farmer and blacksmith, was what is known as a "good liver," made plenty to meet every want, but unambitious as to the acquisition of property. In the last war with Great Britain, 1812-14, he served as lieutenant, and afterward was a captain of the militia, when it was a local distinction. He was physically a very strong and active man and earnest and zealous in whatever he undertook. In politics he was an "old-line whig," and, his mother being a Harrison, and a reputed relative of Gen. W. H. Harrison, he took a very active part in the presidential campaign of 1840. His first wife was a Miss Owens, by whom he had one child—Sarah, now deceased—who married a Mr. William Iverson. By his second marriage—to Miss Thompson, our subject's mother—he had five children: Joseph, who died in Taylor county, Ga.; Elizabeth, now Mrs. Raiford, Americus, Ga.; I. H., the subject of this sketch; Columbia W.; Camilla, wife of Dr. David Bagley, Sumter county, Ga. His wife died in Houston county in 1848 or 1849, aged fifty-four years. Dr. Hand was raised in Houston county, his father having moved there when he was about five years old. He attended the common schools of the county, but may claim to have educated himself, as he studied assiduously at night after his day's work in the field was done. He studied medicine under Dr. William Fisher, of Wilkinson county, Ga., and afterward attended lectures at Forsyth, Ga., at the institution since removed and established in Atlanta as the Georgia college of eclectic medicine and surgery, at which he has subsequently lectured himself. He has also lectured in the medical department of the University of Florida. After his graduation he located in Houston county, where he practiced until December, 1851—six years—when he removed to his present location, where he has since lived, where he established a large and remunerative practice, and where, also, he is engaged very extensively in farming. During the late civil war he was elected by the justices of the inferior court to remain at home and give medical attention to the families of the soldiers. After the war he was elected a delegate to the constitutional convention of 1865, and afterward elected to the general assembly and served during the sessions of 1865-66. He was also elected a delegate to the constitutional convention of 1877, and in 1886 was elected to represent his senatorial district in the general assembly. In 1890 he was again elected. In each case he was elected without any solicitation on his part—as he never sought office.

In 1892 he was nominated for congress by the populists, but was defeated. The nomination was unanimous and unsought. Dr. Hand's writings on medical subjects have attracted much attention throughout the country and his contributions on the political questions of the day have brought him many letters of congratulation. Dr. Hand was married twice. His first wife was Miss Laura Elizabeth, daughter of Isaac Bower, Milledgeville, Ga., to whom were born: Fannie H., educator; Joseph H., physician, Blakeley, Ga.; Mary S., wife of B. H. Askew, Milford; Miranda, wife of Dr. R. T. Hillman, Senoia, Coweta Co.; A. L., physician, Faceville, Decatur Co., Ga.; Isaac Henry, deceased in infancy; Galen, deceased at five years; Clifford, deceased at eleven years, and Lillie, deceased at thirteen years. For his second wife he married Mrs. Ella S. Bull, Tallahassee, Fla., daughter of Chief Justice Baltzell, whose children by her first marriage were: W. S. Bull, conductor, Brunswick & Western railway; Ella, wife of John Farrant, and Misses Bessie P. and Hattie B., at home. The doctor is pleasantly situated, comfortable in every way, surrounded by an intelligent, accomplished family, and dispenses "old-time southern hospitality."

J. T. KIDD, planter and miller, Milford, Baker Co., Ga., son of George W. and Martha (Crocker) Kidd, was born in Stewart county, Ga., in 1851. His grandfather, Richard Kidd, when a young man, settled in Stewart county—among the earliest settlers—and was a planter of note and a prominent citizen. He represented the county in the general assembly, reared a large family of children, of whom only one survives—Peninah Belle, living in Alabama—was an influential member of the Methodist church, and died at a very old age in 1867. Mr. Kidd's father was born in Newton county, Ga., and, when quite young, went with the family to Stewart county, in which he grew up and was educated. During the war he served awhile in the militia. He served a number of years as sheriff of the county, his vocation being that of a planter, and milling. In 1866 he moved to Albany, Dougherty Co., Ga., where he kept a hotel until 1869, when he moved to Baker county, and settled on a plantation near Milford. Seven years afterward he moved to Brooks county, Ga., where he lived till he died, his wife surviving him but a short time. He was a consistent member of the Methodist church. They were the parents of three children: Missouri, wife of C. W. Dunkin, of Brooks county; J. T., the subject of this sketch, and Cora. Mr. Kidd was raised mainly in Baker county, on the farm, and at milling; but was schooled mostly in Lumpkin, Stewart county, and at Albany. In 1872 he entered into business for himself at the old home place, where he remained about five years; he then, in the spring of 1877, settled where he now lives, and engaged in planting and operating a saw and grist-mill. Energetic and enterprising, he is a hearty and liberal supporter of all movements calculated to promote the interests of the county morally and materially. He served as county commissioner a number of years. He married Miss Cordelia F., daughter of W. J. Jeffries, a farmer and stock raiser of Baker county. To them three children have been born: Willie J.; Centennial, and George Hand. Mr. Kidd is a stanch democrat, and himself and family are members of the Methodist church.

J. T. NORRIS, merchant, Newton, Baker Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Frances (Myrick) Norris, was born in Chambers county, Ala., in 1843. His father was born near Yorktown, Va., in 1807. When he was about ten years old his father died, and he was taken in charge by his uncle. A few years later he left his uncle and worked in a blacksmith shop until he saved money enough to buy a horse. He then came to Georgia on horseback, and stopped in Macon, Ga., where he engaged as overseer with Hon. Henry G. Lamar, with whom he remained several years. In the meantime he had married, and decided to go to Alabama, which he did, and lived some years in Chambers county. Returning to Bibb county, Ga., in 1852, with his family, he purchased land in Baker county, and settled his negroes on it, and in 1856 settled his family there. He engaged extensively in planting, and lived on this plantation till his death, which occurred in 1874. Mr. Norris' mother, who was a devoted member of the Methodist church, died in 1875, aged fifty-nine years. Of eleven children born to them, four died in childhood, two—Abner H. and Samuel A.—died after reaching maturity, and five are living: J. T., the subject of this sketch; Julia F., wife of John Bowman, Macon county, Ga.; C. E., merchant, Newton, Ga.; Lucia O., wife of S. J. W. Livingston, Albany, Ga.; C. F., merchant, Newton, Ga. Mr. Norris was raised and educated in Bibb county, and when seventeen years of age joined Cobb's Legion—going from Baker and enlisting in Dougherty county—and remained in the service until the surrender. With his command he participated in the most important battles fought by the army of northern Virginia, and came out of the service as adjutant of Wright's brigade (he entered the army weighing ninty-four pounds, and left it weighing 156). Mr. Norris was wounded—not dangerously—three times, never missed a day when able to be on duty, never was sick except a few days with small-pox, and missed roll call only three days. After the war he returned to Baker county and farmed until 1868, when he engaged in merchandising. In 1873, on account of the panic, he returned to his farm, which occupied his attention several years. He next went to Decatur, Ala., and went into the restaurant business, which he continued until the yellow fever drove him out. He then returned to Newton, and re-entered the general merchandise business, in which he is now successfully and profitably engaged. He is a shrewd business man, one of a high sense of honor, and throws his whole soul into whatever he undertakes. Mr. Norris married Miss Mattie O., daughter of James C. Lark, of the mercantile firm of Hammond & Lark, Hamburg, Macon Co., Ga. One child only—Thomas P.—has blessed this union, who is now a student at the university at Macon, Ga. Mr. Norris is an unadulterated democrat, and took a very active part against the third (or populist) party; is a Master Mason; a Knight of Honor, a member of the Legion of Honor, and an influential member of the Presbyterian church.

H. A. LEDBETTER, hotelkeeper and merchant, Newton, Baker Co., son of Drury and Nannie (Dodwell) Ledbetter, was born in Dougherty county, Ga., in 1856. The family came from middle Georgia and settled near Albany, in what is now Dougherty county, and engaged in planting. Later they moved to Dougherty county, where the father died in 1864, aged fifty-six years, and the mother died in 1866, aged fifty-five years. He was a member of the Baptist church, and she of the Methodist church. Nine children were born to them: William A., Albany, Ga.; Alfred M., Albany; H. A., the subject of this sketch; Lizzie, deceased wife of W. W. Dodwell, leaving one child, and five who died when small. Mr. Ledbetter was principally raised in Dougherty county, and educated mainly in Dawson, Terrell Co., Ga. In 1874, he began life for himself on a farm near Walker station, Dougherty Co., and, later, embarked in merchandising. In 1877, he moved to Baker county, and settled at what is now known as Ledbetter P. O. (so named in compliment of him), where he engaged extensively in farming and conducted a general merchandise store. He continued this about ten years and then went to Decatur, Ala., where he engaged in business in partnership with J. T. Norris, which, however, had to be abruptly abandoned on account of the yellow fever. Returning to Newton he embarked in the hotel business, and in partnership with Mr. Norris established a general merchandise store, transacting a very large and successful trade. Having ample means, and being of affable manners, sociable and of generous impulses, he is very popular and a leading citizen. When he went to Decatur he resigned the position of clerk of the board of county commissioners, but was re-elected immediately on his return, and holds the office now. He is wide-awake and public spirited, takes a deep interest in county affairs, and is active in politics. He is especially solicitous that his children should be thoroughly educated. Mr. Ledbetter was married to Miss Annie, daughter of James C. Lark, formerly of Augusta, Ga., but now of Baker county. She was raised in the county, but educated at Forsyth and Thomasville, Ga. Eight children blessed this union: James D., student, Cuthbert, Ga.; Annie Pearl; Adolphus B.; George Lark; Thomas Norris (living); and Lessie, Maude and an infant deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Ledbetter are exemplary members of the church.

JOHN O. PERRY, judge county court, Newton, Baker Co., son of John and Martha (Partin) Perry, was born in Crawford county, Ga., April 3, 1835. His father was a native of North Carolina, who, on the death of his father when he was a boy, left that state and came to Georgia. He dwelt awhile in Burke county, then went to Twiggs county, where he married his wife (who was a native of South Carolina), and, later moved to Crawford county—among its earlier settlers. He was a farmer, but took an active part in politics, holding the offices of bailiff and tax collector many years. When advanced in years he moved to Jefferson county, where he married a second time, and died in 1863, aged sixty-six years. An older brother, William Perry, died while a soldier in the war of 1812. Judge Perry's mother died in Crawford county, in 1856, aged fifty-seven years. Both parents were members of the Primitive Baptist church. They had eight children, of whom those living are: John O., the subject of this sketch; M. F., treasurer Crawford county; Caroline Becham, wife of Washington Becham, Crawford county; and Martha L. Seely, of Terrell county. The deceased are: William R., died in Florida, in 1881, aged sixty-one years; Columbus B., of the Twelfth Georgia regiment, died October, 1861, on Greenbriar river, aged twenty-four years; America, drowned when two years old; Bettie, died at twenty-three; Jane, wife of Robert Hancock, died in Crawford county, sixty years of age. Mr. Perry remained on the farm, and attended the common schools until he was sixteen years old, when he engaged as a clerk in a neighboring store until he was of age. He then went to Bainbridge as bookkeeper for J. H. Colbert & Co. He was elected marshal and held the office until he left for the Confederate army as a member of the Bainbridge independents, Capt. J. W. Evans, First Georgia regiment, Col. Ramsay. After serving here a year he enlisted in the Abell battery, Florida artillery, with which he remained as first gun sergeant until Gen. Johnston surrendered at Greensboro, N. C., April 26, 1865. He was in the battle at Greenbriar river, Va.; at Olustee and other battles in Florida, and the battles around Savannah, besides many minor engagements. After the war he returned to Bainbridge, finding nothing left but a wife and three children. He soon left for Mitchell county, Ga., where he engaged in farming, with excellent success, for four years. The latter part of 1869 he moved to, and settled in the woods on the land he now owns, and which has since been his home—on the Flint river, between two and three miles below Newton. Besides this 250-acre tract, under improved and profitable cultivation, he has one of 500 acres partially cleared, and several other tracts. He is a progressive and good farmer, full of energy, and very popular. Besides his farming interests he is largely interested in real estate in Baker and adjoining counties. April 1, 1876, he was appointed judge of the county court, and is now serving his tenth term—will have served twenty years on the expiration of his present term, April 1, 1896—and during his nineteen years' service the decisions of but one case have been reversed, and he has never, from any cause whatever, failed to hold his court at the stated time. He is thoroughly alive to the interests and progress of the county and its development. Mr. Perry was married in Abbeville, Ala., Nov. 29, 1859, to Miss Sarah, daughter of Edwin J. Cole, a leading merchant of Clayton, Barbour Co., Ala., a union which has been blessed with four children: Mrs. Lulu A. May, Florida; Walter C., traveling salesman, Bainbridge, Ga.; Edwin J., cashier Bainbridge state bank; Willie Frank, died when two years and six months old. Mr. Perry was president of the county board of education fifteen years, or until the law was passed against holding two offices at the same time. He is a member of the American Legion of Honor, and has been grand commander of Georgia, and was Georgia's representative to the supreme council held at Milwaukee, Wis., August, 1893. He also was Georgia's representative at Detroit, Mich., in August, 1895. Himself and wife are exemplary and active members of the Presbyterian church, of which he has been a ruling elder twenty-one years. He has been superintendent of the Newton Sunday school twenty years, and president of the Sunday school association of the county fifteen years. Baker county cannot, and it might safely be said that no county can, claim a more useful citizen. Judge Perry is now in his sixty-first year. He is hale and hearty, strong and active, and is a total abstainer from all intoxicants, not having so much as tasted wine or strong drinks for the last twenty-three years of his life.

HENRY T. PULLEN, planter, Millford, Baker Co., Ga., son of Moses and Penelope (Askew) Pullen, natives respectively of Virginia and North Carolina, was born in Laurens county, Ga., in 1825. His grandfather, Rev. Thomas Pullen, was a native of Scotland, and came to the United States late in the last century, married a Miss Bowers in Virginia, then migrated to Georgia and settled in Laurens county at what is now known as Pullen's Hill, where he engaged in planting. He was a zealous Methodist preacher, and supplied several churches. He died in Laurens county at the age of seventy-five years. His wife died several years before he did. They had six children—all deceased—of whom Henry T. Pullen's father was the youngest son. He was born and raised on the home place, and received a common school education in Laurens county. He married a Miss Ard, by whom he had three daughters: Priscilla, born deaf and dumb (deceased); Sarah, widow of Seabon Walters, Americus, Ga.; Martha J., wife of Simeon Walters, Baker county. The mother of these having died, he married Miss Penelope Askew, born in North Carolina. In 1831 he moved from Laurens to Sumter county, Ga., and settled on a tract of land and lived there until he died. He was a lieutenant in the army in the last war against Great Britain—1812-14—was an old-line whig in politics, and a member and class leader in the Methodist church, and was a much-esteemed citizen. His wife died in 1865, and himself in 1866. Of the children born to them five lived to maturity: Henry Thomas, the subject of this sketch; Mary Ann, wife of Isaac C. Harris, Norwood, Warren county, Ga.; Moses M., Alabama; Joshua H. (deceased); and William, died in Virginia during the war, a member of Patterson's company, Cutt's battalion brigade of artillery. Mr. Pullen's father moved while he was a child to Sumter county, where he was raised and educated. He remained at home until he was twenty-five years old, when he went to Stewart county, Ga. After several years' residence there he moved to Calhoun county, Ga., where he lived four years, and then returned with his family to Sumter county. In 1864 he enlisted in the Tenth regiment, Georgia state troops, and remained in the service till the close of the war. In 1866, he removed to Blakeley, Early county, Ga., living there five years; thence to Damascus, same county, where he planted until 1879, when he settled permanently where he now lives. Mr. Pullen has a fine plantation and comfortable home, is a prosperous man, very highly esteemed, and exercises a wide and strong influence for good. Mr. Pullen has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Annie E., born in Columbia county, Ga., daughter of William P. Jones, of Sumter county, by whom he had nine children: William M., Early county; Thomas H., physician, graduate Georgia college eclectic medicine and surgery, Atlanta; George M., at home; Mittie L., deceased wife of W. I. Layton, Seneca, Florida; Sarah W., deceased wife of G. D. Webb, Cuthbert, Ga.; Emma, died at thirteen years of age; Ida Anna, died at four years of age; and two which died when infants. Mrs. Pullen died Sept. 13, 1874, and subsequently Mr. Pullen married Miss Jane E. Hardy, whose parents moved from South Carolina to Miller county, Ga., in 1859, by whom he has had no children. Mrs. Pullen is a member of the Missionary Baptist church, and Mr. Pullen is a member of the Methodist church, of which he has been a steward for twenty-five years.

BALDWIN COUNTY.

J. JOHN T. ALLEN, judge of the county court, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., son of James Troup Allen, was born at Mt. Zion, Hancock county, Oct. 24, 1861. His father is, and all his life has been a farmer in Hancock county. During the late war he was a non-commissioned officer in the Confederate service, and remained until the surrender.

Judge Allen was raised on the farm, and received such education as the near-by schools could give, and in 1880, when the middle Georgia military institute opened its doors at Milledgeville, he entered that institution, graduating from it in 1883. He then entered the law department of the university of Georgia at Athens, from which he graduated in 1884, and was at once admitted to the bar, but returned to his home at Mt. Zion. Early in the ensuing year he came to Milledgeville, and in April formed a law partnership with Hon. Robert Whitfield, which still continues. He is a well-read and able lawyer, creditably sustaining the dignity of his judicial position, to which he was elected in 1889, and after serving four years was re-elected.

Judge Allen was married Nov. 27, 1890, to Miss Hattie, daughter of H. E. Hendrix, of Milledgeville, by whom he has had three children: Marion, Isabelle A., and Gladys Pernita. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., a royal arch Mason, and affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

J. JOHN A. CALLAWAY, physician and surgeon, Milledgeville, Baldwin county, was born in Milledgeville, Aug. 17, 1858. His boyhood and youth were spent in the city, and he received his primary and preparatory education at its excellent schools. He afterward attended Mercer university, from which he was graduated in 1877, and then began the study of medicine. After careful preparation he attended lectures at the college of physicians and surgeons, New York city, from which he was graduated in 1881, and returned to Milledgeville, where he located and has since practiced his profession. Dr. Callaway is a man of natural ability, and of more than ordinary skill as a surgeon. Personally he is a very pleasant and most affable gentleman, and universally popular. He is a member of the state medical association.

Dr. Callaway was married in 1882 to Miss Bessie Fleming, a union which has been blessed with two bright sons—Leon and Thomas. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and a member of the Baptist church.

J. HARRIS CHAPPELL, president of the Georgia Normal and Industrial college, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., was born near Macon, Bibb Co., Ga., Oct. 18, 1849. When eight years old his father moved to Columbus, Ga., where he received his primary education. Later, in 1869-70, he attended the university of Virginia. Soon after leaving the university he began teaching school, filling engagements in Clinton, Jones Co., and in other small country towns until 1877, when he located at his old home in Columbus, where he remained seven years. In 1884 he was elected principal of the State normal school, Jacksonville, Ala., which he held two years and was re-elected, but he declined because of the earnest and urgent solicitations of leading citizens of Columbus, Ga., to return to that city and establish a high grade girls' school. In response to this urgent solicitation he went to Columbus and opened the school. He met with phenomenal success, the attendance soon reaching 150 pupils, demanding a faculty of ten teachers. He was principal—equivalent to a presidency—of this school until 1891, when he retired to accept his present position. He was elected secretary of the Georgia State Teachers' association in 1887, and served one year, and in 1888 he was elected president. For a number of times he has been chosen or appointed by the association as an essayist—unfailingly meeting every expectation. As a practical educator, and one commanding the fullest confidence of the public as such, President Chappell doubtless has equals, but he has few, if any, superiors.

President Chappell was married in 1883 to Carrie, daughter of the late G.H. Brown, Madison, Ga., for many years president of the Madison female college. She died childless in 1886, and in 1891 he contracted a second marriage with Etta, daughter of Dr. J. Kincaid, Rome, Ga., by whom he has had two children—Cal-mese, deceased, and Cornelia.

PETER J. CLINE.—Industry and economy, when accompanied by intelligently directed enterprise, will generally win under any surroundings; but there now and then occur cases of more than ordinary success and interest. One of the most conspicuous of these, as well as one of the most instructive, is that of Peter J. Cline, merchant-farmer and stock raiser, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., son of Peter and Bridget Cline, who was born in Augusta, Ga., Sept. 22, 1845. His parents were natives of County Roscommon, Ireland, and the subject of this sketch was the only one of the children born in this country. Mr. Cline's father, a teacher by profession, emigrated to this country in 1843 and settled in Augusta, Ga., where, by his unusual ability he soon attained prominence and influence and position in the city government. About three years afterward he sent for his family, and two years later, in 1848, he died, aged thirty-nine years. His widow was born in 1813 and died in 1853. Both were devout Catholics.

On the death of his parents Mr. Cline was placed under the guardianship of his sister, Miss Mary E. Cline, who with himself were the only surviving members of the family. He was sent to Sharon, Taliaferro Co., Ga., to school. While he was at school his sister married Patrick Otis, of Augusta, Ga., and after his return from school he was "cash-boy" in a dry-goods store for some time in Augusta. In February, 1861, he was sent to St. Vincent college in Pennsylvania, where he remained until July, 1864, when he left there and started home. By the time he had reached Louisville, Ky., his money gave out, and having no friends and knowing no one through whom to get a passport, he sought employment, which he finally obtained on the railway, and worked his way as a brakeman to Nashville. In that city, having some friends, he secured a situation in a crockery store and retained it some considerable time. Himself and other "southern boys" there were very closely watched, but the national characteristics of impulsiveness and impetuous courage caused him to be more closely watched than others, and involved him in several fights with the Federal authorities, and finally five weeks' incarceration in jail—and he was really threatened with more serious punishment. Through the influence of kind friends he was finally released, and there being no railway transportation, he left Nashville as quickly as possible for Augusta by wagon, via Atlanta. On reaching Augusta he obtained a situation in a dry-goods store, which he kept until December following, when he went to Crawfordville, Ga., where he clerked several months. In 1869 he went to Atlanta, where he entered the employ of John Gannon in his dry-goods store, and remained about a year. Returning to Augusta he clerked awhile and then formed a partnership with J. P. Quinn and sold silks and broadcloth in South Carolina with horse and wagon—a portable store. Starting with a joint capital of $150, he made $1,400 in between four and five months. He now “struck out” for bigger things. In September, 1870, he and his partner began business in Milledgeville under the firm name of Cline & Quinn, and in 1873 established a branch store, with Mr. Quinn as manager in Eatonton, Ga. In 1875 the firm, with $23,000 cash capital, dissolved. Their success had been phenomenal from the beginning; a very striking example, as well as affording the greatest encouragement to young men ambitious of success in any line of human endeavor. Turning his attention to husbandry, he has been no less successful and prosperous; and here, also, sets an example which thousands of southern farmers would do well to emulate. He has a large grass farm, is the largest hay producer in that part of the state, and is making money at it. In addition to this he has one of the largest and best blooded herds of Jersey cattle in the south—no better pedigree in the country—in which he takes just pride, as well as realizes large profits. When southern farmers “wake up” and work up to the great possibilities of their section there will be tens of thousands like the enterprising subject of this sketch. It was hardly possible that a man of Mr. Cline’s practical business qualities should be entirely overlooked by his fellow-citizens—so he has been elected to the mayoralty of Milledgeville, been a member of the board of trustees of the Middle Georgia Military and Agricultural college, a director in the bank, and was appointed by Gov. Northen a member of the board of commissioners to the colored school at Savannah—all through the urgent solicitation of friends. He has always been an active temperance worker, and although not a prohibitionist has never taken a drink of whisky. How much of his success may be credited to that?

Mr. Cline was married in 1874 to Miss Katie L., daughter of Hugh Treanor, of Milledgeville, by whom he had seven children, six of whom are living. The mother of these, a devout and exemplary member of the Catholic church, died in August, 1884. Subsequently he married a sister of his first wife, who has borne him six children, of whom five survive. Mr. Cline and wife and family are devout and influential members of the Catholic church.

THOMAS JEFFERSON COOPER, farmer-merchant, Stevens Pottery, Ga., son of William M. and Millie (McGinty) Cooper, was born in Muscogee county in 1837. His father and mother were both born in 1811; the former died in 1866 and the latter in 1886, and both were devoted and devout members of the Primitive Baptist church. They were the parents of eight children: Mary, wife of James T. Robinson; Melinda, wife of W. R. Fenn; Thomas J., the subject of this sketch; Emily, widow of Mr. Etheridge; Catharine, deceased; James, died at Goldsboro, N. C., while in the Confederate service; Elizabeth, wife of W. C. Patterson; Gatsey, wife of W. F. Partee.

Mr. Cooper’s parents moved to Baldwin county about 1845, so that he was raised and educated in the county of which he has been a citizen fifty years. On attaining to manhood he began farming, but in 1862 enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. Conn, went to Virginia and was discharged. He re-enlisted under Col. (afterward Gen.) Doles, serving six months; next under Capt. Lofton, and later, for awhile under both Capt. Beman and Rutherford, and was finally discharged in Augusta in 1865. He came home from the war to find his earnings all gone, and that he must begin life anew, so he set about the "reconstruction" of his own affairs with a will. By hard work, and working early, late and long, practicing economy and investing his surplus judiciously he has forged ahead until he now owns 635 acres of excellent, well-improved farm-land, and since 1868 has had a well-stocked general merchandise store, where he does a good and profitable business. He is now one of the leading planters and one of the solidest and most reliable men of Baldwin county. For four years he served his fellow-citizens as a justice of the peace.

Mr. Cooper was married in 1858 to Miss Sarah, daughter of Joseph S. and Fannie Etheridge, a union which has been blessed with twelve children: Catharine, James, Charles, Sallie, Fannie, John, Effie, Mamie, Roy, Cleveland and two which died in infancy. The mother of these died in 1892 and subsequently Mr. Cooper married Miss M. E. Fenn.

COL. CHARLES DU BIGNON, deceased, was the son of Col. Henry and Amelia (Nicolson) Du Bignon, and was born on Jekyl island, Glynn county, Ga., Jan. 4, 1809. After receiving his preparatory education in his native state he went north to finish it. On his return he read law under the late R. R. Cuyler, one of the most eminent lawyers of his time, and for many years the able president of the Central Railroad & Banking company, and located in Glynn county. In 1841 he was elected to represent the county at the general assembly at Milledgeville, then the capital. In 1844 he moved from Glynn to Baldwin county, where he made his permanent home, and abandoned politics and the practice of his profession to look after the very large plantation interests of his wife, whose father, Senator Grantland, was then one of the wealthiest men in Georgia. He was a magnificent specimen of southern manhood and chivalry and was made captain of the governor's horse guards, which was composed of the flower of the citizenry of the state's capital and Baldwin county. As the captain of this company he went to the Confederate army in Virginia. He died at Woodville, near Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Sept. 13, 1877, and is entombed in the cemetery at Milledgeville. His estimable widow, who survives him, is living at the old homestead.

Col. Du Bignon was married Jan. 4, 1844, to Miss Anna V., daughter of Hon. Seaton and Ann (Tinsley) Grantland, a union blessed with the following-named children: Charles Fleming, who lost his life in the Confederate service; Seaton G., deceased since the war; Katharine, who married Gen. Moxley Sorrell, now of the Ocean Steamship company, with office in New York; Fleming G., lawyer, Savannah, Ga., sketch of whom will be found elsewhere in these Memoirs, and Charles P., youngest child and son, who is living with his aged mother at the Grantland old homestead, Woodville, Ga.

JOHN MARTIN EDWARDS, county treasurer, Milledgeville, son of Martin Edwards, was born in Milledgeville in 1840. His father was born in Rockingham county, N. C., in 1800, ran away from home when a boy, and finally settled in Augusta, Ga., in 1836. He was married in 1838, very poor, and about the same time began life in earnest by engaging in peddling. After accumulating a small sum from his savings he settled in Milledgeville and engaged in merchandising; was prosperous and acquired considerable property, and died in 1879. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity. His widow, whose maiden name was Miller, is still living at the old homestead, her home since 1848, where she awaits the summons to a reunion with him who has gone before. She is a revered and exemplary member of the Methodist church. Eight children blessed this union: John

M., the subject of this sketch; Annie E., wife of M. Kidd; Susan E., widow of M. R. Bell; Perry J., who was a soldier in the Confederate army; George F.; Jefferson, drowned when thirteen years old; Mary, deceased, and Warren.

Mr. Edwards was reared in Milledgeville, where he was schooled until he was seventeen years old, when he was made overseer of his father's plantation. He remained there until the civil war began, when he joined the state troops and served six months under Col. Robert T. Harris. He then enlisted in the Confederate service, and gallantly participated in some of the most important battles of the war, among them Vicksburg, seven days' fight around Richmond, Knoxville, Murfreesboro, Missionary ridge, Powder Springs, Kennesaw mountain, and the battles around Atlanta, remaining in the service until the surrender, losing no time in hospitals or by furlough. His father had 6,000 or 8,000 acres of land, and on this on his return home he commenced farming. Of the corn he raised he sold 100 bushels for $250, which was the foundation of his present estate. In 1873 he was made deputy sheriff and served four years, and in 1885 he was elected treasurer of Baldwin county, to which he has been continuously re-elected since, the highest testimony possible as to his business capability and integrity. He is now operating thirty hands on the farm, and is accounted one of the best farmers, as well as one of the solidest and most influential of Baldwin county's citizens.

Mr. Edwards was married, in 1869, to Miss Bessie, daughter of Robert Himes, Franklin county, Tenn. Four children have been the fruit of this union: Himes M., William Stroud, Mattie T., deceased at six years of age, and Bessie. Mr. Edwards is a member of the I. O. O. F. and a Master Mason, and Mrs. Edwards is an active working member of the Baptist church.

CHARLES W. ENNIS, ex-sheriff, farmer, Milledgeville, Ga., son of P. M. and Evaline (Minor) Ennis, was born in Baldwin county in 1845. He grew to manhood on the farm, and enjoyed very good educational advantages at the country schools and in Milledgeville. His father was of Scotch-Irish descent, born in Baldwin county, and died in 1891. His mother died in 1882. Both were members of the Primitive Baptist church. On reaching manhood he engaged in farming, which he has made the principal pursuit of his life. In 1863 he entered the Confederate service as a member of the governor's horse guards, Capt. Nichols, and continued in it until the close of the war. He was a participant in the battles of the Wilderness and Cold Harbor, and many others—in all fourteen engagements in twelve months, besides numerous skirmishes. Early in 1865 he was captured and sent to Hart's island, N. Y., where he was detained until June 19, 1865. He reached home July 3, to find his father's farm nearly devastated—stock and provisions all gone, the Federal army having passed over it. In 1875 he embarked in the saw-mill business, which he successfully followed until 1879, when he was elected sheriff of the county. He was continuously re-elected until 1895, having served for sixteen consecutive years. While discharging the responsible duties of sheriff so efficiently as to be continued so long in it, he conducted his farming with success. His faithfulness and efficiency and the consequent merited popularity could not be better attested than by his prolonged retention in office.

Mr. Ennis was married in 1866 to Miss Eliza F., daughter of George W. and Abia (Lewis) Barnes, natives respectively of Maryland and North Carolina. To them six children have been born: Sonora, Charles P., killed in 1891 by a boiler explosion; Cora; J. Howard, farmer; Ernest and Willie. He is a Master Mason and has filled several offices—senior warden and others—below that of worshipful master, and is a member of the Fraternal Mutual Insurance company. Himself and wife are members of the Baptist church, of which he has been a deacon for more than twenty years, and a trustee for a long time, and Mrs. Ennis is a working member of the Ladies' Aid society.

SAMUEL EVANS, cotton merchant, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., son of Jesse and Rebecca (Cash) Evans, was born in Person Co., N. C., May 5, 1841. His paternal great-grandfather was born in Wales, England, and came to this country and settled in Philadelphia before the revolutionary war, during which he served in the patriot army. Soon after the war he moved to North Carolina and settled in Orange county. Samuel Evans, his son, and grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Philadelphia, and while yet young came with his parents to North Carolina, where he died in 1840. He married a daughter of Levi Sweeney, whose wife was a Miss Ledbetter. They were natives of Ireland and emigrated to this country about 1775. She lived to be over one hundred years old. The wife of Samuel Evans died in 1852. These old matrons remembered well and recounted vividly the privations and stirring events which occurred during and after the war for independence. A brother of Mrs. Evans—John Sweeney—served during the revolutionary war and was wounded near the Savannah river; for many years the family preserved the old flint-and-steel musket he carried, which is believed to have seen some service during the late war. Mr. Evans' father was born in Orange Co., N. C., in 1808, where he married and had nine children born to him, of whom six were boys: Azariah, killed at the battle of Plymouth; Henry H., wounded in the battle of Murfreesboro, now in North Carolina; John S., killed in the battle of Sharpsburg; William, who came to Georgia and afterward went to Tennessee, where he died in 1872; Moses D., in North Carolina, and Samuel, the subject of this sketch. The parents of Mr. Evans were industrious farming people, accumulated quite a large property for the times—including but few slaves—and were devoted members of the Primitive Baptist church. When Mr. Evans' great-grandfather on his mother's side (Cash) settled in North Carolina he received five square miles of land for a rifle valued at $75. Mr. Evans' mother was a daughter of Moses Cash, and her mother was an Oakley, this family being related to the Ashleys. She was born in 1810 and was married in 1829. The father died in 1878 and the mother in 1881.

Mr. Evans spent his boyhood on the farm in North Carolina and attending school. In 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate service, but on account of a broken ankle was assigned to detail duty, and remained in the service four years—two of which were at the presidential mansion. After the war he engaged in farming for about a year, then, in addition, began the manufacture of plug tobacco, and in 1871 established a business in Milledgeville which he continued three years. At the end of that time he embarked in the heavy grocery and farmers' supplies business and pursued that until 1887, when he entered the cotton commission business, which he has successfully pursued to the present time, at the same time profitably operating a thirty-plow plantation. As a good and progressive farmer and successful business man and an able manager and financier he is not outranked by any citizen of the county.

Mr. Evans was married in 1869 to Miss Zella, daughter of Isaiah and Elizabeth V. (Anderson) Bumpass, anglicized from the French—de Bumpre. Of thirteen children born to them five survive: Alice L., Addie V., Bessie, Samuel and George C. He is an ardent member of the Masonic fraternity and himself and wife and all the children are members of the Methodist church.

SEATON GRANTLAND, deceased, formerly a citizen of Baldwin county, was during his active life one of the most conspicuous as well as one of the most influential personages of his day. Mr. Grantland was born in New Kent Co., Va.,

June 8, 1782. On reaching a suitable age he was apprenticed to learn the printing trade in the old "Enquirer" office, Richmond, Va., when Thomas Ritchie was its editor. Soon afterward his brother, Fleming Grantland, was also apprenticed, and the two brothers there learned the printer's art. In 1808 Seaton Grantland came to Georgia and located at Milledgeville, and was followed the succeeding year by his brother Fleming. Milledgeville had a few years previously been made the capital of the state, and in 1807 the general assembly held its first session there. In 1809 the Grantland brothers commenced the publication of the "Georgia Journal," which soon established a character for uncommon editorial ability, and under the management and editorship of Seaton and Fleming Grantland became a leading and controlling power in Georgia politics. In the struggle between William H. Crawford and Gen. John Clark for political supremacy the "Journal" espoused the cause of Crawford. Fleming Grantland was elected to the state senate without opposition. But his life was short; he died in 1819 when only twenty-nine years of age. Upon the death of his brother Fleming Mr. Grantland sold the "Georgia Journal." Later in the same year, however, with the late Richard McAllister Orme, he established the "Southern Recorder," and was its editor until 1833, when he sold out to Miller Grieve, who had married his niece, Miss Sarah Caroline, daughter of his brother Fleming. Mr. Grantland was a strong and fearless writer, and still opposing the Clark party with gloveless hands, under the battle-cry of "Troup and the Treaty," carried the first direct election of governor by the people—in 1825—by electing George M. Troup over John Clark. It was a bitterly and hotly contested struggle—a veritable "battle of giants"—but was a grand triumph for Troup. Mr. Grantland was twice elected a representative to congress—1835 and 1837—when the election was by general ticket, and it is worthy of remark that his membership was contemporaneous with that of some of the grandest characters which adorn the nation's history—Clay, Calhoun, Webster, Jackson, Benton, Cass, John P. King, Forsythe, Buchanan, John M. Clayton, and scores of others. He retired after this from active politics, his only subsequent service being as one of the electors for Georgia in the presidential election in 1848, when he cast Georgia's vote for Taylor and Fillmore at the capitol in Milledgeville. He was opposed to secession and lived until near the end of the war, his life closing October, 1864, at his long-time home at Woodville, near Milledgeville, aged eighty-two years. When he came to Georgia he brought his mother—then Mrs. Caroline Goodwyn—with him. She died in 1851 and was ninety-one years old.

Mr. Grantland was twice married. He was first married to Miss Ann Tinsley, of Virginia, by whom he had three children: Fleming, a physician, to whom was given the best possible education, partly in Paris; he died in 1854 in the prime of promising young manhood, aged thirty-six years; Susan, now Mrs. David J. Bailey, and Ann V., widow of Charles Du Bignon, now living at the Grantland "old homestead" near Milledgeville. His second marriage was to Miss Katharine Dabney, but there was no issue.

MILLER GRIEVE was born in Edinborough, Scotland, Jan. 10, 1801. His father was named John Grieve and his mother's maiden name was Miller, Miss Marion Miller, a daughter of Dr. Daniel Miller. There were four children: Marion, who married Mr. James McHenry; John, Miller and Callender, who married the late Judge Joseph Henry Lumpkin, so long the chief justice of Georgia. In 1817, they landed in Savannah, John Grieve and James McHenry to go in the old house of Andrew Low & Co., to ship cotton and rice to England and Scotland. In 1820, John Grieve and James McHenry died of yellow fever in Savannah, and the balance of the family moved first to Liberty and then to Oglethorpe county, Ga. Miller Grieve read law at Lexington and went into the practice, the law firm being Grieve & Lumpkin. George R. Gilmer was elected governor over Joel Crawford in 1829, and brought Miller Grieve with him to Milledgeville, Ga., then the capital, as secretary of the executive department and his private secretary; and he remained in that capacity for two years. In 1833 he married Miss Sarah Caroline Grantland, a daughter of Fleming Grantland, and niece of Seaton Grantland; and during the same year he bought out Seaton Grantland's interest in the "Southern Recorder," and with the late Richard McAllister Orme, conducted that paper under the firm Grieve & Orme until 1853. As an editor he was a power, pure, chaste, genial, honest in conviction, frank in statement; and the "Southern Recorder" was then the leading and controlling paper of the whig party. It was regarded, as has been remarked about it, while he was editor of it, that "it was the supreme court of the whig party." Men in different counties would wait its coming to direct what to do, and how to act, and when it did come it was as a remittiteur from the supreme court to the court below. He conducted the paper through the Harrison campaign of 1840, "Tippecanoe and Tyler too," and Georgia cast her electoral vote for Harrison and Tyler. It was the campaign of log cabin, coon skin, green gourds, strings of red pepper, and hard cider, against the "sly fox from Kinderhook, New York, named Martin Van Buren; the political magician; agreeable to all men and all measures; 'now I see you, now I don't,' everything in general and nothing in particular. Write a paper meaning one thing at the start, in the middle something else; wind up with still another contrary to either of the first, capable of three constructions and maybe more, and meaning neither, promise anything, and everything, and when the time came for him to stand, would dodge you sure. Yet smart, and a man not only of ability but of prominent ability."

Mr. Grieve was a power with the "Recorder" in the campaign of 1848. Taylor and Fillmore were the whig candidates, and Cass and Butler, the democratic, and Georgia voted for Taylor and Fillmore. George R. Gilmer was beat out by Wilson Lumpkin, in 1831, for governor, but Miller Grieve left the secretaryship of the governor, or executive department, with a determination to re-elect him, and never did give up until he was re-elected in 1837, beating Schley.

Miller Grieve was elected as a whig to represent Baldwin county in the Georgia legislature twice—1841 and 1843. He was the chairman of the bank committee of the house, and a powerful aid to Gov. George W. Crawford in bringing up the central bank bills, which were at 50 cents on the dollar to 100 cents on the dollar. George W. Crawford was elected governor in 1843, and adopted his plan. (See report of bank committee, 1841.) Mr. Grieve made an able representative, but declined repeatedly to run again for the legislature, though often urged. He was chairman of the board of trustees of Oglethorpe university, at Midway, Ga., and gave some $20,000 of his private fortune to build and establish it.

He was for a number of years a trustee of the Georgia Lunatic asylum and president of the board. Dr. Green, the old late and former superintendent, has remarked repeatedly that, but for Miller Grieve and the editorial columns of the "Southern Recorder" he would not have been able to have built the asylum or carried the measures for appropriations through the legislature.

He was the captain of the old Metropolitan Greys, one of the finest military companies in the state.

Mr. Grieve was present and met Henry Clay when he visited Milledgeville in 1844, when Mr. Clay spoke from the corner in front of the old McComb's hotel.

He advocated the subscription by the citizens of Milledgeville of $100,000 to locate the Central railroad at Milledgeville when W. W. Gordon, its first president, was in Milledgeville urging it. He advocated the building of the state road, Western & Atlantic, from Atlanta to Chattanooga, and, in general, was a public-spirited man.

He was offered the minister's position by President Taylor to the Argentine Republic, South America, but declined it. He was tendered by President Fillmore charge d'affaires to Denmark, and accepted it, and went to Copenhagen, taking with him his two oldest boys, Miller and Fleming G., and his nephew, James McHenry Lumpkin.

His wife preceded him to the grave. There were nine children: Miller, Marion, Fleming G., Eliza, John, Joseph Henry Lumpkin, Marion, George Gilmer, and Sarah Collender. The two Marions died in infancy; Mr. John Grieve died at the age of 31 years, and six of the children are still living.

He died in 1878 at the age of seventy-seven years, honored, respected, beloved by all who knew him, an honest man, a Christian gentleman. He is buried in the Milledgeville cemetery.

CHARLES RHODES HARPER, farmer, Meriwether, Baldwin Co., was one of five children born to Robert H. and Eliza Ann (Carter) Harper. The father was born in Hancock county in 1817, and was a big farmer and large slave holder before the war. He served in the state militia during the war, and died in 1884. His wife was born in Putnam county, Ga., in 1819, and died in 1881. They were good, honest, Christian people, who enjoyed the esteem of every one. Mr. Charles Rhodes Harper was born in Putnam county in 1842, and his boyhood days were those of the farmer's lad, with a meager schooling, picked up here and there in the old log school houses. When the war broke out he enlisted in the state militia, where he did duty for six months, and then went out in Company H, Fifty-seventh Georgia regiment. He was attached to Walker's brigade, in the battles of Peachtree creek and Decatur, and was also at the siege of Vicksburg, and his war record is as creditable as has been his private life.

In 1866 he was married to Anna E. Tatum, a daughter of Dudley H. Tatum, a native of North Carolina. Mr. and Mrs. Harper have had born to them seven children, as follows: John B., Fannie E., married; Robert D., deceased; Charles T., a student in the Technological school; Annie E., a graduate of the Milledgeville Normal school; Julia M., and Emma G., deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Harper are devout Christians, belonging to the Methodist church, of which Mr. Harper has long been a steward and trustee. Mr. Harper is one of the largest planters in Baldwin county, and owns about 2,100 acres of finely cultivated land. The estate is now managed by his son.

IVERSON L. HARRIS, physician and surgeon, Milledgeville, Ga., son of Hon. Iverson L. Harris, once associate justice of the supreme court of Georgia, in his day one of the most eminent members of the legal profession in the state, was born in Milledgeville Nov. 21, 1835. He was raised in his native city, where he enjoyed excellent educational advantages. After preparatory study he attended lectures at the Pennsylvania Medical college from 1857 to 1859, graduating the last-named year. Very soon afterward he located in Albany, Ga., where he was when the "war between the states" began. In May, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the Governor's Horse Guard, Milledgeville, and served as such six months, when he was appointed assistant surgeon to Phillips' Legion—to which his company had been assigned. After acting in this capacity and command three months he went before the medical examining board at Charleston, S. C. He "passed" the examination and was appointed surgeon of the Fifty-ninth Georgia regiment, in which position he continued until the surrender—serving a part of the time as brigade surgeon of Anderson's brigade. During the time he was in the army he was in several important skirmishes, and professionally saw much arduous service. Early in 1865 he was captured by Wilson's raiders between Macon and Columbus, Ga., but was soon after paroled and returned home. He then went to Macon, Ga., and temporarily retiring from the practice, engaged in the drug business, in which he continued five years. In 1872 he returned to Milledgeville and resumed the practice of his profession, in which he has continued, growing in professional reputation, with constantly extending patronage and financial success. For six years of the existence of the old board of physicians he was its secretary and dean. He has also been a member of the State Medical association. He is at present local surgeon of the Central railway of Georgia, and ranks with the foremost of the members of his profession in the state in scientific attainments and practical skill.

Dr. Harris was married in 1876 to Miss Ida Burnet of Sparta, Ga., and to them have been born two children: Mary F. and William B. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an elder.

WILLIAM GARDNER HAWKINS, farmer, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., son of Peterson and Mary P. Hawkins, was born in Baldwin county Feb. 1, 1844. His father was born near Petersburg, Va., in 1813, and when a mere boy came to Georgia and settled in Baldwin county, where he engaged in farming, and which he made his home until he died in 1893. His wife was born in 1826 and is still living—both parents having for many years made their home with the subject of this sketch. They had but two children: William Gardner and Jane Rebecca, who married W. S. Elam, and died in 1882.

Mr. Hawkins was raised on the farm and educated in the common schools of the county. In 1861 he enlisted in the Baldwin Blues, Capt. Caraker, and went immediately to the front. He was in the battles at King's school-house and Malvern Hill, where, being seriously wounded, he returned home. In a short time he rejoined his command, but receiving discharge on account of disability he returned home. He resumed his farm work, to which he has since devoted his entire time and attention. He has prospered and has large farming interests, and is regarded as one of the foremost farmers in Baldwin county.

Mr. Hawkins was married in 1874 to Miss Fannie, daughter of D. H. and Frances Tatum, who bore him five children: Bernard H., just finishing his education; Kirby P.; Dudley R.; Mary A. and Willie G. Mrs. Hawkins, an exemplary member of the Presbyterian church, is still living. Mr. Hawkins is a member of the Masonic fraternity and of the Presbyterian Church, of which he is an elder.

WALTER PAINE, clerk of the superior court, Milledgeville, was born in Milledgeville in 1835. He was raised and received his primary education in the city and finished his education at Oglethorpe university, then located at Midway, Baldwin county. At the beginning of the civil war he was in the hotel business in Milledgeville and in June, 1861, enlisted and entered the service, but was discharged on account of physical disability and returned home. He remained at home until January, 1863, when he entered the Georgia reserves as lieutenant, but was at once made captain of Company D, Fifth regiment, continuing in the service until the surrender. He was at Savannah when that city was evacuated, and was afterward in the following engagements: River's bridge; Coosahatchie and Pocotaligo, and was then detailed to accompany wounded soldiers to Augusta and saw no more active service. After the close of the war he returned to Milledgeville, but soon afterward went to Macon and accepted a clerkship in the freight department of the Central railway, which he held three years. He then returned to Milledgeville, where he engaged as bookkeeper for G. W. Haas, groceryman, with whom he remained for several years. In 1873 he was elected clerk of the superior court, to which office he has been continuously re-elected since.

Capt. Paine was married in 1857 to Miss Gertrude Dasher. She having died, he contracted a second marriage in 1872 with Miss Anna E. Turner. Mr. Paine has one son, Charles H. Paine, who is in the drug business at Valdosta, Ga.

DR. THEOPHILUS O. POWELL, superintendent of the state lunatic asylum, was born in Brunswick county, Va., in 1837, and when six or seven years of age came to Georgia with his parents, who settled in Sparta, Hancock county. There he was educated largely under the supervision of that very eminent educator, Richard Malcom Johnson, of national fame, and after studying medicine for a time attended lectures at the Georgia Medical college, Augusta, from which he graduated in 1859. Soon after his graduation he located in Sparta and was rapidly advancing in the public estimation when the civil war broke out. In 1861 he enlisted as a private in the Forty-ninth Georgia regiment and served as such until about August, 1862, when he accepted an appointment as first assistant physician to the state insane asylum at Milledgeville. He served as such until February, 1879, when he was appointed superintendent, a position which he has creditably held ever since. While in the Confederate service Dr. Powell was in all the battles around Richmond and many skirmishes. In 1886, in compliance with a resolution of the senate and house of representatives of the general assembly of Georgia, Dr. Powell submitted to that body a very full and exhaustive report of his "investigations as to the increase of insanity in this state, and the most important factors in its causation so far as it has been practicable to ascertain them." This report reflects the highest credit on Dr. Powell's professional erudition, profound study and patient research and placed him high "on the roll of honor" of the medical profession. His great scientific attainments, intelligent considerateness for the unfortunate and conscientious discharge of every duty devolving upon him has commended him to the confidence of the people and of the "powers that be," who are satisfied that no more efficient officer could be found. Dr. Powell is a member of the State Medical association of Georgia and was president of the State Medical association in 1887; is a member of the American Medico-Psychological association and of the National Medico-Legal society, and few, if any members of the profession stand higher than he.

Dr. Powell was married in 1860 to Miss Frances, daughter of Edward Birdsong, of Hancock county, a union blessed with two children: Julia, wife of P. A. West of Baldwin county, and Harriet, wife of John Conn of Milledgeville, Ga. He is a chapter Mason, Scottish rite and a trustee of Milledgeville Lodge No. 3, F. and A. M.

JUDGE LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR was a son of John Lamar and was born July 15, 1797, and from boyhood was a lover of books, reading with good effect almost everything that came within his reach, but had a decided partiality to poetry and other works of imagination. In after life he was distinguished for his attainment in belles-lettres, for the classic purity of his composition, and for forensic eloquence.

In 1816 he commenced the study of law in the office of Joel Crawford at Milledgeville, where he read with great assiduity, and, among other acquisitions, became an accurate pleader. Having spent twelve months or more in this office, and wishing to complete his professional education, he repaired to the celebrated law-school at Litchfield, in the state of Connecticut, in which Judges Reeve and Gould alternated in delivering a course of lectures. During a period of thirty years or more the Litchfield school was almost the only institution of the kind, and by far the most famed, in the United States. It was sought by students from almost every part of the union, and from no state, probably, in greater numbers than Georgia.

About the year 1818 or 1819 young Lamar was licensed "to plead and practice in the several courts of law and equity in this state," opened an office at Milledgeville, and not many months thereafter married Miss Bird, the daughter of an eminent physician of that place. Though few lawyers have brought to the bar higher qualifications, he lacked some, and for a few years his prospects were anything but bright. While others with not a tithe of his genius or learning were seen to be reaping rich harvests of fees and crowded with clients, he remained poor and almost briefless. How and why did this happen? Courage, truth and honor were among the most conspicuous elements of his character, and he seemed to have the esteem and confidence of every one. But he could not court clients or solicit patronage; his characteristic independence and legitimate self-esteem would not tolerate even the semblance of unworthy condescension. He doubtless wanted what is commonly called address; he had no turn for frivolous chat, story-telling, anecdotes, etc. In short, he lacked those qualifications on which humbler natures rely for conciliating popular favor.

But there was another peculiarity attached to this gifted young man, which is very seldom seen in persons of his age and fervid temperament. It would seem that the tone of his nervous system was liable to accidental spells of depression, which not only impaired his capacity for social companionship, but, at times, the highest energies of his mind. At the bar and elsewhere, when under the weight of this incubus, he has been known to betray a want of thought and of expertness in the transaction of business, which, to those who knew him best, was astonishing. On one occasion, an important case of his being on trial in the county of Twiggs—a case he had much at heart, and in which he had made great preparation—when in the prescribed order of speaking it became his turn to address the special jury, he arose with perfect self-possession, and having proceeded through an exordium of great appropriateness and beauty, suddenly came to a dead pause. No one knew the cause until he, with humility and confusion of face that betrayed the deep mortification under which he suffered, declared in an undertone to his associate counsel, that he could not proceed, and that the whole advocacy of the cause must fall into the hands of the associate.

In the summer of 1821, his first preceptor in the law having retired from the practice some four or five years before, resumed it, and Lamar became his partner. This co-partnership, by its terms, was limited to three years, and before the expiration of that time Lamar had so many opportunities of exhibiting proofs of his great professional ability that he never afterward wanted clients or fees.

Mr. Lamar doubtless had ambition—a legitimate ambition—to acquire, by meritorious actions, that fame and fortune which may at all times be justly awarded to useful and brilliant achievements; but he had an insuperable aversion to catching office as a mere fortuitous windfall, or getting it by surrendering himself to the arbitrary management of a political party. Under the influence of such generous self-denial, he more than once refused his name as a candidate, when success was little less than certain. This conduct when Thomas W. Cobb—about the fall of 1828—became a candidate for the bench of the Ocmulgee circuit, will serve to exemplify some of the lofty traits which belonged to the character of Lamar.

Mr. Cobb was an experienced and confessedly an able lawyer—had been for many years a respectable member of congress, desired to continue in the public service, but in the decline of life preferred a station nearer home. That popularity, however, which carried him three terms to the house of representatives, and afterward to the senate of the United States, now forsook him. He was beaten on joint vote of the general assembly, by a large majority; but for some cause, best known to himself, his successful opponent (Judge Eli S. Shorter) within a few days resigned the commission of judge, and the vacancy had to be filled. Cobb's friends again presented his name, and Lamar was importuned to offer as the rival candidate. Had he consented, his election was morally certain; but he had becoming respect for Mr. Cobb's seniority and past services, was no stranger to the unworthy motives of those who were most intent on a second defeat, nor to the plasticity of that illy-organized college of electors, the general assembly. His refusal was peremptory, and Mr. Cobb was permitted to take the office he so much coveted.

Before the term for which Mr. Cobb had been elected expired, his death made a vacancy which Mr. Lamar could honorably consent to fill. He came, then, into office on such conditions as met his approbation, and continued until the day of his own lamented death to discharge its duties with signal ability, and with public applause which few in judicial stations have had the good fortune to receive.

The melancholy event of Judge Lamar's death (occasioned, as it was, by his own hand) filled the wide circle of his friends and acquaintances with lamentation and astonishment. He was yet a young man, with sufficient wealth for entire independence, unequaled popularity, a wife and children on whom he doted; no man, indeed, seemed to have more to attach him to life. To the inquiry everywhere made, "What could have caused the suicide?" no satisfactory answer was given. Some supposed it to be religious frenzy, originating in recent and deep impressions on that subject. One who knew him intimately has assigned that which was probably the true and only cause—insanity, resulting from accidental derangement of cerebral organism. The disease of which the judge died may, therefore, be assumed as a natural one, and as explicable, on pathological principles, as apoplexy or any other malady of the brain.

Whatever may have been predicted of the eventful career of Judge Lamar, had he lived longer and been placed in congress, or on some other theater favorable to the display of his splendid oratory and ardent patriotism, it is admitted that, both at the bar and on the bench, he attained the first rank. He presided with great dignity, and was most effective in the dispatch of business. No one who knew the man ever ventured on an act of rudeness or disrespect to his court; yet every person whose deportment was worthy of it had unfailing assurances of his kindness. His lectures of instruction to the grand juries, at the opening of a term, were delivered in admirable style; and his charges to special and petit juries, engaged in the trial of difficult and much-litigated cases, might well serve as models to any bench.

His manners in public and private life were wholly free from useless formality, but frank, bland and refined. He left a young family of sons and daughters (one of his sons, L. Q. C. Lamar, became United States senator from Mississippi, secretary of the interior under Mr. Cleveland's first term, and a justice of the supreme court of the United States.

The above and foregoing is from the pen of his law partner, the late eminent Joel Crawford, and this testimony, from one so competent, establishing the high rank of Judge Lamar in the profession, and also as a citizen, the attempt to improve the picture would be vain; no room is left for art or friendship to throw further light on a character so nobly molded. He was truly a man of great moral elevation, and universally beloved. His sensibilities were very acute, and his emulation was entirely unselfish. Aiming to extend the conquests of his profound intellect to the verge of possibility, he overtasked his nervous system, resulting in that deplorable act which deprived his country and his friends of a pattern of excellence. His fame secure, his virtues without a blemish, his memory will ever remain dear to the people of Georgia, and to all who can appreciate an exalted nature. He is buried in the beautiful cemetery at Milledgeville, Ga. A handsome monument, in the form of an obelisk, twelve or fifteen feet high, has been erected by the members of the bar over his remains, on which is the following inscription, which is said to have been from the pen of the late Judge Iverson L. Harris:

"Sacred to the memory of Lucius Q. C. Lamar, late judge of the superior court of the Ocmulgee circuit, who, during a brief period of four years, discharged the duties of that high office with probity, firmness, efficiency and unquestionable reputation. The devoted love of his family, the ardent attachment of personal friends, the admiration of the bar, and the universal approbation of his enlightened admiration of justice, attest the goodness and greatness of one arrested by death too early in the bright career in which he had been placed by his native state.

"Born, July 15, 1797. Died, July 4, 1834."

W. R. ROBISON, physician and surgeon, Milledgeville, Ga., son of William H. and Elizabeth Robison, was born in Washington county, Ga., in 1843. The family is of old Virginia stock, but his father was born in Washington county and followed farming all his life. His father's brother, Samuel Robison, was a brigadier-general in the Indian war, and was a member of the general assembly twenty-two years in succession.

Dr. Robison was educated in part in Washington and Hancock counties. On July 15, 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company K, Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and served as such two years, and was then elected second lieutenant and, six months later, first lieutenant. He served in this capacity until near the close of the war, at which time the Confederate ranks were so depleted from such long marches and terrible battles, the companies were consolidated, when he was made captain of Companies G and K, holding that rank when he surrendered at Appomattox. Among the important battles in which he bore an active and gallant part were: Yorktown, Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Knoxville, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Wilderness, Sailor's creek, and Appomattox. While in the army he was wounded three or four times, but was never in a hospital, and had but two short furloughs. After the surrender he walked home from Appomattox, made a crop that year, and farmed the three following years. In 1868 he began the study of medicine under Dr. J. G. Shinholser, and subsequently attended lectures at the Georgia Medical college, Augusta, from which he graduated in 1872. He located immediately at Toombsboro, Wilkinson Co., and continued there practicing his profession and selling drugs until 1881, when he moved to Milledgeville, to practice with his brother-in-law, Dr. J. G. Shinholser. Dr. Shinholser died about a year later, leaving three children to rear, when Dr. Robison moved to the farm in Washington county, where he lived five years—practically abandoning his practice. Having discharged this self-imposed sacred duty to these dependent orphans, he returned to Milledgeville in 1886 and resumed the practice of his profession, which he has since continued, growing yearly in reputation and extent of practice, and in the popular favor.

Dr. Robison was married in October, 1867, in Wilkinson county to Miss Sallie, daughter of the late Mr. J. G. Shinholser, sister of his deceased partner. Six children were the fruit of this union, but none of them survive. He is a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church.

Dr. Robison had three brothers in the war: W. F., a member of the north Georgia Methodist conference, who was a chaplain of the Fifteenth Georgia regiment, and is now president of the Young Harris college, McTyierre, Towns Co., Ga.; Samuel, who was in the Twenty-eighth Georgia regiment and died in 1862 while in the army; and Milton, who died in 1864 while in the service.

HENRY STEVENS, founder of the great "pottery" establishment in Baldwin county (about ten miles from Milledgeville), Ga., was a son of Walter and Elizabeth Stevens, and was born in Cornwall, England, May 21, 1813. Commencing to work in a pottery when quite young, by the time he was eighteen years of age he had become quite proficient. On reaching that age he engaged as a sailor on a merchant vessel sailing between Liverpool and New York, and followed a sailor's life five years. When twenty-three years of age he came to Augusta, Ga., and accepted a position as foreman of hands at work grading, laying ties, rails, etc., on the Georgia railway then being built between Augusta and Union Point. When that work was completed he was appointed a conductor, and continued as such a number of years. He next engaged in the saw-mill business in Greene county, Ga., and selling and erecting the "Page mill," a double circular saw, which being the first introduced into that part of the state, excited no little curiosity and interest. He had very great success both in his saw-milling business and selling and erecting mills throughout middle Georgia, continuing until 1854. That year he bought a large tract of timber land—virgin forest—ten miles south of Milledgeville, in Baldwin county, established a saw-mill plant, and launched out extensively in the lumber business. He continued in it with phenomenal success until 1871. On the land he had purchased was an extensive and very valuable deposit of fireclay, and Mr. Stevens utilized and profited by his early training by beginning the manufacture of sewer pipe, a great variety of pottery, and stone-ware. This enterprise, like his other ventures, proved to be an extraordinary success from the start. Being the only works of the kind in the south, the output having been excellent at the beginning and improved as experience was gained and facilities added, and the management having been exceptionally able the business has grown to enormous proportions. During the war he supplied the Confederate government with many articles needed by the army, knives, shoe-pegs, and Joe Brown pipes, etc., and as a consequence, when Gen. Sherman was "marching through Georgia," his mills were burned and his works leveled to the ground. After the surrender he had nothing but his land, an indefinite amount of Confederate currency, and six or seven dollars in gold. He went bravely to work and rebuilt his mills, and as lumber brought good prices, he very rapidly recuperated and placed his vast and varied interests on the road to their present prosperity and magnitude. The products of the mills and pottery have attained a wide-spread enviable reputation, and are shipped to all parts of the south. Mr. Stevens was more solid than brilliant. Caution and carefulness were happily combined with energy and enterprise, guided by almost unerring sagacity; and added to these were practical business qualifications which guaranteed the success accomplished. Another thing—he carried his religion with him into his business, and in his manifold and varied business transactions, with all classes of people, he never lost sight of his Christian obligations and duties. There was always a hearty welcome, a bed in his house, a place and a plate at his table, and money in his palm for the preacher of the gospel of peace. Though remarkably successful in all his worldly pursuits, Christian principle and Christian liberality were a dominant characteristic of his every-day life. An interesting incident which occurred just after the war forcibly illustrates this: A Methodist preacher stopped over night at his house, yet midst the ruins left by Sherman's devastating march. During their conversation the preacher's absolute destitution—want at his home—was made apparent to Mr. Stevens. As already stated, all, and the only, good money he had, was six or seven dollars in gold, and this, true to the generous impulses of his heart, and his profound sense of Christian obligation, he freely gave to the preacher. In 1876 he sold out to his sons, and retired to the quiet enjoyment of a home hallowed by Christian practice, faith and hope.

Mr. Stevens was happily married in Greene county, in 1837, to Miss Matilda, daughter of John and Martha Stevens, formerly of North Carolina, and descendants of early settlers of that state. Her parents started in life poor, but by hard work, close economy and good management, accumulated a small fortune. He died about 1850, and his widow died about 1860. To Mr. and Mrs. Stevens eight children were born: Martha Jane, wife of F. M. Bone; Walter Crawford, partner Stevens Bros. company; Annie E., wife of David Brewer; John Henry, partner Stevens Bros. company; Fannie Matilda, died in 1887, wife of Rev. J. W. Glenn, Methodist preacher; Eliza, wife of F. C. Davis, Newton county, Ga.; William Park, treasurer and general manager H. Stevens Bros. company, Macon, Ga.; and one who died in infancy. The mother of the above, a very pious and exemplary member of the Methodist church, born in 1823, died in 1862. Mr. Stevens contracted a second marriage with Miss Carrie, daughter of William Torrance, by whom he had no children. In both marriages Mr. Stevens was exceptionally fortunate and happy. He was an ardent and prominent master Mason, and a most devout and very influential member of the Methodist church, a real working Christian, a steward nearly all his life, and a trustee.

He died Jan. 16, 1883; and his last wife died in 1883.

JOHAN HENRY STEVENS, manufacturer, Stevens' pottery, Baldwin county, Ga., son of Henry and Martha Matilda Stevens, was born in 1851. He grew to manhood on the plantation, and received his early education at the common schools of the county, after which he attended Emory college two years. He then engaged in business for himself for awhile; but in 1876 he joined his brothers in purchasing the pottery business established by his father. In addition to the extensive pottery business done by the firm, they cultivate about 1,000 acres of land. They are already doing the largest business in their line in the south, throughout which their goods are shipped; and their business is constantly increasing. Mr. Stevens was married in 1873 to Miss Julia, daughter of A. J. and Talitha (Wright) Webb, a union which has been blessed with six children: Lemma, wife of Lee Crittenden Manley; Henry A., deceased; John H., Jr., deceased; Maggie Mell, deceased; Pearl and Rubie. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward.

WALTER CRAWFORD STEVENS, manufacturer, Stevens Pottery, Baldwin Co., Ga., son of Henry and Matilda Stevens, was born in Greene county, Ga. He grew to manhood on the plantation, assisting generally on that and in the "pottery" his father was engaged in establishing. He obtained his primary education at the common schools of Baldwin county, after which he attended Emory college, at Oxford, Ga., two years. In 1876 he and his brother, John Henry, and his uncle, William Stevens, of Sparta, Ga., formed a partnership under the firm name of Stevens Bros. & Co., which they continued with growing reputation and increasing business until the uncle died. They then bought their uncle's interest in the business, and continued the same as Stevens Bros. Company. To meet the rapidly increasing demand for their products, they established an immense additional plant, equipped with the best latest improved machinery, making William P. the general manager and treasurer of the new company, known as The H. Stevens Sons company, Macon. The introduction of this industry by the father, and its subsequent permanent establishment and wonderfully rapid improvement and extension by the sons, demonstrate what persistency of effort and intelligent and well-directed enterprise can accomplish—especially with abundance of the best raw material at hand, and the skill to utilize it.

Mr. Stevens was married in 1872 to Miss Emma Heard, daughter of Wilson and Mary (Wright) Davis, by whom he has had three children, Mittie Irene, wife of Dr. M. M. Stapler, Macon, Ga.; Maria, and one child which died in infancy. Mr. and Mrs. Stevens are prominent and active members of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward.

D. B. SANFORD, lawyer, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., was born in Greensborough, Greene Co., Ga., April 11, 1839, his family being one of the most influential at one time in that county, and one of the best known in the state. He was educated at the excellent schools in his native county, where he lived until he was nineteen years of age, when he went to Milledgeville, and in 1859 was appointed deputy clerk of the supreme court. On the death, soon after, of the principal clerk, he was commissioned by the general assembly to bring up the unfinished work. Suspending this work, he enlisted, in February, 1861, as a private in the Greene Rifles, at Greensborough. The company was assigned to Phillips' legion; later he was elected first lieutenant of Company A of that legion, and in 1864 he was commissioned as captain, holding the rank until the close of the war. Among the important battles in which he was a gallant and efficient participant were: Second Manassas, South Mountain, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Chickamauga, Knoxville, Wilderness, and Sailor's Creek. After being twice wounded at this last-named battle, he was captured and sent to Washington, D. C., where he was detained until August, 1865, when he was released. On his return home he studied law, and in 1867 he was admitted to the bar. He located at once at Milledgeville and resumed his work on the supreme court records. In 1873 he was elected ordinary of Baldwin county, an office which he held by re-election four terms—sixteen years—during all of which time he successfully practiced his profession. In 1889 he was appointed county commissioner, and in January, 1895, he was reappointed. Mr. Sanford is now, and for ten years has been president of the board of trustees of the Middle Georgia Military and Agricultural college, and also has for ten years been a director of the Milledgeville Banking company. His retention of these several important and responsible official positions is conclusive proof of his capacity and fidelity, and of the estimation in which he is held by his fellow-citizens.

Mr. Sanford was married, in 1868, to Miss Elizabeth C., daughter of D. B. Stetson, deceased, a union which has been blessed with two children—Daniel S., in the land office in Oklahoma, and Elizabeth E.

ROBERT WHITFIELD, lawyer, Milledgeville, Baldwin Co., Ga., who was born there in 1852, is one of the rising, as well as one of the most gifted young men of Georgia. His boyhood and early youth were spent—during the “unpleasantness”—on the old family plantation in Jasper county, Ga. In 1867 he entered Mercer university, then located at Penfield, Ga., where he remained two years. He next entered the university of Georgia, Athens, from which he graduated in 1870 with the degree of Bachelor of Philosophy, some of his classmates being the following gentlemen, who have also left their impress on local or state legislation: Washington Dessau, Walter B. Hill, Nat. E. Harris, C. L. Bartlett (congressman), Judge C. C. Jones, Rev. J. D. Hammond, Dr. A. S. Campbell, et al. The ensuing year he graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, and immediately located at Conyers, Rockdale Co., Ga. Six months later he went to Jackson, Butts Co., Ga., so as to be conveniently near Indian Springs, on account of his health. He remained here three years, doing some practice, and then spent the year 1875 on the plantation in Jasper county. The ensuing year he located in Milledgeville and formed a law partnership with Hon. Fleming du Bignon, now of Savannah, which continued until 1884. A year or so later he entered into partnership with John T. Adams, which still exists. In 1878 Mr. Whitfield was elected solicitor-general of Ocmulgee circuit, which comprises the counties of Morgan, Greene, Putnam, Jasper, Jones, Wilkinson and Laurens. This election was for an unexpired term, the incumbent having resigned; but two years later—1880—he was elected for a full term of four years. In 1883 he was again elected to the same office. The following November he resigned, as he had been elected at the October election to represent the twentieth senatorial district in the general assembly. In that body he was made chairman of the committee on the penitentiary, and placed on the committees of general judiciary and lunatic asylum. As a legislator he was chiefly interested in the railway questions before the senate—particularly the lease of the Western & Atlantic (State) railway. He was the author of resolutions for the settlement of the betterment issues with the lessees, defeated at the time, but afterward passed substantially as he introduced them; and he was made chairman of the joint special committee appointed to settle the question, and to whom the resolutions introduced by him were referred. It was while in the senate, in 1889, that Mr. Whitfield had the hard fight—which he won—to secure the location of the Girls’ Normal school at Milledgeville; and it was during this senatorial term that Mr. Whitfield developed, by intellectual capacity, great legislative ability and statesmanlike qualities, which have marked him as one of the foremost of the rising young men of the state. In 1890 the people called again for his services, and he was elected to represent Baldwin county in the general assembly, and was placed on the committees on general judiciary, finance, lunatic asylum, and Western & Atlantic railway, and chairman of the special judiciary committee. Mr. Whitfield has always taken a very active part in politics, and has attained to great popularity, prominence and influence. He has served on the democratic state executive committee, and in 1892 and 1894, in compliance with a request of the state committee, stumped the state. In the race for the sixth district congressional nomination he was defeated by his old classmate, Charles L. Bartlett. It may be safely assumed that he has before him a brilliant professional and political future.

Mr. Whitfield was happily married, in December, 1877, to Miss Effie, daughter of the late Judge Charles E. Harris, of Macon. Four children—three boys and one girl—have blessed this union, Robert, Jr., Charles H., Anna and Marion. He is a Master Mason and a member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

BANKS COUNTY.

WILLIAM ASHE, farmer, Banksville, Banks Co., Ga., son of Alexander F. and Elizabeth (McCracken) Ashe, was born in Franklin county, Ga., in 1825. His paternal grandparents were William and Jane (Fleming) Ashe. He was a native of Pennsylvania, whence he migrated to South Carolina, and afterward, in the latter part of the last century, moved to Georgia. He was a farmer, served as a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and died in Banks county. Mr. Ashe's father was born in South Carolina, and was two years old when his parents moved to Georgia. After reaching maturity he moved to Franklin county. He was a farmer all his life; was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, represented the county eight years in the general assembly, and for a long time was a major in the state militia, when it was a coveted local distinction. He was an active and prominent member of the Presbyterian church. His mother was a daughter of William and Elizabeth (McCord) McCracken. He was a native of North Carolina, a soldier in the revolutionary war, and participated in the battle of King's mountain, where he was seriously wounded. After independence was won he came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county, on land secured under a soldier's bounty warrant.

Mr. Ashe was reared on the farm, and received only the limited education afforded by the country schools of the time. In 1861 he enlisted in the "Banks Guards," Capt. Paul J. Simms. After serving thirteen months he was exempted on account of age, but he soon afterward entered the service in the "Home Guard" organization. He has given attention exclusively to agriculture as his business pursuit, in which he has been very successful. The people, however, have called him into their service, and he served them a long time as justice of the peace, then as tax collector, and finally was elected county treasurer, whose responsible duties he discharged with the same conscientious fidelity he has those of the other offices he has held. He ranks among the most esteemed citizens of the county.

Mr. Ashe was married, in 1846, to Miss Cynthia J.—born in Franklin county in 1827—daughter of William and Jane (Mays) Turk, an old North Carolina family. Of the children born to them, one, William C., is living. Mrs. Ashe, an exemplary member of the Presbyterian church, died in 1852. He contracted a second marriage in 1855, with Miss Eliza A.—born in Anderson district in 1833—daughter of William and Tabitha (Brewer) Owen. He was a farmer, born in South Carolina, and in 1848 moved to Georgia and settled in Franklin county, where for a number of years he served as a justice of the peace. By this union he has had seven children: Mary E., wife of Robert Holbrook; T. J., Cynthia J., Sarah A., Nancy E., Robert E., and John Edgar, deceased. Mr. Ashe is a Master Mason, and himself and wife are devout members of the Presbyterian church.

JOHN FLOYD EVANS, farmer, Banks county, Ga. (postoffice, Gillsville, Hall county), son of David and Mary (Toney) Evans, was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1833. His paternal grandparent, John Evans, was a native of North Carolina, migrated to Georgia in 1800, and settled in Franklin county. He was a farmer and served as a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mr. Evans' father was born in North Carolina and was a small child only a year or two old when the family came to Georgia. He followed farming all his life. His mother was a daughter of John and Nancy Toney, early settlers in Franklin county. He served as a wagoner during the revolutionary war.

Mr. Evans was raised on the farm and received a very limited education at the old-time log school-house. On reaching manhood he commenced farming and continued it until the war. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E, Capt. A. T. Bennett, Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment, and participated with it in all its campaigns and battles until the Vicksburg campaign. In that he was very severely wounded and had to use crutches eighteen months. When he came home from the war he was very poor and had to borrow meal for his family. But he bravely met the emergency, went to work earnestly, worked early and late and saved what money he could. In 1872 he bought his first "patch," to which he has gradually added until he owns 650 acres; is in comfortable circumstances and is regarded as one of the most reliable citizens in the county. He is a justice of the peace and has held the office very many years.

Mr. Evans was married in 1860 to Miss Mary A. (born in Mississippi in 1845), daughter of James and Saltania (Brooks) Bell. He was born in Hall county, was a well-to-do farmer and moved to Mississippi, where he died. Of the children which blessed this union three survive: Erastus P., James and Sandy F. Mr. and Mrs. Evans are devoted members of the Baptist church.

J. D. GUNNELLS, farmer and preacher, Banksville, Banks Co., Ga., son of Nathan and Nancy (Hunt) Gunnells, was born in Franklin county, Ga., in 1827. His paternal grandfather, Daniel Gunnells, was a native of Virginia, a farmer and migrated to Georgia the latter part of the last century and settled in Wilkes county. Mr. Gunnells' father was born in Wilkes county in 1800, was raised a farmer and made that his business until 1836, when he also engaged in merchandising and continued it for the remainder of his life. He was a volunteer soldier in the Indian war of 1836-37, served a number of years as a justice of the peace, was tax collector of the county one or more terms and a member of the constitutional convention. Mr. Gunnells' mother was born in 1797, and was a daughter of Joel and Sallie Hunt. He was a native of Virginia, a farmer, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Some years after the war he came to Georgia and settled in Wilkes county.

Mr. Gunnells was raised on the farm and educated in the historic log school-house common to the locality and period. His life has been an active one, and useful in many fields, exercising a wide and beneficent influence. He has been honored with many public positions, elective and otherwise, and filled all of them acceptably to the people. At one period of his life he taught school for a number of years with excellent success. He has served the county as clerk of the superior court, receiver of tax returns four years, was a member of the board of education a number of years and represented the county in the general assembly one term, and in 1880 was United States enumerator. In all these varied and responsible positions his energy and general intelligence and superior ability and capabilities enabled him to discharge their multifarious duties promptly and efficiently, which is amply attested by the fact that he has never been defeated in any contest before the people. In 1865 he was ordained a local preacher of the Methodist church, where his labor has been arduous and useful, having preached at one church thirty years. He is the owner of an excellent 450-acre farm, on which he has demonstrated that as a farmer, as well as in other callings and as a public official, he ranks among the foremost. None stand higher than he socially or financially. He is one of Banks county's solidest and most substantial citizens.

Mr. Gunnells was married in 1851 to Miss Martha E. (born in Franklin county March 15, 1833), daughter of William J. and Naomi (Prickett) Parks. He was a farmer by occupation, but of strong religious convictions, and traveled much in northeast Georgia, preaching. His father, Henry Parks, was a native of Pennsylvania, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, after which he came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Gunnells seven are living: Sarah A., wife of T. B. Neese; Nancy N., wife of A. J. Holbrook; Georgia A., wife of John S. Varner; C. L., J. H., Daniel B. and George P. Mrs. Gunnells, a devoted and exemplary member of the Methodist church, died in the early part of 1885. The latter part of the year he was united in marriage to Miss Permelia (born in Franklin county in 1830), daughter of Leroy and Mary (Anderson) Parks. He was a prominent, prosperous farmer, and his family was among Franklin county's earliest settlers. Mr. Gunnells is a Good Templar, an aggressive temperance worker; a member of the I. O. O. F., and a Master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent and influential members of the Methodist church.

VINCENT D. LOCKHART, physician and surgeon, Homer, Banks Co., Ga., son of Vincent and Louisa (Owens) Lockhart, was born in Hall county, Ga., in 1849. His paternal grandparent, Britton Lockhart, was a native of Virginia, whence he came to Georgia toward the close of the last century and settled in what is now Lincoln county, when the settlements were scattering. He was quite prominent as a planter. Dr. Lockhart's father was born in Lincoln county, where he grew to manhood. When only sixteen years old he enlisted as a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, in a company commanded by Capt. Lamar. He became very rich in land and negroes and a very prominent citizen, representing the county in the general assembly several terms. Believing he could employ his capital to better advantage in Augusta he went to that city and engaged in merchandising. But, instead, he met with reverses and returned to Lincoln county, whence in a few years he moved to Hall county, in that portion known as "The Glades." His mother was a daughter of George Owens, a prominent farmer of Elbert county, Ga.

Dr. Lockhart was raised on the farm, and after receiving a fairly good education at the county schools went to Atlanta and engaged as a clerk in a drug store. While thus employed he studied medicine. He attended his first course of lectures in 1869 and in 1871 he graduated. He then accepted a clerkship in Atlanta, which he held two years, after which he located in Hall county, where he established a good reputation and secured a good practice. In 1878 he moved to Homer, Banks county, where he has grown in reputation and the public favor, his practice covering an extensive territory.

Dr. Lockhart was married in 1875 to Miss Nancy (born in Hall county in 1849), daughter of Joseph M. and Elizabeth (Cagle) Martin, then of Hall, now living in Habersham county. He is a well-to-do farmer and served in the Confederate army under Gen. Johnston during the late "unpleasantness." They have two children living: William and Walter. He is a Royal Arch Mason and past worshipful master of the local (Homer) lodge, and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

A. J. M'WHIRTER, farmer, Banks county (post-office, Harmony Grove), Ga., son of James and Desina (Fowler) McWhirter, was born in Union district, S. C., in 1835. His paternal grandfather, James McWhirter, of Irish descent, was a native of Virginia, was a farmer and a soldier in the last war with Great Britain; was with Gen. Jackson at New Orleans. Mr. McWhirter's father was born in South Carolina and in 1857 moved to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. He was a prosperous farmer, a good citizen and a prominent member of the Methodist church. His maternal grandparents were Godfrey and Kiskey Fowler. He was a native of South Carolina, a farmer and a soldier in the war of 1812.

Mr. McWhirter was raised on the farm and received his schooling in the old-time log-house. In 1861 he enlisted in Company D, Capt. Montgomery, Sixteenth Georgia regiment. In 1862 a company of sharpshooters was selected from a brigade; Mr. McWhirter was assigned to duty in it, and participated in very many of the bloodiest and most important battles in that unhappy conflict, among them Seven Pines, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Yorktown, Williamsburg, Savage's Station, White Oak, Malvern Hill, Boonesboro, Culpeper Court-House, Winchester, Hagerstown, Knoxville, Chickamauga, North Anna, Fisher's Hill, Middleton, Sailor's Creek, etc. He started in life without a penny, but realizing that "a pound of pluck is worth a ton of luck," he went to work, made and saved what money he could until he purchased the old homestead of his wife's family. He now owns an excellently well-equipped farm of 325 acres, and is enjoying an ample competency. Besides his farm he owns stock in the Harmony Grove factory, thus setting a good example to his brother farmers in the matter of encouraging the establishment of home markets for their surplus farm products.

Mr. McWhirter was married June 24, 1867, to Miss Oney (born in Franklin county in 1830), daughter of Hope and Hannie (Yeagan) Simms. He was born in Fredericksburg, Va., was a farmer and a soldier in the Seminole war. His wife was born in Newberry district, S. C., and lived most of her life in Georgia, in which state she died at the advanced age of ninety-seven years. Mr. and Mrs. McWhirter are exemplary members of the Methodist church.

THOMAS A. NEAL, farmer, Banksville, Banks Co., Ga., son of William and Lavinia (Conley) Neal, was born in Franklin (now Banks) county in 1829. His paternal grandparents were Robert and Tabitha (Chandler) Neal. He was a native of North Carolina, migrated to Georgia early in life, and settled in Elbert county. He was a large and prosperous farmer. Mr. Neal's father was born in North Carolina and came to Georgia with his parents when a small boy. He lived and died a farmer. His mother was a daughter of Charles and Kesiah (Stokes) Conley, native North Carolinians, who settled in Franklin county.

Mr. Neal was raised on the farm, and was educated at the near-by country schools, and when he reached manhood engaged in farming. In 1862 he enlisted in Company I—of which he was elected captain—Thirty-fourth Georgia regiment; but being taken sick shortly afterward he returned home. After the war he had nothing—had to take a fresh start, and has devoted himself exclusively to farming with entirely satisfactory results. He is the owner of a 600-acre farm as good as any in the county, and ranks among the best as a farmer and citizen, and for business integrity.

Mr. Neal was married in 1856 to Miss Margaret (born in Franklin county in 1835), daughter of Alexander F. and Elizabeth (McCracken) Ashe. (For sketch of the Ashe family see sketch of William Ashe, elsewhere in these Memoirs.) To them the following children were born: Ella L., wife of W. S. Mise; William A.; Mary E., wife of R. L. Neal; Laura, and Albert. He is a Master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Presbyterian church.

W. C. OLIVER, farmer, Arp, Banks Co., Ga., son of Jackson and Mary (Maxwell) Oliver, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1836. His paternal grandparents, Dionysius and Jane (Jackson) Oliver, were natives of Virginia, who early in life settled in Elbert county. He was a captain in the patriot army and served through the revolutionary war. His brother built the first house in Petersburg, Elbert county, and his wife's family was related to that of "Stonewall" Jackson. Mr. Oliver's father was born in Elbert county, was a farmer and a Methodist preacher; and in 1840 moved to what is now Banks county and settled on the farm where Mr. Oliver now lives. His maternal grandparents, William and Jane E. (Higginbotham) Maxwell, moved to what was then Franklin, now Banks, county, from Elbert county.

Mr. Oliver was raised on the farm and received a limited education in the near-by country schools. In 1862 he enlisted in Company A, Capt. Chandler, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment, but he was soon taken sick and returned home. After the war he taught school for some time, and then returned to farming, in which his success has met his most sanguine expectations. In addition to operating his farm of 225 acres he operates a ginnery and threshing machine, and runs a grist and cotton seed mill. He is a progressive and excellent farmer and business man, and is highly esteemed by his neighbors.

Mr. Oliver was married in 1868 to Miss Mary E. (born in Franklin, now Banks, county in 1844), daughter of John and Elizabeth (Scott) Mackey. He was a prosperous farmer of Franklin (now Banks) county. Of the children born to them eight are living: Dewitt, Lovick, Lenora, Denver, Atticus, Nettie, Leila, and John Jackson. He is a Master Mason, and himself and wife are active members of the Methodist church.

H. P. QUILLIAN, physician and surgeon, Arp, Banks Co., Ga., son of O. P. and Jane (Meadows) Quillian, was born in what is now White county, Ga., in 1850. His paternal great-grandfather was a native of Ireland, who married an English lady and settled in Virginia. His grandparents, James and Sarah (Prickett) Quillian, were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated to Georgia about 1804, and settled in Franklin county. He was a farmer, and a very prominent and widely known Methodist preacher. His maternal grandparents were Barnabas and Jane (Garrison) Meadows. He was a native of Virginia, migrated to Georgia and settled in Franklin (now Banks) county. He was a farmer, and a volunteer soldier in the Seminole war. Dr. Quillian's father was born in Franklin county. While he was a boy his father moved to that part of the county now embraced in White county, where he supplemented his farming by engaging in general merchandising.

Dr. Quillian was raised on the farm and received his education from the country schools and the male high school at Elberton, Ga. He taught school for a few years. In 1876 he began the study of medicine under Dr. Matthews, and then attended the university of Georgia, from which he was graduated in 1880, and at once entered upon the practice at Arp, and has remained there ever since. Shortly after his graduation he took a post-graduate course in New York. Beginning life with no means, and relying alone on his own resources and exertions, he has attained to an enviable reputation in his profession, and has demonstrated his skill and ability by his success, and by establishing a large and remunerative practice.

Dr. Quillian was married in 1874 to Miss Mary E. (born in what is now Banks county in 1856), daughter of D. C. and Amelia (Saunders) Oliver. He was born in what is now Banks county, raised a farmer, served in the civil war under Capt. Chandler, Sixteenth Georgia regiment, and afterward went to Athens, Ga., where he is now chief of police. Six children have blessed this union: Tallulah, Edgar, Hattie, Bascom, William, and Annette. He is a member of the I. O. O. F., and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

JOHN E. STRANGE, farmer, Carnot, Banks Co., Ga., son of William and Polly (White) Strange, was born in Franklin (now Banks) county, Ga., in January, 1832. His paternal grandparents, Seth and Mary (Dobbs) Strange, were natives of Virginia, migrated to Georgia in 1800, and settled in Franklin county. He was of Scotch-Irish descent and a farmer. Mr. Strange's father was born in Virginia, and was about two years old when his parents moved to Georgia, and followed farming all his life. His maternal grandparents, Isaac and Rebecca (Hooper) White, were natives of South Carolina. He tendered his services to the government during the war of 1812, but peace was proclaimed before he was mustered in.

Mr. Strange was raised on the farm, and was educated at the near-by country schools. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, Capt. Chandler, Twenty-fourth Georgia regiment. With his command he participated in many of the important battles of the war—seven days' fight around Richmond, Gettysburg, Petersburg, etc.—in fact most of the battles fought by the army of northern Virginia. He was captured three days before the surrender, and was sent to Point Lookout, where he was held six weeks. Returning from the war he resumed farming. He commenced with very little, but by working hard, "making every edge cut," and exercising care and attention, he has become the possessor of a good 600-acre farm, which is well improved, and in addition operates a cotton gin and grist mill. He is one of the county's best citizens, popular and held in very high esteem.

Mr. Strange was married in 1866 to Miss Judah E. (born in what is now Banks county in 1843), daughter of George W. and Nancy (Crow) Poole, native Georgians. He was a well-to-do farmer, and for many years a justice of the peace. They have six children living: Josie L., wife of Tyrie Duncan; W. H., Robert E., George G., Jessie J., and John W. He is a Master Mason, and himself and wife are prominent members of the Baptist church.

L. N. TURK, clerk superior court, Homer, Banks Co., Ga., son of William H. and Isabella S. (Ash) Turk, was born in Franklin, now Banks, county, Ga., Dec. 30, 1850. The founder of the Turk family in America was James Turk, who with his family, consisting of his wife, Mary, and three children, Jane, William and Ibbby, came from the north of Ireland, province of Ulster, county of Antrim, to this country in 1757. William, then thirteen years of age, landed in Charleston, S. C., and settled in Abbeville district, Abbeville county, on Long Cane creek. He entered the service of his adopted country in the early part of the revolutionary war, and bravely continued throughout the struggle, a part of the time being on Gen. Pickens' staff as his express bearer or courier. After the close of the war he married Miss Margaret Archibald, daughter of John Archibald, who lived in Roan county, now Iredell county, N. C. In 1792 he moved with his small family and his mother to Elbert county, Ga., and settled on Cold Water creek. He afterward moved with his family and a servant girl, Nellie, to Franklin county, Ga., and located on Webb's creek, where he died April 10, 1795. A son, William (grandfather of L. N. Turk), was born June 20, 1794, in Franklin, now Banks, county, Ga., in a fort called Norris on Webb's creek, where the family had taken refuge from the Indians. This place was within one and one-half miles of Homer, and near there he lived and died. His occupation was farming. He was a soldier, serving as colonel during the Seminole war, and he served for many years as judge of the inferior court, and for six years was principal keeper of the Georgia penitentiary at Milledgeville, receiving his first appointment under Gov. Herschel V. Johnson. He died in 1877. Mr. Turk's father, William H., was born in Franklin county in November, 1818, and followed farming all his life. Early in the late civil war he enlisted in Company A, Twenty-fourth regiment, and served three years. He officiated a number of years as justice of the peace and died in 1885. Mr. Turk's great-grandparents on his mother's side were William and Jane (Fleming) Ash. He was a native of South Carolina and served under Gen. Sumpter during the revolutionary war. His maternal grandparents were A. F. and Elizabeth (McCrackre) Ash. He was born in Union district, S. C., and came with his father when a boy to Franklin county, Ga. He served in the Indian war as major. He represented his county (Franklin) in the Georgia legislature for quite a number of years and he was a man of great force of character. Mr. L. N. Turk grew to manhood on the farm and owing to the unsettled condition of the country he received but little schooling. He is essentially a self-educated man and as his father lost all his property during the war he began life with nothing. He served his county as surveyor for eight years and in 1858 he was elected clerk of the superior court and has been continually re-elected since. He made his first purchase of land in 1878, a small farm which he has profitably cultivated and to which he has gradually added until now he has 450 acres and a comfortable home. Mr. Turk was married in 1878 to Miss Isabella Telford, born in South Carolina Nov. 27, 1857, daughter of G. B. and Elizabeth (Wilson) Telford, native South Carolinians, who moved to Georgia in 1872. Mr. Wilson was a cousin of ex-Gov. Brown, and during the late war served in the home guard. Of the children which blessed this union, four are living: William, Joseph, Minnie, and George. The mother, an esteemed member of the Presbyterian church, died Oct. 21, 1893, and Jan. 17, 1895, Mr. Turk married Miss Alice Burns, born in Banks county, May 13, 1859, and daughter of John M. and Harriet (Long) Burns. Her father, son of David M. and Sarah (Hay) Burns, was born in Jackson county, Ga., where he still lives and served with the Confederate army during the late war. Her grandfather Burns erected the first flour mill built in Jackson county, and was a general of militia when it was considered a great local distinction and much coveted. Mr. and Mrs. Turk are members of the Presbyterian church.

JOHAN T. WHITE, farmer, Banks (postoffice, Maysville, Jackson) county, Ga., son of Robert and Sarah (Miller) White, was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1847. His paternal grandparents, John and Lavinia (Gray) White, were born in what is now Clarke county. He was a school teacher and a quite large farmer, and was a soldier during the war of 1812. Mr. White's father was born in Clarke county, served in the Confederate army for a considerable time, doing faithful service. His mother was a daughter of Joram and Lavinia (Ross) Miller. He was a native of South Carolina, but moved to Georgia when a young man, where he married and raised a family. He was a farmer, and finally moved to Forsyth county, Ga., where he died.

Mr. White enlisted in Company D, Capt. Dorsey, Young's battalion, and participated in many important arguments—in the defense of Atlanta, and generally in front of the Union army when "Marching Through Georgia." At the close of the war his only capital was industrious habits, energy and a determination to succeed. He has now a fine 300-acre farm under good cultivation, and operates a ginnery; is content with his gains and the good will of his friends and neighbors.

Mr. White was married, in 1866, to Miss Elizabeth—born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1846—daughter of William and Mary A. (Baugh) Saville, native Georgians. Of the children born to them, eight are living: Robert, Tresne, Sallie, Morgan, Louisiana, Minnie, Pauline and Paul. Mr. and Mrs. White are members of the Baptist church.

JAMES O. WOOD, farmer, Phidelta, Banks Co., Ga., son of Josh and Stacy (Wheeler) Wood, was born in Jackson county, Ga., in 1833. His paternal grandfather, John Wood, was a native South Carolinian, and a farmer, and a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. Mr. Wood's father was born in South Carolina, and was raised a farmer. He came to Georgia in 1826, and settled in Jackson county, but some years later moved to what is now Banks county. He was a member of the Baptist church. His maternal grandfather, James Wheeler, was a native of Virginia, and a farmer. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and after the war migrated to Georgia and settled in Jackson county, which at that time was very sparsely peopled.

Mr. Wood was raised on the farm, received a very limited education, and when reaching maturity engaged in farming. In 1863 he enlisted in a company commanded by Capt. Whitehead, which was a part of Maj. S. J. Winn's cavalry battalion. He was in a number of battles, and in that at Limestone was severely wounded and sent to the hospital, and after remaining there four weeks was sent home. He started in life poor, but by hard work, economy and good management he has made money and secured a competency. He bought his first land during the war, and paid for it in Confederate money, and now has a good farm of 450 acres, with a good home on it. His farm is under splendid cultivation, and he is considered one of the best farmers in the county. He has wisely invested a portion of his farm profits in the Harmony Grove mills, whereby he has consumers of his surplus farm product right at his door. Himself and wife own twenty-six shares of stock in the Georgia railway, and he owns twelve shares in the North Eastern and four in the Gainesville Southern. Wise farmers will encourage the establishment of manufactories near them.

Mr. Wood was married, in 1859, to Miss Louise—born in Franklin county in 1827—daughter of Joel and Elizabeth (Mays) Thomas. He was born in Elbert county, Ga., but when about two years old his father moved to Franklin (now Banks) county. He was a farmer and was a soldier in the war of 1812. Of the children which blessed this union, four survive: James M., W. E., physician, Dalton, Ga.; Arthur W., and Belle. He is a Master Mason, and Mrs. Wood is a devout member of the Presbyterian church.

BARTOW COUNTY.

JAMES T. M'D. ADDINGTON, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of John and Rachel (Miller) Addington, was born in Union district, S. C., March 7, 1836. His grandfather, Henry Addington, was a native of England, emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war, and settled in Virginia. He served as a soldier in the patriot army during the war, under Gen. Kelsey. After the war he moved to North Carolina, and thence to Union district, South Carolina, where he remained until he died. The children he raised were: Henry, died in Indianapolis, Ind.; James, went to Missouri; William, died near New Orleans, La., residence, Indiana; Rachel, married a Mr. McElreath; John, in Georgia; Carrie, married James Brown, Pickens district, S. C., deceased. Mr. Addington's father was born in South Carolina in 1791, but when eight years old went to live with his uncle, a Mr. Garrett, in Indiana—where he was raised. When he attained to manhood he returned to South Carolina and settled in Union district, where he remained until the fall of 1836, when he migrated to Gilmer county, Ga., and engaged in farming. In 1851 he moved to Cass (now Bartow) county, purchased and settled on 320 acres of land on Pine Log creek. He remained on this place until 1883, when he bought the Dr. Layton property, near Adairsville, containing 150 acres, on which he lived until he died—in his 91st year. He was originally an "old-line whig" in politics, and later in life a republican. For many years he was a justice of the inferior court of Gilmer county, a man of fixed principles and purposes, and quite influential. He was a life-long, devoted member of the Baptist church. To him the following children were born: Margaret, widow of Jarrett Gordon; Susan, widow of Addington Huckelberry; Frances, widow of James Armstrong; James T. McD., the subject of this sketch; Henry, in Texas; William C. D., killed at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va.; Rachel, wife of James Harbin, Texas. Mr. Addington was raised in Gilmer and Cass counties and was educated in private schools. Having finished his own education, he taught in the counties of Cass, Bartow and Cherokee. He made his first home in 1860, near and east of Adairsville, where he lived until 1885, when he bought and settled on eighty acres of land half a mile southeast of Adairsville, where he now lives. He has served eight years as a justice of the peace; has served, also, as chairman of the board of education of Bartow county. He was a United States storekeeper and gauger for seven years. Mr. Addington was married, Dec. 20, 1860, to a Miss Margaret T. Houk, of Bartow (then Cass) county, who has borne him five children: Emma, wife of Wesley Cagle; Mary J., wife of Benjamin Schooler; Cora, wife of Thomas Landers, Atlanta; Lena D., and Lulu P. Mr. Addington has been a republican all his life, but in 1894 he united himself with the populist party, with which he is now aligned.

AMOS T. AKERMAN, deceased, ex-United States attorney-general, son of Benjamin and Olive (Meloan) Akerman, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., Feb. 23, 1821. The Akermans were of English origin, and his immediate progenitors and nearest relatives were natives of Portsmouth. His paternal grandfather was Joseph Akerman, and his grandfather on his mother's side was a soldier in the revolutionary army. Mr. Akerman's father was a surveyor by profession, and stood in high repute. Mr. Akerman's early life was spent in Portsmouth, where he attended the high school. He next attended Exeter academy, where he was prepared for college. He then entered Dartmouth college, from which, in due time, he was graduated. After his graduation, Mr. Akerman, in 1842, came to North Carolina and commenced teaching and reading law. From there he went to Peoria, Ill., but did not remain there long. Returning to the south, he located at Bath, Richmond Co., Ga., where he taught school. Subsequently he entered the family of Hon. J. McPherson Berrien, as a private tutor, under whom he completed his law studies. Thus prepared, he went to Habersham county, Ga., where he was admitted to the bar; located at the county seat, Clarkesville, and commenced practice. Later he removed to Elberton, Elbert Co., Ga., and forming a partnership with Robert Hester, an eminent lawyer of that place, remained there until 1871, when he located at Cartersville. His practice was confined to banking and railway suits, principally in the supreme court of Georgia and the United States courts in Atlanta and Savannah. In 1870 he was appointed United States district attorney for the northern district of Georgia, and later, the same year, was appointed attorney-general of the United States, and held that position until 1872. He served during the war in the quartermaster's department—with the rank of captain—on Gen. Toombs' staff, and filled the same position on Gov. Brown's staff at the siege of Atlanta. Politically, he was first an "old-line whig," but when the republican party was formed he joined that, became a prominent and leading member of it in Georgia, and continued true to its principles until his death. He was an influential member of the constitutional convention of 1868, and revised the Bill of Rights and the portions of the constitution relating to the judiciary, and also the reconstruction acts. Mr. Akerman ranked with the foremost in the legal profession in Georgia, enjoyed a lucrative practice, and his opinions were much sought after, particularly in railway and United States court cases. In all the relations of private life he was held in the highest esteem—a life-long, exemplary member of the Presbyterian church.

Mr. Akerman married Miss Martha Rebecca, daughter of Rev. Samuel Galloway, a native of Bethlehem, Pa., but a resident of Georgia. Mr. Akerman died Dec. 21, 1880. His wife is still living, together with the following children: Benjamin, Elwood, Fla.; Walter, ex-postmaster, Cartersville; Alexander, lawyer, state of Washington; Joseph, tutor ancient languages, university of Georgia; Charles, Alfred and Clement.

JOHN S. BEAZLEY, physician and surgeon, Stilesboro, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Charles and Catharine (Stewart) Beazley, was born in Spottsylvania county, Va., Aug. 12, 1832. His grandfather, Charles Beazley, was born in England, and emigrating to this country settled in Spottsylvania county, Va. Dr. Beazley's father was born near Spottsylvania court-house, Aug. 12, 1790, and was raised a farmer. In 1854 he migrated to Georgia and settled near Crawfordville, Taliaferro county, where he died Jan. 13, 1863. He was twice married. His first wife was Miss Catharine, daughter of John Stewart, near Spottsylvania court-house, Va., and to them seven children were born: Frances, wife of W. A. Overton, now deceased; John S., the subject of this sketch; Frederick A., died in 1875; Arthur G. of Crawfordville; Julia C., widow of Marcus Googer of Crawfordville; Isabella H., deceased, and Emma J., still living.

Dr. Beazley was educated by his grandfather Stewart, and then read medicine under Dr. Godfrey Hinkle, an eminent physician of the valley of Virginia, and afterward entered the university of Virginia and attended lectures in the medical department of that school. After the family came to Georgia he attended lectures at the medical college of Georgia, Augusta, from which he graduated in 1856. Locating in Crawfordville he practiced his profession until the "war between the states" occurred, when he entered the Confederate service, but was discharged from two different military organizations for disability. He was then appointed by Taliaferro county on the county board of physicians, on which he was continued during the war. In 1866 he located at Stilesboro; later moved to Floyd county, whence, in 1867, he returned and settled two miles west of Stilesboro. Here he established a large and remunerative practice and remained until 1883, when he purchased his present home. In connection with his large practice he operates his 620-acre plantation. He not only enjoys the reputation of being a skillful and successful physician, but also of being a successful farmer.

Dr. Beazley was married in 1858 to Miss Sarah, daughter of Richard Asbury, Warren county, Ga., a union blessed with three children: Reuben R., who married Lydia, daughter of D. V. Stockley, by whom he has had two children: John S., who married Lucy, daughter of Stephen S. Soggus, and Edgar G. Dr. Beazley is a staunch democrat, royal arch Mason and a prominent and exemplary member of the Baptist church.

JOSHUA W. BOWDOIN, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Joshua and Beersheba Bowdoin, was born in Monroe county, Ga., Nov. 2, 1832. Some years preceding the revolutionary war two brothers, James and John Bowdoin, emigrated from England to America. James settled in Massachusetts, where he acquired large wealth and founded the now celebrated seat of learning at Brunswick (then in Massachusetts, now in Maine), known as Bowdoin college. John Bowdoin, the other brother and the great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was a Presbyterian minister, and settled in Virginia. James, his son, was born in Virginia, and when only nine years old entered the patriot army and served under Gen. Washington and Greene until peace was proclaimed and independence acknowledged. After the war he went to North Carolina, and subsequently emigrated to Hamburg, S. C. In 1806 he moved into Georgia, purchased considerable land in what is now Monroe county, on which he settled and lived the remainder of his days. He married Miss Equilla Williams, and to them nine children—seven sons and two daughters—were born. Joshua, the father of the subject of this sketch, was the youngest child of James and Equilla Bowdoin, and was born in South Carolina in 1802, but was raised in what is now Monroe county. He was really a pioneer of Cass county, having settled on land now lying in Gordon county in 1833. He purchased 160 acres situated near Adairsville, now the home of his son, Joshua W. To this original purchase he afterward added until he owned 1,040 acres in one body, and a number of smaller tracts. Of the main body he cleared about 500 acres and was one of the largest and most prominent planters in the county. He was an active partisan and an unswerving democrat, and served many years as a justice of the inferior court. He was an ordained preacher of the Baptist church and preached in middle Georgia and east Tennessee. He was instrumental in establishing many churches within the extensive boundaries of his work, among them Mt. Gilead, of which he was the faithful pastor forty years. He was married in Hancock county to Miss Beersheba Fails, by whom he had eight children: Frances M., deceased; Emily F., deceased, wife of Elisha Crisman; John W., physician, deceased; Elisha F., a member of the Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment, died of wounds received in the battle of Atlanta; Josephus D., deceased, was also a member of the Sixty-fifth Georgia regiment; Joshua W., the subject of this sketch, and two daughters who died in infancy. The mother of these children died in 1852, and he afterward married Mrs. Martha Lane.

Joshua W. Bowdoin, though born in Monroe county, was raised in what is now Gordon county, on the homestead where he now lives. He was educated in the common schools of the county and learned the blacksmith's trade. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, First Georgia regiment, and soon afterward was detailed to manufacture firearms, and was located at Adairsville and Dawsonville. After the surrender he returned to the homestead which he inherited and engaged in farming. He owns about 300 acres of excellent land, and is a progressive, successful and prominent farmer, respected and highly esteemed. Mr. Bowdoin married Miss Annie, daughter of John J. Dodds of Gordon county, who has borne him three children: Annie, deceased wife of Henry Johnson; Emma, and Montague. Mr. Bowdoin is an enthusiastic democrat and takes an active interest in the success of his party.

WILLIAM BRANDON, deceased, progenitor of the now numerous and influential Bartow county family of that name, was born in Virginia; came to Georgia about the beginning of this century and settled on a plantation in what is now Gwinnett county, where he died. He raised the following named children: Lawson, moved to Cass (now Bartow) county; Nicey; Reed, died in Alabama; Thomas W.; Parthenia, married Penty Clower; William, died in Mississippi; Moses, died in Floyd county, Ga.; Jackson, died at Yorktown, Va., from exposure while in the army; Joseph P., died in Gwinnett county, Ga.; David (M. D.), died in Thomasville, Ga. Thomas W. Brandon, deceased, son of William, was born in 1803, raised in what is now Gwinnett county and received there what little schooling he enjoyed. In the winter of 1834-35 he moved to Cass (now Bartow) county and settled in the wilderness among the Indians. He bought 600 acres of land, on portions of which his sons, Jefferson R. and David P. now live, between Stilesboro and Euharlee. To this property he afterward added several hundred acres by purchase. He also bought an 80-acre farm, which forms a part of the plantation on which his son William J. now lives. He was in reality one of the pioneer planters in this part of the state and a citizen of prominence, influence and usefulness. He was one of the early justices of the peace in the county and held the office for many years. In his early years he was an "old-line whig," but in the latter years of his life he was a democrat. He was a life-long, ardent and working Methodist, was one of the original members and organizers of the Brandon church which was established about 1836. He gave the land for the church and burial ground and helped to erect the first house of worship, which was built out of logs. This log-house has since been replaced by a nice and large frame building in Stilesboro. He was for many years the class leader of the church. He married Miss Louisa, daughter of William Green of North Carolina, by whom he had ten children: Mary A., wife of W. J. Byers; Elizabeth, wife of J. S. Leak; William J.; Parthenia, wife of W. A. Templeton; Jefferson R.; David P.; Virginia; Florence, wife of W. E. Puckett; Avarilla, wife of H. H. Milam; Susan, wife of J. H. Walker. Mr. Brandon died in 1874 and himself and wife are buried on the old homestead.

William J. Brandon, eldest son of Thomas W. and Louisa (Green) Brandon, was born in what is now Bartow county, at the old family homestead, Jan. 4, 1835; was raised on the farm and received a fair common-school education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F., Eighteenth Georgia regiment, and as a member of that command participated in the battles of Gaines' Mills, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg and Knoxville. At the battle of Knoxville he was taken prisoner and sent to Rock Island, Ill., where he was held until June, 1865. At the close of the war he returned to the homestead, where he remained until December, 1867, when he settled upon the plantation where he now lives, and began the improvements which have made it the desirable home it is. He was one of the original members of Oak Grove Methodist church, which is the outgrowth of the old "Brandon church"—a name it is yet known by among the old settlers. He contributed liberally toward the erection of the new edifice and is one of the trustees. He worthily represents the enterprise and public spirit of the family whose name he perpetuates, the citizenship of Bartow county and the Methodism he professes. Mr. Brandon married Miss Martha, daughter of James Kirkham of Bartow county, who has borne him seven children: Annie, wife of Lee Jolly; Blanche, wife of C. A. Dodd; Walter D.; Jefferson A.; Maude S.; Frank and Eugene, deceased. Mr. Brandon is a democrat and an enterprising and progressive citizen.

Jefferson R. Brandon, son of Thomas W. and Louisa (Green) Brandon, was born on the family homestead in what is now Bartow county, May 9, 1839. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Eighteenth Georgia regiment, and was with his regiment in every engagement in which it bore a part. He was promoted to a first lieutenant in 1863 and remained in the service until April 6, 1865, when he was captured and sent to Johnson's island, and held until June 19, 1865. After the war he clerked in a store at Euharlee and afterward in Nashville, Tenn. He subsequently engaged in merchandising with G. L. McDowell, Atlanta, and Asheville, N. C., until 1884, when he settled where he now resides. Mr. Brandon married Miss Kate, daughter of Samuel J. Sumner, by whom he has had five children: Paul H., William D., Moses T., Claude S. and Hugh P. Mr. Brandon is a strong democrat and served as county commissioner in 1877-8-9.

David P. Brandon, son of Thomas W. and Louisa (Green) Brandon, was born on the old homestead in what is now Bartow county, Oct. 13, 1842, and received a common-school education. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Eighteenth Georgia regiment, and with his command participated in the battles of Gaines' Mills, Seven Pines, second Bull Run (second Manassas) and Sharpsburg. He was captured in a fight three days before Lee's surrender and sent to Baltimore, where, after the surrender, he was paroled. He returned to the old homestead after the war, which has since been his home. He married Miss Betsy J. Hay, a union which has been blessed with six children: Thomas W.; Mary A.; Joseph G.; John R.; Charles G., and David P. Mr. Brandon is a member of the Methodist church.

WILLIAM BROWNE, stock-breeder, Cassville, Bartow county, Ga., son of Isaac and Ruth (Nave) Browne, was born in Carter county, Tenn., Jan. 23, 1839. His grandfather, Jacob Browne, was of Scotch-Irish extraction—his parents having emigrated from Ireland and settled in Northampton county, Pa., where he was born. In the latter part of the last century he migrated to Tennessee, and settled in Washington county, where he was an extensive planter. He had three children: Jacob, who died at Bowling Green, Ky.; Isaac, and Katie, who married Nathan Shipley, of Washington county, Tenn. Mr. Browne's father was born on the old homestead in Tennessee, was educated in the common schools of the county, and until 30 years of age followed the occupation of carpenter and cabinet-maker. After his marriage he settled, as a farmer, in Carter county, Tenn., where he now lives, in his eighty-fourth year. He has taken great interest in public affairs, filling many public offices of trust in the county, and is also a very prominent member of the Baptist church. His family consists of five sons and one daughter, by his first marriage: Christian; William; Isaac, Jr.; Murray, lawyer in Cartersville from 1876 to 1884, now of Winchester, Ky.; Dr. Daniel, now practicing medicine, and Margaret, wife of Joe A. Worley. By his second marriage, in 1855, Mr. Browne has two children, James C. and Mrs. Emma C. Renfroe.

Mr. Browne was raised on the farm and received a fair education at the country schools. In 1862 he enlisted in Company A, Fifty-Ninth Tennessee regiment, with which he served until July 4, 1863, and participated in the battles at Baker's creek and Vicksburg, Miss., where he was paroled and returned home. Subsequently he received his commission as captain in the quartermaster's department, Sixth North Carolina regiment, cavalry, and with this command was under Gen. Johnson on the coast, in the engagements at Tarboro and New Berne and the capture of Fort Croatan, and others in North Carolina, until the close of the war, when he was discharged, in March, 1865. That year he went to Kansas City, Mo., and taught school and engaged in other occupations until the spring of 1866, when he crossed the plains—there were no railroads then—to Virginia city. There he engaged in trading in mining stocks and cattle for about three years, when he returned east and settled at Mt. Olivet, Ky., where he engaged in the drug business about seven years—until 1876—when he purchased and settled on a plantation in Bartow county, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising until 1889. Early in that year he sold out and went back to Kentucky, but in the fall returned to Bartow county, bought his present farm of 150 acres, and embarked in the business of breeding Jersey cattle, high-grade horses and other stock. He is eminently progressive in all matters pertaining to every branch of agriculture, and takes great interest in them, and in regard to them is considered somewhat of an authority.

Capt. Browne was married, in 1873, to Miss Maude, daughter of H. H. Overby, of Nicholas county, Ky. Politically, he is a stanch, uncompromising democrat. He is an ardent, working and exemplary member of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward, and also superintendent of the Sunday school. He is a consistent Christian gentleman, a generous contributor to, and earnest worker in, all movements having for their object the intellectual and religious advancement of the community.

BURGE. Among the earliest settlers of Cass (now Bartow) county were the Burges. Nathaniel Burge, deceased, son of Woody and Judy Burge, was born in Virginia, Jan. 8, 1790. Subsequently to his birth his father moved to North Carolina and settled on Broad river, in Rutherford county. There he remained and farmed until he died—and there he raised his children, Allen, Nancy, David, William, Priscilla, Elizabeth, Sarah, John, Judith, Nathaniel and Mary.

Nathaniel grew to manhood on the North Carolina plantation, and, Nov. 18, 1815, married Miss Nancy Green, daughter of Joseph Green. A few years later he came to Gwinnett county, Ga., where he remained a year, alone, when he returned to North Carolina, and in 1824 moved, with his family, to Gwinnett county and settled on Sweet Water creek. He remained there until 1837, when he removed to Cass (now Bartow) county, and purchased 200 acres of land—on which his son, J. R. M. Burge, now lives—which he afterward added to until his holding was 800 acres, situated in what is known as the "Horseshoe Bend" of Etowah river. Here he lived out his days, and on this original purchase himself and wife are buried—in the "Burge burial ground." Mr. Burge was a consistent, devoted member of the Baptist church, in which he was a deacon very many years. He gave the land on which Raccoon creek Baptist church was built and the burial ground located, and was one of the original members and organizers of the church. Practical, sagacious and public-spirited, he was prosperous. Politically he was an unswerving democrat, and always took an active part in promoting the success of his party. His death occurred Dec. 15, 1849. To these pioneer settlers there were born eight children: Joseph G., deceased; William T.; Adolphus G., deceased; Mary E., deceased, married Daniel Conyers; Elizabeth, deceased, married Russell H. Cannon; Jane A., wife of John Sproulls; Joseph P., first lieutenant, Company K, Fourteenth Georgia regiment, died from exposure in the army in 1861; and James R. M., of Bartow county.

William T. Burge, son of Nathaniel and Nancy (Green) Burge, was born in North Carolina, Jan. 20, 1820, and was raised mostly in Gwinnett and Cass (now Bartow) counties, Ga., and was educated in the common schools of the time and locality. When twenty-one years old he engaged in the sawmill business, and in 1845 purchased the farm now owned and operated by him. For some years he combined distilling with his farming. The year he became of age he was the whig candidate for sheriff of the county. During the late war he was appointed by the county to obtain food and supplies for the families of the soldiers, and in 1863 was quartermaster of the state troops. At this time, also—1862-65—he officiated as one of the justices of the inferior court. At the close of the war he was the first man to take the oath of allegiance to the United States. In early life he was an old-time whig; afterward he united with the democratic party, and when the populist (or third) party was formed he took an active part in its organization, and was elected by that party to represent the county in the general assembly in 1891-92.

Mr. Burge was married, Feb. 3, 1845, to Miss Melissa, daughter of Samuel Smith, of what is now Bartow county, and to them ten children have been born: Nancy, wife of John Munford, Polk county, Ga.; Lexanna, wife of John T. Walker; Susan, wife of J. S. Davitt, Polk county; Dora, deceased, wife of A. S. McGregor; Ida, wife of Samuel S. E. Smith, Polk county; Willie, deceased; James W., Bartow county, and Fannie, Nathaniel and John, all deceased. Mr. Burge is an exemplary and influential member of the Methodist church, of which he was an efficient steward for many years.

JAMES J. CONNOR, lawyer and planter, Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Thomas B. and Sarah (Wall) Connor, was born in what is known as the "Dead river settlement," Montgomery county, Ga., Nov. 26, 1847. His paternal grandfather, Wilson Connor, was born in South Carolina, and came to Georgia and settled in what is now Montgomery county, in 1792. He was an extensive planter and prominent citizen. He was a devoted, influential member of the Baptist church, of which he was a pioneer minister in that part of Georgia—a man of ability and great usefulness. He married Miss Mary Cook, a native of Pennsylvania, and raised a family of four children: James G.; Harriett, who married a Mr. Griffin; Lucy A., who married Joseph Ryals, and Thomas B.

Mr. Connor's father, Thomas B., was born in Montgomery county, Oct. 22, 1798, and died Jan. 6, 1886. He was a large and very prosperous planter, a prominent citizen and politician, and an active and ardent member of the Baptist church. He was twice elected sheriff of Montgomery county. He married Miss Sarah Wall, who was born Oct. 7, 1809, and died Sept. 4, 1885. To them seven children were born: Mary A., deceased, wife of Joseph Ryals; William W., deceased; Thomas B., member of Company E, Sixty-first Georgia regiment, killed in second battle of Bull Run (second Manassas); Wilson W., deceased; Sarah, wife of Thomas B. Calhoun, Montgomery county; Eliza L., wife of James W. McArthur, Montgomery county, and James J., the subject of this sketch.

Mr. Connor was reared on the family homestead and received as good a common school education as could be had during the troublous times of his boyhood and youth. When twenty years of age he went to Dublin, Laurens Co., Ga., and commenced reading law under Col. Jonathan Rivers, and in 1871 was admitted to the bar, and entered at once upon the practice in Dublin. He was mayor of Dublin two years, and solicitor-general of the circuit several years. In 1881 he located in Cartersville and formed a partnership with Judge J. M. Neal, which continued five years. He then settled on his splendid 900-acre plantation in the vicinity of Cartersville, which he is conducting on the most improved and approved principles of modern husbandry, with labor-saving implements and machinery.

Mr. Connor was married, Nov. 9, 1879, to Miss Lucy C., daughter of Dr. James G. Ryals, and to them six children have been born: Thomas B., student at Mercer university, Macon, Ga.; James R.; Mary E.; Robert E.; Lucy C., and Anna B.

Mr. Connor is a leading democrat, a member of the Stilesboro Agricultural club, a Master Mason and a prominent and influential member of the Baptist church, of twenty years' standing. Pushing, progressive, popular, a bright future lies before him.

BELTON O. CRAWFORD, planter and stock-raiser, Cassville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of John and Martha (Clore) Crawford, was born in Laurens district, S. C., Jan. 11, 1827. When a boy (in 1836) he came with his father and family to Cass (now Bartow) county, Ga. He was raised on the old homestead (now his home), was educated at the Cassville academy, and, two years, attended the school of Rev. J. H. George, an educator of very high repute at Condsena. He then read law under Judge A. R. Wright, Rome, Ga., and was admitted to the bar in 1851. He located at Calhoun, Gordon Co., Ga., and practiced his profession there until 1858. His health failing at this time he retired from the practice, and bought a farm adjoining his father's and when his father died he bought the old homestead where he now lives, devoting his attention to farming and stock-raising. In 1861 he was elected a justice of the inferior court, and held the office four years. In 1863 he was commissioned captain of Company E, Price's battalion, Georgia state troops. He is one of the most prominent and substantial citizens of his county and section, a wide awake, progressive planter, and a liberal supporter of educational and Christian movements. He was a trustee of the Cherokee Baptist college, and is now a trustee of Ryal's high school, Gordon county, Ga. The son of a pioneer citizen and Baptist, it is his pride and ambition to emulate his father's public and Christian work.

Mr. Crawford was married in 1852 to Miss Cordelia, daughter of S. J. and Frances Fullilove. She died in 1860, leaving two children: Sally, wife of J. C. McLier; and James, planter, Bartow county. He afterward married Miss Sarah Fullilove, a sister of his first wife, by whom also he has two children, a daughter, Johnnie, and a son, Michael. Mr. Crawford is one of the staunchest of democrats, and a hard worker for his party; and a member of the Baptist church, in which he has been a deacon for twenty years.

REV. JOHN CRAWFORD, deceased, was a son of Samuel and Elizabeth (Roy) Crawford, and was born near Greenville, S. C., in 1793. His parents, natives of Virginia, migrated to South Carolina soon after the revolutionary war, and settled on a plantation in Greenville district. Subsequently, when advanced in years, Mr. Crawford's father lived in Laurens district, S. C.

Mr. Crawford was one of a family of four sons and three daughters; was raised on the plantation and received a fair education at the common country schools. When twenty-eight years of age he was married to Miss Martha, daughter of Aaron and Susan Clore, of Laurens district, where he settled and lived until 1836. Between the date of his marriage and 1836 he was ordained a preacher in the Baptist church. In 1836 he removed from South Carolina to Georgia with his family—himself, wife, six children and a number of slaves—and purchased and settled a plantation of 400 acres in Cass (now Bartow) county, where his son Belton now lives. He was a soldier under Gen. Jackson when that general was fighting the Indians in 1814, and was present when Wetherford surrendered to Jackson. After taking up his residence in Georgia Mr. Crawford was actively engaged in ministerial work in Cass, Cherokee, Floyd and Gordon counties, and was the founder of many of the Baptist churches within their borders, giving liberally of his means for that purpose. He inaugurated the movement for establishing the Cherokee Baptist college at Cassville, Ga., and gave $4,000 toward building it, and was made president of the board of trustees. He was emphatically a progressionist in all matters affecting the welfare of the people, the friend of education, and an active, earnest advocate and worker in the vineyard of the Master. He was a strong advocate of the construction of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway. He was the owner of hundreds of acres of land, a large planter, and owned the first reaping machine brought to Georgia. Politically he was an ardent democrat. He lived to be eighty-two years of age, and his wife died in 1875 at the age of seventy-four years. To this worthy couple the following children were born: Eliza, who married D. H. Hodges, both deceased; Harvey S., of Bartow county; John A., deceased, was a lawyer, a member of the general assembly before the war, was captain of Company K, Eighteenth Georgia regiment, served from June, 1861, to December, 1864, and was wounded in the battles at Sharpsburg and Gettysburg; Belton O., Bartow county; Michael J., was a lawyer, first lieutenant Company E, Eighteenth Georgia regiment from 1861 until the battle of the Wilderness, where he was badly wounded. He was elected to the general assembly in 1868, but expelled because he had held public office before the war; Martha S., married to J. C. Farris, Bartow county.

MATTHEW M. CUNNINGHAM, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of James and Caroline (Watts) Cunningham, was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, Aug. 10, 1845. His paternal grandfather, Matthew Cunningham, was a native of Laurens county, S. C., and his paternal grandmother was a native of Ireland. In Laurens county they were married and there Mr. Cunningham's father was born Sept. 6, 1806, was raised on a farm, and learned the wagon-maker's trade. In 1839 he came to Georgia and settled in Cassville, the county-seat of what was then Cass county, and established himself in the wagon-making business. In 1840 he entered into partnership with James Leak, and together conducted the business near Adairsville until 1846. At that time he bought a tract of 160 acres of land, to which he not long afterward added 140 acres more, and cleared and improved a farm which was his home until he died, in 1891, and where his son, the subject of this sketch, now lives. Originally he was an "old-line whig" in politics, but in his later years was a democrat. In 1841 he connected himself with the Methodist church, was one of the organizers of the Oothcaloga church, and was its class leader until his death. He was broad-minded, liberal in his views, and yet more liberal with his means toward the building of a house of worship, and in support of the church. He married Miss Caroline, daughter of W. J. Watts, another pioneer, who owned part of the land on which Adairsville now stands. She died in 1878. Their children were: William C., who was a member of the Twenty-second Georgia regiment, and died from exposure in the service; Matthew M., the subject of this sketch; Cornelius W.; James A.; Henry B. (deceased); Frances M. (deceased); Mary V., wife of M. C. Fields; Martha A. W. (deceased); and Layton P., Florida. Mr. Cunningham grew to manhood on the farm, and was educated at the near-by country schools. In 1863 he joined the First regiment, state troops, and afterward enlisted in Capt. Cowan's company of mounted troops, with which he served until the surrender—his service including what is known as the Atlanta campaign. After the war he returned to the homestead, where in addition to farming, he operated a cotton gin. In 1889 he formed a partnership with W. T. Hall, and erected the buildings and put in the present machinery equipment. Mr. Cunningham married Miss Carrie, daughter of Edward Griffith, of Floyd Springs, Ga., a union which has been blessed with four children: Beulah E., Ernest C., Alice E. and James E. He is a strong democrat, and a member of the Methodist church at Oothcaloga, of which he is a trustee, a steward and class leader—a useful, prominent and influential citizen.

ARTHUR DAVIS (deceased), planter, Stilesboro, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Benjamin and Nellie (Stokeley) Davis, was born in Cocke county, East Tennessee, in April, 1829. His grandfather was one of the early settlers of East Tennessee, and his father was born and raised a farmer in Cocke county, where he lived all his life. Mr. Davis was reared a farmer, and received only such education as was afforded by the neighboring country schools; and was one of a family of seven children—five boys and two girls. At the age of twenty-one he obtained employment with John E. Patton, contractor, who was engaged in railway construction in Tennessee, Florida and South Carolina, with whom he remained thirteen years. During this period he was continuously promoted until from a salary of $12 per month he was paid $1,000 a year and all expenses of himself and family. Such was his business and executive ability, that he was placed in charge of Mr. Patton's entire force, and made his agent for purchasing slaves and mules, and all supplies for them, and for carrying on his work. In 1863 he was appointed and commissioned by Gov. Vance, of North Carolina, as superintendent of the salt works operated by that state in Virginia. He continued in this position until the spring of 1865, when he rented land and farmed in Virginia until January, 1866. He then came to Bartow county and rented the Conyers farm on the Etowah river, which he cultivated three years. He then rented the Young farm on the same river, on which he lived the ensuing three years. In the fall of 1871, Mr. Davis bought the John S. Rowland farm, containing 500 acres, to which he afterward added by purchase until he owned 1,000 acres of as good land as any in Bartow county, all in one body, and many other tracts of undeveloped land. He was a man of very practical trend of mind and methods, firm and determined in purpose, and possessed of unusual administrative ability; liberal in his views, and generous in his impulses. He was regarded as one of the most progressive, and certainly was one of the most prosperous of the farmers in the Stilesboro neighborhood. Mr. Davis was married Nov. 25, 1859, to Miss Martha A. F., daughter of Thomas Fowler, of Union district, S. C., by whom he has had three children: Ella, wife of Thomas Shockley, Marietta, Ga.; Susan A., wife of A. H. Small, Macon, Ga.; Anna E., wife of L. W. Reeves—a native of Tennessee—Bartow county, Ga. Mr. Davis was a democrat, and an active and influential member of the Baptist church, of which he was a deacon. He died Sept. 10, 1889. Mrs. Davis is yet living, and resides on the plantation.

PETER HAMMONDS, farmer, Stilesboro, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Islam and Rebecca (Cheek) Hammonds, was born in Laurens district, S. C., Oct. 3, 1821. His grandfather, Peter Hammonds, was a native of County Clare, Ireland, who, when he came to the United States settled in Laurens district, where he lived until he died in 1821. Mr. Hammonds' father was born on the South Carolina homestead, where he was raised a farmer and spent most of his life, but died in Spartansburg, S. C. He was twice married. His first wife was Miss Rebecca Cheek, who bore him four children: Cassandra, who married Andrew Massey; Bethany, who married John Lindsey; Lucinda, who married ——— Murphy, and Peter, the subject of this sketch. His second wife was Miss Millie Barker, by whom he had five children: William, Nancy, Rebecca, Catharine and Amelia. Mr. Hammonds was raised a farmer, and was deprived of educational advantages as he was growing to manhood. In 1844 he came to Cass (now Bartow) county, and by a land grant took up forty acres of land, the lot No. 905, one-half mile northeast of Stilesboro depot. To this he added 300 acres by the purchase of other 40-acre lots, making his tract 340 acres, and extending from the depot to his home place at the mouth of Raccoon creek. All is under improved cultivation, by himself and children to whom, as they married, he gave a portion of his land. During the war he served as a member of the Home guard. Since the surrender he has given his attention exclusively to his farm, and as a farmer and citizen ranks among the foremost, and as high as any citizen in Bartow county. Mr. Hammonds married Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Emsley Hilton, Laurens district, S. C. To this union nine children were born: Robert, deceased; Mary; William, Taylorsville, Ga.; Toliver, farmer, Stilesboro; John, merchant, Stilesboro; Henry, deceased; James, farmer; Rebecca, wife of Joseph Forrester, Stilesboro, and Peter, merchant, Stilesboro. He is an ardent democrat and has always been an active party man, and is a working and exemplary member of the Methodist church.

WILLIAM J. HILBURN, merchant, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of

Robert and Eliza (Bailey) Hilburn, was born at Old Castle, Cass (now Bartow) county, April 5, 1843. His grandparents were natives of Virginia, and early in the present century migrated to Georgia and settled in what is now De Kalb county. There Mr. Hilburn's father was born, and after receiving such education as the common country schools afforded learned the trade of a tailor. Subsequently he studied dentistry and settled at Old Castle and later at Adairsville, where he followed his profession until he died. His wife died in 1883. Mr. Hilburn was given a common-school education and then learned the carpenter's trade. In 1861 he enlisted in Co. K, Seventh Georgia regiment, which at once proceeded to join the forces in Virginia. With his command he was engaged in many important battles, among them Bull Run (first Manassas), Garnett's farm, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, second Bull Run (second Manassas), Antietam, Gettysburg, Wilderness, Spottsylvania court-house, North Anna, Petersburg, Weldon R. R.; went through the East Tennessee campaign and surrendered under Gen. Lee at Appomattox. During all this four-years arduous and faithful service he received but three slight wounds—one in his right foot at Gettysburg. In 1866 he began clerking for A. P. Johnson, Adairsville, and continued with him until 1868. He then moved to Cobb county, Ga., where he worked at his trade and farmed until 1871, when he returned to Adairsville and engaged in merchandising. At the end of a year he discontinued his business and went to Atlanta. After pursuing a mercantile life here awhile he returned to Adairsville and established himself permanently in a grocery and general merchandise store. In this last enterprise he has been very successful. In 1892 he built the "New Midway house" and brick block, and is profitably conducting the new and popular hostelry in connection with his store. He is at present the mayor of Adairsville. Pushing in character and being an "up-to-date" man in business and politics, he will grow in popularity and influence.

Mr. Hilburn has been twice married. In 1867 he was married to Miss Nancy C. Gholston, who died in 1876, leaving a daughter, Willie O., wife of T. M. Manning, Floyd county, Ga. He was again married Oct. 28, 1880, to Miss Annie Hunt, who has borne him four children: Pearl R.; Ralph, deceased; Rembert P., and Jennie B.

Mr. Hilburn is an ardent, active democrat, a member of the I. O. O. F., a Master Mason and a prominent and influential member of the Methodist church.

REV. CHARLES WALLACE HOWARD, only son of Charles and Jane (Wallace) Howard, was born in Savannah, Ga., Oct. 11, 1811. His father was a prosperous merchant of Savannah and his mother a member of an old and distinguished family of that city. Mr. Howard attended the best schools of his day and at the age of sixteen entered the university of Georgia. Graduating from this university he went through the course at the theological seminary at the university of Princeton, N. J. At twenty-one he was ordained in the Presbyterian church at Athens, Ga., and accepted a pastorate at Milledgeville, Ga. Here his powerful eloquence was interested in behalf of the Oglethorpe university, and through it large sums of money were raised for its building. When completed he filled the chair of belles-lettres.

April 25, 1835, he married Miss Susan Jett Thomas, the second daughter of Georgia's gallant soldier, Gen. Jett Thomas. In 1838 he was sent to England to collect the colonial documents of the state of Georgia, which arduous service he performed with conscientious fidelity and thoroughness and to the satisfaction of the legislature of Georgia. At this time, differing with the presbytery on questions vital to the interests of the south, he left that body, resigned his pastorate and went to his farm in Bartow county (then Cass). From his farm he was soon called to Charleston, S. C., by the Huguenots, and with them he rebuilt the Huguenot (French Protestant) church and gathered together its people, who for a hundred years had been scattered among other congregations, translating their liturgy from the French and revising it. In 1849 his health failing him, his attached congregation sent him to Europe for a year, and on his return, still feeble, for two years they refused to accept his resignation. Finally they were compelled to allow him to return to his farm, where he devoted himself to agriculture, literature and scientific research. One of the results of his research was the discovery of the Howard hydraulic cement in Bartow county, the only cement of its color now known to the world. He wrote and published his Manual of Grass and Forage Plants for the south, which is quoted as a standard work. He contributed innumerable agricultural and scientific articles to magazines and other periodicals of unusual merit, and which were widely and profitably read. He was a life-long and active member of the Georgia State Agricultural association, and while not neglecting other branches, paid particular attention to the grasses and sheep husbandry. It is probable that after the organization of the association (of which he was one of the founders) he never missed attending an annual meeting. His very extensive general information, ripe scholarship and rare scientific attainments were recognized by all, and respected accordingly. And his modesty was such, that mention of them in his presence was absolutely oppressive to him. Although opposed to secession, as an unwise means to settle our grievances, notwithstanding his feeble health, he took an active part in the Confederate struggle, serving as captain of company I of the Sixty-third Georgia regiment. He was severely wounded in the battle of July 22, 1864, between Decatur and Atlanta. His gallantry in the field was only equaled by the favor with which he successfully appealed to the public for funds for the wayside homes for the soldiers. After the war, confident that the south, with her manhood and honor unsubdued by the trying ordeal through which she had passed, he returned to his farm, devoting himself to it and the welfare of his state in her new circumstances. He was frequently employed by capitalists to make investigations on certain lines as to Georgia's resources. In 1869, under the auspices of the Western & Atlantic railway, he prospected that portion of Georgia, between Chattanooga, Tenn., and Rome, Ga., including Lookout and Pigeon mountains, and made an exhaustive report of its amazing mineral wealth, particularly in the variety, abundance and superior quality of its coal and iron ore. In 1872 he bought his farm, Ellerslee, on the east brow of Lookout mountain, where he loved to rest and commune with nature. And here he died, Dec. 25, 1876, in the sixty-sixth year of his life. At his death Gen. Joseph E. Johnston said: "His loss is a great one to Georgia. For his capacity, patriotism and virtue made him more truly useful since the war than any other Georgian."

LEVI D. JOLLEY, farmer, Ford, Bartow county, Ga., son of Joseph and Zilla (Dickerson) Jolley, was born in Anderson district, S. C., July 5, 1827. His great grandfather, Marcus Jolley, was a native of Ireland, where he grew to manhood and married. He came to America, with his family, before the revolutionary war, settled in Virginia and was in the patriot army during that conflict. He was a planter, and reared four children—one son and three daughters. The daughters married and lived and died in Virginia. Henry L., the son, and the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was born in Ireland, came with his parents to this country, and was reared in Virginia. When he grew to manhood he migrated to South Carolina and settled in Anderson district, and lived and died there. During one period of his life he officiated as a magistrate. He reared five children: Joseph, Henry, who lived and died in South Carolina; Millie, who married Jesse Hardin; Sarah, who also lived and died in South Carolina, and Elizabeth, who married a Mr. Crenshaw, of Troup county, Ga. Mr. Jolley's father Joseph, was born in South Carolina, in 1785, where he was raised on his father's farm, and married Miss Zilla, daughter of Robert Dickerson, who came from England to Virginia. In 1837 he moved to Georgia and settled in Cass (now Bartow) county, purchasing 160 acres of land, the same on which Peter Hammonds now lives. This property he improved, reared his family (in part) on it, and lived and died there. He was a strong and ardent democrat and a devout and liberal member of the Baptist church. He was an original member and one of the organizers of the Raccoon creek Baptist church of which he was a deacon from the time of its organization until he died. He reared ten children: Annie, deceased, wife of Elias Felton; Elizabeth, deceased, with of Joseph Kennedy, Bartow county; William, deceased; Henry, died from exposure while in the army, in Virginia; Rachel, married Archie McDaniel, he dying, she married Elbert Shaw, of Troup county, Ga.; Levi, the subject of this sketch; James, Bartow county; Sarah, widow of Thomas Booker; Maria, deceased, wife of Elbert Shaw; Mary, the youngest, widow of Edmund Harling. The father died in November, 1861, and his wife in 1873. Mr. Jolley, the subject of this sketch, was reared a farmer, was educated in the common schools of the county, begun life for himself with no capital except "vim" and untiring energy. In 1870 he settled on the farm where he now lives, which contains 300 acres; and in addition to cultivating his farm, he has for twenty-four years operated a cotton gin, and later has added a corn and saw mill. Mr. Jolley was married in 1851 to Miss Hannah, daughter of Thomas Carpenter, a South Carolinian, who settled upon the land now owned by Dr. Beazley. Nine children blessed this union, of whom eight reached maturity: Robert F., Bartow county; Joseph T., Bartow county; Elizabeth K., widow of Dr. I. N. Van Meter; James C., William A., Bartow county; Lee W., Taylorsville, Ga.; John H., teacher, and Hilliard J. Mr. Jolley is a democrat and an exemplary and influential member of the Methodist church. He was one of the original members of Oak Grove church, contributed $400 toward the building of the "meeting house," and has been one of the stewards since the church was organized. Mr. Jolley had the misfortune to lose his wife by death, Dec. 18, 1887, and is now living a life of usefulness, calmly awaiting the summons to an unending reunion. He prides himself on inheriting from his ancestry a God-fearing spirit. None of them avoided the payment of a just debt, and that the name is the synonym of strict honesty.

ROBERT H. JONES, carriage manufacturer, Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Samuel and Ann E. (Edwards) Jones, was born in Elbert county, Ga., Sept. 21, 1828. His parents were natives of North Carolina, but the family moved soon after his birth to Alabama, where he was reared. There, until after his marriage, he was engaged with his father in a tannery and a general merchandise store. In 1851 he embarked in the carriage business at Oak Bower, Hart Co., Ga., where he remained until 1853, when he moved and located at Cartersville and established an extensive carriage manufacturing business, which he continued until 1861. That year, in response to the call for volunteers, he raised the "Fire-side Defenders," which afterward became a company of the Twenty-second Georgia regiment, of which he was elected colonel, and with which he remained until 1863. His command was engaged in the battle of Seven Pines, where he received a painful musket-shot wound in the hip, but did not leave the field. He was in the seven days' fight around Richmond, and in the battle of Malvern Hill, where he was shattered and badly burned by the bursting of a shell in his face. As soon as he recovered he resumed the command of his regiment. At Sharpsburg, while leading his brigade, he was evidently made a target of by the Federal sharpshooters, having been shot through the hat, the ball grazing the top of his head; then, immediately afterward, he was hit in the stomach, the ball penetrating through his belt; and in a few seconds he was shot through the right lung, the ball going completely through him. From this wound he never recovered, and was compelled to resign in 1863. After remaining several days without having his wounds dressed, he was carried by the men of his regiment to Winchester, where he received the needed medical treatment, and as soon as he could travel came home. In 1866 he returned to Cartersville and reorganized his carriage-building business, which he has since conducted with his usual energy and foresight, and with phenomenal success. It is now conducted under the firm name of R. H. Jones & Son. Politically he is a democrat, but has never sought or filled a public office.

Col. Jones was married in 1851 to Miss Cynthia E., daughter of W. G. Cotton, then a resident of Troup county, Ga. Six children have blessed this union: Emma C., wife of W. B. Saddle, Hart county, Ga.; Lulu B., wife of C. R. Bilbro; L. Glenn, Alabama; John W., Cartersville; Fannie B., wife of A. S. Quinlon, Atlanta, and Howard E. F., Cartersville, Ga. Col. Jones is a member of Bartow County Veterans' association, of which he is chaplain, a Knight of Honor, a member of the I. O. O. F., and a Master Mason. He is a member of long standing of the Methodist church, has been a lay delegate to its conferences, and since 1859 has been a local preacher. No citizen in the county stands higher than he in any respect.

JOHN J. JOHNSON, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of William C. and Cassandra (Lindsey) Johnson, was born in South Carolina Oct. 14, 1826. His paternal grandfather was Randolph Johnson, who was a native of England, and emigrated to the United States and settled in Virginia, whence he migrated to South Carolina and settled in Laurens district. He afterward moved to Duck river, Maury Co., Tenn., where he died. Mr. Johnson's father was reared in South Carolina, and in 1845 migrated to Georgia and settled at Poplar Springs, near Adairsville, in Cass (now Bartow) county, where he lived until 1863, when he retired and made his home with the subject of this sketch until he died in 1866. Thirteen children were born to him, of whom six grew to maturity: Hosea, Gordon county; Perry, Bartow county; Wiley, Arkansas; Arena Murphy; Melinda Bray and John J., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Johnson was reared in South Carolina, where he lived until he was nineteen years of age, when he came with his father to Georgia, and they jointly bought the Poplar Springs property. In 1854 he bought and settled on the land he now lives on—a tract of 362 acres. This he cleared and has improved, and it has been his home since. In 1862 he enlisted in Company I, First Regiment, Georgia State troops, and was with them in every engagement they participated in until the close of the war. Since then he has given his attention exclusively to his farming interests, satisfied with being regarded as one of the best farmers and among the most substantial of the county's citizens. Mr. Johnson married Miss Mary E., daughter of William T. Barton, Bartow county, by whom he has had twelve children: Martha J., wife of V. Alexander; Henry Wiley, Atlanta; Luella; Estella, wife of John Hunt; Inez; Birdie; Lowell; Robert E., deceased; Homer, deceased, and three who died in infancy.

C. M. JONES, planter, manufacturer and mineral developer, Emerson, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Wyhe and Nancy (Lively) Jones, was born in what is now De Kalb county, Ga., July 29, 1829. His grandfather, William Jones, was a native of Wales, England, who, when he emigrated to America, settled in Maryland, where he died. Mr. Jones' father left Maryland when a young man, came to Georgia and settled in Morgan county, where he married. Later he moved to what is now De Kalb county, where he engaged in farming and stock-raising, and died in 1830. His children were: Frances, wife of Jacob House, Cobb county, Ga.; William L., died in 1854 in Alabama; C. M., the subject of this sketch.

Mr. Jones was reared on the plantation, receiving a common country-school education; his father having died when he was quite young, he was deprived of some advantages in this respect he might otherwise have enjoyed. Attaining to man's estate he engaged in farming as a life occupation. In 1861 he enlisted in company F, Thirty-sixth Georgia regiment, of which he was commissioned first lieutenant. He served with this command until the battle of Perryville, Ky., where he was seriously injured, forcing a temporary retirement from the service. Six months afterward Mr. Jones raised the Second regiment, Georgia reserves, of which he was commissioned colonel, and at the time of the surrender was in command of the brigade. While in the service he participated in the following engagements: Fazewell, Cumberland Gap, Tenn., Richmond, Lexington, Covington, Ky., Georgetown, Frankfort, Versailles, Perryville, Ky., near Charleston, S. C. At the close of the war he resumed his farming operations on the old homestead, where he remained until 1873. Perceiving the necessity of having land on which improved farming implements and machinery would be used to meet the changed conditions on the plantations resulting from the war, he prospected extensively through the south and west, and finally purchased 800 acres of his present property from Dr. H. J. Bates, paying $21,500 for it. By subsequent purchases he has increased his holding to 2,800 acres, 1,000 acres of which are bottom lands extending along the Pumpkinvine creek three miles, than which there is no finer farming land in the state. The property is rich also in deposits of brown hematite, gray and other kinds of iron ore, manganese, black lead, lime, yellow ocher, flexible sandstone, red oxide iron, umber and gold—all of which have been mined and shipped. For many years he has had a woolen and grist mill, doing a large and profitable business, and putting in a saw-mill, engaged also in the manufacture of lumber. In 1874 he commenced mining and shipping ore, and, later, organized the Brown-Jones mining company, with which he is connected, which is opening and developing valuable iron deposits. He laid, at Emerson, the first malleable iron plant in the state, which is known as the Emerson Malleable Iron company, of which he is president. A limestone quarry on the property, which had been partially worked before his purchase of it, he opened more extensively and has since operated. A deposit of black lead is the most extensive, and is regarded by Col. Jones as the most valuable on his property, to develop which he organized the Georgia Graphite company, and erected a large mill for preparing the product for market. This plant is now operated by J. F. Allerson & Co., under lease and royalty. The kaolin clay deposits are operated by Anderson & Armstrong, of Marietta, Ga. At Emerson are the extensive ocher mills of J. C. Orme, established through Col. Jones' efforts, and in which he is interested. The town of Emerson was founded by, and is really a creation of Col. Jones—was named in compliment of ex-Gov. Joseph Emerson Brown, and is situated on the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, forty-three miles from Atlanta. From this place Col. Jones has built a broad-gauge railway to the various mines, quarries and mills scattered over his valuable property. He is a far-seeing and true and wise developer, and is demonstrating on a limited scale, yet in none the less convincing manner, the vast possibilities of the development of Georgia's varied and exhaustless natural resources; and if one man, unaided, can accomplish what he has, what might be reasonably expected of organized companies, with millions of capital!

In his farming operations Col. Jones, as elsewhere, leads the van. He uses the latest improved labor-saving implements and machinery, and the most advanced methods. As an evidence of it it may be stated that he owned and operated the first self-binder brought to Georgia. While not neglecting any of the staple southern products adapted to his locality—cotton, corn, oats, wheat, etc., he, to a limited extent, pays some attention to fruits, having now about nine acres of the very choicest fruit in great variety. Were he a younger man these acres might be expected to multiply to hundreds at no remote date. In early manhood he was sheriff of De Kalb county four years, and in 1882 was elected to represent Bartow county in the general assembly. Subsequently he identified himself with the populist party, and in 1892 was a delegate to the national convention, held in Omaha, Neb. In the recent state election he was the candidate of the party for state treasurer.

Col. Jones was married in 1850 to Miss Sarah, daughter of Thomas Carroll, of Gwinnett county, Ga., a union which has been blessed with ten children: Louise J., wife of R. C. Tillie, Atlanta; Mary E., wife of J. E. Morris, Bartow county; William L., farmer, Floyd county; Charles W., farmer, Bartow county; Thomas H., farmer, Cherokee county, Ga.; John P., broker, Augusta, Ga.; Sarah F., wife of J. E. McElroy, Norcross, Ga.; Milton H. V., attorney, Atlanta, Ga.; James M. Jones, farmer; Robert E. Lee, Bartow county, deceased, and Lena. Entertaining a profound sense of the necessity and value of education, he liberally educated his children, and lends his great influence to all educational movements. Col. Jones is a member of the Bartow County Veterans' association, and has been a Master Mason forty-three years. He is an exemplary and influential member of the Methodist church, has been honored as a delegate to its general conference, and takes great interest in its affairs. He ranks with the foremost in all the walks of life, and his energy, enterprise and public spirit are worthy of emulation.

REV. SAMUEL P. JONES, Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Capt. John J. and Mrs. Queeny (Porter) Jones, was born in Chambers county, Ala., Oct. 16, 1847. His paternal grandfather, Rev. Samuel G. Jones, was a Methodist preacher, who married a daughter of Rev. Robert L. Edwards, one of the pioneer Methodist preachers of Georgia. Four of the brothers of Mr. Jones' father are ministers of the Gospel; and for several generations the family on both sides have been prominent church members and preachers of the Word.

When only nine years old Mr. Jones had the misfortune to lose his mother. Four years afterward his father married Miss Jennie Skinner, of Cartersville, to which place he moved his family in 1859. In 1861, his father entered the Confederate army, and by reason of his absence and the disordered state of society, he drifted into the company of the immoral and dissipated. Surrounded by and associating with this class, he found himself at the age of twenty-one, physically and morally wrecked and ruined. Until his mother died he had been a scholar under Prof. W. F. Slaton, now the superintendent of the public schools of Atlanta. Here the groundwork of an education had been faithfully laid. During his father's absence he had neglected his studies; but soon after his return he entered the school of Hon. W. H. Felton, and, later, attended the high school at Euharlee, of which Prof. Ronald Johnson was principal. Here his health broke down and prevented his taking the collegiate course his father intended for him. It was at this period he mistakenly sought relief in drinking; he also at this time commenced reading law, and, after due preparation was admitted to the bar. He, however, continued his life of dissipation until August, 1872, when, on his death-bed, his father extorted from him a solemn promise to reform and meet him in heaven. He kept his promise, and soon after his conversion, commenced to preach the Gospel. The first sermon he preached was the week after his conversion, at the old New Hope church two miles from Cartersville. He went there with his grandfather Jones, who was the pastor on the Bartow circuit; and the Rev. Sandford, who was to have preached, failing to keep his appointment, his grandfather prevailed upon him to preach in his place. He now began to preach, and under the direction of Rev. George R. Kramer, began to prepare himself for the ministry. Three months afterward he applied for admission and was accepted and received into the North Georgia annual conference, and entered upon the arduous self-sacrificing work of the itinerant Methodist preacher. His first appointment was on the Van Wert circuit, where he preached acceptably three years. His next appointment was on the DeSoto circuit, Floyd county, Ga., with seven churches, where he was unusually successful. From here he was sent to Newborn circuit, Newton county, Ga., where he remained two years, and where he was blessed with greater success than ever before. His next appointment was on the Monticello circuit, Jasper county, Ga., where he also served two years. During these and the three preceding years he had been instrumental, under God, in converting 2,000 people and adding them to the membership of his churches, besides doing a great deal of revival work in other circuits. In the first eight years of his ministry he was instrumental in converting not less than 5,000 people, and preached not less than 400 sermons a year. His first revival work that gave him any notoriety was in 1879-80. In January, 1881, he was appointed agent for the orphans' home of the North Georgia conference, at Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., and doing revival work in Atlanta, Griffin, Macon, Columbus and Savannah. This work engaged him during 1881-82. His first revival work in Atlanta was at the First Methodist church, when Gen. Evans was pastor; this was followed by work at St. Luke's, Columbus; St. John's, Augusta; Trinity and Monumental, Savannah; Mulberry Street, Macon, and at all the leading Methodist churches in Georgia. The first revival services which gave him newspaper notoriety were in Memphis, Tenn., in January, 1883. Since that time he has worked in more than twenty states, including the cities of Brooklyn, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago, Baltimore, Washington, D. C.; Indianapolis; St. Joseph, Mo.; Waco, Tex.; Mobile, Ala.; Nashville and Knoxville, Tenn., and in Toronto and other cities in Canada. In no place where he has preached have the buildings or tents been large enough to hold the people. He has preached to congregations numbering 10,000 people, and at Plattsburg, Mo., he had an audience of 20,000 people. At his revival in Chicago, the "Inter-Ocean" and "Tribune;" the "Commercial-Gazette," and "Inquirer," Cincinnati, and the "Globe-Democrat," St. Louis—having an aggregate circulation of 300,000—printed his daily sermons. Through the columns of those widely-circulated journals he enjoyed the great privilege of preaching to a million and a half persons every day. His first preaching, he says, was called "earnest exhortation"—which, he claims, cannot be feigned—and he contends that that which did so much for him, will do as much for others. He has always had an inborn hatred for shams, and especially for religious shams; says that he would prefer to be an Ingersoll, and a disbeliever in the Book, than to be a Methodist, professedly believing everything, and yet being just like Ingersoll. In the fourth year of his ministry he began to preach to his people just as he thought, convinced that the preacher who fits the most consciences will get the most hearers—just as the shoemaker who makes the best fit will get the most customers. In preaching at the consciences he says there are three essential requisites—clearness, concentration and directness—and that when the conscience is aroused the alternative is left, of a better life or complete abandonment. When he first began to preach he was brought face to face with the fact, that to succeed as a preacher one must either be a great thinker or a great worker—and after prayerful consideration he chose the latter. During the first eight years of his ministry he preached not less than 400 sermons a year, week after week, preaching oftentimes four sermons a day. He has never attempted to prove that there was a God—that Christ was divine—or that there was a heaven or hell. He made these things not an objective point—but a starting point; his idea being that Christ meant what he said in the command—Preach the Gospel, not defend it; preach the Word, not try to prove that the Word is true. He is a believer in progressive theology, in aggressive effort, in agitation, in conflict, in conquest, and in the crowns which must follow this line of work. To the newspapers he concedes he owes much of his success, they having been very kind to him in their reportorial columns. The main object of all his preaching has been to make men fully realize that sin is hideous, and righteousness attractive; to drive men from the former, and to attract them to the heights and beauties of the latter.

Mr. Jones was married in November, 1869, to Miss Laura, daughter of John H. McElrain, Henry county, Ky., and of the seven children which have blessed this union six survive: Mary M., Annie C., S. Paul, Robert W., Laura Henry, and Julia Baxter.

CHARLES LOWRY, a native of the north of Ireland, and his wife emigrated to America and settled on James river, in Virginia, before the revolutionary war, in which he served as a soldier. From his son Charles have descended the Lowrys of Bartow county, Ga.

Charles Lowry, second, was born in Virginia, and served as a soldier in the patriot army during the latter part of the revolutionary war. He married a Miss Reese of that state and afterward migrated to South Carolina, where he remained until about 1812, when he moved to Georgia and bought and settled on a tract of land in Franklin county. In 1825 he moved from Franklin to Gwinnett county, Ga., where he lived until 1833, when he came to Cass (now Bartow) county, and purchased and settled on land near Cassville. He died in 1847 or 1848 at the home of his son David. Of fifteen children born to this worthy couple five died young and ten were raised to maturity: David, married first a Miss Bennett, of Gwinnett county; she dying, he married Mrs. Sheppard (nee Stegall); he was a soldier in the war of 1812 and died about 1879 in Smith county, Tex.; James, also a soldier in the war of 1812, married and died in De Kalb county, Ga.; Solomon Reese, whose sketch hereinafter appears; John, a soldier in the war of 1812, married and died in Mississippi; Thomas, served in the Indian war, married and died in Rome, Ga.; Samuel, married and died in Mississippi; Elizabeth, married Joshua Gibson, a soldier in the war of 1812—both died in Texas; Sarah, deceased wife of Jacob Reed; Mary, deceased wife of Shadrach Lowry, Calhoun county, Ala.; Martha, deceased wife of Theophilus Little, Arkansas.

Solomon Reese Lowry, third son of Charles Lowry, second, was born in Spartanburg, S. C., Nov. 17, 1800. He received a good common school education, and when a young man taught school in Gwinnett county. Later he settled in Forsyth county and engaged in farming until 1838, when he moved to Cass (now Bartow) county, and settled near Cassville, where he lived until 1861, when he purchased four 167-acre lots five miles north of Cartersville, where his son Joseph now lives. He lived here until his death, in June, 1889. Mr. Lowry married Miss Priscilla, daughter of Isaac Gilbert, of Gwinnett county, who died in 1892. In early life Mr. Lowry was a whig, but during the latter part of his life he was an ardent democrat. He was a strong and consistent member of the Methodist church. Their children were: Russell J., Gwinnett county; Joseph G., Bartow county, and a daughter who married M. H. Leak and died in Texas in 1865.

Joseph G. Lowry, second son of Solomon Reese Lowry, was born in Forsyth county, Dec. 7, 1836, but was raised in Cass (now Bartow) county, and educated at the Cherokee Baptist college in Cassville. In 1859-60 he engaged in merchandising in Cassville, and in March, 1862, he enlisted in Company I, Fortieth Georgia regiment. After five months' service he was transferred to the purchasing department, under Maj. Cummings, and subsequently to the post quartermaster's department, under Capt. George S. Seaton, where he remained until the close of the war. After the war he returned to the old homestead and commenced farming, which he has followed ever since. He has a choice tract of 305 acres of land, and ranks as one of Bartow county's most progressive and successful farmers. At one time he was actively engaged in developing and mining iron ore. In politics he is an active and prominent member of the populist (or third) party. He is a leading and influential member of the Methodist church.

WILLIAM H. LUCAS, deceased, son of John Lucas, was born in Sparta, Hancock Co., Ga., Jan. 8, 1814. His family was a branch of the prominent Lucas family of Richmond county. His early education was obtained in the private school of Rev. Dr. Beman, Mount Zion, Hancock Co., one of the most eminent educators in Georgia at that time. Subsequently he was graduated from the University of Virginia. He was associated for many years with Col. Bates in publishing the "Alabama Journal," at Montgomery, Ala., when a young man, and was very active and prominent in politics and public life. About this time and for many years he was a whig, but before he died he became a democrat. In 1859 he came to Cass (now Bartow) county and bought a 500-acre plantation—on which his widow now lives—where he spent his declining years as a planter, and died. Toward the close of the war he was a member of the "Silver Grays," a military body organized in Augusta, Ga., for home duty. He was a man of extensive reading and information, and of considerable force of character, prominent and popular in political and social circles. Mr. Lucas was twice married, first to Miss Champ Bradfute, granddaughter of the distinguished Col. William Bird, of Virginia. By this marriage he had two children: Alfred, Columbus, Ga., and Carrie L., wife of Laurent B. Hallaquint, Montgomery, Ala. Mr. Lucas' second marriage was to Frances L. Martin, daughter of the prominent banker of Augusta. Mr. Lucas was a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity. In early life he was a member of the Methodist church, but before he died he united himself with the Protestant Episcopal church.

WILLIAM H. LUCAS.

HENRY J. McCORMICK, civil engineer and farmer, Stilesboro, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Isaiah and Matilda (Sproulls) McCormick, was born in Abbeville district, S. C., Feb. 10, 1838. His paternal grandfather, Hugh McCormick, was of that sturdy stock known as Scotch-Irish, and was a native of County Clare, Ireland. He belonged to that numerous body of Presbyterians who, in the last century, seceded from the national church establishment of Scotland. About 1784, in consequence of religious troubles in Ireland, he emigrated to this country and settled on Long Cane creek, Laurens district, S. C. Like many of his countrymen he was a weaver by trade, and followed it—operating the old hand-loom—in connection with his large farming interests, when established in his new southern home, until his death. After arriving in this country he married Miss Martha Johnson, also a native of County Clare, Ireland, whose parents emigrated to America before the revolutionary war and settled in South Carolina. There were born to them three sons: Hugh, who died in South Carolina; Daniel, who died in Richmond county, Ga., in 1875; Isaiah, and one daughter, Jane, who married James Wylie, and died in Tennessee. Isaiah, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Laurens district, S. C., in 1810. He was raised on the farm, and his educational advantages were quite limited. In 1853 he came to Georgia and settled in Cass (now Bartow) county on a plantation he bought, situated on Euharlee creek, near Stilesboro. In early life he was an “old-line whig,” but afterward became a strong democrat. He was raised a member of the seceding organization mentioned above, but subsequently united with the Presbyterian church, of which he was a devout and devoted member. His wife was a daughter of Charles Sproulls, a South Carolina family of English origin. Nine children were born to him and grew to maturity: Henry J., the subject of this sketch; Frances, wife of S. T. McGinnis; Martha, wife of B. B. McGinnis; Elizabeth, wife of Samuel Turner; Susan, wife of T. S. Hawkins; Anna H., Charles S., John, and Thomas, all of Bartow county. He died in 1873 and his wife in 1890. Capt. McCormick was raised a farmer in Abbeville district, S. C., until he was sixteen years old, when he came with his parents to what is now Bartow county, and finished his education at Stilesboro institute. March 12, 1861, he enlisted in Company E, First Georgia battalion, for twelve months. On the expiration of his term of enlistment he was commissioned second-lieutenant of a company in Phillips’ Legion, was soon promoted to first lieutenantcy, and then to the captaincy. On May 18, 1862, by the accidental discharge of a musket in the hands of one of his men, he was shot and lost his left leg. On his recovery he was detailed for post duty, and stationed at Cartersville, Ga., and afterward at Augusta, where he remained until the war closed. Returning from the war, he resumed farming, and in addition followed his profession of civil engineering and taught school. In 1873 he was elected surveyor of the county and held the office until 1881. He was again elected in 1886, and held the office until 1892. In 1894 he was the democratic candidate to represent Bartow county in the general assembly. He is president of the Bartow County Veterans’ association, secretary of Phillips’ Legion Survivors and president of Stilesboro Farmers’ club, one of the leading organizations of the county. Capt. McCormick was married March 12, 1863, to Miss Josephine, daughter of L. Hawkins, deceased, of Bartow county, by whom he has had six children: Clara M., deceased wife of Irwin W. Williams; Robert R., Atlanta; Charles S., Atlanta; Mary G.; John H., and Jessie J. Capt. McCormick is an active and influential member of the Baptist church, of which he has for many years been a deacon. He ranks among the foremost of Bartow county’s progressive farmers and is a very popular citizen.

JOHN N. PEACE, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Major and Biddy (Gilleland) Peace, was born in Hancock county, Ga., June 25, 1818. His great grandparents were natives of England, emigrated to America some years before the revolutionary war, and settled in Virginia. During the voyage Mr. Peace's grandfather, John Peace, was born, grew to manhood in Virginia, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. After the war he taught school many years, and married Miss Elizabeth Wade, a native of Wales, England. In the latter part of the last century he came to Georgia, and took up his revolutionary soldier's claim of 250 acres of land in Hancock county, where he lived until he died. To him the following children were born: Major; John, died in Columbus, Ga.; Daniel, lost his life in a steamboat accident while on his way from Illinois to Georgia; Elizabeth—Mrs. Johnson; Nancy, married Lemuel Lovett; Jane, married Peter Bray; Martha, married Robert McCook; Temperance, married William Brewster. Major Peace, eldest son of the above, and father of the subject of this sketch, was born in North Carolina in 1791, but was raised on the farm in Hancock county, and died on it in 1854. He was a prominent democrat, and for many years was sheriff of Hancock county. He was a consistent and exemplary member of the Methodist church for a generation or more. He was twice married. His first wife was Miss Biddy Gilleland, who died in 1820, having borne him four children: Elizabeth, deceased; William, deceased; John N., the subject of this sketch; Susan, married Allen Dozier, who died, when she married Moses Pitman, who also died, and she is now living in Adairsville. His second wife was Miss Sarah Vincent, by whom he had six children: West, deceased; Daniel, deceased; Nathaniel, in Texas; Lovejoy, near Albany, Ga.; Annie, deceased; Sarah J., married Henry Dickens, both deceased. John N. Peace was raised on the old homestead in Hancock county, where he received a common-school education. On reaching manhood he followed overseeing for twenty-seven years in Georgia and Alabama. While a resident of Hancock county he held the office of justice of the peace for many years. During the late "unpleasantness" he was detailed by the officials of Barbour county, Ala., to run a farm to raise stock and grain for the Confederate army. In 1866 he purchased his present place, which then consisted of eighty acres. To this he has added until he has a splendid tract containing 421 acres, excellently well improved. Mr. Peace has been married twice, the first time to Miss Ann May Minton, of Hancock county, who died in Alabama in 1865, having borne him five children: William, who was a member of the First Alabama battalion sharpshooters, and died while a prisoner at Rock Island, Ill.; Elizabeth H., wife of George W. Byrd; Nancy, wife of M. V. Shaw, Texas; Susan, wife of Laughlin McLain, Arkansas; Martha E., at home. His second marriage was to Mrs. Adaline (nee Fry) Barnes, of Alabama, by whom he had five children: John; Robert L., deceased; George A., Floyd county, Ga.; Joseph B.; Louisa, wife of Henry Scott. Mr. Peace is a stanch democrat, has been a Methodist for fifty years, being now an exemplary member of Mt. Carmel church.

JAMES G. RYALS, D. D., deceased, formerly of Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Joseph and Lucy Ann (Connor) Ryals, was born in Montgomery county, Ga., April 24, 1824. His grandfather, William Ryals, was born in North Carolina in June, 1768, was raised a planter, came to Georgia the latter part of the last century and settled in Montgomery county, and died there, Nov. 20, 1827. He raised the following family: Winnie, who married Burrill Calhoun; Penelope, who married J. G. Connor; Joseph, Matilda, who married a Mr. Partin; William, who married Eliza Connor, and John B., who married Maria Connor.

Dr. Ryals' father was born Nov. 20, 1796, and died in Montgomery county, Sept. 8, 1859. He was a large planter, quite prominent in county politics, and represented the county in the general assembly. He was happily married to Miss Lucy Ann Connor—a union blessed with seven children: Harriet G., who married Carson Culbreath; James G., the subject of this sketch; Elizabeth, who married John A. Morris; Annie E., who married Hiram Swain, who died, and she afterward married John Pierson; Mary C., who married Dr. John Raubs; Josephine, who married George T. McLeod; Lucy, who married Maj. W. H. Mann, who was killed in the battle of Atlanta, July 22, 1864. She afterward married Joseph T. Lawson.

Dr. Ryals received his preparatory education in the best schools of the county, and then entered Mercer university, from which he was graduated in 1852. He read law under Judge Francis H. Cone, Greensborough, Ga., and was admitted to the bar the year he graduated. After teaching school a year in Columbus, Ga., he came to Cass (now Bartow) county in 1854, purchased the plantation on which his son-in-law, J. J. Connor, now lives, and commenced the practice of his profession in Cartersville, which he assiduously pursued with eminent success for seven years. About this date he was converted and joined the Baptist church. He was ordained the same year as a minister, and was at once called to the pastorate of the Baptist church at Cartersville. After officiating at this church a year he accepted calls from the Acworth and Raccoon creek churches, serving them about fifteen years, when he was elected professor of theology at Mercer university, Macon, Ga. He usefully held this important professorship until his death—profoundly lamented—which occurred in 1892. Politically he was a democrat, and before his connection with the church took an active interest in political affairs.

Dr. Ryals was married Jan. 13, 1852, to Miss Mary E., daughter of A. James, of Greene county, Ga., and this marriage was blessed with five children: Lucy C., who graduated with high honors from Wesleyan Female college, Macon, Ga., and afterward married James J. Connor, attorney, Cartersville, Ga.; James G., Jr., deceased, who graduated with first honor from Mercer university in 1877, and later from the university of Virginia, taking first honors in thirteen schools, and the degree of A. M. in post-graduate course. He was elected president of the state normal school of Alabama, which position he held at the time of his death; Walter M., deceased, who graduated from Mercer university in 1880, and died in 1886; Thomas E., who graduated from Mercer university in 1884, also from university of Virginia, now a practicing lawyer in Macon, Ga., and Robert L., who graduated from Mercer university in 1886, was afterward professor of mathematics four years, and is now a rising member of the Macon, Ga., bar.

WILLIAM W. TRIMBLE, farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Augustus C. and Louisa (Brogdon) Trimble, was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, May 8, 1843. His grandfather, William Trimble, a well-to-do farmer of Scotch-Irish extraction, settled early in life in what is now Newton county, where he died in 1821. He married Miss Margaret Wellborn, by whom he had three children, of whom one, Augustus C., was the father of the subject of this sketch, who was born in what is now Newton county, in 1818. He was reared on the farm, a farmer, which was his life occupation. While yet a boy he went to Gwinnett county, Ga., whence, about 1833, he came to Cass (now Bartow) county and settled between two and three miles from Adairsville—one of the sturdy pioneers who settled among the Indians. He inherited from his mother 300 acres of land, and to this he added 800, which made him one of the largest land owners in the county. Of this he opened and cultivated 600 acres. He served as clerk of the superior and inferior courts in 1848-49, and was prominent in the public affairs of the county. He was a member of the state troops or home guard in 1864-65. He married Leuisa, a daughter of Wiley Brogdon, a Cass county pioneer, who bore him three children: William W., the subject of this sketch; Josephine, wife of John Camp, Rome, Ga.; and Virginia, wife of W. L. Le Conte, Bartow county. The mother of these died in 1849, and for his second wife he married Miss Adeline Fain, by whom he had two children: Hattie, deceased wife of Eli Smith; and Helen, present wife of Eli Smith. She dying, Mr. Trimble married Miss Mary Thompson, who survives him—he having died May 15, 1894. He was a strong, active and influential member of the democratic party, and a Master Mason; he was also an ardent and working Methodist, and one of the founders of the church at Adairsville, of which he was a steward for fifty years. Mr. Trimble, the subject of this sketch, was raised a farmer on the homestead, where he now lives, and was educated in the common schools of the county. In 1861, he joined the First Georgia regiment, in which he served six months, and then enlisted in Company I, First Georgia cavalry, with which he served to the close of the war. He was in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaigns, at the defense of Atlanta, and with the force that foiled the Stoneman raid. After the war he settled down to business on his farm, the successful cultivation of 450 acres of which fully occupied his time and attention. Mr. Trimble married a daughter of Col. J. W. Gray, Adairsville, a union which was blessed with eight children: Clara, Minnie, Ella, Lulu, William, Gussie, Layton and Richard. Mr. Trimble is an active democrat, and a member and steward of the Methodist church.

J. M. VEACH, miller and farmer, Adairsville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Thomas and Lydia (Snyder) Veach, was born in Frederick county, valley of Virginia, Aug. 14, 1823. His grandfather, Thomas Veach, settled originally in Delaware.

Mr. Veach was reared and educated in Virginia; but when nineteen years of age went to Adams county, Ill., where he engaged in the mercantile business until 1847, when he came to Marietta, Ga., where he was employed the same way. In 1848, he came to Adairsville, Cass (now Bartow) county, where he continued his mercantile business, and also engaged in purchasing grain. During the war he was a purchasing agent for army supplies for the Confederate government. In 1868, he erected a mill and engaged in the milling business, in which he was phenomenally successful—so much so, that in 1881 he erected his present mill, which is operated by the roller process, and has a capacity of 250 barrels of flour per day, the actual daily output being 200 barrels, for which he has a steady market. For many years Mr. Veach has also been engaged in farming, in addition to his other important business enterprises, at one time operating a farm of 500 acres, but now reduced to 275 acres. He was a promoter of, and an original stockholder in the Merchants' bank, Atlanta, also of the Underwriters, now Home insurance company, of Atlanta, and was one of the original stockholders of the Piedmont Park association. Besides, he is connected with a number of important private and public enterprises in Chattanooga, Tenn. In 1892, he was elected to represent Bartow county in the general assembly—and such are his general ability and sound judgment, he could long before have been honored with public office, if he would have accepted it. Far-seeing, enterprising, public-spirited, he occupies a front position among the farmers and business men of the county, and ranks as its richest individual citizen.

Mr. Veach married Miss Julia, daughter of Benjamin Echols, of Chattanooga, and to the union three children have been born: George, farmer and miller, Adairsville; Anna, wife of N. H. Grady, Chattanooga; and Henry M., cashier and bookkeeper of the mills, Adairsville. Mr. Veach is an uncompromising democrat, and a prominent master Mason, having been worshipful master of his lodge for fifteen years. No citizen of Cherokee, Ga., is more widely or favorably known than Mr. Veach, none more financially solid or more highly esteemed.

AULSEY A. VINCENT, farmer, Pine Log, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Pleasant and Susan (Edwards) Vincent, was born in Madison county, Ga., in 1811. His grandfather, Isaac Vincent, was born in North Carolina, and, about the beginning of this century, moved with his family to Georgia, and settled in Elbert county, where he died. Being left a widow Mr. Vincent's mother moved in 1835 to Cass (now Bartow) county, and bought and settled on 100 acres of land on Two Run creek, right amongst the Indians. Her family consisted of eight children: Elizabeth, who married S. H. Bowland, and died in Louisiana; Aulsey A., the subject of this sketch; Mary, who married C. Bostick; Richard (deceased), who married Miss Ballew; Isaac (deceased), who also married Miss Ballew; John M. (deceased), who married Miss Edwards, of Alabama; James D., who married Miss Jenkins, and died on his way to California; and Margaret, now Mrs. Hicks, who resides on the old "home place." Mr. Vincent's mother died in 1877, aged eighty-four years.

Mr. Vincent came to Cass county with his mother and peddled goods in the surrounding country until 1836, when he engaged in merchandising two years in what is now Pickens county, selling principally to the Indians. In 1838, he purchased 160 acres of land in Cass county on which he lived until 1846. That year he bought the land—160 acres—on which he now lives, to which he has since added by purchase until his tract contains considerably more than 500 acres. This land he cleared and improved and has tilled for nearly half a century. He has always taken an active interest in public affairs, but has held no office except one—that of county commissioner, which he held six years. Mr. Vincent has been married three times. His first marriage was to Miss Martha Upshaw, by whom he had thirteen children: Mary, wife of W. F. Weems; William E. (deceased); Georgia Ann Matilda (deceased); Lucinda H., wife of G. W. Hughes; Martha Della A., wife of Newton Campbell; James M., married Sallie Trippe, who died, and then he married Luella Styles; Chesley B., who married Ida Stephens; Malvina R., wife of William T. Bradford; Aulsey E., who married Agnes Adair; Lucius M., who married Sallie Mahan; Luawah G.; Bevnia, wife of A. J. Reynolds; Lorena G., wife of Dr. W. J. Daniel. By his second wife, Jane E. Bell, a widow, he had three children: Hart E.; Stella D., wife of John P. Adair; and a babe unnamed. His third marriage was to Margaret McEver, by whom he had one child, unnamed. Mr. Vincent was a whig before the war, but since has been a democrat. He is one of the oldest living citizens of Bartow county, and is revered by his neighbors and fellow-citizens.

JOHN H. WALKER, deceased, son of John and Elizabeth L. (Holcomb) Walker, was born in Laurens district, S. C., in 1816. His father was English-born, and went to France, whence he emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia, and afterward moved to South Carolina, where he lived until his death.

Mr. Walker was raised in South Carolina, and when a young man—about 1835—came to Georgia and settled near Kingston in Cass (now Bartow) county. Later he bought and farmed on land now a part of the Dr. W. H. Felton farm, until 1852. At that time he purchased a tract of 200 acres, to which he afterward added 100 more—on which he settled and farmed, and where his son, James P., now lives. He made important and valuable improvements on this place, where he died May 26, 1886. Early in life he was a whig, but later became an ardent democrat. For a number of years he filled the office of justice of the peace. Although not regularly enlisted he served in South Carolina during the war as a guard of military prisoners. He was a Master Mason, and an influential member of the Methodist church. Mr. Walker was married in South Carolina to Miss Catharine Cleardy, and to them ten children were born: William, deceased; Letitia, deceased wife of Thomas A. Owens; Sally, deceased wife of Z. T. Wright; Charlie, died from exposure during the war while serving as a member of Company F, First Georgia cavalry; Mary, deceased wife of Thomas Bridges; John H. Farmer, Bartow county; James P., Bartow county; Fanny, deceased; Randolph; and Lula, deceased.

JOHN H. WALKER, JR. (son of John H. Walker, Sr.), was born on Pittard's creek, four miles north of Cartersville, Ga., April 3, 1846. He was raised a farmer, educated at the common schools of the county, and was graduated from Emory college, Oxford, Ga. April 18, 1864, he enlisted in Company F, First regiment, Georgia state troops, with which he served to the close of the war. At the battle of Kennesaw mountain, May 18, 1864, he received a gunshot wound in the right shoulder, but he remained on the field. After the war he remained on and operated the old homestead place for fifteen years. He then farmed in different places until 1892, when he came to his present home, where he operates a farm of about 400 acres. In 1876 he was elected receiver of tax returns and served two years—one term—was United States census enumerator in 1880, and has several times been school enumerator in the county. In connection with his farming interests he deals in real estate. Mr. Walker was married March 3, 1881, to Miss Sue, daughter of Thomas Brandon, Bartow county, by whom he has had eight children: John H., Ethel, Kate E., Rena, Blanche, Mary, deceased; Ruth, Thomas B. He is a Master Mason and a member of the Methodist church, of which he is a Sunday school teacher.

JAMES P. WALKER, fourth son of John H. Walker, Sr., was born in Cass (now Bartow) county, April 27, 1849. He was raised on the farm, and educated at the common schools of the county. He began life as a clerk, and later bought a farm. Subsequently he purchased the family homestead, where he has since, and now lives, successfully conducting a farm on improved and progressive principles, and is a confided in and leading citizen of the county. Mr. Walker was married in 1889 to Miss Emma, daughter of the Rev. John W. Stipe, of the North Georgia conference M. E. church south. He is an exemplary member of the Methodist church, a member of the board of stewards and a class leader. He is recognized as one of Bartow county's most substantial and influential citizens.

RANDOLPH WALKER, fifth son of John H. Walker, Sr., was born on the family homestead, in Cass (now Bartow) county, April 13, 1855. After receiving the best education obtainable at the country schools when he was growing up, he went to Rome, Ga., as a clerk. In 1885 he purchased a farm of 150 acres and began farming—adopting improved implements and methods with success and profit. He was married in 1884 to Miss Mollie, daughter of Rev. John W. Stipe, of the North Georgia conference M. E. church south. Four children are the fruit of this union: Charles M., John R., James P., and Wesley C. Mr. Walker is a democrat, a leading, influential member of the Methodist church, and a thorough-going, prosperous farmer.

CHARLES B. WALLACE, planter and ex-railway manager, Cartersville, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Campbell and Susan (Lyon) Wallace, was born in Knoxville, Tenn., Sept. 20, 1836. He received a liberal education, and after graduating at the East Tennessee university entered the office of his father, who at that time was president of the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railway. He remained there until 1863, when the rolling stock of the road was transferred to Georgia, with headquarters at Augusta, and operated in carrying provisions to the Confederate army, and cotton to Wilmington, N. C. Previous to the evacuation of Knoxville, Mr. Wallace had filled the position of superintendent of the road, and he continued to fill it until the close of the war, when the headquarters were at Athens, Ga. In 1866 he was appointed by Gov. Charles J. Jenkins assistant to his father, Maj. Campbell Wallace, who was superintendent of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, in rebuilding the road. In 1867 he was appointed superintendent of the western division of the Memphis & Charleston railway, and served that year. In 1868 Col. Sam Tate was appointed receiver for the Selma & Meridian railway, when Mr. Wallace was engaged to rebuild and operate that road. When Col. Tate was removed Mr. Wallace retired with him, and was at once placed in charge of the Montgomery & Eufaula railway, and built the last forty miles of that link. But before its completion he was solicited by the owners of the Selma & Meridian railway to return and take charge of that road as general superintendent, which he did, and remained until 1872. After this he was associated with Gen. Tate in the construction of the North & South railway—Montgomery to Decatur, Ala. This accomplished he located in Atlanta and engaged in the construction of the Georgia Western (now Georgia Pacific) and other railway enterprises. In 1880 he took charge of the Southern Railway & Steamship association business, which position he resigned in 1881 to accept the superintendency of the Alabama Great Southern—300 miles long—from Chattanooga, Tenn., to Meridian, Miss., a position which he held four years, operating the road with consummate ability. He retired about 1888 from railway business, and buying 300 acres of choice land near Cartersville, turned his attention to farming, making his home in his elegant residence in the city. He is a wide-awake, progressive farmer, and keeps fully abreast with the times, socially, commercially, and politically; and he is, as might be expected, a leading citizen of the city and county.

Mr. Wallace has been twice married. He was first married in 1869 to Miss Jennie, daughter of Dr. Richard Owen, of Mobile, Ala., who died in 1876, leaving four children: Susan L., wife of Nesbit Wingfield; Robert O., Atlanta; Charles B., Atlanta, and Jennie. His second marriage was to Miss Ida T., daughter of Dr. Thomas Jones, Washington, Ga., by whom he has had two children: Margaret and Campbell, the fourth. Mr. Wallace is an active democrat, and a prominent and exemplary member of the Presbyterian church. Of extensive and varied attainments, large wealth, and advanced ideas, he exercises a wide influence for good.

GEORGE HOUSTOUN WARING, hydraulic cement manufacturer, Cement, Bartow Co., Ga., son of Dr. William R. and Annie M. (Johnstone) Waring, was born in Savannah, Ga., Dec. 22, 1833, and is a great grandson of Sir George Houston. Mr. Waring's father, William R. Waring, was a descendant of Benjamin Waring, who settled in South Carolina in 1740, and married a daughter of Landgrave Smith. After receiving the necessary preparatory education in his native state, South Carolina, Dr. Waring attended and graduated from South Carolina Medical college in Charleston, from the university of Pennsylvania, afterward from the Dublin university, Dublin, Ireland, and lastly from the celebrated medical college in Paris, France. Later he was appointed a surgeon in the United States army, and while stationed in Savannah, Ga., married, resigned, and settled in that city, in which he became the most prominent physician of his time. He also became a leading citizen in public affairs, and was called to the mayoralty by his fellow-citizens. He died in Savannah in 1843. Mr. Waring was given the best education afforded by the schools of Savannah and at the north, and then entered Yale college. Afterward he entered the university of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia, from which he graduated in 1855. Returning home he engaged in planting until 1861, when, in response to the call for volunteers, he enlisted in the Georgia hussars, and afterward in the Chatham artillery of Savannah, Ga., Company F, Jefferson Davis legion; and subsequently was commissioned major of a cavalry command, and served until the surrender. Mr. Waring also served on the staff of Gov. John B. Gordon and Gov. W. Northen. In 1867 he purchased the lime and cement works established by Rev. Charles Wallace Howard in 1845, on the line of the Western & Atlantic (state) railway, at what is now known as Cement, in Bartow county. He operated this plant until 1889, when the Howard Cement company was organized, of which he was made president, and its operations confined exclusively to the manufacture of cement. The plant is provided throughout with the latest improved machinery—comprising Rand drills, air compressors, and 150-horse-power engine, keeps in operation six kilns, employs fifty men, and has a capacity of 300 barrels of cement per day. So extensive is the deposit that the plant could be increased to meet any demand. Mr. Waring is a staunch democrat, but has never held, and never would hold an office. Mr. Waring was married in 1858 to Miss Ella S., daughter of Rev. Charles Wallace Howard, a union which has been blessed with five children.

BERRIEN COUNTY.

PHILEMON W. ALEXANDER, D. D. S., who was born July 26, 1842, in Elbert county, Ga., is of Scottish lineage—his ancestor, George Alexander, having come to this country from Scotland and died in 1703. The father of Philemon was a farmer, who, in 1849, thinking to better his condition, set out for the gold fields of California, only to die of cholera while on the way. The young man, having attended the common schools of Elbert county, Ga., and Greenfield, Mass., entered the dental college at Baltimore, but left in 1861 to join what was known as the Albany Guards, Company E, Fourth Georgia regiment. On account of sickness he was discharged the following November; but in 1862 was assigned to duty with Jackson's ordnance train. In 1863 he was placed in command of the sharpshooters of the Thirty-eighth Georgia regiment. He was seriously wounded, and left on the field at Gettysburg, where he was captured by the Federal troops and imprisoned on David's island. He was paroled in September and returned to his command in October. He was elected adjutant of the Thirty-eighth Georgia regiment; but, being unfit for duty on account of his wounds, was transferred to the naval department and put on duty on the gunboat "Drewry." The gunboat ran aground, having been abandoned by the troops, and a few moments later was blown to atoms by the explosion of a shell. The troops were then put on board the ironclad "Richmond." Soon after this Mr. Alexander entered the secret service department under Capt. Reed, in which service he remained until the close of the war. He was captured once, while in this service, but was rescued in a few hours. Altogether, Mr. Alexander's experience during the war included many stirring and romantic incidents. After the war he began the practice of his profession, dentistry, at Albany, Ga., where he remained ten years; then, in 1875, he removed to Allapaha, where he still resides. Dr. Alexander is a member of blue lodge, A. F. & A. M., at Albany, and of the chapter and council at Allapaha; holding the office of secretary of the chapter and thrice illustrious master of the council. He has been twice married; first in October, 1868, to Miss Cornelia E., daughter of Francis Billingsly, of Taliaferro county, Ga., who died in 1878. His second marriage, in October, 1880, was to Miss Sallie L. Baker, daughter of John Baker, of Bryan county, Ga. Dr. Alexander's children are four: Annabelle, born in 1870, married in 1891 to N. J. Cruger, of Albany, Ga.; Stephen P., born Dec. 9, 1881; Inez, born July, 1883, and Gertrude, born May, 1886.

WILLIAM CORNELIUS ASHLEY, M. D., was born Sept. 7, 1863, in Coffee county, Ga. His father, a farmer, Matt Ashley, represented his county in the general assembly, and died in 1871. After some time in the common schools, William attended the Spring Hill academy for two years. He then began reading medicine under the instruction of Dr. J. H. Latimer, at the same time clerking in Dr. Latimer's drug store. After these preparatory studies, he entered the Atlanta Medical college, from which he graduated in March, 1884. He soon afterward located in Irwinville, Irwin county, Ga., where he practiced until 1888, and then for six months in the town of Minnie, in the same county. After this he moved to Allapaha, Berrien Co., where he has already formed an extensive practice. Dr. Ashley is a member of Eureka lodge, No. 313, F. & A. M., of which he has been W. M., and is now deacon. He represented his lodge in the Grand Lodge at Macon in 1892. He is also a member of Allapaha chapter and Allapaha council, having taken nine degrees. The wife of Dr. Ashley was Miss Judie E. Paulk, whose father, Reason Paulk, is a farmer of Irwin county, and whom he married in 1888. Their daughter, Gladys, was born Sept. 26, 1890, and their son, Marshall, was born July 3, 1892.

ALLEN C. CLEMENTS, M. D., was born in Spring Hill, Ga., March 17, 1864, and is the son of a well-to-do planter, who held various offices in his county, Montgomery, being state senator from his district when he died in 1879. Young Allen attended Spring Hill academy, and in 1877 he entered the sophomore class in Emory college, Oxford, Ga.; here he spent two years, and in 1883 entered the Medical college in Atlanta, to graduate in 1885 the valedictorian of his class. He took the gold medal for general average, and several special prizes, and, although so young, scarcely of age, his rank in scholarship was as high as any ever attained by a student of this institution, which has graduated many brilliant and able men. Young Clements located at Scotland, Telfair Co., but after four years he moved to Adel, Berrien Co., where he enjoys the exclusive practice, which is very lucrative. He is also medical examiner for the New York Life and several other large insurance companies. In college Dr. Clements belonged to the Delta Tau Delta fraternity, and is both a Mason and an Odd Fellow. In these lodges he has held various offices, being now secretary of the Masonic lodge. He has always taken an active part in political affairs. While residing in Scotland, Ga., he was mayor of that place, and now holds the same office in his present place of residence, Adel. Dr. Clements has some fame as a writer, and is regarded as one of the most fluent and eloquent speakers in South Georgia. He married Oct. 7, 1891, Miss Ophelia, daughter of Dr. J. C. Ryals, of Lumber City, and has one son, Allen C., jr.

D. D. DORMINY, a successful merchant of Berrien county, Ga., was born in Irwin county, Ga., April 23, 1846. His father, John B. Dorminy, was a farmer, who represented his county in the general assembly a number of years, and who died in 1878. The son, D. D., availed himself, as far as possible, of the privileges of the common schools of his county, though denied those of the college. During the war, in 1864, he joined the Fourth Georgia cavalry. When the war was over he located on a farm in Berrien county, which he has managed with judgment and skill. He has also conducted with success a mercantile establishment in Allapaha, first as one of the firm of Roberts & Dorminy, selling out to Roberts at the end of a year; then, after two years, he entered again with M. B. Roberts, selling out once more after a year. For two years after this he was with Mr. Daniel Turner, whom, at the end of this time, he bought out, and the business has since been carried on by himself, his son and Fish Griner, under the firm name of Dorminy & Co. Mr. Dorminy married Betty, the daughter of Bryant Roberts, of Lowndes county, and they have seven sons and one daughter. His eldest son, John V., born Feb. 10, 1871, is a merchant of the firm of Dorminy & Co., and in 1890 married Blanche, daughter of Dan Turner. The other children are: Hugh, born Feb. 14, 1876; Edgar, born November, 1877; Budger H., born Feb. 5, 1879; William, born Sept. 21, 1880; Claude, June 20, 1882; Mary Ida, October, 1885; Emory Speer, Dec. 15, 1887.

REUBEN FUTCH, planter, Nashville, Berrien Co., Ga., son of Thomas Futch, a planter, was born in Bulloch county, Ga., Oct. 12, 1819. Reuben enjoyed only the limited opportunities for education that the country schools then afforded. When he was but six years of age his father removed to what is now Berrien county, where the son has made his home ever since. Mr. Futch, during a part of the war, belonged to the Fourth Georgia cavalry. Since the war he has devoted himself to the interests of his large farm in Berrien county, though for one term he served as justice of the inferior court, to which office he was elected in 1870. He is a member of Duncan lodge, No. 234, F. & A. M., in which for over thirty years he has held the responsible office of treasurer. His wife is Sarah, daughter of John McCranix, of Berrien county, and they have three sons and six daughters living, all but one of whom are married. His eldest son, John, born Dec. 11, 1845, has been tax receiver of Berrien county for one term. John Futch, a brother of the subject of this sketch, who had been a citizen of Berrien county many years, died in Nashville in 1894.

JOHN C. GOODMAN, physician, Tifton, Berrien Co., Ga., was born in Gates county, N. C., May 17, 1834; his father, Barnes Goodman, a farmer, served awhile with the state troops and died in 1862. After finishing his preparatory studies in the high schools of his native county, he entered the state university of North Carolina in 1854, graduating in 1858 with the degree of A. B. In 1857 he began the study of medicine under the direction of Dr. Jones, and the next year entered the medical department of the university of Virginia. After a year spent there he completed his medical course in the university of New York, graduating about 1860, and located at Somerton, Va. In 1861 he went into the army, joining a home company at first, but the next year was transferred to Maj. Cahoon's battalion as second sergeant. This battalion disbanded in 1862, and Sergt. Goodman went into the contract service in a hospital. In the fall, however, he was commissioned assistant surgeon and assigned to duty in Johnston's division and was with it when it surrendered in 1865. Returning to Somerton he practiced medicine there until 1882, when he removed to Jacksonville, Telfair Co., Ga., and engaged in the manufacture of turpentine. Two years later he moved to Allapaha, where he carried on the manufacture of naval stores in connection with his office practice. In Tifton, to which place he came in 1891, he has carried on an extensive trade in drugs, together with his successful medical practice. Dr. Goodman is an honored member of the Methodist church. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, belonging both to the blue lodge and the chapter, also to the Knights of Pythias. In each of these fraternities he has held various offices, and was W. M. of Allapaha lodge for three years. On Christmas day, 1860, Dr. Goodman married Miss Henrietta A., daughter of Hutchings Goodman of North Carolina. They have six children. The eldest daughter, Mary E., is the wife of E. L. Vickers, in the naval stores business in Worth county, Ga. The eldest son, Charles H., is engaged in farming at Tifton. The second, John Hawkins, is with his father in the drug business. James H., Catharine and Harriet reside at home with their father.

RUFFIN T. KENDRICK, M. D., was born in Twiggs county, Ga., Jan. 15, 1832, and is of Scottish ancestry. He attended the common schools of Houston county, and afterward, in 1857, his father, William Kendrick, having removed to Baker, now Dougherty county, of which he was one of the pioneer settlers, the son went there also and read medicine under the instruction of Dr. W. L. Davis at Albany. In 1854 young Kendrick entered the medical department of the university of New York, graduating in 1855. Locating in Dougherty county he practiced there six years, removing thence to Calhoun county, where he practiced seventeen years. In 1862 he entered the army as assistant surgeon of the Thirty-second Georgia regiment, but in 1863, a substitute taking his place, he returned home to Calhoun county, where he always gave his professional services to soldiers' families free of charge. After this he practiced for two years at Ty Ty, Worth Co., and then in 1879 he removed to Allapaha, Berrien Co., where he has since remained. Dr. Kendrick, by his skill and experience, has won a high rank in his profession. In 1869 he became a member of the State Medical association, and has been chairman of the committee on surgery from his district for a number of years. In 1874, when the association met at Atlanta, Dr. Kendrick was orator of the society and responded to speeches of welcome by Gen. Garlington and Dr. Alexander. The doctor's worth has been recognized among his neighbors in various ways. For four years (1875-79) he held the office of treasurer of Calhoun county. In the masonic fraternity he has held the highest offices in his lodge and chapter, Eureka Lodge No. 313, and W. T. Gould chapter. Moreover, for a number of years he held the office of second and third grand steward, and for eleven years that of first grand steward in the grand lodge of the state. Dr. Kendrick is a leading member of the Baptist church. Politically he is an uncompromising democrat. He has a brother, John P. Kendrick, a prominent merchant of Gainesville, Tex. Dr. Kendrick has been twice married; the first time to Miss Eliza D. Helms, daughter of Chas. Helms, formerly of North Carolina, later of Baker county, Ga. She died in August, 1882, and he afterward married Mrs. Fannie A. Fryer, widowed daughter of Col. John Turner of Berrien county. The doctor's eldest son, Winburn A., born 1856, is a planter in Claiborne county, Tex., where he has lived since 1879. The second son, Charles W., born 1858, married Miss Mamie Ferguson of Savannah; is now chief clerk in the transportation office of the Brunswick & Western R. R. Dr. Kendrick's daughter, Electa B., born in 1867, is the wife of James T. Maund of Tifton. The second daughter, Mattie D., born 1872, is the wife of E. R. Matthews of South Carolina.

HENRY H. KNIGHT is a man of mark in Berrien county, where he was born Nov. 17, 1840. His father, John Knight, had held various county offices during his lifetime and died in 1876. Henry's education was limited to that of the common schools of the county. He enlisted in the Twenty-ninth regiment, Company G, Georgia volunteers, and was twice wounded: once slightly at Pine Mountain, and very seriously by the explosion of a shell at the battle of Jonesboro, Ga. Since the war he has carried on the mercantile business at Ray's Mills with great success and has by no means neglected the interests of his plantation. Besides this Mr. Knight has been for three years county commissioner and is now representative to the general assembly. Here, his prudence and sagacity being recognized, he was placed on the following important committees: Academy for the blind, county and county matters and special agriculture. It was his function to introduce the bill to incorporate Nashville, and one to protect fish, both of which were passed. Mr. Knight is a member of the masonic fraternity. His wife is Mary, the daughter of Thomas M. Ray of Ray's Mills, and they have three sons and two daughters living.

JOHN G. KNIGHT, planter, Ray's Mills, Berrien Co., Ga., son of Levy J. Knight, a planter of Berrien county, was born June 23, 1832. His father held several county offices; for a number of years he represented the county and for two terms was senator from his district in the general assembly. Mr. Knight, after receiving a good common school education, devoted himself assiduously to agriculture, his extensive farm highly prospering under his management. He gave his service to his state during the war, enlisting in 1861 in the Twenty-ninth Georgia regiment. Afterward, in 1862, he was transferred to the Twenty-sixth. The first wife of Mr. Knight was Eliza B., daughter of George Carter of Lowndes county, who died in 1863. He afterward married Mrs. Mary Knight, the widowed daughter of James Davis of Lowndes county, and to them were born five sons and two daughters. Rufus, the eldest son, born in 1854, married a daughter of Jonathan Knight in 1874 and resides in Florida. Louis, born in 1859, married a daughter of James Sloan, and now resides near his father on a farm. Mr. Knight's brother, Jonathan D., was also quite prominent in the affairs of his section, having been representative two terms and senator two terms in the general assembly and was also a member of the constitutional convention. He died in 1885.

WILLIARD HERSCHEL LOVE, banker and wholesale grocer, Tifton, Berrien Co., Ga., was born in Eden, Ga., Oct. 23, 1856, and is a son of Henry and Susan (Dorsey) Love. He was given the usual common school education, and at an early age displayed that business instinct which has been associated with his successful career. When a young lad he earned his first money as a newsboy on the B. & W. railroad, and finding that more money could be made out of the management if he owned it himself, he secured the exclusive right of selling on that road. He worked here until sixteen years old, when he learned telegraphy and worked for the old A. & G., now S. F. & W., at Blackshear, Ga., in 1875, until he was given the key at Pearson, Jan. 1, 1876. His rise in the trust and confidence of this railroad has been a steady one, and he is now in the twentieth year of his connection with it, in different positions of trust, now being claim agent. He was elected clerk of the superior court for Coffee county in 1878, and served for one term; afterward was county school commissioner for two terms, and in 1890 moved to Tifton. He was elected mayor of Tifton when first incorporated in 1891, served two years, and in 1895 embarked in the wholesale grocery business. A few months later with Messrs. Julian Love and Buck he entered into a banking business and has full charge of the same. Mr. Love was married Dec. 5, 1878, to Absley Kirkland, a daughter of M. Kirkland, of Coffee county. They have three children: Henry M., Claud E., and Mary W. Mr. and Mrs. Love are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church. He is a Mason, holding the position of district deputy in the grand lodge of Georgia, and in politics is a strong democrat, being one of the state executive committee from the second congressional district. Mr. Love's addition to the business circles of Tifton is justly appreciated by the people, who know that such qualifications of brains and push as he possesses are to be sought after by every community.

MALCOLM J. M'MILLAN is the son of John McMillan, a farmer of Berrien county, who during the Seminole Indian war was a scout, and who died Nov. 15, 1888. Malcolm was born near Allapaha, Aug. 12, 1852. He had only limited educational advantages, such as are afforded by the common schools. Having remained with his father until twenty-two years of age he secured a position with J. B. Dorminy & Co., who after four years sold out their business to Paulk, Henderson & Co. With this firm young McMillan remained until they in turn sold out to Paulk, Gaston & Co., when he left them and tried farming for a little over a year. But the commercial instinct was strong within him and he once more turned to trade, and after selling goods for W. S. Walker till 1885, went into business with W. K. Roberts under the firm name of Roberts & McMillan. At the end of three years, J. L. Paulk having bought out the interest of Roberts, the firm was McMillan & Paulk. In 1891 Mr. McMillan bought his partner's interest, and the entire business is now in his own hands. By prudence and industry and good management he has achieved well-deserved prosperity, having a very good trade and carrying a stock of about $8,000. That he stands well in the estimation of his fellow-citizens is evidenced by the fact that he has been mayor of Allapaha for a number of years. He was one of the first county commissioners, has been jury commissioner for about six years, was elected to represent his senatorial district in 1894, and is now chairman of the democratic executive committee. Dec. 7, 1877, Mr. McMillan married Miss Julia R. Griffin, daughter of J. H. Griffin, a farmer of Allapaha, and they have one son and four daughters: Sarah L., born Sept. 28, 1878; Lelia, born Aug. 3, 1880; Fannie Belle, born Dec. 25, 1882; Clarence E., born Dec. 25, 1886; and Etta M., born Oct. 3, 1890.

JOHN MURROW, attorney, Tifton, Berrien Co., Ga., is a son of Dr. John A. Murrow, now a resident of Pembroke, Ga., and was born in Bryan county, Ga., Dec. 31, 1858. He was educated at Cone's academy, Bulloch county, and entered on the study of law at the state university, Athens, being a member of the last class graduated by the celebrated Prof. Wm. L. Mitchell. He located at Ty Ty, Worth Co., where he practiced law for twelve years, moving to Tifton, Ga., in 1894. His practice extends over a territory comprising several adjoining counties. As a counselor Col. Murrow holds the confidence of his people and the respect of his brother attorneys. He has for twelve years been local attorney for the Brunswick & Western railroad, which fact attests the value of his services. In 1882 Col. Murrow was joined in wedlock to Miss Estelle, a daughter of Dr. J. H. Pickett, to whom have been born four children: Willie L., a lad of eleven years; Roy H., nine years; Clyde, a daughter of six years; and Irma, three years of age. A blue lodge and royal arch Mason, and a Knight Templar at Americus, and also a Knight of Pythias, Col. Murrow combines with his excellent reputation as a lawyer social qualities which make him a pleasant and companionable gentleman.

WM. LEE PATTEN, M. D., is the son of a farmer, James Patten, and was born in Milltown, Berrien Co., Nov. 9, 1865. After receiving a good common school education, for one year he attended the agricultural college at Thomasville. During three years, 1883-1885, he taught school in Irwin, Berrien and Lowndes counties; for the two years following he was salesman in the general merchandise stores of J. W. Harroll & Son and H. C. Dukes of Valdosta. In the spring of 1887 he began to read medicine, entering the medical college of Atlanta the following fall, and graduating March 1, 1889. The young physician located at Pensacola, Fla., where he practiced four years. When about to leave that city he was tendered a banquet by the physicians of the city, and in the speeches made many well-deserved compliments were paid their departing friend and associate. Dr. Patten then located in the town of his birth, Milltown, where he has already acquired an excellent practice in the town and vicinity, besides carrying on a large trade in drugs. He is a member of Damon lodge, No. 13, K. of P., and of Columbia lodge, K. of H., both located in Pensacola, Fla. His wife, whom he married Jan. 15, 1891, formerly Miss Lizzie Dennis, is the daughter of Rev. W. B. Dennis, a Methodist minister of Pensacola. They have two little daughters, Lucille, born July 13, 1892, and Lizzie Lee, born Sept. 17, 1893.

HENRY B. PEEPLES, Nashville, Ga., was born at Athens, Ga., Feb. 2, 1849; is one of the leading lawyers of Berrien county, and is descended from a South Carolina family—his grandfather having come thence to settle in Jackson county, Ga., about 1820. The family seems to have a decided predilection for the law, his father and two uncles being quite distinguished in the profession. One uncle, Cincinnatus, for about six years was judge of the superior court of Fulton county; the other, Judge R. A. Peeples, has held various county offices in Berrien and Lowndes counties. His father having devoted ten years in Athens and four in Atlanta to mercantile pursuits, removed to Berrien county and commenced the practice of law at Nashville; was a member of the legislature from Berrien county, was ordinary four years, and at the time of his death, in December, 1893, was judge of the county court. Henry B. Peeples, after a few months at a private school in Atlanta, was sent to the High school (academy) at Nashville. Having reached manhood's estate, he began farming in Berrien county, near Nashville. To this calling he devoted several years, and was very successful; but in 1876 the natural bent of his mind decided him to begin the study of law, and in 1877, at the March term of the superior court, he was admitted to practice. By assiduous attention to his profession in the city of Nashville, his home, he has taken a high rank among his fellows. He represented the county in the legislature in 1886-87. In April, 1892—to fill the unexpired term of J. R. Slater, deceased—he was appointed by the governor solicitor-general of the southern circuit. The following October he was elected by the legislature to fill the same office for the full term. Mr. Peeples is a member of Duncan lodge, No. 234, F. & A. M., of which he is worshipful master. He is also high priest of Daisy chapter, Royal Arch, at Adel, Ga. At the age of twenty-one Mr. Peeples married Miss Ellen Byrd, daughter of N. W. Byrd. He has two sons and two daughters: Mattie, aged seventeen; Nathan W., aged fifteen; Taylor M., aged twelve, and Fannie J., eight.

J. W. TALLEY.

COLQUITT STRICKLAND, born May 22, 1857, is the son of a farmer of Clinch county, Ga., who was also justice of the inferior court of his county, and who died Nov. 1, 1883. The son obtained his education in the common country schools, working on a farm and attending school until twenty-one years of age, when he went into the mercantile business at Milltown, Berrien Co., where he has since resided. He is carrying on an extensive and profitable trade with a stock of some $10,000, and in addition, since 1892, has been running a large farm. Here he makes a specialty of corn and hogs, selling every year thousands of pounds of meat of his own raising. The political principles of Mr. Strickland are democratic. He is a Mason, a member of Butler lodge, No. 211, of which he is senior warden. His wife was Miss Mattie L. Roberts, of Valdosta, whose father, William Roberts, by diligence in the farming industry, has been able to retire from business with a competency. The family is highly esteemed in the community. Mr. Strickland has two sons and one daughter: Charley G., born July 16, 1884; Willie R., born March 10, 1888. The daughter, Luella, was born Feb. 11, 1894.

JAMES W. TALLEY, M. D., was born Feb. 22, 1826, in Henry county, Ga., not far from Atlanta, and is of English ancestry. His grandfather, with two brothers, came to this country, and the former, Caleb Talley, after serving during the revolutionary war, settled in Virginia. He was the father of seven sons, five of whom were Methodist ministers. One of these, Rev. Nathan Talley, of Greene county, Ga., was the father of James W. Talley. The latter received a good academic education, and in 1850 began the study of medicine under Dr. William Blalock, of Fayetteville, Ga. In 1851 he entered the Medical college of Georgia, at Augusta, but took his degree from Savannah Medical college. He located in Milltown, Berrien Co., where he has built up one of the most successful and extensive country practices in the state. During the war Dr. Talley was exempted from military duty on account of his profession. Politically he is a democrat. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, of lodge No. 211, has been grand master, and is now past master. One of Dr. Talley's brothers, H. M. Talley, is also a physician at Valdosta. Another, A. S. Talley, is a real estate agent in Atlanta. For his first wife, Dr. Talley married Miss Mary Little, daughter of Zabot Little, of Henry county. She died in 1867, and he afterward married Miss M. Holzendorf, daughter of Alexander Holzendorf, of Cumberland island, one of the best known planters in the state. Dr. Talley's family consists of two sons and four daughters. His eldest son, Junius V., born May 8, 1872, graduated from the Louisville Medical college in June, 1894; William T., born Aug. 30, 1875, at home, attending school. The eldest daughter, born in 1854, is the wife of Huffman Harroll, a merchant of Valdosta; Mary I., born in 1864, married J. H. Bostwick, a manufacturer of naval stores, in Berrien county; Effie C., born Nov. 5, 1870; Lelia H., born Sept. 6, 1873, is the wife of J. J. Knight, a merchant of Milltown.

HENRY H. TIFT, Tifton, Berrien Co., Ga., was born at Mystic, Conn., March 16, 1841, his father, Amos C. Tift, having been a merchant of that city, where he died in 1886. Henry enjoyed the educational advantages of the common and high schools of his native town, and also a year at East Greenwich seminary. He then served an apprenticeship of three years in the machine shops of Mystic and Hartford, after which he served as engineer for five years, between New York, Apalachicola and Key West, and on the C. H. Mallory steamship line, plying between New York and Texas. Mr. Tift came to Albany, Ga., in 1870, taking charge of some manufacturing enterprises, N. & H. T. Tift & Co., but in 1872 he moved to Tifton and went into the lumbering business, in which he has since been chiefly engaged. For some time he carried on a mercantile establishment in connection with his lumbering enterprise, but last year sold his interest in that to his brother, W. O. Tift. He ships lumber to western and Cuban points, but mainly coastwise to New York and New England, his average cut being some 40,000 feet per day. Mr. Tift owns, individually, 65,000 acres of land, and is using every effort to bring a desirable class of settlers to his town. He is building a railroad from Tifton to Helena, Telfair Co., Ga., for which a charter has been secured, and a company will be organized. He is largely interested in the Tift & Snow company, which carries on a nursery and fruit farm of over 300 acres. H. H. and W. O. Tift also own a great fruit farm, 250 acres of pecans, pears and grapes—thirty-five acres being in grapes alone. Mr. Tift also owns a large interest in the Tifton Canning company, and in addition, has an extensive business in naval stores near Tifton. During the war he was engineer of a government transport, being in the fleet that transported Butler's troops up James river. Mr. Tift married Miss Bessie Willingham, daughter of Thomas Willingham, of Albany, Ga., and has three sons, Henry, Thomas and Amos.

WILLIAM S. WALKER is the son of a farmer, Elisha S. Walker, who was at one time justice of the inferior court of Dougherty county, and who died May 25, 1865. The son, William, was born in Stewart county, Ga., June 18, 1849, and attended the common schools, chiefly in Rome, Ga. In 1871 he entered commercial life, going into business first at Tifton, but in 1873 he transferred his business to Allapaha. In 1885 he exchanged trade for farming, which he carried on quite extensively, and in connection with it a large livery business. Mr. Walker, who is politically a democrat, was elected to the general assembly in 1880, where he served one term, being contemporary with Gov. Northen. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is worshipful master of Eureka lodge, No. 313. The family to which Mr. Walker belongs is well known and esteemed. His mother's father was a Baptist minister in Stewart county; his brother, Eugene C., is a broker in Atlanta; another brother is a farmer in Berrien; a cousin, James M. Griggs, is judge of Pataula circuit. Dec. 14, 1879, Mr. Walker married Mrs. L. W. Griffin, whose father, Robert Downs, of Camden county, Ga., died of yellow fever in 1856. Their one son, Griggs, was born Oct. 20, 1883.

BIBB COUNTY.

CAPT. GEORGE D. ALLEN comes of "Old Dominion" stock. His father, Maj. W. A. Allen, was born in Amelia county, Va., in 1815, and reared on a plantation. He, with his father, Capt. Alexander Allen, removed to Bedford county, Tenn., in 1834, where he married Martha E. Davidson, daughter of George Davidson, who was a native North Carolinian. Maj. Allen, while a resident of Tennessee, was a man of distinction and influence, having served a term in the senate of that state. After the war he came south and located at Forsyth, Ga., where he now resides, enjoying, by choice, the life of a quiet citizen, much loved and respected by the people of his community.

Capt. George D. Allen was born in Shelbyville, Tenn., Dec. 30, 1843, and passed his boyhood days on the home plantation, and was being educated at the Shelbyville university when war became the cry. He at once enlisted in Company B, Forty-first Tennessee regiment of the C. S. A., and served through the entire four years. His service, for the most part, was in the Army of the West, where he was in all the important battles. At the fall of Fort Donelson, in 1862, he was captured and spent seven months in prison at Indianapolis. He was exchanged in time to take part in the siege of Vicksburg. From this time he served as aide-de-camp to Gen. H. B. Davidson, and at the close of the war was on the right flank of Lee's immortal band at Appomattox.

Capt. Allen returned to his father's country home in June, 1865. The following October he married Miss M. Eufaula Scandrett, an accomplished lady of Griffin, Ga. They are the parents of eight children, four of whom are living: Lawson D., George D., jr.; Harry S., and Stewart W., all of whom are now having the best educational advantages.

Capt. Allen came to Georgia in 1866, engaged in cotton planting two years, and in 1868 embarked in the mercantile business at Forsyth, Ga. He was chairman of board county commissioners and mayor of the city. It was during his administration and largely owing to his energy and influence that the Monroe Female college, the oldest female college in the south, was rebuilt.

The year 1884 marks the date of Capt. Allen's coming to Macon, since which he has been one of her most energetic and successful business men. He engaged in the wholesale grocery trade, and in 1890 organized the firm of Allen & Dumas Co., of which he was president and general manager. In December, 1894, he became sole owner of the business, which includes the Juliette water mills, located at Juliette, Ga., twenty-two miles north of Macon, on the Southern railway, and one of the largest and best-equipped grist mills in the south.

Capt. Allen is, in religion, a Methodist, is a Knight Templar Mason, and a citizen of whom Macon may well feel proud for his enterprise and ability.

AUGUSTUS O. BACON, United States senator-elect of Georgia, is a native of Bryan county, and was born there Oct. 20, 1839. His parents were, however, residents of Liberty county, and he was born when his mother was on a visit to Bryan county. His father was the Rev. Augustus O. Bacon, a Baptist minister, and on his mother's side he is a grand nephew of the late Judge William Law, of Savannah, one of Georgia's most distinguished men. By the death of his parents the boy was left an orphan at an early age, but under the care of a grandmother he spent his boyhood, and at the age of 16 he entered the University of Georgia, graduating in the collegiate course in 1859, and the law school in 1860. In October of that year he began the practice of his profession in Atlanta, but in May, 1861, he joined the forces under the starry flag of the Confederacy, and enlisted as adjutant of the Ninth Georgia regiment.

In 1864 he was wedded to Miss Virginia Lamar, of Macon, and when hostilities were ended Maj. Bacon returned to Macon, and has since practiced his profession there. His success in his profession was immediate, and he quickly assumed a ranking place in the Bibb county bar. In the summer of 1868, he made his debut in politics, being nominated by the democratic state convention as presidential elector for the then fourth congressional district. The compliment can be better appreciated when it is known it was made on the same day the great Bush Arbor mass-meeting, at Atlanta, was held, and was for the purpose of invoking the highest oratorical ability. The masterly way in which he handled the questions agitating the public, to the satisfaction of the party, marked him then as one of the coming men of Georgia. Two years later—1870—he was elected to the legislature of 1871-72. He was re-elected to the next legislature, and in January, 1873, was chosen its speaker. In the fall of 1876, he was again elected, and this time was unanimously elected speaker. Under the new constitution he was re-elected in December, 1877, for two years, and on the organization of the house, was again unanimously elected speaker. In 1880, he was again elected to the house from Bibb, and chosen speaker. Maj. Bacon's record, under the circumstances, could hardly be other than a brilliant one. His knowledge of law, fine executive ability and parliamentary experience and learning, and fine personality, made him a model speaker. In 1883 he was a candidate for governor, and in that famous convention he had a large plurality. After a three-days' deadlock a committee was named to suggest a candidate to the convention, and, by a majority of only one vote, they agreed upon Hon. Henry McDaniel over Mr. Bacon. Two years later he was again a candidate for governor, being defeated by Hon. J. B. Gordon. The contest was a close one, and though Gen. Gordon won, there was only a difference of about 1,500 in the popular vote, several of the counties being carried by shoe-string pluralities. He was chosen United States senator in 1894, after an exciting campaign and a canvass on the part of Mr. Bacon, remarkable for its organization and execution.

DR. ROBERT B. BARRON, a leading physician of Macon, Ga., is the son of Dr. James Finney and Joannah E. (Shropshire) Barron, and was born in Clinton, Jones Co., Ga., Dec. 26, 1859. Dr. James F. Barron was born in Jones county in 1825 and has always lived there. He was educated at Powelton, Hancock Co., and was graduated in medicine at the University Medical college of the city of New York in 1849. He served in both branches of the general assembly before the war and was a member of the secession convention, being in favor of that movement. In 1853-4-5 he was justice of the inferior court of Jones county. He was exempt from active military service on account of physical disability, but was one of four men in his native county who, during the war, looked after the widows and orphans at home, and in so doing spent all he had. He was married in 1853, his wife being a daughter of Capt. James H. Shropshire, an officer in the Seminole war, and a granddaughter of James Shropshire, a native of England. They had six children: James H. of Jasper county, Ga.; William W. of Jones county, ex-sheriff and clerk of the superior court; Dr. R. B.; Jackson Clay, Jones county, lawyer and judge of the county court, now serving his second term, having been elected first at the age of twenty-three; he was for two years at West Point academy; Abington L., a teacher in Putnam county; Sallie E., unmarried. Dr. James F. Barron's father was William Barron, also a native of what is now Jones county, Ga., and was born in 1798. He was a farmer all his life, was at one time sheriff of the county, and died in 1837. His father, Dr. Robert B. Barron's great-grandfather, was Samuel Barron, who was born in Virginia in 1772, and came with his father to Hancock county, Ga., in 1783. He became an extensive planter, was one of the original settlers of Jones county, and owned several hundred slaves. He had eleven children and at his death left to each of them between thirty-five and forty slaves. His father, Dr. Barron's great-great-grandfather, James Barron, was a native of Scotland. The great Commodore Barron, who fought a duel with Commodore Decatur, was a first cousin of James Barron. The name, James, has been given to the eldest son of the Barron family for six generations. Dr. Robert B. Barron was brought up and primarily educated in Clinton. At the age of seventeen he entered Mercer university at Macon, Ga., graduating with the degree of A. B. in 1881. Returning home he read medicine with his father one year, then went to Bellevue Hospital Medical college in New York city and was graduated from that institution in 1883. He came back to Clinton, Ga., after his graduation and practiced with his father until 1889. From that time until August, 1891, he was employed as physician and surgeon by the Southern Lumber company and the Wadley & Mount Vernon Railway company at Wadley, Ga. He came from Wadley to Macon and has since practiced there. Dr. Barron is a member and president of the Jones County Medical society, and also of the Macon Medical society; is a member of the Georgia Medical association and of the American Medical association, to whose meeting in 1887 he was a delegate. He is past high priest of Constantine chapter No. 4, R. A. M., and master of Mabel lodge No. 255, F. & A. M., and senior of St. Omar commandery No. 2, Knights Templar, and a member of the A. T. O. (Greek society). In 1885 he received the degree of A. M. from Mercer university. He was married in the year last mentioned to Miss Willa, daughter of William Etheridge. In 1887 he read before the Georgia Medical association a paper on "Uterine Disorders," which was published in the report of the society's transactions. He has read many other widely-noticed papers before the Jones county and Macon Medical societies and is orator of the Georgia Medical association for 1896. Dr. Barron is an honored member of the Baptist church, and his wife is a member of the Methodist church.

CHARLES LA FAYETTE BARTLETT, late judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit, is the son of Judge George T. and Virginia L. (Saunders) Bartlett, the latter a native of Georgia, whose ancestors were Virginians, her father and mother coming to Georgia from Southampton county, Va. George T. Bartlett was born in Jasper county, Ga., in 1824, and in his early life gained political prominence. He served several terms in both branches of the state legislature, having been a member of the Georgia senate in 1861, when the ordinance of secession came up for consideration. He recorded his vote in favor of that measure. Previous to this date he had been solicitor-general of the Ocmulgee circuit, being first elected to that position in 1848. He entered the Confederate service in April, 1861, as captain of the Glover guards, a company he organized in Jasper county, and was sent to Norfolk, where his command was assigned to the Fourth Georgia regiment. He was captured in November, 1864, and was taken first to Hilton Head, then to Point Lookout and lastly to Fort Delaware, where he was held a prisoner until July, 1865. On his release he returned to Jasper county and resumed the practice of law. In 1873 he was made judge of the Ocmulgee circuit and sat on the bench seven years, when he again took up active practice and in 1884 came to Macon, where he died a year later. Hon. Charles La Fayette Bartlett was born in Monticello, Jasper Co., Jan. 31, 1853, and received his rudimentary education in the academy in that city, the principal of which was Prof. W. R. Berncr. At the age of fifteen he matriculated at the university of Georgia at Athens, and graduated from that institution in August, 1870. He then entered the university of Virginia and while there took up the study of law. Returning home he entered his father's law office and was admitted to the bar in August, 1872, at the city of Monticello, in which he immediately thereafter began the practice of his profession in partnership with his father. This firm was, however, dissolved after it had existed about a year, his father being, as above mentioned, appointed in 1873 judge of the Ocmulgee circuit. Mr. Bartlett, therefore, practiced alone until 1875, when he associated himself with the late Samuel Hall (afterward judge of the state supreme court) and W. A. Loftin, the style of the firm being Hall, Loftin & Bartlett. This partnership continued until January, 1877, when Mr. Bartlett was appointed solicitor-general of the Macon circuit for the term of four years. In 1881 his father removed to Macon and they went into partnership for the second time, continuing together until the father's death in 1885. In May of that year Mr. Bartlett joined Hon. Washington Dessau and they practiced as a firm until Jan. 1, 1893, when he was appointed judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit. Political as well as professional honors have been won by Mr. Bartlett. In 1882 he was elected from Bibb county to the lower house of the state legislature and re-elected in 1884. Four years later he was sent to the state senate from the twenty-second senatorial district, composed of the counties of Bibb, Monroe and Pike. He has likewise served frequently as a delegate to congressional, gubernatorial and senatorial conventions. He is a member of the Macon lodge No. 5, F. & A. M.; of Constantine chapter No. 4; St. Omar commandery, Knights Templar; Franklin lodge, I. O. O. F.; M. R. Rogers lodge No. 59, Knights of Pythias and of Macon lodge No. 23, B. P. O. Elks. Dec. 3, 1873, Mr. Bartlett married Emma L., daughter of the late Dr. J. B. Carlton, Athens, Ga. In April, 1894, he resigned his seat on the bench and on the twenty-eighth day of that month the Macon bar met to take action on his resignation. A committee which had been appointed at a previous meeting reported the following resolution, the preamble to which was eulogistic in the extreme:

"Resolved, first, that Judge Charles L. Bartlett so discharged the duties of the office of judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit as entitles him to the commendation of every citizen of the circuit. Second, that we exceedingly regret the necessity which has caused his resignation of that important office. Third, that he will carry with him in retiring from the bench the respect and affectionate regard of the members of this bar."

This report was signed by J. L. Anderson, W. H. Felton, A. L. Miller, B. M. D. and E. H. Winship. Many laudatory speeches were also made on the occasion—a fitting tribute to Mr. Bartlett's success on the bench.

WILLIAM CAPERS BASS, president of the Wesleyan Female college, Macon, was born in Augusta, Ga., Jan. 13, 1831. His father, Rev. Henry Bass, was for many years a successful pioneer Methodist preacher, and the son grew up in South Carolina, owing to the division of the conference, which put the father, a few years after the son's birth, across the Savannah river. At Cokesbury young Bass prepared for college, and there, Aug. 22, 1848, at the age of seventeen, he united with the Methodist Episcopal church south. In January, 1850, he entered the sophomore class—half advanced—at Emory college, and was graduated in 1852. He served as assistant to Rev. Crosby W. Smith, president of the Greensborough academy, until the latter was called to take charge of the Wesleyan, when he succeeded him. When in his twenty-first year he applied for a license to preach, and entered the ministry as a preacher at the old Walker church, made famous as the place where Bishop Pierce delivered his first sermon. At the close of his labors in Greensborough he went to Madison Female college. Then he entered upon his special work as a teacher of girls. After a year's service he was called to Wesleyan, but declined, remaining there five years longer. Again called to the Wesleyan, he accepted the professorship of natural science, October, 1859. In this pioneer of female colleges he began what has proven his life work. In 1874 he was chosen to be president of the college, to succeed Dr. Bonnell. Eminently wise was the selection, for there were few who could have shown more important requisites than Dr. Bass. He was possessed of business tact and executive ability, and under such a combination the college took new life and has assumed a ranking position among the colleges of the country. To few, if any, is the Methodist church of Georgia more indebted than to William C. Bass. Hundreds of women, whose character he was greatly instrumental in molding and developing, have been scattered, not only over Georgia, but over the south, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande.

Dr. Bass was married in July, 1854, to Octavia Nicholson, of Greensborough, and much must be set down to the credit of the helpmate who has aided him in life. In the management of the Wesleyan college Rev. Bass has been distinguished for his liberality, and in thirty-five years diplomas have been given free to more than 700 young women. One-half of these were daughters of itinerant Methodist ministers, and the same number have probably been educated totally at Rev. Bass' expense. As an educator, the daughters of Georgia have never had a more earnest advocate than Dr. Bass. In his baccalaureate for twenty years, in his sermons in churches and at camp meetings, and in his addresses before the annual district and quarterly conference, his eloquent appeals for female education have been heard. The Red Cross Knight, in the palmiest days of chivalry, was never a truer champion of the woman of his vows. All the daughters of Georgia have a bold defender in Capers Bass, and never was fealty to an espoused cause more faithfully kept.

JOHN SPRINGS BAXTER, one of Macon's most distinguished citizens, was born in that city, Dec. 3, 1832, and was taken to Athens when but a child in arms, by his parents. In that city he grew to manhood, attending private instruction in Dr. Beman's famous school, and graduating from the University of Georgia in 1853, with the degree of A. B. He then went to Jefferson Medical college, at Philadelphia, and was graduated in 1856. He returned to Macon and there began practice. In August, 1861, he enlisted in the Macon volunteers, an old military company, organized about 1825, which was assigned to the Second Georgia battalion, and known as Company B. He served as a private till April, 1862, when he was made surgeon of the battalion, and acted as such about two months. He then went to Richmond, where he was made assistant surgeon to the Third Georgia hospital. Two months afterward he was appointed surgeon of the Forty-sixth Georgia regiment, in the field, which regiment was then stationed at Charleston, S. C. He accompanied the regiment, in May, 1863, to the relief of Vicksburg, and remained with the army until the surrender of Gen. Johnston, at Greensborough, N. C. He officiated as surgeon in the battles of Jackson, Miss., and on the retreat from Chattanooga to Atlanta. After the war he resumed his practice in Macon, for about a year, and then went into the general merchandise business with George S. Jones, under the firm name of Jones & Baxter. He retired from business the latter part of 1873, and in 1876 was made a director of the Southwestern railroad, running from Macon to Eufaula, Ala. and Columbus, Ga., the length of the road being 333 miles. In May, 1891, he was made president of the Southwestern, and served as such until February, 1894, and at the election of that year was made vice-president, an office which he now holds. In 1876, in connection with the late W. B. Johnston, he organized the first artificial ice company established at Macon, and carried it on until 1884, and then sold out. He was one of the original incorporators of the Macon Brewing company, and was one of its directors, and when the company went into the hands of a receiver, in 1891, he and R. H. Plant reorganized the company as the Acme Brewing company, of which he is now a director. He was one of the men who agitated and secured the building of the Macon water works, and was a director up to 1893. He is a director of the Central Georgia bank, the Macon Fire Insurance company, the Macon Building and Loan association, and the Ocmulgee Land company, all of Macon, and of the Southern Mutual Insurance company, of Athens, Ga. Dr. Baxter was married in November, 1858, to Caroline, daughter of the late Judge Edward D. Tracy, a resident of Macon, and has one child, Tracy Baxter, who is an attorney in Macon. His wife died in 1861, and Dr.

Baxter has never remarried. He belongs to no church, though he affiliates with the Presbyterians, and belongs to no secret society. The only office he ever held was that of city physician, one year, 1857.

The father of Dr. Baxter was Thomas W. Baxter, born in Greene county in 1786. He was a merchant in Macon and Milledgeville, Ga., for many years, and later had charge of the Athens manufacturing company. He died in Athens in 1844. Thomas W. Baxter was a brave soldier in the Seminole war, and in the civil war furnished six sons, including the subject of this sketch, to the Confederate army, viz: Andrew, Thomas W., Eli L., who died in service; Edwin G. Baxter, killed in the service in Texas, and Richard B., who was all through the service until the attack on Knoxville in 1864, where he was captured and held until the war was over. He was in the Third Georgia regiment, first, and was a private in the Fifteenth Georgia regiment when he was captured. The grandfather and grandmother of Dr. Baxter were natives of North Carolina, and the family is of Scotch-Irish descent.

A LECK BLOCK, president of the Acme Brewing company, of Macon, Ga., was born in New York city, Sept. 21, 1856, and two years later came with his parents to Americus, Ga., where they lived till 1865, then moving to Macon, Ga., where they have since resided. The greater part of Mr. Block's education was received in Macon, but at the age of 14 he left school and entered the real estate and insurance office of Turpin & Ogden. For two years he acted as clerk, then book-keeper, and later became a full partner, continuing in this business till 1890, when he devoted himself to other interests. In 1884, in partnership with his brother, N. M. Block, he embarked in the beer business, establishing a warehouse, doing general bottling and shipping beer all over the state. A few years later they added the wholesaling of whisky to their trade. Still in company with his brother, Mr. Block, in 1886, organized a stock company and purchased the Central City ice plant, which had been established about a year, with a capital of $17,000. The new company increased the stock to $40,000, enlarged the plant and elected Mr. Block president, in which capacity he served till 1891, when he was made manager, a position which he still holds. Mr. Block and his brother own the controlling interest in this enterprise. In 1890 the Macon Brewing company built a brewery costing $340,000; after running it two years, they were obliged to place it in the hands of a receiver. The receiver conducted it a year, when it was put up for sale, selling for $112,000. The company was reorganized, with a capital stock of $150,000, of which $142,000 was paid in. Mr. Block was made president March 10, 1893; H. Horne, vice-president, and a dividend of 8 per cent. declared the first year. The new brewing company is known as the Acme Brewing company, the officers are: President, A. Block; vice-president, H. Horne; secretary, treasurer and superintendent, J. N. Hazlehurst. The last year this business was managed by the old company they sold 8,000 barrels of beer. The new company sold their first year 15,800 barrels. Mr. Block and his brother disposed of their other beer interests, but retain the wholesale whisky trade. Mr. Block is a director of the Academy of Music and stockholder in the following enterprises: American National bank, Progress Loan and Improvement company, and Bibb Loan association. He is a democrat, but not an active politician, and is a member of Central City lodge No. 3, Knights of Pythias. He was married in July, 1891, to Leonora Metzger, a native of Cincinnati. Mr. Block is one of the keenest and most successful business men in Macon; good fortune has smiled upon all his undertakings; he is an agreeable, whole-souled gentleman, making friends as readily as he does money. Mr. Block's father, Joseph Block, a native of Germany, served in the Confederate interests during the late war, as home guard. He lives in Macon, and is seventy-four years old.

ARTHUR E. BOARDMAN, president of the Macon Gas Light and Water company, was born in Macon, Ga., March 20, 1850. He received his primary education in his native city, and graduated, with the degree of civil engineer, at Rensselaer Polytechnic institute in Troy, N. Y., in 1870. Immediately after graduating he returned to Georgia and engaged in surveying the extension of the Southwestern and other railroads. In 1872, Mr. Boardman was elected city engineer of Macon, and a year later entered the service of the Macon Gas Light company. He rebuilt the gas works, built the water works, and also built the gas works at the state asylum at Milledgeville, Ga., and the water works at Americus, Ga. In company with W. A. Jeter, Mr. Boardman, in 1886, formed the Jeter & Boardman Gas and Water association. The history of this association will be found in the sketch of Mr. W. A. Jeter, published in this volume. Mr. Boardman, in 1893, was president of the American Gas Light association, and presided at their meeting in Chicago during the World's Fair. He is a director, and for several years was vice-president of the Macon Savings bank, of which his father, J. M. Boardman, was president almost to the time of his death in 1893.

While not an active politician, Mr. Boardman is a staunch democrat. He is not a member of secret societies, and his affiliations are with the Episcopal church. Mr. Boardman was married in 1875 to Rebecca W., daughter of Clinton C. Tallman, of Brooklyn, N. Y.

JOHN WILLIAM BURKE. No man in Macon is more widely or more favorably known than the gentleman of whom this sketch is a brief mention. A life full of service for the Master, as editor, preacher and business man, has carried him into all parts of the state, and has diffused most widely an influence which has always been exerted for the uplifting of society. John W. Burke was born in Watkinsville, Ga., Oct. 1, 1826, and there reared to the age of fifteen years. At that age he entered upon an apprenticeship to the printers' trade in the office of the "Athens Banner," and on which paper he continued to labor until February of 1849, when he removed to Cassville, Ga., and established the "Cassville Standard." After six years of successful management of this periodical, he began the work of the ministry, joining the Georgia conference of the Methodist church, his first circuit being that of Cassville. In 1856 he was transferred to the Lawrenceville circuit, where he continued until 1858. In the latter year, Rev. Burke, on account of his knowledge of the publishing business, was placed in charge of the Methodist Book repository, located at Macon, which he managed successfully until 1864. A private venture in the publishing business was then entered upon, J. W. Burke & Co., of which he has since been president, being established on the ruins left by Sherman. Under his careful management this soon became one of the institutions of Macon, and for many years was the leading printing establishment in Georgia. In connection with his duties for this concern, Rev. Burke continued to labor with untiring zeal in the cause of Methodism, filling various important and useful positions in the Georgia conference. In 1878, he was the presiding elder for the Macon district, and in 1880, filled that difficult office for the Americus district. He was for twenty-five years the publisher and assistant editor of the Southern and the Wesleyan Christian "Advocate," the length of his service evidencing the quality of his services. Rev. Burke's nuptials were solemnized with Caroline White in 1848, and to them have been born the following children: Fannie, Mrs. Col. Nat. E. Harris, Macon; Mary, Mrs. B. H. Sasnett, Atlanta; Leila, Mrs. W. R. Holmes, Macon; E. W., manager of The J. W. Burke Company; Rev. W. B., a Methodist missionary in China for the past eight years, and J. W., Jr., who was killed by lightning at Cumberland Island, Ga., at the age of twenty-four. This family was reared in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and the parents now contemplate them useful and prominent members of society.

THOMAS C. BURKE, dealer in paints and oils, was born in New York city, February 27, 1856. Four years later he came with his parents to Macon, Ga., and was there brought up and received his early education. He finished his scholastic course with R. A. Slaughter. Upon leaving school he entered the office of his father, who was a contractor, and continued with him for one year. In 1874 Mr. Burke and his father, with a capital of $600, established a paint and oil store in Macon, under the firm name of C. Burke & Son. This partnership existed until August, 1886, when the father died, and since then the business has been carried on under the name of T. C. Burke. The first year of the co-partnership's existence it did a business of about $6,000, but it has steadily increased the volume of its transactions until 1893 they amounted to $150,000. Mr. Burke is one of the five owners of the Academy of Music in Macon and is vice-president of the Academy of Music company, president of the Progress Loan and Improvement company, director of the Union Savings bank and Trust company, was a member of the municipal bond commission, and is now fire commissioner in Macon. He owns stock in many commercial enterprises. He has never sought political preferment and has never held a political office. He is a firm democrat but not in any way an active politician. He is a member of the Roman Catholic church. He had one brother who was a priest and died in New Orleans at the age of twenty-nine. His sister Maggie is now known as Sister Legouri, a sister of mercy in the Mount de Sales convent. Mr. Burke attends to all the legal business for this convent. He was married in 1886 to Mary S., daughter of John W. Bessman, Augusta, Ga., and they have two children: Mary Henrietta and Martin L. Mr. Burke's father was Christopher Burke, a native of Dublin, Ireland, who came to America in 1837, at the age of twenty years, settled in New York, and remained there until 1860, when he came to Macon, where he died in 1886, as above mentioned. Christopher Burke served as commissioner of Bibb county and alderman from the third ward of Macon. During the war he had charge of the paint shop of the Macon & Western railroad at Macon. Thomas C. Burke is widely esteemed in social and business circles, his shrewd yet affable nature and ready wit making him a universal favorite.

THOMAS J. CARLING, capitalist of Macon, Ga., was born in New York city June 13, 1839. He was educated there and learned the plumbing trade, but in 1873 removed to Macon and has since resided in that city. In 1874 he re-engaged in the plumber's business, conducting it until 1885, when in partnership with H. R. Bryan he built the Macon & Suburban street railroad, four and one-half miles long, Mr. Carling owning ninety per cent. of the stock. He sold the street railway the same year it was built and then in partnership with Mr. Bryan bought and remodeled the Lanier house, of which he is still the principal owner. In company with several others he built, in 1893, the Macon & Indiana Springs railroad, which is seven miles in length and chiefly owned by him. In March of the latter year he purchased the "Telegraph," one of Macon's favorite newspapers, and has sold a certain interest in it, his intention being to dispose of the remainder in a short time. Mr. Carling was elected to the city council in 1891; though he was only in the field two weeks before election he defeated four other candidates who had made regular canvasses for the office. Two years later he was made chairman of the council for twelve months. Mr. Carling is a Mason, a Mystic Shriner, Royal Arch and Knight Templar. He is now master of Mabel lodge, No. 255, F. & A. M. He is also a member of Syracuse lodge, No. 36, Knights of Pythias. He has held every office in that lodge and in the grand lodge. He is now supreme representative of the state. He is also a member of the I. O. O. F., the Red Men, and is colonel of the uniformed Knights of Pythias. He was married in 1876 in Columbia, S. C., to Ella F., daughter of Rev. Robert Miller, now of Macon, Ga. Mr. Carling's father was John Carling, a native of New York.

WILLIAM R. COX, senior member of the large wholesale grocery firm of Cox & Chappell, Macon, Ga., is a native of the county in which he now resides. He is a son of D. M. Cox, who soon after his birth, April 4, 1843, removed to Houston county. Here William R. came to years of maturity, receiving such education as could be had in the ordinary schools of that period. The war between the states was the first great event of his life, and though but a youth, he did battle bravely for the undying principles of the Confederacy. Mr. Cox enlisted in the First Georgia, in April of 1861, and passed the twelve months of that enlistment in Pensacola, Fla., and in Virginia. Returning to Macon when his enlistment had expired, the company of which he was a member a month later was mustered into the artillery service and joined Gen. Bragg, who was operating in the department of Tennessee. As a corporal of this company Mr. Cox followed it with varying fortune through a large number of important campaigns and it is but just to add that they were looked upon as one of the most efficient and skilled batteries in the western army. Mr. Cox received a slight wound at Perryville, Ky., but otherwise returned from the war unharmed. Perry, Houston Co., was the point at which Mr. Cox made his first business venture, but disposing of his interests there in 1868 he came to Macon, where he began at the bottom round, clerking for several years. He afterward became junior member of the firm of Jacques, Johnson & Cox, wholesale dealers in liquors and cigars. He subsequently established in company with Mr. Corbin the firm of Cox & Corbin, and now handles groceries and provisions exclusively. The domestic life of Mr. Cox has been most felicitous, his home having been presided over since November of 1873 by Lizzie, the accomplished daughter of Col. J. E. Jones, a former president of the Central Georgia bank, and for long years a leading spirit in the business circles of Macon. After his death Mr. Cox purchased the old Jones homestead, one of the most beautiful residence properties in the city, where he now resides. William R. Cox is a wide-awake business man, and is interested in various business enterprises. He is vice-president of the Central Georgia bank, and a director of the Southwestern railroad. In politics he votes the democratic ticket, is a Methodist in religion, and is an ex-alderman of the city of Macon, and president of the Alexander free school board of that city.

WILLIAM A. DAVIS, one of the most prominent business men in Bibb county, was born on a farm eight miles east of Macon, Ga., April 4, 1847, living there until he was thirty years of age. He studied at Jeffersonville, Twiggs Co., Ga., in the years 1861-2-3. In 1863, though but sixteen years old, he entered the Confederate service, enlisting in Company B, Second Georgia battalion of cavalry, as a private, and later was made orderly sergeant, serving as such until the surrender. He fought in the battles of Chickamauga and Griswoldville, participated in many skirmishes, and left the service with an enviable record. After the cessation of hostilities he resumed his studies at the academy of Allentown, Twiggs Co., of which James E. Croslin, an educator of reputation, was principal, and then returned to his home in Bibb county, being called there by the death of his father. He managed the homestead from 1866 to 1877, during which period he was elected to represent Twiggs county in the general assembly, and during the session served with distinction on the committees on agriculture, public institutions and other matters before the legislature. A majority of his fellow-members not favoring the permanent institution of the college at Dahlonega, a bill to that end was defeated, but Mr. Davis secured a reconsideration and succeeded in having the bill passed, to which fact the agricultural college at that point now owes its existence, and for which service he received unstinted praise. Entering municipal as well as state politics Mr. Davis has been elected alderman from three different wards of the city of Macon—serving six years in all in the city council—and for four years of that time he acted as mayor pro tem. He has also been road commissioner from his district for several years. In 1880 he came to Macon and five years later, in company with M. C. Balcomb, engaged in the business of handling cotton, the style of the firm being Davis & Balcomb. This firm existed until 1890, when it was re-arranged under the title of W. A. Davis & Co., and now continues as such. For years Mr. Davis was a director of the Merchants' National bank of Macon, which went into voluntary liquidation in 1893. He is now vice-president and director of the Guarantee company of Macon, and has interests in various other business enterprises. He is a thirty-second degree Mason and a Mystic Shriner. He has held all the principal offices in the subordinate lodges, to-wit, past master of Macon lodge, No. 5, F. & A. M.; past high priest of Constantine chapter, Royal Arch Masons; past eminent commander of the St. Omar commandery, Knights Templars, and he is at this time grand senior warden of the grand lodge of the state. He is also a member of the I. O. O. F. and the Encampment, having held all the chairs and being at present district deputy grand master. He is past noble grand of United Brother's lodge, I. O. O. F., and past chief patriarch of the Encampment. He is, as well, a Knight of Pythias. He affiliates with the Baptist church, and, while living on his farm, was for many years a deacon of the local church. In 1868 Mr. Davis married Mary R., daughter of J. W. and Susan (Barlow) Summers; they have four children, Hattie B., Edwin, Mabel C., and Gussie M. Edwin is a graduate of Mercer university, Macon. Mr. Davis' father was Elisha Davis, a native of Burke county, Ga., who was several times elected to the general assembly. He was a jurist and served on the bench of the inferior court of Bibb county for many years. He died in 1866 at the age of sixty-one. Two of his sons, in addition to William A., served in the late war. John N. was in the Bibb county cavalry and with the western army almost all the time that army was in the field. Gilbert M. enlisted in Hampton's brigade as a private, saw service during the entire war period, and was mustered out when in command of his company. Elisha Davis' father was John Davis, a Virginian by birth and the son of John Davis, a Welshman, who emigrated from Wales to Virginia and was killed in the revolution at the battle of Brandywine. William A. Davis has won his way in life by force of individuality and honest determination to succeed, using his great natural abilities to the best advantage; and as a public-spirited citizen has won a host of friends in social, business and political circles.

JOSEPH T. DERRY, professor of languages in the Wesleyan Female college, Macon, Ga., was born in Milledgeville, on Dec. 13, 1841. His early boyhood was spent in Milledgeville and Eatonton. When he was nine years of age his parents moved to Charleston, S. C., where they resided for two years. They then moved to Augusta, Ga., which continued to be Mr. Derry's home for twenty-six years. His preparatory instruction for Emory college was obtained in the Augusta schools. In 1859 he entered the junior class at Emory college, Oxford, Ga., from which he was graduated in 1860, with distinction. In the spring of 1861, when the "war between the states" began, Mr. Derry enlisted in the Confederate service, and for four years followed the starry cross of the southern Confederacy. At the close of the war he returned to Augusta and took up the profession of teaching. He was first at the head of a select, classical and English school; next was principal of the Houghton institute, and then for nine years was head of the classical department of the academy of Richmond county. He was holding this last position when he accepted a call to the chair of ancient and modern languages in Wesleyan Female college, Macon, Ga. This position he holds now—1895. Mr. Derry is the author of a school history of the United States, published in 1874; a Guide to Georgia, which appeared in 1878, and a history of the United States for schools, published in 1880, and the Story of the Confederate States, which appeared in May, 1895, and in less than three months reached a second edition. He has also, at different times, contributed valuable articles to Frank Leslie's, The Century and other leading magazines. Prof. Derry was married, Aug. 5, 1862, to Miss Elizabeth D. Osborne, of Augusta. Her great-grandfather, Hon. Henry Osborne, of Camden county, was a delegate to the state convention which ratified the constitution of the United States, Jan. 2, 1788. Prof. and Mrs. Derry have had several children born to them, of whom three are living: Henry P., a leading young physician, Macon; Susie, wife of T. C. Parker, a promising business man, Macon, and George Seney, a bright and promising lad, born in 1881.

WASHINGTON DESSAU, lawyer, Macon, was born in that city, July 24, 1852. His early education was obtained in the public schools, and in 1867 he entered the University of Georgia, at Athens. He was graduated in 1870, and from the law department in 1871. He then returned to Macon, and in October, 1871, entered the law office of Nesbits & Jackson, and was admitted to practice a few months later. He continued to practice in Macon, and in 1885 formed a partnership with C. L. Bartlett, which continued until Mr. Bartlett went on the bench in 1893, when Mr. Dessau formed a partnership with Robert Hodges. In 1884 Mr. Dessau was presidential elector from the sixth congressional district, and in 1888 was a delegate from the state at large to the National democratic convention. In 1892 he was president of the Georgia Bar association, and has been a member of the state democratic executive committee for two terms.

Mr. Dessau was married, in 1880, to Fanny E., daughter of Edward H. Gilmer, of Montgomery, Ala., a nephew of George R. Gilmer, who was governor of Georgia.

SAMUEL S. DUNLAP is a leading spirit in the industrial life of Macon, Ga., to which city he came, a penniless youth, forty-six years ago. With but an ordinary education, he began his career, in November, 1849, as a clerk in a retail grocery, at $96 per year, and board. For three years he remained in the same position, and even with that insignificant salary was able to save enough to start a very small business of his own. Success attended him from the very start; his business increased, and the war found him on the highway to wealth. Heeding his country's call, Mr. Dunlap joined a cavalry company and served six months as first lieutenant. He then resigned and returned home, where he organized and led to the field, as captain, the Bibb cavalry. This company he uniformed and equipped at his own expense, selling a lot of cotton for the purpose. It is but fair to say that such disinterestedness was repaid by the individual members subsequently. He participated in many of the hard-fought battles of the war, notably: Second Manassas, Harper's Ferry, Sharpsburg and Gettysburg. In the latter he was seriously wounded in a personal encounter with a Federal officer, and spent several months in the hospital at Richmond. He returned from the war, sick and wounded in body, but not daunted in spirit. Like many others, he found himself without means. Renting a farm, he began its cultivation, and mother nature smiled on his efforts, notwithstanding the fact that only one hand could be used on the plow, the other being carried in a sling. In 1867 Mr. Dunlap concluded to again try a mercantile life, and this time selected the hardware business. Again fortune smiled on him, and he continued to increase his humble beginning, until he is now at the head of one of the largest establishments of the kind in the south, the Dunlap Hardware company being favorably known all over the state.

Mr. Dunlap has always been a man of great enterprise, and instead of allowing his means to accumulate and remain idle, he invested in various industrial and banking institutions. He is president and a leading stockholder in the Macon Agricultural works, president of the Macon Fire Insurance company, a director in each of the three leading financial institutions of Macon, the Exchange Union Savings and Central bank, and a large stockholder in the Southwestern railroad. He also cultivates a magnificently improved plantation of 400 acres, lying within two miles of the city. Mr. Dunlap has been a member of the Methodist church since he was twelve years old, and has always taken part in the active work of that organization. He was for many years superintendent of Mission Sunday school, and is now a member of the board of stewards. A word concerning his family: Samuel S. Dunlap was born in Jasper county, Ga., July 31, 1830. He was the son of David and Hetty (Wingate) Dunlap, his father being a farmer of limited circumstances. He reared six sons to maturity; five of them did their duty bravely in the army, and two of them are now living, Rev. William C. Dunlap, of Covington, a Methodist preacher of note, being the other. In 1855, May 15, Mr. Dunlap celebrated his nuptials with Mary A., daughter of J. L. Birgh, of Bibb county, to whom were born seven children. Six of these are now living, as follows: Nettie, Mrs. H. M. Wortham, Macon; Florence, Mrs. Ashton Stark, Richmond, Va.; Clara, Mrs. Claude Badgely, Albany, N. Y.; Lillia, Mrs. Lewis A. Stevens, Atlanta, Ga.; Ilah, Mrs. Col. Lee A. Jordan, Macon; Samuel S., Jr., at home. In 1873 Mr. Dunlap erected one of the most beautiful homes in the city of Macon, where he lives, surrounded by family and friends, enjoying the means his industry has brought him.

WILLIAM HAMILTON FELTON, JR., present solicitor-general of the Macon circuit, was born on a farm in Macon county, Ga., Sept. 19, 1860, and lived there fifteen years. He was educated at the schools of his native county and at Mercer university, at Macon, Ga., where he graduated with second honors and the degree of A. B. In October, 1878, he entered the law department of the University of Virginia, and took the degree of B. A. there, in July, 1880. He was admitted to the bar in Macon, Ga., Dec. 1, 1880, and immediately opened an office there. A year later he formed a partnership with Tracy Baxter, which continued until 1888, when Mr. Felton was elected solicitor-general. He was re-elected in 1892, for a term ending Jan. 1, 1897. Mr. Felton is one of Georgia's leading democratic politicians, always ready and willing to work for the good of his party and his country. He was elected to the legislature in 1886, and served two years, being a member of the following committees: Judiciary, railroads and banks. He is a Mystic Shriner Mason and a Knight of Pythias. He was married, Nov. 28, 1888, to Miss Mary E. Johnston, daughter of the late William B. Johnson. Mr. Felton's father was LeRoy Monroe Felton, a native of Jones county, Ga., a very large planter in Macon county all his life, who died in May, 1894, at the age of sixty-eight years. Mr. Felton, Sr., served repeatedly in both branches of the state legislature. Mr. Felton's grandfather, William Felton, was a North Carolinian, who came to Georgia in his early manhood, about 1815. The Felton family are of English descent.

MATTHEW R. FREEMAN, city recorder of Macon, Ga., was born there Oct. 10, 1837. Receiving his rudimentary and academic education in the schools of that place he entered the Georgia Military institute at Marietta and studied there during the years 1853-4-5, but left on the completion of his junior course. Among his classmates were Gen. P. M. B. Young of north Georgia; Charles H. Olmstead and Charlton N. Way, both of Savannah; John Milledge, state librarian and others prominent in political, judicial and professional circles. On leaving the military institute in 1855 young Freeman returned to Macon and entered the foundry and machine shop of Robert Findley in order that he might learn the machinist's trade. He remained there three and one-half years and at the end of that time commenced to study medicine with the late Dr. M. S. Thompson, after which he graduated at the Southern Medical and Botanical college, now extinct, at Macon. He began the practice of medicine in his native city and prosecuted it with success until in April, 1861, when he followed his company, the Macon guards, an old established division of militia, of which he was first lieutenant, into the field in the Confederate service and was assigned to the Eighth Georgia regiment. This company was afterward known as Company C. Mr. Freeman served as first lieutenant in that company and regiment until the autumn of 1863, when he was made assistant inspector-general on the staff of Col. John C. Fizer, and served in that capacity up to the date of Sherman's campaign through Georgia, when he was assigned to the reserve corps of that state with the rank of major. He joined Hardee's brigade and made the campaign of Georgia and the Carolinas, which was terminated by the surrender of Johnston at Greensborough, N. C. He fought in the following battles: First Manassas, dam No. 1 at Yorktown, Garnett's farm, Malvern Hill, Rappahannock Station, Thoroughfare Gap, Second Manassas, South Mountain, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Gettysburg, Knoxville, Tenn., the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Fort Harrison and Appomattox. After the surrender of Lee Mr. Freeman returned to Macon and for eighteen months engaged in handling cotton and merchandising, which he carried on until 1880. In November of that year he was badly injured in a railroad accident on the Georgia Central, which laid him up in bed for six months and made him an invalid for four years, during which time he was unable to attend to any business. At the suggestion of friends he commenced the study of law and was admitted to the bar May 13, 1887, establishing himself in Macon and opening the practice he now enjoys. In December, 1890, Mr. Freeman was elected recorder of Macon for a term of three years and in 1893 was re-elected for another period of two years, the term of office having been made shorter by the new charter. A stanch democrat, he has never taken any active part in politics, but his opinions have weight with the party managers. He is a Knight Templar Mason in the St. Omar commandery of Macon and a member of the I. O. O. F., as well as of the uniform rank, Knights of Pythias. Mr. Freeman was married Feb. 15, 1859, to Fanny E., daughter of the late Dr. A. A. Cullen, Sandersville, Ga., and they have six living children, three sons and three daughters: Azel R.; Harriet G., wife of H. G. Griswold, Macon, Ga.; Della S., wife of W. K. Young, Macon, Ga.; E. Walker, Fanny (unmarried) and Augustus C. His father was Azel Roe Freeman, born in New Jersey in 1791, who came to Georgia in 1825 and with his brother settled in Macon, where they built the first brick store-room and entered into business, which they carried on for a number of years. Azel Roe Freeman was for fifteen years clerk and treasurer of the city of Macon and to all intents and purposes the mayor. He was the first steward of Wesleyan Female college in 1839. At the close of the war he organized the Mechanics' Building and Loan association and the Ocmulgee Building and Loan association in Macon, serving as secretary and treasurer of both these institutions from their inception until his death in 1872. Shortly after he had succeeded in establishing the organizations above mentioned he formed the Home Building and Loan association, occupying the same dual position in it as he held in the two others. He was a devout member of the Mulberry street Methodist Episcopal church. He was a sergeant in the war of 1812, serving in Capt. David Todd's company, Kentucky mounted militia. Six of his sons fought in the late and other wars. Matthew R. Freeman's service on the field has already been detailed. Thomas S. Freeman was killed at Goliad, Tex., in the war of Texas independence in 1836. He was second corporal in Capt. M. J. Bullock's company, Ward's battalion, Georgia volunteers. Henry C., who was a soldier in the Mexican war and lieutenant in a Georgia regiment in the civil war, was in 1864, while stationed at Fort Pulaski, captured near Savannah and sent to Fort Delaware; from there to Johnston's island and was held a prisoner until the war closed. He died in 1865. George C. was in the Confederate treasury department during the civil war. Benjamin P. and Milo S. held positions in the transportation department of the Confederacy during the same period. Matthew R. Freeman and his wife are members of the Mulberry street Methodist Episcopal church and highly esteemed in a large circle of acquaintances.

DR. WILLIAM B. GILMER was born in Macon, Ga., in 1859; was there reared and educated, graduating at Mercer university in 1878, with the degree of A. B. For two years after graduating he was engaged with his uncle, H. J. Lamar, in the wholesale drug business, and then entered the college of physicians and surgeons in New York city, where he graduated in 1884. The same year he passed a competitive examination for interne of Roosevelt hospital and remained there eighteen months. Then he took a second examination and entered the women's hospital and served as interne there for eight months. The following ten months he spent with Dr. Nathan Bozeman, the gynecologist, and with this extended preparation for the practice of his profession returned south and sought a location. Finding none that suited him he returned to New York and practiced there for two and a half years. Dr. Gilmer then came to Macon, remaining eight months, after which he went to Vienna, where he studied in the general hospital for a time and in Prof. Crabach's clinic took a course in obstetrics and gynecology. From Vienna Dr. Gilmer came to Macon, where he has since made a specialty of gynecology and obstetrics, with most remarkable success and ever-increasing fame. Dr. Gilmer is a member of the Greek society, Kappa Alpha, and affiliates with the Baptist church. He was married in August, 1888, to Mary, daughter of E. H. Ryder of Nova Scotia. Dr. Gilmer's father, Edwin H. Gilmer, a nephew of the late Ex-Gov. Gilmer of Georgia, was a merchant and planter, who was born in Alabama and died in 1864. The emigrant ancestor of the family was Dr. Gilmer, a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, who came to America in 1740, and settled in Virginia. Branches of the family afterward located in North Carolina and Alabama. Dr. Gilmer is one of the best read and progressive young physicians in his native state.

GUSTAVUS RICHARD GLENN, state school commissioner, and resident of Macon, Ga., is a native of Jackson county, Ga., having been born away from the noise and bustling activity of a city, in a quiet country home, on Dec. 5, 1848. He removed with his parents to Terrell county, Ga., at the age of six years, and in a small schoolhouse located in the neighboring town of Chickasawhatchie, first marshaled his young and immature faculties in the training of the intellect and to the subsequent fullness of his education. He remained here during the four turbulent years of civil strife, and when this was concluded he was sent under the tutorship of Rev. William Park, in Meriwether county, who conducted the Mt. Carmel school. This was a preparatory institution for entrance into the state university, and young Glenn studied with this purpose in view. Having completed the course he became a student at Athens, graduating in 1871, with an A. B. degree, and after another year, devoting his time to post-graduate work, with an A. M. degree—including the entire curriculum of the college. In the fall of 1872, with his diploma in his possession, he went to Columbus, Ga., and for the next three years taught school, establishing two years afterward the Columbus female college, which he managed with exceptional success until the buildings were destroyed by fire in 1884. Then he accepted the professorship of natural science in the Wesleyan female college, located at Macon, Ga., and filled this chair with eminent ability until he resigned in 1892. In the fall of 1893, Mr. Glenn assumed the business managership of the "Macon Telegraph," remaining until Dec. 14, 1894. He was then appointed state school commissioner by Gov. W. Y. Atkinson. On July 22, 1875, he was united in marriage to Nellie, daughter of Henry W. Verstill, formerly of Columbus, but now residing in Atlanta. She was a beautiful, talented lady with the admirable characteristics that bless the home life, encourage the husband in his daily labors and comfort when anxieties and vexations fret the disposition. This union has been blessed with ten children, three boys and seven girls. Mr. Glenn affiliates with and is a steward in the Methodist church of Macon, having held this honorable position many years. Although the performance of his professional duties demands his presence in Atlanta, his home is in Macon, Bibb Co., Ga.

HON. DUPONT GUERRY was born at Americus, Sumter Co., on March 26, 1848. His father, Wm. B. Guerry, is a descendant of the French Huguenots, who, many years ago, settled in the state of South Carolina. His mother, whose maiden name was Sarah A. Dixon, is a descendant of a South Carolina family of English extraction.

DuPont Guerry owes his entire education to two years' attendance at the common schools of his native town, and to his father, who aided him materially in his studies. He, therefore, entered upon the duties of life without the advantages afforded by a regular course at college or university.

Before he had attained the age of fifteen years, he volunteered in the military service of the Confederate States, and presented himself ready for the privations of the camp and the perils of the field, as a private in the army of northern Virginia. Much to the regret of this boy-soldier and patriot, he was rejected by Gen. Pendleton, on account of extreme youth and smallness of stature. Thus disappointed in his effort to serve his country in the ranks of the noble army mentioned, he turned with manly resolution and hope, to the army then under the command of Gen.

Joseph E. Johnston; but about this time the news reached him that the militia officers of Georgia were called to service, and he joined them, on their organization, at Atlanta. When the militia (proper) were called out, and their reorganization took place, he was elected a lieutenant, although at that period he was scarcely 16 years of age. This opportunity to serve his state was most gratifying to him, and he improved it to the utmost, being ready at all times to give his life for the cause he had espoused. He engaged in the battles, on the right, which were fought at the city of Atlanta, in July, 1864, and there was no soldier who evinced greater gallantry in that army of chivalric men. Those who were eye-witnesses of his valor are enthusiastic in its praise. He was also in the battle of Griswoldville, and more than sustained his reputation for bravery in that contest. When Macon was captured by Gen. Wilson he was in the city, and preferring to escape rather than to be paroled, he and his father and a few others retired from that place after night through the railroad bridge, and succeeded in avoiding capture.

Determining to pursue the profession of law, in which his father was engaged, he accordingly began the study of that science. Devoting himself closely and assiduously to his books, he was, in due time, after a most creditable examination, admitted to the bar, and commenced the practice of the law at Americus, in conjunction with his father, in the year 1870. With the same earnestness, industry and resolution which distinguished him from childhood, and a mind, naturally judicial, well-stored with the eternal principles which constitute the legal science, he entered upon the duties of counsellor and attorney. Although he commenced the practice in the presence of a bar of great ability, he sustained himself from the beginning, and very soon received the most complimentary recognition of his ability and promise from the chief justice and justices of the supreme court of Georgia. His efforts before that tribunal very early marked him out as the peer of the first legal minds of this state, and as the years have passed, he has steadily developed his powers and extended his reputation as a lawyer.

In 1876, he was married to Miss Fannie Davenport, of Americus, a lady of rare beauty and accomplishments, who, having been his playmate in childhood and his friend in youth and early manhood, was a fit companion of his after life. This union has been blessed with four children, whose presence gives cumulative happiness to their home.

His election to the senate in 1880 was a merited compliment from one of the most wealthy and intelligent constituencies in the state. A more able, indefatigable or faithful representative of that district, or of the interests, rights and honor of the commonwealth, could not have been selected. He was a member of the standing committees of the senate on the judiciary, finance, banks, public buildings, railroads and internal improvements, being the chairman of the committee on finance during a great portion of the session of 1881, owing to the providential absence of its distinguished chairman, Hon. R. T. Fouce. He was, in addition, chairman of the joint standing committee on finance, and of the joint special committee, appointed to investigate and devise as to the acceptance of certain irregular United States bonds, which were tendered the state treasurer in payment of the balance due as purchase money for the Macon & Brunswick railroad. He was likewise a member of the joint special committee, appointed to investigate the lease of the Western & Atlantic railroad. Few, if any, senators were placed in so many important positions requiring industry and intelligence, yet he was equal to the task imposed, and discharged every duty cheerfully, promptly, and with great ability. During the session of 1881 he was present at every roll call, and always ready to advocate such measures as he deemed beneficial to the state, or oppose those which he regarded bad in policy or wrong in principle. His opposition to the acceptance of the irregular bonds of the United States, was decided. After a full investigation, as chairman of the committee, he presented the majority report, which was adverse to their acceptance, and sustained that report by a speech that has seldom been equaled in the senate of Georgia for clearness and force of argument. He handled the subject like an intellectual giant, making the line of duty so plain that scarcely a senator was left to oppose his views. But for this effort the bonds in question would, in all probability, have been accepted, and a large loss to the people might have resulted.

On the bill introduced by himself to compel the railroads of Georgia to adopt and enforce joint rates, he made a masterly argument. Then, when the Cole charter was before the senate on its final passage, his powers as debater were brought into exercise by the opposition which that measure encountered from the Hon. Henry D. McDaniel, who soon afterward became governor of Georgia. That gentleman desired to subject the bill to a material amendment, and the effort he made to accomplish this purpose met successful resistance only in the argument of Mr. Guerry, which may be truly characterized as overwhelming.

Mr. Guerry was a delegate from Sumter to the state convention of 1883, and was the author of the resolution to appoint the conference committee of eighteen, and which resulted in the nomination of his friend, Mr. McDaniel, for the office of governor. He has attended a number of other state conventions, and was a delegate, for the state at large, to the national democratic convention, which met at Chicago in 1892. He was appointed by President Cleveland United States attorney for the southern district of Georgia in 1886, and thereupon removed to Macon, where he now resides. He tendered his resignation to Mr. Cleveland, to take effect on March 4, 1889, but the same was not accepted until Mr. Harrison accepted it in April thereafter. Mr. Guerry has been quite active in politics, though an aspirant on two occasions only for political office. He has made speeches throughout Georgia during several campaigns, and, in 1892, made a number of speeches in Alabama at the request of the democratic national committee. He is a member of the Methodist church, and also of the board of trustees of the Wesleyan Female college. He is a member of the legal firms of Gustin, Guerry & Hall, at Macon, and Guerry & Son, at Americus.

WILLIAM MILLER GORDON. This gentleman is one of Macon's prominent business men, being general manager of the Progress Loan and Improvement company, and also senior member of the insurance firm of Gordon & Budd. Mr. Gordon lays claim to nativity in Macon county, his parents residing there at the time of his birth. As a matter of fact, however, that old and famous hostelry at Oglethorpe, Ga., known for long years as "Old Travelers' Rest," was his real birth-place, his parents being temporarily there when the event occurred. The parents, John and Catherine Gordon, removed to Perry, Houston Co., in 1858, where they still reside, at an advanced age. William M. Gordon was born April 19, 1851. His early education contemplated the law as a profession, but heavy reverses suffered by his father during and immediately following the war (his property being in slaves and in money loaned throughout the state) caused a change in their plans for the son. Instead of entering college, therefore, the youth, at seventeen, became acting deputy clerk of the court of Houston county. At nineteen he was enabled, by judicious economy, to enter in a small way the mercantile business at Perry. From time to time his success admitted an enlargement of the business, and it was not many years before he found himself at the head of a large and successful mercantile establishment. To his business he added that of farming, buying land in small lots as opportunity offered for profitable investment. In fact, it was the old story, too rarely realized, however, of honesty, persistence and the judicious use of money saved, that made Mr. Gordon one of the wealthy men of his community before middle age. In 1887 he decided to take up outside work, and removing to Macon, went into the general insurance business, and also became general manager of the Progress Loan and Improvement company. He still retains his interest in Houston county, where he owns some 7,000 acres of fine farming and fruit lands, and an interest in the mercantile establishment conducted by a brother at Perry. Mr. Gordon's success as a financier caused his selection in 1881 as the proper person to represent Houston county in the general assembly. It will be remembered that the session of '81-2 was a most important one, because of the weighty financial legislation which came before it—notably the building of the present beautiful capitol. Mr. Gordon was promptly made a member of the finance committee, and took a leading part in all the discussions which came up, acquitting himself with much credit. In September, 1884, Mr. Gordon was united in marriage to Bessie, daughter of J. T. Budd, of Monticello, Fla., who became the mother of two children, Josiah Budd and Catherine.

JOHN LUMSDEN HARDEMAN, judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit, was born in Macon, Ga., Nov. 12, 1851. In that city he was reared, receiving a rudimentary education, and in 1867 he entered the state university, graduating there in 1871, with the degree of A. B. He was a brilliant scholar, winning the debaters' medal and the anniversary oratorship from his college society—the Demosthenean—early giving promise of the great oratorical gifts which have made him famous at the bar, the forum and on the hustings.

It falls to the lot of but few men to be so gifted with the peculiar power of eloquence possessed by this distinguished son of Georgia. Peculiarly original, without the monotony of oft-repeated and hackneyed familiar quotations, his ornate addresses abound in gems from the classics and apt sayings from the sacred writings, which latter have a singular potency whenever properly applied. On leaving college his first work was in the cause of education, teaching school one year in Jones county.

Under Hon. James H. Blount he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1873. Immediately thereafter he accepted an offer of partnership, becoming a member of the law firm of Blount, Hardeman & Hardeman. He was twice elected to the office of solicitor-general of the Macon circuit, by the general assembly, holding that responsible trust from 1880 to 1888, and discharging its duties with that zeal and ability that has ever characterized him. No official ever gave more general satisfaction than has Judge Hardeman in the various positions of honor and trust to which the confidence of his people have called him. There lives no man more faithful and fearless in the discharge of duty. To those who enjoy the honor of an acquaintance with his life's work, this will not sound as anything but merited praise. His every act in public and private life seems born of a sacred regard for duty.

His last law partnership was with W. D. Nottingham, extending from 1888 to September, 1892. Soon after this he was appointed judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit, by Gov. Northen, which office he now holds, enjoying the confidence and esteem of bar and people. In 1889 he was elected a member of the house of representatives, from Bibb, and did valuable work in that body, serving on committees on general judiciary, railroads, banking and academy for the blind.

In 1878 he was made captain of the Floyd Rifles, one of the oldest and best military organizations in the state, being organized in 1841. For three years he was a member of the state military advisory board, of which he was secretary. In 1894 he was elected major of the Second regiment, infantry. This honor, as well as a still higher one in military circles—that of lieutenant-colonel—was easily within the reach of this gifted gentleman at another time in the past; but by reason of loyalty to his company, whose devotion to him caused them to pass a resolution urging him not to accept, but to continue as their captain, this tempting honor was put aside. This act of self-denial but simply accords with the unselfish nature of the man. The final acceptance was due to the accumulation of judicial labor that made it necessary to resign the captaincy and become major, with its less exacting duties.

Judge Hardeman was, prior to his present appointment, attorney for Bibb county. Many and varied are the positions of trust and responsibility he has filled.

He is a member of the F. & A. M. and of the Knights of Pythias, having held in the latter the captaincy of the uniformed rank, resigning it in 1893. He is past chancellor, commander of Empire lodge, No. 11, which, however, disbanded some time ago. He is also a member of the Baptist church, and in 1875 was united in marriage with Miss Fannie E., daughter of John B. Ross, who was at the time of his death a wealthy and leading merchant of Macon. In 1894 he was elected a trustee of the Georgia academy for the blind, an institution for which his honored and lamented father faithfully labored.

On April 27, 1894, within five minutes after receiving official information of the resignation of Judge Charles L. Bartlett, Gov. Northen appointed Judge Hardeman to his present position. This prompt selection of the governor's from among so able a bar as that of the Macon circuit stands as a well deserved tribute to the personal and professional character of the gentleman chosen, while the uniform correctness of his rulings and the respect and confidence he commands and enjoys among the members of the bar will attest the wisdom displayed in his selection.

Still in the prime of life, of great mental and physical vigor, Judge Hardeman has before him a brilliant career, and a devoted people only await his consent to bestow additional honors on him. Judge Hardeman resides in a palatial mansion on the heights in Vineville, a beautiful suburb of Macon. His home is graced by a lovely wife, a lady of most elegant and entertaining manners. One child has blessed their union—young Tom Hardeman, who is just budding into manhood, who bears the name of his distinguished grandfather, and is the pride of his parents. Many are the distinguished guests who have enjoyed the hospitality of this home.

Verily the lines of this favored son of fortune seem to have fallen in pleasant places. But those who have watched his career know best that his eminent success in life is largely due to his untiring energy, his high sense of honor, as well as other noble traits of character. Generous, chivalrous, manly—a truly typical southern gentleman is he—possessing qualities of head and heart that bind his friends to him as with hooks of steel. No wonder that he is successful in the varied paths to which the versatility of his genius has borne him. Well versed in matters military, an able lawyer and jurist, learned in statesmanship, his life of success affords an example for the rising generation.

“Colonel Hardeman was always a generous antagonist, just, courteous, fair and honorable, scoring no underhanded advantage, and dealing nothing but legitimate blows. Such a man as this candid and lofty gentleman made politics honorable and elevated public agitations. The truth is that Tom Hardeman, as he is familiarly called, is the type of truth, correctness and fidelity, and has been a true representative of our best Georgia manhood; and he never made a poor or an uninteresting speech in his life." (Avery's History of Georgia).

THOMAS HARDEMAN, JR., as he was popularly known (his real name being John Thomas), was born in Putnam county, Ga., Jan. 12, 1825, at what is known as the Brooks place, a few miles from Eatonton. His Hardeman ancestors were Welsh and settled in Virginia. Three brothers spread from these. Thomas Hardeman followed Daniel Boone into Kentucky, Hardeman county, Tenn., being named for him. Isaac Hardeman went west, and was one of the defenders of the Alamo, Hardeman county, Tex., being named for him; the Confederate general, W. P. Hardeman, was a son of this one. The other brother, John, came to Georgia and settled in Jackson county, in the part which afterward became Oglethorpe. This John, the grandfather of the subject of our sketch, was one of the earliest clerks of the superior court of Oglethorpe county. He was the father of one daughter and five sons: Thomas; Jack, who moved to Mississippi; Robert V., a state senator in 1845 from Jones county and twice judge of the superior court of the Ocmulgee circuit; Benj. Franklin, state senator from Oglethorpe in 1851, and twice solicitor-general of the northern circuit; and Isaac, who died in childhood.

Thomas Hardeman, Sr., was born in April, 1797, in Oglethorpe county. He was married Oct. 16, 1821, to Sarah Blewett Sparks, they being the parents of Thomas Hardeman, Jr., and also of Robert Ulla Hardeman, the present state treasurer, who has held his position since 1884, having opposition in his own party only once. Faithful and pure, Robt. U. has more warm personal friends than any man in the state. They lived for many years in Putnam, Thos. Hardeman, Sr., being several times sheriff of that county, a position he resigned rather than execute a negro that had been sentenced to be hanged, and afterward became clerk of the superior court. In 1832 they moved to Macon, soon settling in Vineville.

Thos. Hardeman, Jr., was graduated at Emory college in 1845. Beside leading in his literary society he stood high in the class of that year, which has long been considered the banner class of the institution. He studied law at Clinton under his uncle, Robert V. Hardeman, and was there admitted to the bar April 20, 1847, Judge James A. Meriwether presiding. He was defeated for solicitor-general of the Flint circuit in November, 1847, by R. W. McCune, who was then the incumbent. This so discouraged him that he soon abandoned the profession of law and turned his attention to the business of a commission merchant which he followed almost uninterruptedly up to his death. In 1846 he had an assistant's position in the clerical department of the house of representatives, to which he was re-appointed in 1849 and 1851.

In 1853 he first entered political life with the following announcement:

"To the Citizens of Bibb County:—The time for selecting those who shall represent you in the state legislature is rapidly approaching, and at the solicitation of many friends of both political parties, I offer myself as a candidate for your support. Questions involving the future interest of our city, and thereby of our county, will command the attention of our next general assembly, and with a view of advancing that interest, independent of party obligations and caucus requirements, I have been induced to offer myself a candidate to represent you, pledging myself, if elected, to represent your interests independent of such obligations."

He was a whig, and though the parties were evenly divided in Bibb county, in the election he led all competitors by seventy-five votes over the leading democratic candidate, leaving his brother whig 125, Bibb being entitled to two representatives.

In those days each county was entitled to one senator; so in 1855 he was a whig candidate for senator, defeating Leroy Napier, the democratic candidate, and being again far in the lead among his own party candidates. In 1857 he was again elected to the house, still leading the ticket. He at once took a prominent stand upon first entering the legislature, devoting his energies to the advancement of the people and to the upbuilding and fostering of all public institutions, especially the academy for the blind and the Georgia military institute, so much so that in 1859, when he was the whig (or American, as it was then called) candidate for congress, he was fought most bitterly for the interest thus displayed, but, nevertheless, he was elected to congress over Alexander M. Speer, a democrat, who afterward became judge of the supreme court of the state. He was the only Georgia whig, with the exception of Joshua Hill, elected to that congress, the other members of the delegation being all democrats, Robt. Toombs and Alfred Iverson being in the senate, Martin J. Crawford, Peter Love, Lucius J. Gartrell, John W. H. Underwood, James Jackson and John J. Jones being in the house. The Americans believing strongly in the south were nicknamed "South Americans." All of this delegation have passed away except John Jones of Burke; Hill and Hardeman, the only whigs, dying within a few hours of each other on the night of March 7, 1891.

From Dec. 7, 1859, to Feb. 1, 1860, there was no organization of the national house of representatives. The republicans coming into power all elements of the opposition fiercely fought them for the speakership.

On the first ballot Bocock, the democratic candidate, led with John Sherman, republican, a close second, Mr. Hardeman alone voting for his colleague, Mr. Hill. He then alone on the second ballot supported Mr. Boteler, of Virginia, whose vote afterward reached as high as forty-nine. On the twenty-eighth ballot Mr. Boteler, Zeb Vance and Hardeman voted for W. M. H. Smith, of North Carolina, and from these three he gradually grew until the forty-first ballot, the vote then being Pennington, republican, 115; Smith, 113; necessary to a choice, 117. Pennington on the forty-fourth ballot gained two votes and was elected.

Early in the session in a short speech Mr. Hardeman said: "It has been charged here by a portion of the members on my left, that the responsibility for not organizing rests on the opposition members from the south. Now, I wish to state distinctly that I am opposed to and shall oppose from now till Christmas next year the election of a republican candidate for speaker. At the same time I will not and cannot support a man who indorses the opinions of Judge Douglas, which opinions are, I think, subversive of southern interests and southern rights, to-wit, that the organic act confers on the people of a territory while in a territorial condition the power to exclude slavery by unfriendly legislation."

This was a stormy session of congress, the southern members all banding together regardless of politics.

On Jan. 19, 1861, when Georgia seceded from the Union he, although strongly opposed to secession, with all of the Georgia delegation except Mr. Hill, withdrew from congress, not resigning, but contending that the secession of Georgia vacated their seats, Mr. Hill holding a different view of his obligation of the state's position, formally resigned. Mr. Toombs was afterward expelled from the senate. By this time the preparation for war had begun in earnest. Mr. Hardeman, being captain of the Floyd Rifles, a position he occupied since Jan. 5, 1856, at once tendered the services of his company to Gov. Brown. In April that company, together with the Macon volunteers and City Light guards of Columbus, were ordered to Norfolk and on April 22 arrived at Portsmouth navy yard, while it was still burning, having been fired by United States officials on evacuating the place, they being the first troops from any state, except Virginia, to appear in the Old Dominion in behalf of the Confederacy. They, together with the Spalding Grays of Griffin, which arrived a day or two later, were at once organized into the Second Georgia battalion by the election of Capt. Hardeman as major. On March 15, 1862, he was promoted to the colonelcy of the Forty-fifth Georgia regiment; at Frazier's farm on June 30, 1863, "while nobly encouraging his brave men, was severely wounded" (Gen. Anderson's official report), from which wound he never recovered, suffering seriously until the day of his death. Being discharged on account of physical disability, he returned to Macon and was elected a member of the house of representatives in October, 1863, and upon its organization was made speaker, defeating the Hon. B. H. Bingham by a vote of 86 to 58. He was appointed major to take charge of a conscript camp in 1863, which commission he returned, declining to accept the position. On July 10, 1864, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel and aide-de-camp to Gen. G. W. Smith, who commanded the state troops and was serving with him when the war closed.

In 1865, upon the assembling of the first legislature after the fall of the Confederacy, he was again elected to the legislature and upon the organization of the house was elected speaker, defeating Judge E. H. Pottle by a vote of 117 to 17. Upon taking his seat he delivered the following address:

"We are convened to-day under circumstances of no ordinary character. Our difficulties are many and threatening, yet, as the pillar of fire guided the children of Israel through the perils of the wilderness, so may the star of patriotic duty so shed its light upon our pathway as to conduct our people to the land of deliverance and of hope.

"The political status of our state depends in a great measure upon our actions here. May I be permitted to hope, in view of the great interests at stake, we may so shape our legislative action as to secure for our people a restoration of civil law and insure for our state a position and representation in the council of the nation?

"It were useless to disguise the fact, gentlemen, that all the dreams of a southern Confederacy and a separate nationality have passed away, and having qualified ourselves for citizenship by swearing to support the constitution of the United States, it becomes us in good faith to comply with this obligation and so legislate as to convince even our enemies of the sincerity of our intention and the purity of our motives. This can be accomplished without servile submission or sycophantic protestations that belie the action of our people during the struggle through which they have so heroically passed, by a manly regard for principle, and a faithful observance of the constitution which we have sworn to support. Now that the carnage and strife of war are over, it were vain to spend our time in idle regrets for and crocodile tears over the events of the past. Action, bold, enterprising action, is necessary for our success in the present and our hope for the future; to enliven the home made desolate, to rebuild our ruined cities, to revive our drooping commerce, to vocalize our streams with the music of machinery, to fill our furnaces with the fruit of honest industry and our granaries with the rich harvest of our fertile fields.

"I know our prospects are as drear as a winter scene. A dark cloud obscures our political horizon and no bow spans its mantling gloom; but southern energy and southern enterprise will not bend before the storm that gathers in its bosom, but outliving its fury will be all-powerful in rebuilding the broken fortunes of our people and restoring our state to the proud position she occupied before war desolated her happy hearthstones or its results marred her hitherto untarnished escutcheon.

"To facilitate these results, gentlemen, wise, prudent, economical legislation will be required of this general assembly; protection to person and property should be given to that unfortunate class who have been left homeless and unprotected in our midst; and protection should be secured against that spirit of lawlessness and vice that mistaken notions of freedom have engendered in their bosom.

"Our agricultural pursuits, now languishing for want of a proper system of labor, our mechanical interest so essential to the complete development of our greatness, especially need our fostering care and support.

"Liberal arrangements should be made for the education of our poor children, and above all we should provide for the maimed soldier and the orphaned little ones of those gallant men who evinced their devotion to their cause by shedding blood,

That so holy was,
It would not stain the purest rill
That sparkles in the grove of bliss;

and who by their gallant deeds and heroic bearing have created in the hearts of their countrymen a monument as lasting as the foundation of their own granite hills.

"In the discharge of our duties let no jealous bickerings or party strife mar the harmony of our actions. Forgetting the animosities of the past, burying with our noble dead those old issues that have been effaced by their blood, let us with one accord renew our allegiance to the state and to the Union, and by our legislation here and actions elsewhere convince the world that Georgia, though prostrate, will rise again; though desolated, her fields will gladden once more with waving harvest the hearts of her husbandmen; though stricken with poverty, her hills will enrich with their hidden treasure and her commerce whiten with her sails her ocean waters, and though her schools are deserted and her colleges suspended, learning will decorate her brow with the wreaths of science and religion rekindle her fires upon the desecrated altars of her faith. Though joined to the rock of an irresistible destiny, she will sever the cords that bind her, and with stately step and graceful mien resume her onward and upward march to glory and to greatness.

"Invoking upon our deliberations the wisdom of divine agency, let us now proceed to the duties confided to us by a generous constituency, humbly praying that our labors will redound to Georgia's interest and to the nation's glory."

And here he thus early sounded the signal for the fight that he ever afterward kept up. Public education, liberal provision for the Confederates and for the orphans of those who had been killed, justice to the negro, but supremacy for his own race.

The keynote to all of his future efforts was: "Georgia, though prostrate, will rise again."

In 1853 he rendered signal service to the academy of the blind by securing an appropriation to erect the building and was a great friend to the Georgia military institute at Marietta, and strove hard for the removal of the capital from Milledgeville to Macon. The bill for the removal was introduced by Wilde Cleveland of Crawford, but a substitute of Mr. Hardeman's was adopted, and on its final passage the vote was 51 to 51, when the speaker, John E. Ward, voted "aye." This bill provided for a submission of the question to a popular vote at the regular election of 1855, when it was defeated by a vote of 49,781 to 34,545. He also opposed the bill for the sale of the state road, as he did again in 1855 and 1857.

In 1855 a strong effort was made to require all free persons of color to leave the state in a given time. Senator Hardeman was not noted for the fairness of his complexion, nor was a certain other senator who was serving with him. The house had passed this bill, and on its third reading a viva-voce vote had been taken in the senate, but before it was announced, Mr. Hardeman moved to amend the same, so that the bill should read "to require all free persons of color to leave the state, except the senators from the counties of Kinchefonsee and Bibb."

Not appreciating the joke, the other senator at once made his way to the senator from Bibb, demanding explanations, much to the amusement of all the senate. Taking advantage of the opportunity, Mr. Hardeman at once moved to indefinitely postpone the bill, which motion was carried.

He secured from a special committee on the Georgia military institute a bill to appropriate $15,000 for two years, which passed by a vote of 48 to 46, he being at that time one of the committee. In 1857 he succeeded in having passed a bill to erect a monument in Macon to Capt. Isaac Holmes, who commanded the Macon Guards in the Mexican war, and who died while in that country. He strenuously tried to obtain an appropriation of $3,000 to the military, which he failed to do. He again championed a bill to remove the capital to Macon or Atlanta and to submit it to the voters. In each of these three legislatures he had a prominent place on the committees on banks, finance, internal improvements, etc., and at each session was on the committee that had charge of the inaugurals of Govs. Johnson and Brown.

In 1863 and 1864 he still performed military duties at all times, except when the legislature was in session. The legislature meeting in Macon on Feb. 15, 1865, Mr. Hardeman urged upon the people, the citizens of Macon, to do all in their power to secure the location of the capital there, but leading men of the city did not approve it. In the sessions of 1865 and 1866 he championed state aid to the Macon & Brunswick railroad, and the woman's bills, of one of which he was the author. These were making wife-whipping or mal-treatment a misdemeanor, the wife to be a competent witness; and the other to allow a woman to own and inherit or buy property in her own right, whether feme covert or feme sole.

He was the last speaker of the Georgia house of representatives under the Confederate government, and the first under the United States in the new regime.

He earnestly favored the rehabilitation of Georgia as a state in the Union, and at the same time lifted his voice in two-thirds of the counties for his race to stand together. He voted to accord to the negro his legal rights, but eloquently battled for the supremacy of the white race.

Having been in congress prior to the war, and being in the Confederate army, brought upon him disabilities. President Johnson granted him the following pardon under the great seal of the United States:

"Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America.
"To All To Whom These Presents Shall Come, Greeting:

"Whereas, Thomas Hardeman, of Macon, Ga., by taking part in the late rebellion against the government of the United States, has made himself liable to heavy pains and penalties;

"And whereas the circumstances of the case render him a proper object of executive clemency;

"Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, president of the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, and divers other good and sufficient reasons to me thereunto moving, do hereby grant to the said Thomas Hardeman a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed, arising from a participation, direct or implied, in said rebellion, conditioned as follows, to-wit: This pardon is given to take effect from the date on which the said Thomas Hardeman shall take the oath prescribed in the proclamation of the president, dated May 29, 1865, and to be void and of no effect if the said Thomas Hardeman shall hereafter, at any time, acquire any property whatever in slaves or make use of slave labor, and that he first pay all costs which may have accrued in any proceedings hitherto instituted against his person or property up to the date of the acceptance of this warrant;

"And upon the further consideration that the said Thomas Hardeman shall notify the secretary of state in writing that he has received and accepted the foregoing pardon.

"In testimony whereof I have hereto signed my name and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

(Seal.)

"ANDREW JOHNSON.

"By the President.

WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

"Done at the city of Washington this, the 28th day of August, A. D. 1865, and of the independence of the United States 90th."

The United States congress fettered all of those of the south who had held any position of prominence by imposing pains and penalties from which congressional action alone could free them. Despite the fact that no political honors or preferment could be in store for him, Col. Hardeman kept up the fight for democracy, traveling over more counties and making more speeches in 1872 and 1874 and prior thereto than any man in Georgia.

He was put upon the state democratic executive committee in 1872, and served four years as chairman.

On April 3, 1874, by a special act, congress removed his political disabilities, he being one of the very last in the state to have this ban set aside; in three months thereafter he was nominated by the democrats of Bibb county to the legislature, again leading the ticket, as he afterward did in the election.

On the assembling of the legislature on Jan. 13, 1875, Col. Hardeman was elected speaker over Hon. A. O. Bacon, the speaker of the last house, by two votes, Capt. Bacon being then elected speaker pro tem. Thomas J. Simmons, of Bibb, was elected president of the senate.

This house was rich in its membership. A. R. Lawton, O. Warner, H. G. Turner, A. O. Bacon, J. L. Warren, W. D. Anderson, H. H. Carlton, Allen D. Candler, W. T. Wofford, L. F. Livingston, Patrick Walsh, A. M. Speer, W. M. Hammond, T. M. Furlow, J. C. C. Black, and a host of others, who, since that time, have made not only state, but national reputations.

In this legislature he took an active part in securing aid to the Marietta & North Georgia R. R., he prior thereto having stumped that section of the state to arouse the people to the importance of having this road.

In 1876 he was a candidate for the democratic nomination for governor, being the chief opponent of Gen. Colquitt; there existing between them the warmest personal friendship, the friends of one, were, as a rule, the friends of the other. The rule for the democratic nomination was the two-thirds rule. As soon as Colquitt delegates had been selected in enough of the counties to indicate a majority vote, Col. Hardeman, never having believed in the two-thirds rule, but in the old whig doctrine of a majority, retired in Gen. Colquitt's favor, and in the campaign devoted all of his energies to the election of the full democratic ticket.

In 1880, he was again a candidate for the nomination, Gov. Colquitt not receiving the two-thirds, but approaching it so near and harmony being the watchword of Col. Hardeman, he ceased opposition to Colquitt, and advised all of his friends to do the same, which advice only a few followed.

In 1882, the state by the new apportionment being allowed another representative in congress and there having been no redistricting, without being a candidate he was nominated by an overwhelming vote by the democratic state convention for representative from the state at large, Hon. George T. Barnes, John I. Hall and H. H. Carlton being among those receiving high votes. In the election he received 81,443 votes, against 24,930 for C. D. Forsythe, the republican nominee, this being 14,220 more than the combined votes of Hons. John C. Nichols, H. G. Turner, C. F. Crisp, Hugh Buchanan, N. J. Hammond, J. H. Blount, J. C. Clemments, Seaborn Reese and Allen D. Candler, the district democratic candidates, he running ahead of the ticket in every district, thus showing his popularity, not only within the party, but among its opponents; and this, despite the fact that in 1870 and '72 and '74, of all the democratic campaigners in Georgia, he waged the most persistent warfare against independents and republicans, and had stumped those districts wherein was their stronghold more thoroughly than any one else.

In this congress he was chairman of the committee on expenditures in the department of state. He was in congress when the republicans elected their first president, and there again when the democrats elected their first after their long absence from power. At the expiration of his term he was, by President Cleveland, appointed postmaster at Macon for four years.

In 1890 the democrats of Houston county petitioned that he become a candidate for governor. Hon. W. J. Northen had been in the field for some time, and the farmers' alliance seemed to be flocking to him. Col. Hardeman consented to enter the race, but after making two speeches his health completely failed him, owing to heart disease, and his physicians peremptorily ordered him to give up the candidacy.

In doing so he appeared his last in public life, although he was a member from the state at large on the democratic state executive committee at the time of his death.

Having succeeded his father in the firm of Hardeman & Sparks, which at one time had the largest cotton warehouse business in middle and upper Georgia, he was thrown most intimately with the farmers (southwest Georgia then being altogether tributary to Macon), so in 1876 it was no surprise that he was elected president of the Georgia State Agricultural society, and was re-elected annually to 1883, when he declined further election. His addresses to that body, and on other agricultural occasions, together with his efforts in the legislature and in congress in behalf of farmers, kept him in close touch with the agriculturists.

In 1876 he was grand commander of the grand commandery Knights Templar of the state of Georgia.

In 1874-5 and 1875-6 he was grand chancellor of the grand lodge Knights of Pythias of Georgia.

In 1870 Gov. Bullock appointed him a delegate to represent the state at the southern commercial convention at Cincinnati.

In 1872, upon the formal reorganization of the Floyd Rifles, he was again elected captain, resigning in less than two years. In 1875 he was appointed by President Grant Georgia's commissioner for the Centennial celebration at Philadelphia.

In 1883 President Arthur made him the state commissioner to the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial exposition at New Orleans.

It is not necessary to speak of the condition of affairs in Georgia in 1865-6-7, and what is known as the reconstruction period. The dark clouds hung low, but he faltered not in endeavoring to lead his people.

In July, 1866, a call signed by A. W. Randall, J. R. Doolittle, Thomas A. Hendricks and others was issued for a national union convention of two from each district and four from the state at large, to assemble in Philadelphia on Aug. 16 (to be elected by the state electors) to sustain the administration in maintaining the union of the states under the constitution our forefathers established, and to take action for the rights, dignity and equality of the states; that there is no right to dissolve the union; that slavery is abolished; that each state shall have the right to establish the qualification of its own electors, and no international power can or ought to dictate; to maintain inviolate the rights of the state—and that all resistance to the general government being at an end, war measures should be abolished.

At this time there was no party organization, or head, in Georgia; so Col. Hardeman at once issued a call for the citizens of Bibb county to meet and act. In that meeting, on July 12, presided over by Eugenius A. Nisbet (the author of the ordinance of secession), Col. Hardeman introduced the following resolutions:

"That we approve of the call for a national union convention at Philadelphia, Aug. 16. Resolved, That counties of this and other districts be, and they are hereby requested to meet at the earliest practical time, and appoint delegates to a convention of their respective districts, to be held for the purpose of electing delegates to the national union convention, in conformity with a call for that convention.

"Resolved, That in the event there should be no convention held, on account of the shortness of the time and absence of postal communication, then we request the governor of the state to appoint delegates for the state at large, and also for such congressional districts as fail to appoint.

"Resolved, That the people of the counties of this district be requested to meet and endorse this action calling for a convention of the fourth district on July 25, at Macon."

J. J. Gresham, Thomas Hardeman and W. S. Holt were appointed the county delegates.

This congressional district was the first to hold a meeting. They elected Thomas Hardeman and P. W. Alexander as delegates to the national convention, and voted for A. H. Stephens, H. V. Johnson, D. A. Walker and A. H. Chappell as delegates from the state at large.

All of the districts soon held meetings and ratified the delegates from the state at large, electing the following as the district delegation: First, Judge W. B. Flemming and Gen. John B. Gordon; second, Gen. Eli Warren and Col. J. L. Wimberly; third, Judge Hiram Warner and Judge E. H. Worrill; fourth, Thomas Hardeman and P. W. Alexander; fifth, Linton Stephens and Gen. A. R. Wright; sixth, J. H. Christy and Robert McMillan; seventh, R. F. Lyon and James Milner. Much good resulted from that convention.

In 1867 a constitutional convention controlled and governed by the republicans had adopted a new constitution for the state, which was to be submitted to the people. Notes on the situation by Benjamin H. Hill had aroused the people. Great discussion was being carried on to keep the white voters from voting in the election to be held under the new constitution. New congressional bills had been passed affecting the status of Georgia, so a voluntary convention assembled in Macon on Dec. 5, 1867, composed of 253 delegates, representing seventy counties. Mr. Hill was chosen president, and his address on taking the chair was not only characterized by great ability, but was calculated to arouse the people to opposition. A committee of two from each congressional district was appointed to express the views of the convention. On this committee may be found George A. Mercer, C. H. C. Willingham, C. B. Richardson, Gen. Phillip Cook, T. M. Furlow, P. W. Alexander, D. E. Butler, Judge Bottle, L. J. Glenn and J. D. Stewart, while the committee from this district were Thomas Hardeman and Dan Hughes, the Hon. J. J. Gresham, of Bibb county being chairman of the committee. This committee shaped the action of that convention, which was expressed in the address of a special committee composed of Herschel V. Johnson, A. H. Chappell, B. H. Hill, Warren Aiken and T. L. Guerry. In their preamble and resolution may be found such expressions as these: "The season for honest discussion of principles, and for lawful opposition to existing abuses and their growth, is ever present and pressing.

"The southern people are true to constitutional liberty, and ready to acquiesce in any policy looking to the honor and good of the whole country, and securing the rights of all classes of people.

"We regard the effort of the present ruling power to change the fundamental institutions of the United States government as false in principle, impolitic in action, injurious in result, injurious to the south, and detrimental to the general government. Silence under wrong may be construed as endorsement. Be it, therefore,

"Resolved, First, that we recognize the duty to sustain law and order and to support truthfully all constitutional measures of the United States government, and maintain the rights of all classes under enlightened and liberal laws.

"Resolved, Second, that the people of Georgia accept in good faith the legitimate results of the late war, and renew their expression of allegiance to the union of the states, and reiterate their determination to maintain inviolate the constitution framed by our fathers."

The third resolution was to protest dispassionately, yet firmly, against what was known as the reconstruction acts of congress and against the vindictive, partisan administration of those acts as oppressive and ruinous to the states of the south as well as hurtful to the true welfare of every portion of the country.

The fourth resolution protested against the policy of the dominant party in congress to inflict upon the states of the south bad government as wrong, not only against all races of the south, but as to the people of all parts of the Union and as a crime against civilization, which was the duty of all right-minded men to discountenance and condemn.

On June 26, 1872, the state democratic convention assembled in Atlanta. A. H. Stephens was opposed to Horace Greeley, who was at that time an independent republican candidate for president, and fought any action being taken that would commit the democratic party to his support, but the following delegates to Baltimore were elected from the state at large: Gen. Henry L. Benning, Col. Julian Hartridge, Gen. A. R. Wright, Col. Thomas Hardeman, Col. C. T. Goode and Col. I. W. Avery, who attended the Baltimore convention and participated in the nomination of Greeley.

On July 24, 1872, the state democratic convention was called, over which Thomas Hardeman presided, which ratified the nomination of Greeley and Brown.

On Feb. 23, 1848, he was married in Eatonton to Jane S. Lumsden, by whom he had three children, one dying in infancy, and their only daughter, Jessie, dying in June, 1887.

In a few days after the death of the daughter (an affliction from which he never recovered) he wrote the following:

Asleep in Jesus; cease to weep;
Our children with the Savior sleep.
Side by side, they safely rest,
Sweetly sleeping on his breast.

Asleep in Jesus; years long gone,
The Savior took our first-born home;
Ere earthly sorrow racked his breast,
Our angel boy was with the blest.

Asleep in Jesus; chastening love
Has called another child above—
Our daughter dear, our pride, our joy,
Has gone to meet our baby boy.

Asleep in Jesus; life's troubles o'er,
Eternal rest, joys evermore;
The conflict fought, the battle won,
The conqueror's shout, the victor's crown.

Asleep in Jesus; dearest Lord,
Support us with thy precious word,
For thou hast said, "in deep distress
Your every sorrow I will bless."

Asleep in Jesus; oh, how sweet,
The precious promise, "You may meet
The much loved lost ones in that home
Where death and parting never come."

Asleep in Jesus; make us feel Submissive to thy sovereign will;
In every thought, and act, and word
Say "Blessed be thy name, O Lord."

On Jan. 14, 1891, he was partially paralyzed and died in the only home he ever owned, in Vineville, on March 7, his wife following him to the grave in October, only one member of the family surviving, J. L. Hardeman, who is now judge of the superior court of the Macon circuit.

His wife, the daughter of John G. and Malinda (Sanford) Lumsden, was truly a helpmate in all things. His equal in intellect and culture, she was most ambitious for him.

On the night of March 4, 1861, she, with two female relations, made a Confederate flag from a telegraphic description received from Montgomery as soon as the stars and bars were adopted, and presented it to the Floyd rifles before sunrise on the morning of the fifth, when a salute was fired to it by the company, it being the first military salute received by the flag of the young republic of Georgia. She was president of the Soldiers' Relief society during the war and of the Ladies' Memorial association for a time afterward.

As an orator Col. Hardeman had no superior in the state; the agricultural population flocked to him; the merchant and mechanic were charmed, while on literary occasions his audience was held spell-bound, and on the stump he was almost matchless, but his great forte was as an extempore and social orator. He delivered literary addresses at numbers of colleges, male and female, in Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, and the oration on laying the corner-stone of the academy for the blind. In fact there is no class of addresses of which he did not deliver a great number in Georgia.

Among the best of his orations were those delivered at the centennial of the battle of King's Mountain in North Carolina; presenting the Ross-Gettysburg medal to the Floyd Rifles; the commencement oration at Emory college in 1866 (in which he advocated industrial education in colleges, and for which he was condemned by some of the trustees, this being a new departure); his eulogy on the dead of Macon lodge; his eulogy on the death of President Garfield as a Knight Templar, and his various memorial addresses.

His was a cheerful, happy disposition; sunlight hovered around him wherever he went, and his hearty recognition of every person whom he ever met endeared him to the people. Firm in his opinion of right, he was never combative to an opponent. Generous to a fault, his endorsement of the farmers' papers in 1873 bankrupted him. He was a Bible scholar of much study, he was apt in his illustrations and quotations every time and never failed to touch the hearts of his hearers. Georgia was his idol, not only his home, but his heaven.

The traits of his character were perhaps better set forth by the Rev. Dr. E. W. Warren at his funeral than we could well do here:

"We have assembled here to-day to bury a friend; your friend and my friend, the friend of the good man and a friend of the bad man, a friend of the rich and a friend of the poor, the friend of those who were prosperous and of the needy, the large-hearted, philanthropic friend of all men, who, from his young manhood and through its bright days down to the present lived among you in the city of Macon as a prominent man, and in his business, political and social life, always enjoyed the deepest affection and the most implicit confidence of the people of this city, as well as of the state of Georgia.

"Whether he floated on the unruffled tide of prosperity, or whirlpool of adversity and financial depression, no suspicion of his integrity ever rested upon the mind of a single man. Never unduly depressed by misfortune or elated by success, his wonderfully balanced mind was one that could speak peace to the angry passions of man at all times, with a voice not clothed in tones of authority, but with the power to sooth, control and draw men toward him in the strongest bonds of affection. This friend of ours had ambition without jealousy and grand ambition, but never so strong as to induce him to rob a man of his rights. If success was to be gained by a loss of his integrity or by any method that demanded a compromise of his high sense of honor or his God-given manhood, he cast it from him as an unholy trifle not worthy of his possession. His character can be judged from the fact that for the greater part of his life he occupied high positions where the closest critics could examine into his life and almost into the inmost recesses of his heart, and with all this, who ever heard or saw a character more spotless or a life more full of all that makes life bright and fair? Whose hand ever tried to smirch that stainless reputation, and who among the men of Macon does not love the memory of this man?

"With the workingman he was always friendly, kind and cheering and for him he always had a warm and kindly greeting. In society he was ever welcome. Every door was open to the man whose spirit was so cheerful, whose manner so courteous and whose power to please and attract so remarkable. He was indeed a star that shone ever bright, beautiful and constant upon earth. In his home he was the same man as abroad, to the guest he extended the hand of welcome and among his friends gathered around him in that home his heart shed forth a happy influence.

"Nurtured by the most pious parents, rocked, as it were, in the cradle of religion, he never made a public profession of the religion of Christ, but when stricken with disease a short time ago he expressed a wish to recognize the church and he lived to accomplish his desire."

SAMUEL CARRINGTON HOGE is the efficient superintendent of the Main Stem division of the Central railway of Georgia, with headquarters at Macon, Ga. His life has been spent in railroad service, having risen to his present important position from that of junior clerk in the agent's office of the Georgia railroad at Macon, where he entered the service in 1874.

His father, James Hoge, was a native of Virginia, reared in Tennessee, but moved when only a young man to LaFayette, Walker Co., Ga., where he resided twenty-five years, moving from there to Atlanta in 1857, acting as agent for the Western & Atlantic railroad from 1857 until 1863, under appointment from Gov. Joseph E. Brown. In 1873 he moved with his family to Macon, where he spent the remainder of his days, dying in March, 1884, after having been connected first with the Georgia railroad and subsequently with the Central railroad. His mother was a native of Baltimore, a woman of marked amiability and deep piety; she died May 5, 1893, and her remains were interred beside those of her husband in Rose Hill cemetery, Macon.

The subject of this sketch was born Sept. 8, 1853, in Walker county, Ga. He is the youngest of nine children, a brother of Mrs. M. E. Patton, Miss Mary and Miss Augusta Hoge, of Chickamauga, Ga.; of Mrs. Kate Cumming, of Tampa, Fla.; James M. Hoge, of Midway, Ky.; Joseph T. Hoge, of Macon, Ga.; and of the late Col. Edward F. Hoge, who was a prominent attorney of Atlanta and who for a number of terms represented Fulton county in the state legislature, and was the founder of the Atlanta "Journal."

Mr. Hoge's boyhood was passed in Atlanta, where he had the advantage of excellent schools. When but a young man he entered the service of the Georgia railroad and continued with it in various capacities until 1878, when he accepted a position with the Central railroad. In 1883 he was made trainmaster of the southwestern division of the Central railroad, which position he held until 1888, resigning to accept the position of superintendent of transportation of the Georgia Southern & Florida railroad, then in its infancy. He was afterward made superintendent of the same road, and later went to the Macon & Northern as superintendent, where he remained for a little more than a year, returning to the Central to accept his present position of superintendent of the Main Stem division.

April 2, 1884, he married Miss Clara Wells, daughter of the late Joseph E. Wells of Macon. They have been blessed with two children, Edward Foster and Joseph Wells. Mr. Hoge is a Presbyterian in religious belief, being an elder in the First Presbyterian church of Macon. He is a member of the democratic party and takes pleasure in doing his part in the spreading of its principles. His standing in railroad circles is of the best, his wide knowledge of the business being equaled by but few; he is a popular and efficient official, a gentleman of elegant address and refined tastes.

DR. WILLIAM FLEWELLEN HOLT, one of Macon's leading and most successful physicians, was born in Bibb county Aug. 25, 1835. His early years were passed in Macon, Ga., and there he received his primary education. In 1852 he entered the university of Georgia at Athens and graduated two years later. He immediately commenced a course of study at the Jefferson medical college at Philadelphia, taking his degree there in March, 1857. Returning to Macon he began the practice of his profession and in the spring of 1863 was appointed state surgeon by Gov. Joseph E. Brown. Soon after he was made assistant medical director of the state of Georgia with headquarters in Macon and Atlanta. He served in this capacity until the close of the war, which found him in Macon, Ga., where he has since remained. Dr. Holt was under fire during four miles, which will shortly be built from Dublin to Savannah, 110 miles; and is also director in the Savannah & Western railway. Mr. Hughes is a member of the B. P. O. Elks, and Royal Arch Mason, and a member of the Baptist church. Mr. Hughes was of Welsh extraction, and was a native of North Carolina, whence he migrated to Georgia in his youth. He became a very prominent planter, acquired a great acreage, large live-stock interests and many slaves. Mr. Hughes' father, Hayden Hughes, was born in Jefferson county, Ga., in 1805, and died in 1880, leaving a large amount of property. Mr. Hughes is a highly-cultured and genial gentleman of splendid physique—seldom equaled—and is the oldest living representative of the family.

WILLIAM AUGUSTUS JETER was born in Houston county, Ga., Sept. 15, 1850. His grandfather was a native of Virginia and descendant of prominent French ancestry. His father was A. A. Jeter, who was born in Laurens county, Ga., in 1823. He was a planter all his life, was a captain of the militia before the war, and died in 1888. The career of William Augustus Jeter has been one of magnificent development and broad usefulness. He was endowed with uncommon faculties of courage and perception, and threw himself into the liberal and progressive movements of the times with the genius of a man born for affairs. Until twenty years of age his sphere of work was confined to the farm where his eye first saw the light, but his ambitious spirit wished a broader field of action, and it soared out to find it. He located at Hawkinsville, Ga., and faced the future confidently with all the heartiness of a sanguine nature. His masterful individuality soon became conspicuously impressed upon the annals and events of the town. His life there was crowded with successful endeavors. For two years he conducted a large grist mill business, and then, with Thomas H. Henley, now, also, of Macon, organized the Hawkinsville Brick Manufacturing company, which they managed with great success for four years, making over 12,000,000 brick during that time. He next established a turpentine-barrel factory, employing over 100 men. He fared prosperously in this undertaking. Then he built and operated a cotton-seed oil mill, and, also, formed a company and constructed a cotton compress, one of the first cotton compresses built in the interior of the state. In 1884 he personally built a steamboat, named the "Mary Jeter," and bought another of the same size, and, by the organization of this boat line between Hawkinsville and Abbeville, Ga., on the Ocmulgee river, the naval store business was largely increased, it becoming the main shipping point for all destinations as far south as Abbeville. He operated this line with remarkable success about three years, when he sold it. No sooner was he done with one undertaking than his busy brain was engaged with another. In 1885, so closely identified had he become with the affairs of Hawkinsville, and in a hundred ways contributed to her prosperity, that the people elected him mayor, an honor they specially desired to show him in testimony of their high personal regard and as a tribute to his public spirit, progressiveness and exceptional success. During his term as mayor, he formed the Jeter-Boardman Gas and Water association, with headquarters at Macon. This company built the gas, water and electric works at Brunswick, Ga.; water works at Tampa, Fla.; Ocala, Fla.; Tuscaloosa and Florence, Ala.; Johnson City, Tenn., and Cartersville, Ga. All of said works are owned and operated now by the Jeter-Boardman association, which also owns and operates the gas, electric and water plants at Macon, Ga., which property alone is worth over $1,000,000. Prosperity smiled upon him in Hawkinsville, but his energies took a wider range than that locality could afford. He began studying the map of the country, and his keen perception told him that Brunswick, Ga., was at no distant day destined to become a great seaport, and expand in commerce, increase in population and enhance in values. In 1885 he moved from Hawkinsville to Brunswick and became a leader and important factor in the material development and substantial growth of the city by the sea. There, as elsewhere, he quickly demonstrated that he was full of resources, and was a tireless worker. He immediately commenced the construction of the water works there and from that time on has devoted himself to the building and management of the other works already mentioned. His operations in this line have been so extensive and so successful that he is known over the south as "the water king." His investments in real estate and various business enterprises in Brunswick brought him rich returns. He profited greatly by the material progress which he inspired and which aided immensely in sending Brunswick bounding forward on the road to prosperity and development. He found it an unpretentious town and helped to make it one of the most famous in the state. So rapidly and extensively had the business of the Jeter-Boardman Gas and Water association grown that he was forced to remove from Brunswick to Macon, a still larger city, and the headquarters of the association. It will be observed that Captain Jeter never went backward. He was always moving onward and upward. He took charge of the office of the association at Macon, and his fine executive ability here had full sway and a splendid opportunity was afforded for the display and exercise of that shrewd financial management for which he is noted. The results have been golden. Soon after Capt. Jeter's removal to Macon, the association purchased the gas, electric and water plants of the Macon Gas Light and Water company, one of the most valuable pieces of property of the kind in the south. In addition to his presidency of the Jeter-Boardman Gas and Water association, he was elected vice-president of the Macon Gas Light and Water company. He ably and successfully discharges the duties of the dual positions. In 1876 Mr. Jeter wedded the widow of John R. Love, Esq., her maiden name being Susan Laidler, a native of Houston county, Ga. She is "a woman nobly planned, to warn, to comfort and command." Their married life has been full of sunshine and happiness. Four children have blessed their union: Willie Belle, Daisy Fay, Emma Evans, and W. A., Jr. Capt. Jeter and his interesting family live in a beautiful home on College street, the fashionable residence thoroughfare of the city. Here they are surrounded by all the comforts and pleasures that wealth can afford. Mr. Jeter is a man of domestic temperament and simple habits. He finds his chief joy around the family fireside and in the peace and contentment of the home circle. He is a gentleman of literary taste, broad culture and genial intelligence. He is generous and liberal; the door of hospitality is always open. His nature is genial and his manners refined. He is a member of the Baptist church and has firm religious convictions. He is faithful to his friends and true to his obligations. His interest and influence are always on the side of honesty and justice, hence, his success. By strong industry and enterprise he has thrived.

Yours Truly

HENRY L. JEWETT, treasurer of the Georgia Southern railroad, and one of the most active business men of Macon, Ga., for the past sixty years, is a New Englander by birth, having been born in that historic old county of Hartford, Conn., Aug. 29, 1821. He was given a liberal education. Under the able tutelage of Revs. Wm. Cornwell and David Short, Episcopal ministers, he was at thirteen a well-educated lad, being versed in Greek and Latin, in addition to the common branches. At that age George, a brother who had gone into business in Macon, prevailed upon his parents to permit Henry to come south and join him in the venture. In 1835, therefore, he joined his brother in a mercantile business in the city of Macon and there began a business life which has been most active and successful for six full decades, a record equaled by but very few men now living in Macon, if any. To give anything like an extended account of the active business life of this gentleman would transcend the limits of this sketch. Suffice it to say that much of it has been of very great value to Macon and her citizens, and all of it has been clean and honest and of the highest degree of business integrity. The following brief outline will serve to show its various changes: After two years with his brother the firm failed. The creditors took the stock and then sold to Henry L. on his bare note, running four years. He was successful in paying off the notes and at the end of the time sold out to advantage. He then tried farming, buying a plantation ten miles north of Macon. But less than a year sufficed to show him that he was not cut out for a farmer, and selling his farm he returned to the city, entering the office as accountant of a large mercantile establishment. He remained in the office ten years and then, in company with others, bought out his employers. Two years passed and again he sold to advantage and again took charge of an office, where he remained until the war. During the war, while not engaged in active field work, he carried on a commission business. The first two years of the war he acted as paymaster for the local troops. In 1864 he enlisted under Gen. C. V. Anderson, and being elected major of his regiment, served for a period of six months. He was then put in charge of the state hospital books and thus missed the battle of Griswoldville, while the major who took his place was killed. When the war closed Mr. Jewett went to New York city, where he was successful in making arrangements to buy cotton for one of the largest concerns doing business in the south. Returning to Macon he formed a partnership with a Mr. Snyder and together they did a most successful business, until his partner's failing health caused the dissolving of the firm. In 1878, the following year, Mr. Jewett assisted in establishing the Capital National bank, and for the next fifteen years was the president of that flourishing institution. Except his connection with the Georgia Southern railroad as treasurer, and which he assisted in organizing and building, Mr. Jewett has for several years been practically out of business, enjoying the fruits of a successful business career. Such a life, and passed in a constantly growing city like Macon, necessarily carried with it much gratuitous labor. Mr. Jewett has performed his share of this labor from time to time in an uncomplaining and satisfactory manner, the institutions of his city, educational, religious and civil, being stronger and better because of his connection with them. While a member of the city council he introduced and had passed what is now called the "Jewett bill," which provided for refunding the outstanding debt of the city. The success of the measure stands a monument to Mr. Jewett's financial foresight. In educational circles he enjoys the distinction of being the oldest trustee of that justly celebrated school, the Wesleyan Female college, and he was one of the superintendents of construction of the Alexander free school building, and of which he is at present one of the trustees. A member of the Methodist church since 1837, Mr. Jewett has always taken a lively interest in the advancement of that great religious institution, serving as trustee, class-leader, Sunday school superintendent, almost without intermission. The marriage of Mr. Jewett occurred March 2, 1841, to Martha, daughter of John Howard, a wealthy planter of Monroe county, Ga. This union has proved one of rare felicity. For fifty-six years Mrs. Jewett has been a true and devoted wife and mother, and still lives, blessing and blessed by her husband and children. She became the mother of eleven children, nearly all of whom, however, died in infancy. Those living are: John H., a planter of Bibb county; George P., merchant at Macon; and Mrs. Dr. Howard Williams.

J. MARSHALL JOHNSTON, banker, Macon, was born in Loudon county, Tenn., May 21, 1837, on a farm, and lived there until he was fourteen years of age. He then went to Rittenhouse academy in Kingston, Tenn., and then a year later went to Hiwassee college in Monroe county, Tenn. He also attended a private school in Loudon county for a year, but finally quit school to study civil engineering, and from first carrying the rod he rose rapidly, and before he was twenty-one years old he was an assistant engineer and had charge of a division of the Cleveland & Chattanooga railroad, then a branch of the Eastern Tennessee railroad, now the main stem of the Eastern Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia railroad. He continued engineering for three years, and then opened a store in Loudon, Tenn., with R. T. Wilson, the firm being Wilson & Johnston, and was continued until the war. They also, in 1859, established a store in Louisville, which continued the same time. In the spring of 1861 he entered the Confederate service as assistant commissary of subsistence, with rank as captain, and served all through the war and surrendered in Mississippi. After the war closed Mr. Johnston went to New York and engaged in the commission and banking business, the firm being R. T. Wilson & Co., and the partnership is still known there. He remained in New York city until 1882, and then came to Macon, where he has since lived. In 1893 he was made president of the American National bank of Macon. He is one of the largest planters in the state and has large property interests in every section of Georgia. He is a director of the Southwestern railroad. He was married in 1871 to Martha, daughter of the late E. D. Hugonin, of Macon, and they have two children—Richard W. and Martha. Mr. Johnston is a democrat of the old school and a strong admirer of President Cleveland. Mr. Johnston's father was Ebenezer Johnston, who was born in South Carolina. He migrated with his parents to Tennessee when a boy, and died there in 1867, aged sixty-seven years. His grandfather was Joseph Johnston, born in Ireland, and a courier in Gen. Washington's army during the revolution. Mr. Johnston affiliates with the Presbyterians. Mr. Johnston is considered one of the best business men in Macon. He is a man of the highest moral character and social standing, and his affable ways and pleasing disposition make him always an agreeable companion. He is very charitable and ever ready to help any cause which has for its end the material progress or improvement of the city's welfare. Mr. Johnston owns in Sumter county, Ga., 8,000 acres of land, the cultivation of which furnishes employment to 500 or 600 negroes. He is a just and kind employer and takes good care of his employees.

WILLIAM B. JOHNSTON was born in Putnam Co., Ga., Nov. 19, 1809, and died in Macon, Ga., Oct. 20, 1887. He was descended from English ancestry, the father moving to Georgia from Virginia. Upon reaching his majority he moved to New York city, where he lived some years, whence he came to Macon, Ga., in 1839, where he spent the remainder of his life. For many years he was actively engaged in business, but retired in 1848, and thenceforward gave his attention to investments, for which he had accumulated ample means. In September, 1851, he married a daughter of Judge Edward Dorr Tracy, of Macon, leaving, upon his death, his widow and two daughters—Mrs. George W. Duncan and Mrs. W. H. Felton, Jr.—all living in Macon. He was prominent and active in the various enterprises gotten up for individual profit and the advancement of the interests of the city of Macon. He was one of the originators of the Macon cotton factory, a flourishing industry before the war, and was an incorporator and director in the City bank—for many years a leading financial factor in Macon. During the “war between the states” he was in control of the depository of the Confederacy, established at Macon. At one time there were $1,500,000 in gold under his protection. This depository took the highest rank of any similar institution outside of Richmond, Va. The Macon depository counted in and took up $15,000,000 in seven days, during the funding of the first issue of Confederate notes. The trust was discharged ably, faithfully and patriotically. Immediately after the war, when the Central railroad was a physical and financial wreck, he was chosen president by the board of directors, as being eminently qualified from his financial ability and sagacity to place that valuable property on its feet, in which he fully succeeded, negotiating in New York a loan of $1,000,000 to rebuild the road from Macon to Savannah, which had been destroyed by the Federal army. Before this he had been a director, and after having accomplished the work assigned him he declined the presidency, but remained for years a leading and influential director in the road. He was well known in his immediate community and throughout the state for his financial ability, and Gov. Jenkins selected him as the agent for the state to negotiate a large amount of bonds, which was done successfully and advantageously. Mr. Johnston, with a few friends, was the originator of the first ice factory in the state of Georgia, which industry since that time has been greatly extended, and ice, formerly having been a luxury, has become one of the necessities of life, and at a price within the reach of all. He was one of the original lessees of the state road, and a director at his death. He was also a pioneer and active worker for the establishment of gas and water works for his city. In addition to the duties of an active life, he took time to interest himself in art. He possessed superior judgment in architecture, and his wonderful taste in paintings and sculpture was evidenced by his selections during his long sojourn in Europe, of paintings and sculpture, by which his splendid residence in Macon was adorned and beautified.

He was genial in his disposition, and fond of the society of the young, and was always a welcome companion among men of much younger years than himself.

WILLIAM M'EWEN JOHNSTON, one of Macon's wealthiest and most popular citizens, was born in Loudon county, Tenn., July 20, 1850, and lived there until he was twenty years old. In 1866 he went to Washington college at Lexington, Va., of which Gen. Lee was president, and remained there four years. After leaving college he entered the banking and commission house of R. T. Wilson & Company in New York city, holding a clerical position until 1879, when he became a partner. He still holds his interest in this firm, but has retired from the active business life he led in New York from 1870 to 1891. In the latter year he began a three years' tour, in which he traveled all over the world. Returning he settled in Macon, Ga., where he has a beautiful home and intends to spend the remainder of his life. Mr. Johnston was married in Macon, Ga., in 1891 to Flewellyn, daughter of Anderson W. Reese of that city. While not an active politician, Mr. Johnston is an ardent democrat and always has been. He affiliates with the Presbyterian church, and is director of the American National bank of Macon, Ga. He is a man of refined tastes, with the means to gratify them. He makes his home, his life and the lives of those about him beautiful by the exercise of his gifts and his wealth.

CHARLES CARROLL KIBBEE, late judge of the superior court, was born in Macon, Ga., Aug. 25, 1837, received his primary education there and in 1857 went to Princeton college, entering the junior class and graduating in 1858. Shortly afterward he went to Athens, Ga., and began the study of law under

Hon. Thomas R. Cobb, being admitted to the bar at Watkinsville, in 1859. He began the active practice of his profession at Hawkinsville, Pulaski Co., Ga., and in 1861 enlisted in the Confederate service as orderly sergeant of Company G, Tenth Georgia infantry. A few months later he was made second lieutenant, and in the winter of that year was promoted to the rank of captain. In 1864, for gallantry on the field, he was again promoted, being made lieutenant-colonel, in which capacity he served until the war closed, with the exception of eight months in the year last mentioned, when he was acting adjutant-general on Gen. Goode Bryan's staff. Prior to this he acted as inspector-general of this brigade. Col. Kibbee was in the following battles, during his term of service in the field: Williamsburg, Va.; Savage station; Malvern hill; the two battles at Cold Harbor; Chancellorsville; Fredericksburg; South Mountain; Harper's Ferry; Sharpsburg; the Wilderness; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Lookout mountain; Knoxville, Tenn.; Gettysburg; Petersburg; Cedar run and many minor engagements. He was wounded at Savage station and his promotion for gallantry was won on the fields of Chancellorsville and other famous battles. When Gen. Lee surrendered Col. Kibbee was at High Bridge, Va., and thought there was little for him to do but to return home, so he started for Macon on foot, reaching there in about three weeks. Desiring to resume the practice of law, he located at Hawkinsville, Ga., but on account of his not having taken the oath required by the laws of reconstruction was not allowed to practice, whereon he entered into business as a cotton factor, which he prosecuted all the summer of 1865, and in the autumn was elected to the lower house of the state legislature which he served during the session of 1865-6. In the latter year he began again the practice of law, having taken the modified oath, and remained in Hawkinsville until 1889. In 1870, he was elected to the state senate from the Fourteenth district, which comprised the counties of Pulaski, Dooley, Wilcox and Dodge, serving six years in that legislative body. While there he was chairman of the committee on finance and member of the committees on general judiciary, banks, corporations, public affairs and other matters before the senate. As chairman of the finance committee he acted as chairman of the joint financial committee, in 1875, which conducted the audit and examination of the state treasury. In the year last mentioned he was appointed special commissioner by the governor of the state to adjust the accounts of the state and its northern financial agents. In 1884 he was elected to the bench of the superior court for the Oconee circuit, which then embraced the counties of Pulaski, Dooley, Wilcox, Twiggs, Irwin, Telfair, Montgomery, Laurens and Dodge, retaining that judicial position for four years. During the year after the expiration of his term he removed to Macon and has been a resident of that city ever since. In 1872, Judge Kibbee was elected a delegate to the Baltimore convention, but was unable to attend that meeting by reason of business engagements. He has many times been a delegate to state conventions. He is a member of Mt. Hope lodge, F. & A. M., of Hawkinsville, and of the St. Omar commandery, Knights Templars, at Macon. He is also a member of the chapter at Hawkinsville, in which, as in the blue lodge, he has held all the chairs. He was grand master in 1874-5 of the I. O. O. F. of Georgia and representative in 1876-7 to the grand lodge of the United States, which met at Philadelphia and Baltimore. In 1877, Judge Kibbee married Louie W., daughter of Clinton Taylor. She was born in Lafayette, Ind., though her father is a native of Louisiana, and has two daughters, Annie L. and Millie C. Judge Kibbee's father, John Morrison Kibbee, was born in Concord, N. H., and emigrated to Georgia in 1827, locating in Macon and engaging in mercantile business. He remained in Macon from 1827 to 1847, when he went to New York and embarked in another mercantile enterprise which he conducted for twelve years. Two years later he returned to Hawkinsville and lived there until his death in 1877. His wife was Martha M. Graves, a native of Sunderland, Conn., and they had three sons and two daughters: Judge Charles C.; Amelia, wife of Samuel W. Bridges, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Henry M., New York city, who was sergeant of the Tenth Georgia regiment, was captured just before the battle of Harper's Ferry and confined at Fort Delaware until the war was over; Dickson E., Milledgeville, Ga., who was also a soldier in the late war, serving two years in Goode's cavalry; and Clara, wife of Edwin M. Graves, Chicago, Ill. Mrs. Martha M. Graves died in 1866. Judge Kibbee's grandfather was born in Scotland and came to America at an early day, his sturdy character and national thriftiness having descended to his posterity in a very marked degree. Judge Kibbee and his wife are members of the Episcopal church, of which he is a vestryman, and both are prominent in social circles.

LUCIUS Q. C. LAMAR was born Sept. 1, 1825, and died in February, 1893. He was a statesman and jurist, and at the time of his death was associate justice of the supreme court of the United States. He was the son of L. Q. C. Lamar, Sr., who was born in 1794. The father of this latter gentleman was John Lamar, who was born in Crawford county, Ga., about 1766. He was a planter all his life, and married his cousin Rebecca Lamar. His children were as follows: Lola, Gen. Mirabeau B. Lamar, who was at one time president of Texas; Jefferson Lamar, a patriot of the war with Texas, and L. Q. C. Lamar, Sr. Jefferson Lamar had a son, Lucius Lamar, who was a colonel of the Nineteenth Georgia infantry in the late war, and died a few years ago as United States marshal for the southern district of Texas; and he had a daughter, Evaline, who is the wife of William Polk, of Alexandria, La.

L. Q. C. Lamar, Sr., had the following children: L. Q. C. Lamar, whose memoir here appears; Thompson D. Lamar, killed at Petersburg, as colonel of the Fifth Florida infantry, who was a physician; Jefferson M. Lamar, colonel of Hobb's legion in the late war and fell at Hampton gap; Susan, wife of Lemuel Wiggins, of Georgia, both of whom died without issue; Mary Ann, wife of James Longstreet, who died in Calhoun, Ga., as solicitor-general of that district, who afterward married Col. J. B. Ross, of Mecklin, Ga.; Dr. Thomas R. Lamar, whose son, L. L. Lamar (deceased), was sheriff of Hancock county for several years, and also served in the Confederate army; Mrs. Louisa McGeehee; Mrs. Mary Ann Moreland; Mrs. Amelia Randall; and Lorella Lamar, who married Absalom Chappell, a distinguished lawyer, and a member of congress from Georgia in 1843. The latter's son, Thomas Chappell, is a prominent lawyer of Columbus, Ga., and author of text books. Another son, Harris Chappell, is a prominent educator of Georgia. Lamar Chappell is a merchant in Memphis, Tenn., and Lucius Chappell is a merchant in Columbus, Ga. At the time of the death of L. Q. C. Lamar, Sr., he was a superior court judge, and resided at Milledgeville, Ga. He died just about the time he had reached his full powers, though he had already won distinction at the bar and was highly honored in the judicial office. Judge L. Q. C. Lamar, Jr., was truly worthy of the honors won in life and deserves the eulogies so richly bestowed on his name since his recent death. He was only a small boy when his lamented father died, which was about 1834 or 1835. His mother was a highly endowed woman, physically and mentally, fitted to be the mother of an eminent son. She lived to a great age and became the wife of Mr. Trantman, who also lived to be very old.

Lucius Q. C. Lamar, the lately deceased jurist and statesman, grew to be a man of fine physical presence, having a symmetrical form indicative of an almost perfect manhood. He entered Emory college, Ga., at an early period and graduated in 1845, when he was twenty years of age, in a class containing several men who have achieved prominence. In college he was famous in debates, and was the acknowledged authority among the boys on political matters. His bent was from the first that way—to statesmanship. He was a professor for a time in the Mississippi university, filling an adjunct professorship—the famous Albert T. Bledsoe being the chief professor. After this Mr. Lamar became a lawyer and formed a co-partnership with his famous uncle, Absalom H. Chappell, of Macon, Ga. He was engaged for a few years in law practice when he again moved to Mississippi, and served again as professor. In 1853 he was elected to the legislature and in 1854 settled on his plantation in Lafayette, Miss. He was elected to congress as a democrat, serving from 1857 to 1860, when he resigned and entered the secession convention of his state. In the war he served first as lieutenant-colonel and then as colonel of the Nineteenth Mississippi infantry, but after severe service in northeast Virginia was forced to retire on account of ill health. He was then sent to Russia as commissioner by the Confederate government. Returning to Mississippi he was elected professor of political economy and social science in the university of Mississippi, in 1866, and in 1867 was transferred to the chair of law. In 1872, he was again elected to congress, and re-elected in 1874. He was then elected to the United States senate. He possessed great independence of thought and action, as was shown by his refusal at one time to vote against his convictions on the currency question, even though so instructed to do by the legislature of his state. He appealed to the people and by them was sustained. He was secretary of the interior in the cabinet of President Cleveland during his first term, and in 1887 was appointed by the same president as associate justice of the supreme court of the United States.

Judge Lamar was married July 20, 1846, to Miss Virginia Longstreet, daughter of the famous Augustus B. Longstreet, president of Mississippi university, and noted for very versatile talents as lawyer, judge, writer and professor. By his first marriage, Judge Lamar had four children as follows: Fannie, who married Hon. D. Edward Mayes, president of the University of Mississippi; L. Q. C. Lamar, Jr., planter of Mississippi, who married Kate Lester; Augusta, wife of Hugh Heiskell, of Memphis, Tenn., and Virginia, wife of William H. Lamar. Late in life Judge Lamar married Mrs. Holt, of Macon, who was formerly a Miss Dean. Judge Lamar was pre-eminently fitted for debate, having a thoroughly disciplined and well-stored mind, and possessing a courage that never quailed in the face of a foe. His voice was commanding and well-controlled, he was self-possessed though very vehement in delivery. A man of learning and reading he was in demand on literary occasions, and always achieved distinction in this sphere.

HENRY J. LAMAR, president of the Exchange bank of Macon, Ga., was born on the plantation owned by his father, Benjamin B. Lamar, in Bibb county, Ga., within nine miles of Macon, March 21, 1825, and lived on the farm until he was ten years of age, when his parents moved to Macon. His primary education was obtained in the schools of that city—his chief teachers being M. M. Mason and Gen. James W. Armstrong, the latter a graduate of West Point. Both instructors were famous in their day as teachers. Prepared thus for college, in 1841 he entered the university of Georgia at Athens, where he remained until his senior year, when he was compelled to leave without graduating on account of ill health. He had as schoolmates several companions who became distinguished and even eminent. Foremost among these were the late Senator Benjamin H. Hill, Rev. Dr. J. L. M. Curry, Hon. Joel A. Billups and others. On leaving the university Mr. Lamar began farming, and pursued this business until the close of the civil war. After this he engaged in various pursuits, but principally the drug business. Beginning by merchandising in Macon in 1865, he extended this trade by founding drug stores in Atlanta in 1873, and Albany, Ga., 1880, and he now owns six drug stores in Macon and is president of the Lamar-Rankin Drug company, of Atlanta, Ga. This heavy business has been conducted successfully, indicating great ability in Mr. Lamar as a man of affairs. Wealth has been accumulated, yet there is no abatement of his energy nor failure in his capacity, although now in his seventieth year. Able to retire and live in luxury and ease, he is still devoted to business. Mr. Lamar is an extensive landowner, and conducts large planting interests in Bibb and other counties. He was made president of the Exchange bank of Macon in 1880, which is a large and successful institution. Since 1890 he has been president of the Union Savings bank of Macon, a very popular and successful bank. Filling such places continuously for many years furnishes strong proof of Mr. Lamar's capabilities as a financier and of the high estimate in which he is held by business men and the public. Having been so successful in his private affairs, he is easily and fully trusted in the management of the interests of others. The value of such a man of judgment, integrity and enterprise can hardly be estimated in any community. In addition to the interests above mentioned Mr. Lamar is president and chief owner of the Bradfield Regulator company of Atlanta, and he is president and chief stockholder of the Swift Specific company of Atlanta; this company manufactures and sells on a large scale the famous "S. S. S." remedy, known all over the world.

Mr. Lamar belongs to no secret societies or any church. He was married in 1850 to Miss Valeria B. Jones, daughter of Wiley E. Jones, deceased, who once resided in Columbus, Ga., but died near Macon. Mrs. Lamar had three uncles in the ministry of the Methodist church, men of mark and merit. She is a woman of fine intellect and excellent traits of character. They live in the beautiful village of Vineville, Ga. (a suburb of Macon), and reside in a beautiful home. Seven children have been born to this family, viz: Henry J. Lamar, Jr., of Macon, Ga.; Valeria, wife of Edwin McLaren, of Columbus, Ga.; John T. Lamar, of Butts county, Ga.; Fannie L., wife of J. W. Rankin, deceased, of Atlanta; Wilena, wife of Eli S. Shorter, of Eufaula, Ala., and Walter D. Lamar, of Macon. Alberta Lamar married W. H. Washington, of Nashville, Tenn., and died in 1887, leaving a son, Henry L. Washington, grandson of Henry J. Lamar. Mr. Lamar's father was a native of Jones county, Ga. He was a Baptist minister and a large planter, and died in 1835, leaving five children, the second being H. J. Lamar, who alone survives. Mr. Lamar belongs to a large family of that name, many of whom have been prominent, but as most notable we mention L. Q. C. Lamar, of the United States supreme court, and his father, L. Q. C. Lamar, an eminent lawyer and judge. Gen. Mirabeau B. Lamar, a hero of the Texan revolution and afterward president of the young republic, was a kinsman. Mr. Lamar may be characterized as a gentleman of good and mild manners, of such style as does not repel approach, being easy of access to all grades in society. There is no appearance of vanity or pride proceeding from his success in life. He is intelligent and discreet and of capacity for a higher position before the public. There seems to be no aspiration for political honors, no effort to win fame or even notoriety. Moving smoothly on his ways of business he makes no loud report of what he is doing. Any day nearly he may be seen on horseback riding to and from his business, looking more like a farmer than a merchant prince and banker. A quiet man, without ostentation or pretense arguing wealth and self-importance, he has reached old age without reproach and with great credit to himself and family. Able to live well, he does so in a charming home presided over by a wife, intelligent and discreet, affectionate and religious.

ALEXANDER LAWTON MILLER, late judge of the Macon circuit, was born in Richmond county, Ga., Nov. 6, 1848. He was reared, however, in South Carolina, obtained a good education and graduated from the University of South Carolina at Columbia in 1869. He then removed to Houston county, Ga., where he taught school a year and a half and at the same time studied law. He was admitted to the bar in 1871 and immediately thereafter located in Houston for the practice of his profession. He practiced there continuously until 1890, when he was appointed judge of the Macon circuit, serving until Jan. 1, 1893, when he resigned and resumed his practice, forming a partnership with A. D. Bacon. Mr. Miller was elected to the legislature in 1876 and served in the lower house three terms—from 1876 to 1882. During his middle term he was continuously on the finance committee and chairman of the special committee which impeached the state treasurer. He also served as county judge of Houston county and was one of the five commissioners that directed the building of the present state capitol, which was erected at a cost of $1,000,000. He is a Mason, but has sought no higher rank in the order than that of a Master Mason. He is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Oct. 26, 1876, married Catherine, daughter of George T. Hurt. Mr. Miller's father was Jonathan M. Miller, a native of South Carolina, who was born in 1811. He was a planter all his active life, owning plantations in Georgia and South Carolina. He was an enthusiastic secessionist. He married Margaret Smith, a Georgian by birth, and they had twelve children, of whom ten, six sons and four daughters, grew up, and seven, four sons and three daughters, are now living. Two of these sons fought in the Confederate army in the last war; William W. went out in 1861 with the first regiment of South Carolina cavalry and served until November, 1864, when he was captured near Fredericksburg and held a prisoner at Point Lookout until the war closed; John M. served in an independent cavalry company from 1862 until the close of hostilities. His company was known as Walpole's company and was Hardee's escort during Gen. Johnston's last campaign, and surrendered in North Carolina.

HENRY ARCHER METTANER, physician, Macon, was born in Prince Edward county, Va., Dec. 27, 1829, where he was brought up and received his primary education. He attended Hampden Sidney college (Va.), where he remained until his senior year, and then he entered the medical department of the Randolph-Macon college, located in Prince Edward county. This department was presided over by Dr. John P. Mettaner, his father, a distinguished surgeon of that day, and a surgeon in the war of 1812, who was a son of Dr. F. J. Mettaner, a surgeon of distinction in the army of Gen. La Fayette during the revolutionary war. Dr. Henry Mettaner was graduated at Randolph-Macon college in 1851, and a year later located in Macon, where he has since remained. In the spring of 1861 he enlisted as surgeon in A. H. Colquitt's brigade, and served as such until the war closed.

J. W. MYRICK, farmer, Holton, Bibb Co., Ga., son of James and Nancy (Flewellen) Myrick, was born in Bibb county, where he now lives, Nov. 24, 1833. Mr. Myrick's father was a physician, and was born in South Hampton, Va. The family is of Welsh ancestry, several generations having lived in Virginia before the revolutionary war, and many of the name were soldiers in the patriot army. Dr.

Myrick came to Georgia a single man along in the '20's and married in Baldwin county. For many years the Myrick and Flewellen families have resided in this locality. Although a physician, Dr. Myrick did but little practice on account of the precarious condition of his health. But he was very careful and thrifty and an excellent manager, and accumulated a handsome property, some 2,000 acres of land and sixty or seventy slaves. He was a devoted Christian and an ardent Methodist, a liberal giver, and a willing and enthusiastic helper and worker in the upbuilding of his church. Dr. and Mrs. Myrick had six children, three of whom died in infancy and three reached maturity: Frances, who married Thomas Norris, is now deceased; Susan, who married W. D. Williams, also deceased, and the subject of this sketch. Dr. Myrick died in 1865, and Mrs. Myrick in 1872. Mr. Myrick is unmarried, and has passed most of his life on the farm. Until the war he stayed there to take care of his aged father and mother. After hostilities fairly began, in 1862, he enlisted as a private in the Floyd rifles, Macon, Ga., and was a participant in many of the bloodiest and most important battles. Since the war, in addition to looking after his landed and other interests, he has been largely interested in railway construction. In this direction he has had contracts with the Eastern Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia, the Macon & Dublin, and the Georgia Southern & Florida. Although unmarried he takes an absorbing interest in all movements which promise to ameliorate the condition of the oppressed and distressed, and to promote general advancement and enlightenment—particularly all educational enterprises. In politics Mr. Myrick is a stanch democrat; fraternally he is a Master Mason, and religiously he is a thorough-going Methodist.

HON. EUGENIUS A. NISBET, LL. D. To none of the readers of this volume who are at all conversant with Georgia history will the name of Nisbet be strange, for it can be found honorably mentioned in every work presented to the public which deserves recognition as a true history of the state. In presenting the life of the above distinguished member of the family the biographer will tell "a plain, unvarnished tale," well knowing that fullness is not needed in handling a subject of true merit. The deceased subject of this sketch was of the old Scotch Presbyterian stock, who suffered martyrdom and banishment at the hands of men rather than to risk the displeasure of God. Capt. John Nisbet, an officer of the Covenanters, was executed for loyalty to his religious principles in the streets of Edinburgh in the year 1668. In that same year his sons were expropriated, came to America, and settled in North Carolina. About a century later James Nisbet came on the scene of action in Rowan county, N. C. Having graduated from the Philadelphia Medical college, he came to Georgia and settled in Greene county—one of the first graduates of medicine to locate in the state. Dr. Nisbet soon became known as a friend and promoter of advanced education and held many offices of trust with honor to himself and the state.

Eugenius A. Nisbet was the son of this Dr. James and Penelope (Cooper) Nisbet, and was born in Greene county, received his preparatory course at Powelton, Hancock Co., Ga., entered Columbia college, S. C., where he remained one year, and finished in 1821, when he graduated with the highest honors of his class from Franklin college (university of Georgia), Athens. He began the study of law under Judge (ex-United States senator) A. S. Clayton, and completed it at Judge Gould's celebrated law school, Litchfield, Conn. Being under age, he was admitted to the bar by a special act of the general assembly. He entered upon the practice of his profession at Madison, Morgan Co., then included in Ocmulgee circuit, whose bar at that time was said to be the strongest in the state, having on its rolls such names as Early, Cobb, Shorter, Gordon, Longstreet and Lamar.

It is certainly strong evidence of great industry and superior talent that he succeeded in obtaining a lucrative practice. He rose rapidly in his profession, became one of the leading jurists of the state, and the Nisbet law firm of Macon one of the very strongest. In 1830, while a member of the state senate, he strenuously advocated the establishment of a supreme court—his speech on the bill being of such strength as to bring forth a request from his brother senators for its publication. The bill was lost at that time, but when, finally, in 1845, the court was established, he was elected one of the judges. He served eight years of his term with entire acceptability to the people and with distinguished ability. This is a fact worthy of note, as in those early days of the court precedents were established rather than followed. In regard to Judge Nisbet's written opinions Judge Richard Clark (himself an ex-judge of the court) of the Atlanta circuit, says: "As a judge his chief characteristic with me is that his written opinions are couched in better rhetoric than any judge who ever sat on the supreme bench, and he has the happy faculty of making clearer to others his own thought than any other judge. When one of his opinions is read to me I know it by the sound." Among his fellow-members of the bar Judge Nisbet was highly respected, and especially beloved by the younger members, for whom he had great sympathy. Judge Nisbet's public life was varied and useful. It began quite early—the people having elected him to the lower house before he had attained his majority. Indeed, he had to wait seven days after the general assembly was organized before he could take the oath. During his lifetime he served seven terms in the general assembly, four in the house and three in the senate. The journals of both houses show that, uninfluenced by party or local considerations, he was always ready to support any policy by which the best interests of Georgia would be promoted. Among his special efforts which were marked by great ability was his successful championship of the penitentiary system, which was savagely attacked in the legislature of 1828. As chairman of the committee to whom the subject was referred he made an elaborate report in favor of the continuance of the institution, which was adopted. Another report which still further added to his reputation he made as chairman of the committee on federal relations. A discussion had arisen between the general government and the state of Georgia concerning the Cherokee Indians. His report on the subject was a masterly effort and triumphantly established the state's position. His entrance into the senate in 1830 was signalized by a speech advocating an increase in the appropriation to his alma mater, Franklin college (university of Georgia), of which institution he was a trustee to the time of his death. It was at this time that he made his effort in behalf of the supreme court already mentioned. The services of Judge Nisbet at the bar in the legislative halls had given him, although a comparatively young man, a state-wide reputation, and in 1836 he was one of the nominees on the whig ticket for congress. At that time, in Georgia, congressmen were elected by general ticket, and to secure a nomination a wide and favorable reputation was essential. The whole ticket was defeated. In 1838 he was again placed on the ticket, and this time the entire ticket was elected. In the next ("Tippecanoe and Tyler too," 1840) campaign he was re-elected, but from private considerations resigned before the expiration of his term. He was in congress when Henry Clay organized the whig party, and was an ardent admirer and faithful follower of that great leader. As events progressed toward the movement which culminated in civil strife, Judge Nisbet's voice was lifted for the union, which he earnestly strove to preserve. But with the election of Lincoln his last hope for its preservation failed, and he bent his energies to the formation of the new government. Elected as one of the Bibb county delegates to the convention of 1861, he was made chairman of the most important committee—that which prepared the ordinance of secession—on which were such giants as Toombs, Hill, Stephens and Johnson, and the ordinance as prepared by him was adopted by the convention. He was also among those who were selected by the convention to represent Georgia in the Montgomery convention. In that body, also, he took an active and leading part, as its proceedings show. He conceived the idea of making Alexander H. Stephens vice-president of the new government—a brilliant stroke of policy which rallied the conservative element to its support and added incalculably to its strength. Judge Nisbet was a broad-minded man, and while he was essentially a lawyer and profoundly versed in all that pertained to his profession, he found time to gratify his taste for literature and educational work. On this point we quote from a former biographer who was intimately acquainted with him: “Fond of literature, he is a writer of excellent taste and high cultivation. Although from early life a hard professional worker, he has found time to be an occasional contributor to one of our most popular magazines. He has been invited to deliver addresses on various literary occasions, and has devoted much time and thought to the common and free schools.” In religious belief Judge Nisbet was a Presbyterian—following his Scotch ancestry. In his family circle he was kind and gentle, but firm, charitable to a fault, and a man of great personal dignity of character. His marriage occurred in Hancock county in 1825. The lady of his choice was Amanda M. F. Battle, a granddaughter of Capt. James Alexander, who distinguished himself as an officer in Gen. Clarke’s brigade at King’s mountain during the revolutionary war, and at the siege of Augusta. A large family was born to them, among whom may be mentioned the late Judge James T. Nisbet, who was a distinguished member of the Macon bar, and the surviving children: Col. R. B. Nisbet, Eatonton; Mrs. Judge W. A. Reid, New York City; Mrs. Laura Boykin, Nashville, Tenn.; Mrs. Dr. P. H. Wright, Macon, Ga. Judge Nisbet died in 1870 at Macon and was buried in Rose Hill cemetery, attended by a large concourse of mourning friends. The bar adopted appropriate resolutions and the press united in graceful and feeling tributes to his memory.

ROBERT ALEXANDER NISBET, clerk of the superior court of Macon, was born in Russell county, Ala., March 20, 1848, and lived there till he was fifteen years old. He attended the country schools and Oswichee academy at Oswichee, Russell Co., Ala. In the winter of 1863 he entered the Confederate service in the Nelson Rangers, organized in Columbus, Ga., which company did courier duty for Gen. S. D. Lee’s corps, western army. Mr. Nisbet entered as a private and served until Gen. Johnston surrendered at High Point, N. C. After the surrender he returned to Alabama; coming from there to Macon, Ga., in 1866, where he studied law in the office of the Nisbets, a firm consisting of Eugenius A., late judge of the Georgia supreme court; James A. and James T., son of E. A. Nisbet. He was admitted to the bar in Macon in 1869 and practiced until 1881, when he retired to his farm near Macon. Mr. Nisbet remained on his farm until 1891, when he was elected clerk of Bibb superior court for two years, and in 1893 re-elected for a second term and again in 1895. In 1878-79 he was a representative from Bibb county to the state legislature, serving on the finance and railroad committees. This was called the long parliament; during its session the state treasurer was impeached and the finance committee had charge of the investigations into the matter. Mr. Nisbet helped to reorganize the Macon volunteers after the war and was a member of that military organization for fifteen years. He is a Royal Arch Mason, Knight Templar, and has been chancellor commander of the Central City Lodge No. 3, Knights of Pythias. Mr. Nisbet was married in 1871 to Florence, daughter of Thurston R. Bloom, and again in 1876 to Cora C., daughter of Henry Soloman, and widow of Samuel Hunter. He has been since 1880 a member of the Bibb county board of public education and since 1886 its president, taking a very active interest in the progress and advancement of the public schools. Mr. Nisbet's father, Frank A. Nisbet, was born in Greenc county, Ga., was a graduate of the state university, and moved to Alabama after reaching maturity. He represented Russell county in the Alabama state legislature several times, and was a member of the Alabama state constitutional convention. He married Arabella Alexander, a native of Putnam county, Ga., and they had ten children, of whom three were girls. Four of the sons were in the Confederate service: William L., sergeant-major in the Thirty-fourth Alabama regiment, served all through the war, was wounded at Bentonville, N. C., in 1865, and is now living in Russell county, Ala.; Cooper C., also in the Thirty-fourth Alabama regiment, died in the service, having served from the beginning of the war; James W. entered the same regiment with his brothers in 1863 and surrendered with Gen. Johnston in North Carolina, died in 1881, and Robert Alexander. The other brother, Frank L., is living in Russell county, Ala., and has been state legislator three terms. Mr. Nisbet's father and mother both died in Alabama.

CAPT. ROBERT E. PARK, one of Macon's representative citizens, was born in La Grange, Ga., Jan. 13, 1844. His father was Maj. John Park, a native of what is now Clarke county, Ga., born January, 1800. He was the son of William Park, of Spartanburg district, S. C., who was a soldier in the patriot army under Gen. Sumter. Capt. Park's great-grandfather was John Park, a native of Chester county, Pa., who was killed at the battle of Cowpens, S. C., during the revolution. The founder of the Park family in America was Arthur Park, of County Donegal, Ireland, who came to West Chester, Pa., in 1720, and was of Scotch-Irish descent. Capt. Park's mother was Sarah Truly Robertson, a native of Clarke county, Ga., born March 5, 1805. Her father was John S. Robertson, of Nottoway county, Va. He was the son of Beverly Robertson, who was a soldier in the colonial army, held the rank of lieutenant in a Virginia regiment, and was present at the surrender of Cornwallis at the siege of Yorktown. When Capt. Park was a babe his parents moved from La Grange to Greenville, Ga., where he was brought up and received his primary education. He also attended Brownwood institute, La Grange, Ga., taught by Prof. William Johns, and was prepared for his entrance into Emory college at Oxford, Ga., in 1860. He remained there a year, and then went to the Agricultural and Mechanical college at Auburn, Ala. He left there June 12, 1861, to go to Tuskegee, Ala., where he enlisted in Company F, Twelfth Alabama regiment of infantry. The company's first captain was R. F. Ligon, afterward lieutenant-governor of Alabama. After serving as a private for a year his company was reorganized, and Mr. Park was unanimously elected second lieutenant of Company F. At the battle of Seven Pines he was made first lieutenant. After the battle of Winchester, Va., he was made captain, though he had commanded his company for nearly eighteen months, owing to the disability from wounds of Capt. J. W. McNeely. He acted as captain until Sept. 19, 1864, when he was captured at the battle of Winchester, where he was badly wounded in the leg and left on the field of battle. Thirteen pieces of bone were taken from his leg, and he couldn't be moved for a month. He was then sent to West's prison hospital at Baltimore, then to Point Lookout prison, Md., then to Old Capitol prison at Washington, D. C., and lastly to Fort Delaware, where he was kept till June 14, 1865, when he was released. Capt. Park participated in the following battles:

Yorktown, Williamsburg, Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Va., Frederick, Hagerstown, South Mountain, Md., where he was captured and held prisoner nineteen days and exchanged. Then he retreated to Richmond with his command and was in the battle at Hanover courthouse, was with Gen. R. E. Lee in his invasion of Maryland and Pennsylvania, and was in the battle of Gettysburg, where he was wounded and sent back to Richmond. After thirty days in the hospital he was given a furlough, which he only used for twenty-five days, and then rejoined his command, and for several days commanded the regiment, all the senior officers being killed or wounded and absent. His next battles were at Spottsylvania courthouse, and then came the battle of Monocacy. He then went to Gen. Early to threaten Washington, D. C. Then came the battles of Bunker Hill, Kernstown, Newton, Martinsburg, Winchester, where, as stated, he was wounded and captured. When Gen. Lee surrendered, Capt. Park refused to take the oath of allegiance, though he was a prisoner in Fort Delaware at the time. After the war Capt. Park returned to his home in Greeneville, Ga., where his mother was then living, his father having died when he was a child. He commenced to study law, and in 1866 accepted the position of teacher in the Tuskegee, Ala., high school, remaining there a year, then went to Mt. Meigs, Ala., where he taught as principal in the Henry Lucas institute. He remained there two years, and then spent two years as principal of the La Grange, Ga., high school. He then came to Macon and accepted the position of general agent for the southern states for Ivison, Blakeman & Co., school and college text-books, and represented them in that capacity until 1890, when the company was united with the American Book company, which company he represented five years in the same capacity. Capt. Park is vice-president of the Equitable Building & Loan association, vice-president of the Macon Fire Insurance company, and director of the Exchange bank, and the Union Savings Bank & Trust company, first vice-president of the National Security Loan & Abstract company, and is president of the Macon board of trade, and has been since 1892 president of the Riverside cemetery company. He was elected manager of it for life, and has been president since its organization in 1887. He is president of the Cumberland Island company, of the Macon Hospital association, and of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and vice-president of the Georgia Quincy Granite company. In 1878 Capt. Park bought 743 acres of land in Bibb county, eight miles north of Macon, at Holton, Ga., to which he has added from time to time until now he has over 1,200 acres. Holton is an interesting suburb of Macon, and is a handsome and attractive village at the railway station that lies midway of Capt. Park's plantation. Here are commodious cottages, school buildings, a brick store, postoffice, summer houses and a brick church and beautiful park. There is a very large acreage on this farm devoted to grass and the grains, but the farm is cultivated chiefly that its grain may supply the live stock, and this brings in the profit. The stock consists of registered Jersey cattle, Little Guinea cattle, Berkshire pigs, Poland China hogs, and Shetland ponies. Since 1880 Capt. Park has been a member of the executive committee of the State Agricultural society, and is chairman of the board of trustees of the Mulberry Street M. E. church. He is a Royal Arch Mason and Odd Fellow, and belongs to the A. O. U. W., Knights of Honor, the Royal Arcanum and Knights of Damon. Since 1886 he has been trustee of Emory college at Oxford, Ga., his alma mater, and is a trustee also of Wesleyan Female college in Macon. Capt. Park was married in 1875 to Ella H., daughter of Gen. William S. Holt, deceased, and has two children—William Holt Park and Ella Holt Park. His wife died on March 8, 1890, and on April 27, 1892, he was united to Mrs. Emily Hendree Stewart, daughter of the late Dr. George Hendree, of Tuskegee, Ala. He was lieutenant-colonel on the staff of Gov. W. J. Northern during his first term, but declined a reappointment. He is an honorary member of the Macon volunteers and a great friend of the military and of all public enterprises.

I. C. PLANT was born in the city of New Haven, Conn., Feb. 27, 1814. When only thirteen years of age, he went to South Carolina and was educated in the Columbia college. He afterward removed to the state of Georgia, which became the home of his matured life. In his youth he manifested a preference for banking, and at nineteen years of age was in business for himself, and this profession became the occupation of his life.

In 1839 he was appointed agent of the Marine Bank of Georgia, located in Macon. Under his skillful management, the agency prospered greatly, and the bank became one of the solid moneyed institutions of middle Georgia. He continued in this bank for over twenty years, until the war between the states closed such establishments. During this long period, many state banks failed, and several in the city of Macon. Mr. Plant sometimes referred with pardonable pride to the fact that no bank which he controlled had ever experienced any financial embarrassment. Being the soul of integrity and rectitude, he surrounded himself with assistants of like character, and no shadow of suspicion attached to any transaction of a long and honored banking career.

Mr. Plant was twice married. His first wife was Miss Charlotte Walker, of Boston, Mass., who lived only a few months. His second wife was Miss Elizabeth M. Hazlehurst, of Glynn Co., Ga. He left four children by this latter marriage, all being born in Macon, Ga.

In 1865, Mr. Plant organized the First National bank of Macon, being elected president. which office he held continuously until his death, a period of nearly twenty-eight years. In 1865, he organized also, the banking house of I. C. Plant & Son, which has done a most prosperous business, the firm being continued after his death. His son, Robert H. Plant, of the latter firm, was made president of the First National bank, and his younger son, George H. Plant, vice-president of the same, after Mr. Plant's death. It is a high distinction when a father and sons have originated and controlled successively a great banking house and maintained the unbroken confidence of its patrons.

A successful banking career of half a century, under systems of state banks and national banks, through several periods of monetary depression and vicissitudes of a great civil war, testify most emphatically to the conservatism, the integrity, the energy and the sagacity of Mr. I. C. Plant.

Mr. Plant cherished a warm interest in everything which promoted the welfare of the city of Macon. Its library, its public buildings, its manufactories, and improvements of all kinds had no more earnest and intelligent advocate. At the county and state fairs, held in the city, he made it a point to contribute something to the exhibition, either from his collection of minerals or from the products of his farm in the suburbs of the city. He had a fondness for natural history and it afforded a healthful recreation for his leisure hours. His office was the center to which came all the curious minerals, ores, shells, fossils, birds, etc., of the adjacent territory. He was full of anecdotes about these curios, many of which were unique and valuable. His collection contained quite a full series of the unionidae or fresh water mussels, whose shells he had been gathering for years for Mr. Lee, of Philadelphia, the great specialist in unionos. His collection of Indian relics was also large. Some of his fossil ammonites were very fine.

He was genial and companionable. He had a kind word for every one. He took a personal interest in the employes of the bank, and many owed their success in after life to his advice and influence.

At an early age, Mr. Plant gave evidence of interest in religious matters, joining the church at thirteen years of age, and for many years being a member of the First Presbyterian church of Macon and a regular attendant upon its services.

His contributions to the church and to private charities were liberal, and he is remembered by many for his thoughtful assistance in time of need. With regular habits and a vigorous constitution, he enjoyed almost uninterrupted health, and was able to discharge the duties of his office up to a short period before his death. He died Nov. 16, 1892, in his seventy-ninth year.

SYLVESTER B. PRICE, the present postmaster of Macon, Ga., was born in that city Sept. 22, 1846, was educated and has resided there nearly all his life. The many public offices to which he has been elected attest the esteem in which he is held in his native city. In the fall of 1863, when but a seventeen-year-old boy, Mr. Price enlisted in the Confederate army, serving as a private in Massenburg's battery for several months and then in Key's battery of Helena, Ark., till the close of the war. He was in numerous battles, was badly wounded at Rocky Face and just before the close of hostilities was captured while doing courier duty near Macon and detained as a prisoner three days, before he succeeded in making his escape. Immediately after the war he returned to Macon and held a mercantile position for two years, going from there to Atlanta, where, with his uncle, George W. Price, he engaged in the shoe business until 1872. At that time he returned to Macon and in partnership with his father and brother established a grocery which he conducted until 1886. In 1876, Mr. Price was elected alderman from the Fourth ward of Macon, and in 1882 again elected to the same office in that ward. He has served four terms as mayor, his first election to that honor being in 1884. March 14, 1894, he was appointed postmaster. While not an orator, Mr. Price is an indefatigable and successful political worker for his party. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, a Royal Arch Mason and affiliates with the Episcopal church. He was married in 1872 to Mary Lee Perkins, daughter of A. L. Perkins, of Monroe county, Ga. Mr. Price's brother, Albert C., was a private in the Second Georgia battalion and was killed at Petersburg, Va., in 1864. His brother, Willis F., who lives in Macon, served in Massenburg's battery all through the war and was wounded at Spanish Fort, Mobile, Ala.

JULIEN RANSONE, retired planter, Macon, was born in Hancock county, June 7, 1835. Sparta, a small village, was his birthplace, and there he grew to manhood, attending the school of Prof. Carlisle P. Beman, then one of the most noted teachers of his day. In the summer of 1852 he entered Yale college, and left there on the termination of his junior year, to take an eclectic course for the senior year, though he did not graduate, leaving for the purpose of taking certain studies that the curriculum of Yale did not include. Notwithstanding this apparent breach of law, the name of Mr. Ransone appears in the class of 1857. After leaving college he retired to his plantation, a magnificent estate, with about 200 slaves, located in Early county, and there led the life of an old typical planter, spending his winters in the northern cities. When the war broke out, he was sick in bed, but as soon as able, he went to Richmond, and the Confederate government being in great need of artillery, he offered to procure some field guns at his own expense. His generous offer was refused and he then attempted to purchase some from the American foundries, but without success. Finally, in the fall of 1861, he ran the Federal blockade, personally visiting England, and secured six eighteen-pound Blakely guns at a cost of $60,000 to himself. These were delivered, four to Wilmington, N. C., and four to Charleston. On his return, the steamer on which he was aboard ran aground at an island in Charleston harbor, and was under fire of the Federal blockading fleet. In his attempt to reach shore he was captured and carried to northern prisons, eventually reaching New York, where he secured his release. He ran the blockade of the Potomac and reached Richmond just before the battle of Fredericksburg. There he was commissioned by the Confederate secretary of war as captain of light artillery, and his battery was composed of four guns. He served through the war in this rank and was in the battles of Olustee, Fla., and John's island, in Charleston (S. C.) harbor, and served fourteen months on James island. He left Charleston on its evacuation and went with Hardee, being in the engagement at Averasboro, N. C., where he was wounded. After the war he returned to his plantation in Early county, where he remained until 1879, when he moved to Macon, where he has since lived a quiet retired life. He belongs to no church or secret society, but affiliates with the Episcopal church.

MAJOR WILLIAM H. ROSS, president of the Central City Loan and Trust association, of Macon, Ga., was born in that city and there received his preliminary education. In 1857 he entered the junior class at the military institute, leaving in his senior year and returning to Macon, where he engaged in handling cotton. In the spring of 1861, the Floyd rifles, a militia company organized in Macon in 1847 of which Mr. Ross was first lieutenant, entered the Confederate service, was assigned to the Second Georgia battalion, and thereafter known as Company C. Six months later Lieut. Ross received a commission as lieutenant-colonel, and returning from Norfolk, Va., to Georgia organized Ross' battalion, of which he was lieutenant-colonel, commanding. This rank he held one year, the period for which the men in this battalion had enlisted. He was then assigned to the staff of Maj.-Gen. W. H. T. Walker, of the army of the Tennessee, with the rank of major. He remained on this staff until Maj. Walker was killed at Atlanta, July 22, 1864, and was then transferred to the staff of Lieut.-Gen. W. J. Hardee and acted as assistant inspector-general of Hardee's corps until the surrender, Maj. Ross surrendering at Greensborough, N. C. He fought in the following battles: Sewell's Point, Va.; Fort McCallister, Ga.; and going with the second battalion of Georgia sharpshooters under Gen. Johnston into Mississippi, participated in the engagements at Raymond, Jackson (two battles); then in Tennessee in the battles of Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Rocky Face, Cassville, New Hope church, Kennesaw Mountain, battles around Atlanta, Jonesboro; then at the fall of Savannah, in the engagements in the retreat from Savannah to Charleston; was in Charleston when that city was captured; then in the fight at Cheraw, S. C., Averasboro, N. C., Bentonville, N. C., and was only once wounded—at Jackson, Miss. For four years after the war Maj. Ross and his father, J. B. Ross, engaged in mercantile business in Macon, Ga., the firm being, J. B. Ross & Son. The following ten years he conducted a cotton business and then established the real estate and banking enterprise which he now carries on. He is president of the Central City Loan and Trust association of Macon, Ga., organized in Macon, September, 1883, with a capital of $150,000, which was increased to $190,000 in 1894. He is a charter member of the Macon bond commission, which, when appointed, took charge of the city's 7 per cent. bonds—at that time quoted at 50 cents on the dollar—and refunded that issue at 6 per cent., the bonds being now, in 1894, salable at 112 1-2. Maj. Ross has served as alderman of the city of Macon four years and in 1877 represented Bibb county in the constitutional convention. For some years after the war he was lieutenant-colonel of the second battalion of the state militia and has frequently been a delegate to state and congressional conventions. He was one of the directors of the Macon & Covington railroad, now known as the Macon & Northern, running 106 miles from Macon to Athens and served in that capacity until this road went into the hands of a receiver. He was married in 1861 to Miss Smith, of Mobile, Ala., a daughter of H. B. Smith, a native of Georgia. Maj. Ross is well known in financial, railway and political circles and enjoys the confidence, not only of his clients, but of the people of the state at large. His military record is unexcelled.

DR. JAMES THWEATT ROSS, was born in Cuthbert, Randolph Co., Ga., July 18, 1861, and at the age of two years moved with his parents to Taylor county, Ga., and two years later from there to Houston county in the same state. At the latter place and in Fort Valley young Ross was reared and received his early education. In 1879 he entered Mercer university and graduated in 1882 with the degree of A. B. He then commenced the study of medicine with his father, Dr. Benjamin L. Ross at Fort Valley, and in the fall of 1883 entered Jefferson medical college, graduating April 2 1885. Returning to Fort Valley he practiced his profession there until September, 1889, when he came to Macon, and formed a partnership with K. P. Moore, M. D. This partnership continued until Aug. 1, 1892, since which time Dr. Ross has practiced alone. He is a member of the Georgia state medical association and vice-president of the Macon medical society. He is not a church member but affiliates with the Baptists. Dr. Ross was married Feb. 13, 1889, to Mary Belle, daughter of Fred Danish, a native of Germany, but a resident of South Carolina. Dr. Ross's father, Benjamin L. Ross, was born near Irwinton, Ga., in 1825. He is a licensed preacher of the Baptist church, and a graduate of the medical college of Charleston, South Carolina, having also taken courses of medical lectures in Philadelphia, Pa. Benjamin L. Ross married Louisa F. Maugham, a Georgian. They had four children, two sons and two daughters. John P. Ross, judge of the Macon city court, is a brother of Dr. J. T. Ross. Dr. Ross' grandfather, John Ross, was a native of Georgia, a noted Baptist minister of his day, who died in 1837, at the age of fifty-two years. Dr. Ross is well and favorably known in both professional and private circles and is one of the most promising of Macon's young physicians.

ALONZO D. SCHOFIELD, manufacturer, Macon, was born in that city Jan. 3, 1857. His father was John Shepley Schofield, founder of the Schofield Iron works and an old resident of the city. The subject of this sketch received his primary education at the hands of his private tutors and in private schools, and in 1871, he entered the state university at Athens, Ga., from which he was graduated in 1874, with the degree of A. B., at the age of seventeen. He then went to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and took a commercial course in the Eastman business college, and returning to Macon entered the Exchange bank as bookkeeper. After two years' service there he entered the business of his father, being made a partner, the firm name of J. S. Schofield & Son continuing until the death of the father in 1891.

John Shepley Schofield, was born near Manchester, in Derbyshire, England, in 1820, and came to America with his younger brother Joshua R. in 1840. He located in New York, but shortly afterward came to Georgia and became connected with the Central railroad, remaining in its service until he established the Schofield Iron works. He was a prominent democrat, though not given to aspiring to office, was a Mason and a member of the Presbyterian church. He was an unobtrusive man, kind and generous, and enjoyed the esteem and respect of everybody who knew him. He was married in 1845 to Miss Emma Mackey, a native of South Carolina and they had eight children of whom but two survive—A. D. and Charles E. Schofield. The wife died and in 1866 Mr. Schofield was married to Anna Franklin, of Washington county, Ga., and by her he had three children—of whom two survive, as follows: J. S., Jr., and H. A. During the war the senior Schofield was engaged in making shells and other munitions of war for the Confederacy. One of his sons, Joshua R., now deceased, was a private for two years in the Confederate service. After the death of the father in 1891, the iron works have been operated by his sons—A. D., Charles E. and John S., Jr., and the firm is now known as the Schofield Sons Company. Alonzo D. Schofield, president of the company, is prominently connected with a number of successful enterprises in his home city, and zealously watches the interests of his own factory, whose products have a reputation throughout the whole state. He belongs to the Episcopal church of Macon. He was married to Elizabeth, a daughter of the late I. C. Plant, and they have three children—Elizabeth, A. D., Jr., and Gladys.

EMORY SPEER, United States judge for the southern district of Georgia, was born in Monroe county, Ga., Sept. 3, 1848. At the age of fifteen he entered the Confederate army as a private in company K, Fifth regiment, of Lewis' Kentucky brigade of mounted infantry. He took a part in several engagements in Georgia and South Carolina and surrendered with his command at Washington, Ga., in April, 1865. In September of the next year he entered the university of Georgia and allied himself with the Eta chapter of Chi Phi. He was graduated in 1869, after taking several college honors. He read law, and in the November following his graduation at the university of Georgia he was admitted to the bar. He was appointed solicitor-general of the state when twenty-three years of age by the first democratic governor of Georgia elected after the war. In 1878 he was elected a member of the Forty-sixth congress from the Ninth district of Georgia as an independent democrat by a majority of 225. Two years later he was re-elected by a majority of 4,064. As a member of the elections committee in his first term he pursued an independent course—notably by voting for Hon. W. D. Washburn against Ignatius Donnelly in a celebrated election contest for Minnesota. During his second term he was made a member of the ways and means committee, and was one of the conferrers between the house and the senate on the disagreements on the tariff bill of 1883. Immediately on the expiration of this term he was appointed by President Arthur United States attorney for the northern district of Georgia. Here he speedily evinced to the country his great ability as a lawyer and advocate. His successful prosecution of the Banks county Ku-Klux, resulting in the conviction of eight white men for assaulting negroes—a case which produced the greatest excitement—was his cause celebre. Mr. Speer was afterward appointed special counsel for the government in the celebrated election trials at Columbia, S. C., in the fall of 1883. He was nominated by President Arthur to the position of district judge of the United States for the southern district of Georgia. His courts are held at Savannah, Macon, and Augusta, and he has presided in a number of cases of national importance. Judge Speer is the author of Speer on Removal of Causes, Little, Brown & Co., Boston. His decisions are noted for a strong and lucid style. He was eight years trustee of the university of Georgia, and although a member of the Methodist church is the president of the law school of Mercer university, the principal Baptist college of Georgia.

JAMES D. STETSON, vice-president of the American National bank, was born in Milledgeville, Ga., May 31, 1846, and lived in that city until 1863. He was educated at the private schools there, and later at Oglethorpe university, which he attended for two years, reaching the sophomore class. In the autumn of the year last mentioned he enlisted in the Georgia state troops, being mustered into the McIntosh light infantry. He entered the Confederate service as a private, was afterward elected first lieutenant of his company, and served in that capacity all through the war. He spent the most of the war period in Macon, attached to the quartermaster's department, but was captured in November, 1864, by a troop of Sherman's soldiers. He effected his escape the evening of the day on which he was taken prisoner, reaching his quarters little the worse for the unpleasant experience. At the close of hostilities he located at Milledgeville and there engaged in mercantile business until 1867, when he removed to Baltimore, Md., staying there one year, and at the expiration of that term he journeyed to Savannah, where he took a position with J. W. Lathrop & Co., cotton factors. He remained with them until 1873 and then went to Hawkinsville, Ga., where he organized the Hawkinsville Bank & Trust company, with a capital stock of $50,000. He was elected cashier of this company and served as such until 1891, in which year he came to Macon, to become the vice-president of the American National bank, which was opened April 2, 1891, with a capital of $250,000. In that year he was chosen vice-president of the Hawkinsville Bank & Trust company, and on the death of C. T. Lathrop, in September, 1893, was made president of that institution. In addition to holding these important offices Mr. Stetson is a director of the National Security, Loan & Abstract company of Macon, and of the Georgia & Alabama railway company. He also served several years as commissioner of Pulaski county. He is a staunch democrat, but takes no active part in politics, and is also prominent in church affairs, being a deacon of the Tatnall Square Baptist church, Macon. He is also a trustee of Mercer university, and chairman of the prudential committee of the board of trustees of Mercer university. Mr. Stetson was married in 1872 to Eugenia, daughter of Maj. John H. Pate, a Georgian by birth, who served as major of the Forty-ninth regiment of Georgia troops in the last war. Mr. Stetson and his wife have four children—three sons and one daughter. His father was Daniel B. Stetson, who was born in Cohasset, Mass., in 1810, and in his boyhood was apprenticed to a brick mason, but ran away to sea. Landing at Portsmouth, Va., at a subsequent date, he went to work as a contractor, one of the buildings he erected at that point being the old Seaboard & Roanoke freight depot, which was burned when Norfolk was evacuated by the Confederate troops in 1861. While a resident of Portsmouth he married Edith Wyatt, daughter of Maj. Wyatt, an officer of the revolutionary war. Daniel B. Stetson came to Georgia about the year 1842 and located in Milledgeville, where he was a merchant up to the breaking out of the war. He then retired from active business, but remained in Milledgeville, dying there in 1865. He was for some time judge of the inferior court of Baldwin county, Ga. His wife survived him many years and died in 1884. One of their sons, William S., was a lieutenant in the Fifty-seventh Georgia regiment, and fought all through the war. He was captured at the fall of Vicksburg, but paroled shortly afterward. He was severely wounded in the leg during the battle of Kennesaw mountain, July, 1864, and was again wounded by a piece of shell at the battle of Bentonville, N. C., the last battle of the war. He now resides in Florida. The Stetson family is of English origin, the emigrant ancestor reaching America in the Mayflower. James D. Stetson is highly esteemed in financial circles, his judgment and advice in monetary matters being eagerly sought and greatly valued.

MR. W. P. STEVENS was born in Baldwin county, Ga., March 31, 1859, of English parentage, and the youngest of three brothers. His parents were Henry and Matilda Stevens (for whose sketch see that of Henry Stevens, Baldwin county). After receiving a thorough education, he crossed the water and visited his father's old home, and spent quite a while prospecting among the clay industries of Great Britain. On his return he accepted a position as superintendent for Stevens Bros. Co., Stevens Pottery, Ga., which position he held with credit until his father's death, at which time he launched out on his own account, in the saw and planing mill business and merchandising, in which he was successful and made money. After cutting all the timber contiguous to his mills he disposed of his interests in this line, formed a company, consisting of himself and two brothers, W. C. and J. H. Stevens, of Stevens Bros. Co., and built a sewer pipe plant at Macon, Ga., and commenced the manufacture of sewer pipe, fire brick, flue goods, etc., under the name of Henry Stevens Sons Co., the subject of this sketch being elected general manager and treasurer.

By never-failing courage and tenacity, and not knowing what "fail" means, Mr. Stevens soon built and equipped a modern plant, furnished with the best machinery, and by his shrewdness and foresight, the plant has been a success since its inception, and has not shut down since it was started, except for repairs.

Mr. Stevens married Miss Emma G. Stephens, a daughter of John W. Stephens and C. A. Stephens. Her father belonged to a well-known Mississippi family, and died in Nashville, Tenn., while in the Confederate service. To them three bright and beautiful children have been born: Estelle, born Sept. 2, 1885; Fannie, born Aug. 27, 1888; and William Park, Jr., born June 25, 1892. Mr. Stevens claims that to his wife is due a great deal of the credit for his successful business career. He is charitable and courteous, but stern and positive in business transactions; says "No" without changing, and is what all practical business men, with whom he has dealings, term a shrewd and conservative business man. Mrs. Stevens is a prominent member of the Methodist church.

H. C. TINDALL, president of the Macon Hardware company, and a man of fine business ability, is a son of Henry W. Tindall and Judith McKey. His father was a native of Georgia, having been born near Augusta, in 1811. He was there reared to manhood, and in his early years removed to McDonough, Ga., where he embarked in the mercantile business and where he married, as above, the daughter of T. W. McKey. In 1846, he established himself in Macon, where he passed the remainder of his days, a leading spirit in the commercial life of the city. He was a man of exalted piety, and lived a life devoted in its religious bearing to the Methodist church. H. C. Tindall received his literary education in the schools of Macon and began his business career at fourteen years of age, in the wholesale establishment of Seymour, Tinsley & Co. Remaining with them five years, he concluded to invest his savings in that which always brings the best returns—an education. Having neither time nor inclination for a classical education, he concluded to take the course at Eastman college, Poughkeepsie, N. Y. He spent the summer of 1873 in that beautiful city, and graduated in the business course with honor. After he had been awarded his diploma, he was offered a good situation, through the college, with a large house in New York, but being thoroughly southern in his tastes, and having many ties at home that he could not sever, he refused the offer. Immediately upon his return to Macon, in September, he was given a place as bookkeeper with the wholesale house of Campbell & English, where he remained twelve years. He afterward became partner in the firm of wholesale tobacconists, Campbell, Tindall & Co., which he left only to become partner in the larger business of the wholesale firm of Campbell, Van Syckel & Co. By the death of Mr. Campbell the firm was changed to Nussbaum, Van Syckel & Tindall. This firm eventually merged into a stock company under style of Macon Hardware company, and Mr. Tindall is now its president. He was for two years secretary and treasurer of the Macon agricultural works and is now a director in that institution. He is also secretary and treasurer and director in the Excelsior Hook & Back Band company, whose trade covers the entire south. Mr. Tindall is a man who finds time from his secular duties to serve his church and even here his business ability is called into requisition, being trustee and treasurer of the Orphan house of the M. E. Church, South Georgia conference, and steward and trustee of Mulberry Street Methodist church of Macon. He was elected to the office of alderman in 1889, without even presenting his name for nomination, and received more votes than any candidate on the municipal ticket. He served one term (two years) in that capacity with so much gratification to the people that citizens of every class, color and station, urged him to accept the nomination for mayor, but being of a home-loving disposition and preferring business to politics he declined further honors in that field and is now happy and contented in following his chosen pursuit and in training his bright boys for the same vocation. Mr. Tindall lost his first wife, Miss Mamie L. Bass, of Covington, Ga., who died in 1887, the mother of five interesting children, for whom he subsequently found a mother in Miss Julia A. Cushman, of Columbus, Ga., a lady of the truest type.

BROOKS COUNTY.

T. N. ARRINGTON (deceased) was one of the pioneer settlers of Brooks county, who had by intelligent, faithful and painstaking labor made that piney-woods part of Georgia "blossom as the rose." In doing this none labored more earnestly or deserved more credit than Mr. Arrington. Systematic and progressive, the fruits of his careful management remain in the widely-known beautiful Arrington plantation at Hickory Head. The Arrington family came from Scotland to Virginia, removed thence to North Carolina, and later to Twiggs county, Ga. T. N. Arrington, son of Thomas and Martha Arrington, was born in Twiggs county March 13, 1825. Here he married his first wife, Lucinda Melton, who bore him four children: William, Martha, Louisa and Henry. After her death he married a widow Averett, who, in 1857, accompanied him to southern Georgia. He settled in the Hickory Head neighborhood, where a few years later his wife died, leaving no children. May 26, 1867, he married Frances Reissier, daughter of T. I. and Amanda (Groover) Denmark, of Brooks county. Six children blessed this union: Ann (Mrs. B. W. Stone), Thomasville; Briggs; Harriet (Mrs. James McMullen), and Clifford, Julia, and Thomas N., Jr., all young and at home. Mr. Arrington was esteemed as one of the most charitable of men, always ready and quick to respond to the calls of the needy. He took a deep interest in public affairs, and at the time of his death, Dec. 11, 1881, was a member of the general assembly of Georgia. This sad event devolved on his bereaved widow the care and responsibility of training and preparing for the duties of life their family of interesting children. Fortunately for them she has proven fully equal to the great emergency, the task is being successfully accomplished, and they all promise to become worthy and useful members of society.

W. P. BURKE, whose plantation home is at Hickory Head, Brooks Co., Ga., is perhaps better known as the inventor and patentee of "The Burke Automatic Steam Washer," one of the latest and most sensible inventions in that line ever placed on the market. While it would be a great impropriety to impair the dignity of this sketch to make it an advertising medium by describing the invention, it is but simple justice to the inventor to say that by giving it to the world he takes rank as a public benefactor; for any invention that is labor-saving, more particularly that lightens the labor of the care-worn housewife, entitles the inventor to that honorable distinction. Mr. Burke comes from the distinguished Irish family which sheds honor on the Irish name. Michael Burke, his grandfather, came from Ireland to Savannah, Ga., with an uncle who was a Catholic bishop on some ecclesiastical business. He had been educated for the priesthood, but abandoning that idea, he studied medicine and became quite prominent as a practitioner in both Savannah and Charleston. After many years of useful and remunerative practice he retired and removed to Richmond county, Ga., where he died. Mr. Burke's father, R. B. E. Burke, was an only child and was born in Richmond county, Ga., where he married Eleanor McCullough. He was well educated at Richmond college, Augusta, Ga., and followed the profession of a teacher in Alabama and southwest Georgia. In middle life he removed to Stewart county, Ga., where he raised his children: M. F., Gadsden county, Fla.; B. E., Quitman; W. P., inventor, Brooks county; Catharine M. (Mrs. B. F. Worrell), Thomas county, and Elizabeth, deceased. Mrs. Burke died May 13, 1870, in Decatur county, Ga., and Mr. Burke died Sept. 2, 1882, in Thomas county, Ga. W. P. Burke was born in Russell county, Ala., Jan. 25, 1845. When the "war between the states" was precipitated his youthful enthusiasm, conjoined with his impulsive blood, inspired him to quickly respond to the call for volunteers. He enlisted in one of the first companies that was organized and served with it in state service around Savannah, Ga., until the spring of 1862, when he returned home. The next year he entered the regular service as a member of Company F, Fourth Georgia cavalry. This command did service in Florida first and participated in the battle of Olustee; afterward it was transferred to Hood's army and was in the Atlanta campaign. After the fall of that city his company formed part of Gen. John T. Morgan's brigade through Tennessee and Alabama, and then under Gen. Wheeler pursued Sherman through Georgia and was in southeast Georgia at the time of the surrender. Mr. Burke returned to Brooks county after the war and was married Feb. 14, 1866, to Mary, daughter of James H. and Ellen Groover, a very old and highly respected family. To them have been born seven children: Ada I. (Mrs. W. J. Harrell), Quitman, Ga.; Pascal G., Ola E., Rufus E., Florrie E., and Linda O., young folks at home, and Walter J., the youngest, deceased. Mrs. Burke died Oct. 17, 1881, and Aug. 10, 1882, Mr. Burke was married to Fannie G. Harris, of Cuthbert, Ga. He is a democrat, a missionary Baptist, and a Master Mason. He lives on a fine 800-acre plantation six miles south of Quitman, and is considered one of the solid men of his community. He is now traveling in the interest of his invention.

ROUNTREE. This is one of the solid, substantial families of Quitman, Ga., whose different members occupy highly honorable positions, socially and financially, in this progressive little city. A. J. Rountree, the head of the family, has been a resident and leading merchant of Quitman for many years. By his sagacity and enterprise, strict attention to business, and unswerving integrity of character, he has secured the confidence of the community, established an enviable reputation, and accumulated a handsome fortune. He is of South Carolina stock, his grandfather and father having lived in Edgefield district. Richard Rountree, his grandfather, was living there during the revolutionary war, and was a very wealthy planter. He joined the patriot army, serving as a captain, and on one occasion while at home an incident occurred which showed his great nerve and courage. He was known as a man of wealth, and believed to be possessed of no small amount of money. This was a tempting bait to the tories, who, learning of his presence at home, surprised and captured him, and attempted to force him to divulge its hiding place. With determined courage he held out against them, although they went to the desperate extreme of tying and leaving him in the swamp. After the tories left a faithful negro released him after he had been in the swamp two days and saved his life, and he lived to raise a large family. This remarkable man had a family of eighteen children. Three daughters remained in South Carolina. One of these married Wiley Barry; another Samuel Stalnaker, and a third Thomas Goldsmith. Five of the daughters settled in Jasper county, Ga., one marrying Jefferson Smith, another Cary Cox, another Asa Cox, another Stevens and the fifth Willborn. James Rountree made York district, S. C., his home. Thomas went to reside near Huntsville, Ala., and William somewhere in Tennessee. The subject of this sketch is unable to mention the residence of the remaining six children. Daniel Rountree, son of Richard Rountree, was born in Edgefield district and was a man of some prominence, who for many years served as a magistrate and was a well-to-do planter. He married Fannie Nelson, same district, by whom he had eight children: Elvira, James, Martha, Parmela, Andrew J., W. D., Thomas J., and Myra, all of whom are dead except Andrew J. Mr. Daniel Rountree and his wife were Baptists, and lived and died in Edgefield district. Andrew J. Rountree was born in Edgefield district, S. C., Aug. 3, 1818. When seventeen years of age, becoming discontented with home, he left and worked his way to Alabama, where he remained a year as overseer on a plantation in Wilcox county. He spent the next year in Lowndes county, during which he became a volunteer member of a company which did service in the Creek Indian war, for which he now draws a pension. At the end of two years (1837) he returned home, and the next two years went to school and worked on the plantation. In 1839 he went to Marengo county, Ala., remaining but a few months, and then pushing his way to Louisiana, he obtained a position as overseer in Claiborne parish. He remained here but two years, and then went to Natchitoches parish, where he remained five years. By this time he had accumulated some money, and concluded to return home and engage in merchandising, in which he has been unusually successful. He remained in Edgefield, S. C., until after the close of the war, when he made a prospecting tour in Southern Georgia, and being favorably impressed with the country about Quitman, he determined on making that place his home. So he removed and established himself and has built up a business and reputation as solid as any in that section of the state. Though still in robust health and quite active, he has partially retired from business, which is conducted by his sons. In 1847 Mr. Rountree was married in Edgefield district to Mary Zimmerman, who died four months afterward. In August, 1852, he married Savilla, daughter of Samuel Stevens, formerly of Connecticut, who had settled in Edgefield. By this second marriage he had seven children: Fannie C. (Mrs. Dr. T. W. Hunter), Quitman; Samuel S., merchant, Quitman; Daniel W., lawyer, Atlanta; Bartow, merchant, Quitman; Matt, Eliza (Mrs. Taylor Dukes), Quitman; Walter, deceased, and Edward N., Quitman. Politically Mr. Rountree is a lifelong, uncompromising democrat, and religiously a Baptist; he is also a member of the Masonic fraternity.

THOMAS IRVING DENMARK. This gentleman is one of the oldest of the living representatives of the pioneer settlers of the vast piney-woods region of southern Georgia, who wrested it from barbarism and blazed out the way for advancing civilization. Nearly a score of years ago he passed the allotted three score years and ten. Blessed with a strong constitution, not addicted to any debilitating excesses, careful not to abuse "God's temple," he has attained to remarkable longevity and retained wonderful physical vigor. Scrupulously abstemious, he has never used tobacco nor liquor in any way except as a medicine. His colonist ancestors were of Scotch-Irish origin.

Mr. Denmark was born Sept. 30, 1809, in Bulloch county, Ga. His paternal grandfather, William Denmark, was the son of an Irishman, who settled in the state of North Carolina, on the Great Pedee river, many years before the revolutionary war. His maternal grandfather, William Wise, was a native of Scotland and emigrated to this country when quite a young man before the revolutionary war and settled in Screven county, Ga. The grandfathers on both sides were soldiers in the revolution. William Denmark, the paternal grandfather, removed to Georgia about the year 1770 and settled in Screven county. He subsequently moved to Bulloch county, and late in life to Warren county, where he died at the advanced age of 102 years. William Denmark had two wives—his second wife being Emma Moye, a sister of his first. Emma Moye, second wife of William Denmark, is said to have lived to the age of 101 years. William Denmark had a number of children by each of his wives.

Mr. Thomas I. Denmark's father, Redden Denmark, the son of William by his second wife, Emma, was born in Screven county, and was reared partly in Screven and partly in Bulloch. Redden married Lavinia, daughter of William Wise, a planter in Bulloch county, where he raised the following named children: Elizabeth (Mrs. James Groover), deceased; Clarissa, deceased; Sarah (Mrs. William Lastinger), deceased; Thomas Irving, the subject of this sketch, and John, who died in 1894 in Perry, Florida. Redden Denmark, the father of Thomas Irving, died in 1814 in Bulloch county, Ga., at the age of forty-four. Lavinia, widow of Redden Denmark, and mother of Thomas Irving, a short time after the death of her first husband, was married to Mr. McNeeley, by whom she had several children, and lived to be about seventy years of age.

Mr. Thomas Irving Denmark, the subject of this sketch, after the death of his father and marriage of his mother, was taken and reared by his uncle, Malachi Denmark, on a plantation in Bulloch county, and had the advantage only of an "old field" school education. Dec. 1, 1831, he married Amanda Groover, daughter of Charles Groover, a planter of Bulloch county, Georgia, and settled near his father's old home. In 1837 Mr. Denmark removed with his wife and the three children, who had been born to them, to Thomas county, Ga., now a portion of Brooks county, and settled about four miles south of his present home in Brooks county, where he lived for eight years. In 1845 he moved from the place settled by him in 1837 to his present home in the piney-woods of Brooks county, four miles south of Quitman, where he has lived ever since.

Mrs. Denmark, wife of Thomas Irving, was born May 12, 1816, and died Aug. 15, 1890. She was a woman of great piety and of considerable intellectual force. Her mother was a native of Savannah, and both of her parents were descendants of the Salzburgers, a religious sect who left Austria on account of religious persecutions and settled at Ebenezer, in Effingham county, soon after the settlement of Savannah by Oglethorpe. The old Ebenezer church, built by the Salzburgers, still stands near the banks of the Savannah river in Effingham county. Mrs. Denmark was one of the organizers (about 1840) of Liberty Baptist church in the old town of Grooverville in Thomas (now Brooks) county, Ga.

The children of Thomas Irving and Amanda (Groover) Denmark are: Sarah Elizabeth, wife of James Lee, Jr., of Bulloch county; Agnes Assenith, widow of Aaron W. L. McFarlin, who now lives with her father; Redden Irving, a planter of Brooks county; Mary Jane, widow of Wade P. Hodges, of Decatur county; Clayton Rhay, a planter, died in Brooks county, December, 1886, at the age of forty-six; Frances Reiser, widow of Thomas N. Arrington, of Brooks county; Daniel Jones, died aged eleven; Ann Victoria, died aged sixteen; Brantley Astor, a lawyer of Savannah, Ga.; De Witt Clinton, who died at the age of twenty-one; Elisha Peck Smith, a lawyer of Valdosta, Ga.; Nora Judson, who died in infancy; Florence Virginia, wife of Joshua N. Saunders, of Leon county, Fla. Mr. Denmark has now living seventy-five descendants, to-wit: Eight children, forty-two grandchildren and twenty-five great grandchildren. He has had in all ninety-five descendants, to-wit: Thirteen children, fifty-five grandchildren, and twenty-seven great grandchildren.

During the Seminole war in Florida Mr. Denmark enlisted as a soldier, but saw very little active service, being in only one skirmish with the Indians.

In 1864, during the war between the states, when a call was made by the Confederate states for an enlistment of men from 16 to 55, Mr. Denmark, though within seven weeks of fifty-five years of age, volunteered and went into the army, where he saw some pretty hard service around the city of Atlanta, and was there at the evacuation of that city by the Confederate army. His sons, Redden and Clayton, enlisted in the Confederate army in the early part of the war, and both of them were in it at the close of hostilities.

Mr. Denmark's whole life has been devoted to farming. He has always taken a very active part in the cause of education and religion. He has been a deacon in the Baptist church over fifty years, and all of his children are members of that church, except Mrs. Hodges, who is a Methodist. Three of his sons were educated at the university of Georgia. To all of his children he gave the best educational advantages that he could afford at the time. His sons and daughters are specimens of true manhood and womanhood.

Mr. Denmark had always enjoyed the best of health and is still vigorous and well-preserved in body and mind. He has always managed his own plantation. While a slave-holder he would never have an overseer. At the age of eighty-six he is still quite active and manages his own farm, looking after all its details with as much care as if he were still a young man.

He has always viewed grief and trouble with a philosophic eye—looking back, after the first shock of death, upon the lives of his children that had gone before him, with a pleasant memory. His sole great affliction, from which he has never rallied, and the one on which his thoughts constantly dwell, was the death of his wife on Aug. 15, 1890, with whom he had lived in loving and sweet companionship over fifty-eight years.

Mr. Denmark has always been a kind and generous neighbor. He is a type of what is correctly termed a "good citizen." He is punctilious, almost to a fault, in the keeping of his promises. He is a consistent, though not a puritanical, Christian. He has always been a democrat, but has never had anything to do with politics except to vote and to advocate the claims of those he thought worthy of public trust.

He was a faithful husband, a stern but kind father. He believed that boys and girls should be early taught to take care of themselves, and that idleness was the parent of many vices. His children demonstrate the wisdom of the manner in which he reared them.

Often around his table and on the wide piazzas of his country home may be seen gathered about him, in one group, children, grandchildren and great grandchildren.

REV. CHARLES SCRIVEN GAULDEN. As it is the province of these volumes to commemorate the lives and deeds of the men who have helped to shape the destiny of this fair state, the name of the deceased subject of this sketch is presented. Born and reared on Georgia soil, under which his body now sleeps, he was one of her most devoted sons, and during a long and useful life did much to elevate her in the moral and intellectual scale. He was of Scotch-Irish ancestry, descended from families who had first settled in Virginia, but later migrated to South Carolina, where his father, Jonathan, was reared, and who brought the name to Georgia, settling in Liberty county in the latter part of the last century. Here he reared his family and here our subject was born May 5, 1812. His mother was a Miss Paisley, of Savannah, Ga., of Scotch-Irish stock and of remarkable intellectual powers. Mr. Gaulden was second in age of seven sons. His boyhood was spent in pursuits incident to the plantation life of those early days, and in acquiring the rudiments of an education, which was completed at the university of Georgia, which he left a few months before graduating. When he was about the age of twenty-one years his father moved with his family from Liberty county to Lowndes (now Brooks) county. Shortly after this he volunteered his services in behalf of his state, and as a gallant, fearless soldier, led the battle of Brushey creek in the war against the Seminole Indians, where he captured a number and put the others to flight, causing them finally to leave Georgia. Although so young he displayed those characteristics which followed him through life; coolness in time of danger, great executive ability, practical in all things, sound judgment, unyielding will and perfect fearlessness.

In this battle he received a wound in his right cheek which came very near proving fatal. As the bullet could not be extracted, he carried it through life. Shortly after leaving college he chose law as a profession, and as friend and pupil of the famous Judge Law, of Savannah, Ga., he in due course of time was admitted to the bar. Selecting Lumpkin, Stewart county, as a suitable point, he began there his career as a lawyer, which for twenty years was one of uninterrupted success. His residence at Lumpkin was at a time when that town was one of the most flourishing in the state, and the local bar, of which he was admitted leader, was not surpassed by any. The points which gave him pre-eminence were an indomitable will, tireless energy, with lack of even the idea of fear, and perfect integrity in his business and private life. His reputation as a fearless advocate, combined with his high moral character, excellent judgment, and proficiency in his profession, made him one of the most successful lawyers of his time. The fact that from the practice of his profession he amassed a fortune of about $200,000 in about fifteen years being evidence per se.

Politically, he was a whig, and represented Stewart county one term in the legislature, where he went for the special purpose of aiding in the establishment of the supreme court of the state, which was done largely by his influence and labor, as the entire southern portion of the state, or the wire grass section, followed his leadership. The supreme court probably would not have been established when it was but for his personal efforts and active influence. When this court had been established he secured the pledge of a majority of the legislature to elect his distinguished preceptor, Judge Law, of Savannah, to the position of chief justice, which he, however, refused, replying: "It would be the ambition of my life, but I am too poor a man to give up my practice of $25,000 per annum to accept so small a salary."

Political preferment, however, had no charm for Mr. Gaulden, and although he had several times been offered the nomination for congress, which meant his election, he refused and never again stood for office, though he served as a delegate from Brooks county in the secession convention of the state. He preferred that Georgia should remain in the Union, but went with the majority; as he never acted for mere effect, but to accomplish some good end. He afterward told a member of his family that he went with a majority of the convention, as refusal so to do would do no good. But it was one of the saddest days of his life; and he took himself to the solitude of the woods, where the tears of sorrow flowed fast as he poured out his heart in prayer to his God for his country, friends and family. But we have anticipated.

Having gained eminence at the bar, and made himself financially independent, a strange departure was made in his life—at least so it seemed to the world. But gold could not allure, or ambition tempt—in fact nothing could swerve him from the path of duty, as he conceived it. Literally renouncing what the world generally most prizes and covets, in 1859 he moved from Lumpkin to his plantation in then the new county of Brooks, and from that time to the day of his death gave his time and means to the propagation of the Gospel of Christ. His method was that of the true missionary. Being a regularly ordained minister of the Missionary Baptist church he would begin a series of meetings in a country community, and such was the power of his preaching and the influence of his Christian example, a baptism of the Holy Spirit would follow and conversions result, and a church would be built with means largely of his furnishing. When he went to Brooks county there was but one Missionary Baptist church in it—at Grooverville. He organized the one at Quitman, and numbers of others in the three counties of Lowndes, Brooks and Thomas. His services were always gratuitous, using whatever was given him for the cause of missions. During the war he organized the Mercer Baptist association, and for many years was moderator. As a public speaker he was didactic in style; though when enthused could rise to flights of oratory which captivated his audience and convinced them of the truths he was uttering. A profound theologian, he expounded the truths of the Bible with no uncertain sound; and with his wealth, social position and useful life, did much to advance the kingdom of his Master. He was married in 1844, in Lumpkin, to Charlotte L. Le Sueur, a lady of French Huguenot stock, who bore him seven children, viz.: Charlie M., wife of John Tillman, hardware merchant now residing at Quitman, Ga.; John B.; James Albert; Cornelia L., who died in infancy; D. Le Sueur, lawyer, Titusville, Fla.; William T., teacher in high school, Albany, Ga.; Samuel S., physician, Quitman, Ga. With the counsel and example of such a father, aided by the ministrations of a devoted wife, no comment need be made as to the position these children now occupy in their different spheres.

Rev. Gaulden died at Quitman, Ga., Oct. 8, 1894, of pneumonia, contracted while on a visit to one of his plantations on the Etowah river, a few weeks previously. Around his dying bed gathered his children and wife, who heard from his lips his last utterances, full of Christian hope and triumph over the last enemy—Death. Thus did a great man live and die; caring nothing for worldly fame, or the plaudits of men; leaving the sweet incense of a Christian life as a precious memory and inspiration to his family and numerous friends. His wife, a woman noted for her gentleness and loveliness of person and character, and unbounded kindness and hospitality, survived him but a few years, departing this life on Aug. 1, 1889.

E. A. JELKS, M. D. There is perhaps no more popular person in Quitman than the gentleman whose life supplies the material for this sketch. For many years he has ushered numbers of its now bustling citizens across the threshold of life, administered to their bodily ills, and eased their exit into the great beyond. Dr. Jelks was born in Hawkinsville, Ga., Oct. 1, 1836, and was the son of Col. J. O. and Mary (Polhill) Jelks. The family on the father's side is of Welsh descent, and on the mother's of English. The three original members of the Jelks family who came to this country first settled in North Carolina, whence they emigrated south and westward. Dr. Jelks' father, Jas. O. Jelks, came to Georgia, and settled in Pulaski county, in the early part of this century, where he was a merchant and planter and raised his family, and where he died in 1885. He was quite prominent in his day, and represented the county in the legislature between 1830-40. His wife was a daughter of James Polhill, for many years judge of the southern circuit, and who died while in office. The children of this couple are: E. A., doctor; J. O., merchant, Hawkinsville; J. J., fertilizer company, Macon; Nathaniel P., doctor; Needham W. (deceased), Hawkinsville; W. A., merchant, Hawkinsville; and Virgie P. (Mrs. W. S. Holliman, Macon, Ga.). Dr. Jelks was educated at Mercer university, Ga., but left the senior class to study medicine under Dr. L. A. Folsom, Bellville, Fla. He attended the lectures in Philadelphia, and was in a class of 640. Of these 400 were southerners, most of whom left and came south when hostilities seemed imminent. He entered the medical college at Charleston, S. C., and graduating in 1860, settled in Quitman, Ga., and commenced the practice of his profession. He had hardly got well started when volunteers were called for and he enlisted in Company C, Twenty-sixth Georgia regiment, which was sent to Virginia, and became a part of "Stonewall" Jackson's famous corps. On the organization of the regiment in Brunswick, Dr. Jelks was made assistant surgeon and on its reorganization a year later, he was appointed surgeon. He was on the field during the seven days' fight, was at Second Manassas, in the valley campaigns under Early, at Sharpsburg and Fredericksburg, and surrendered at Appomattox. After the war he resumed the practice of his profession at Quitman, in which he has been eminently successful, from which he is seeking to be relieved. He is largely interested in orange culture at Lake Jesup, Fla. In 1863, Dr. Jelks married Constance A. Atkinson, in Camden county, Ga., by whom he has had four children: Bessie (deceased); Josie, single; Edwin, drug clerk, Quitman; and Nellie (deceased). This wife died in 1890, and the doctor married Janie Sinclair, who has borne him no children. Dr. Jelks is a democrat, an elder in the Presbyterian church, and a Mason. His geniality of disposition and wholesouledness of character have won for him the admiration of hosts of friends in the community where his life has been so usefully spent.

JOHN G. M'CALL, son of Francis S. and Ann (Dopson) McCall, was born in Screven county, Ga., Jan. 18, 1836. This is a large and prominent family in Brooks county, descended from two brothers, Daniel and William McCall, who came from Scotland to America among the earliest colonists. William McCall, grandfather of John G., settled in eastern Georgia, in Screven county, where he lived a useful and exemplary life as a Baptist minister. During the revolutionary war he served as colonel under Gen. Francis Marion, with conspicuous efficiency. In 1835 Francis S. McCall, father of John G., married Ann, daughter of Joseph Dopson, a very wealthy and influential planter of Beaufort district, S. C. Mr. McCall died Aug. 30, 1877, but his widow is still living at the advanced age of seventy-seven years. The newly-married couple lived in Screven county three years, and then removed to Telfair county, Ga., where they lived until 1845, when they removed to what is now Brooks county, and settled at a point eight miles below the present site of Quitman, the county seat. Here the family enjoys an influence deserved and wide. Mr. McCall was especially active during his lifetime in looking after the interests of the Baptist denomination in that section.

This worthy couple raised to maturity a family of thirteen children, all of whom became useful and honored members of society. Those now living are: John G., Dr. J. H., president Merchants' and Farmers' bank, Quitman; Jane, wife of C. M. Quarterman, druggist, Quitman; W. C., lawyer, Quitman; Mary, wife of J. B. Finch, merchant, Quitman; Elvira, widow of Elijah Ives, Orlando, Fla.; H. J., lawyer, Madison, Fla., and Addie, wife of J. N. Stripling, lawyer, Jacksonville, Fla. Capt. McCall was educated at Union university, Murfreesboro, Tenn., where he graduated with the degree of A. M. in 1858. He was immediately elected by the trustees of the university adjunct professor of mathematics and languages, and after serving one term was elected to the chair of Greek and Hebrew. He held this position until the university suspended on account of the war, when he returned home. The following year he enlisted and was made first lieutenant of Company K, Fiftieth Georgia regiment. He retained this position until promoted to the captaincy of the company after the battle of Gettysburg. Immediately after entering the service Capt. McCall's company was stationed three months at Savannah, and then was ordered to join Gen. Longstreet's corps in the army of Northern Virginia. While in this corps his command participated in a number of the most sanguinary battles of the war—notably Second Manassas, Fredericksburg, Antietam and Gettysburg. Immediately after this memorable engagement Capt. McCall's military life was suddenly terminated by a distressing wound. On the retreat of the army across the Potomac he was assigned to the command of several companies and a section of artillery with instructions to hold the bridge at all hazards. Just as Capt. McCall had completed the advantageous position of his men he was struck by a minie ball from the gun of a sharpshooter, which so shattered his lower jaw as to necessitate the amputation of a large portion of it. A remarkable fact connected with it was that the pain was slight, and it healed so rapidly that he was able to be about in a few days. On his return home he was elected ordinary of the company, serving four years, and during which time he entered upon the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1866 and commenced the practice as one of the firm of Hunter & McCall, a partnership which continued until 1871, since which time he has practiced alone. Capt. McCall has always taken an active interest in public affairs, particularly educational, both local and state. He has been chairman of the board of education and is now chairman of the city school board. The very excellent system of graded schools at Quitman is largely due to his intelligent efforts, he having been mayor when it was inaugurated. His earnest and persistent work has done much toward securing the phenomenal success the schools have achieved. He is a member of the board of visitors and advisers of the Southern Female college at La Grange, Ga., and for many years has been connected with Mercer university as a trustee. Capt. McCall is a valued and very prominent member of the Baptist church, and has enjoyed the rare distinction, not often bestowed on a member of his profession, of being elected moderator of the Mercer Baptist association. The following exceedingly complimentary mention is made of Capt. McCall by one of the state dailies: "In fact Capt. McCall is a wonderfully well-rounded man. He is an able lawyer, a profound theologian, an eminent scholar, a successful financier and one of the best Sunday school superintendents that ever managed a school." Capt. McCall was married in Quitman, Jan. 31, 1867, to Rosa, daughter of Dr. Virgil Bobo. His wife is of French descent, a niece of the distinguished Edward J. Black, many years ago a member of congress from Georgia, and is a cousin of Congressman G. R. Black. To them five children have been born: Rosa (Mrs. J. O. Lewis), Quitman; Rachel Black, Nonnie Bobo, Edna Floride, and a son, John Francis, Jr., who is a student at Mercer university—all of whom are members of the Baptist church, a fact of which the parents are especially and justly proud. After Capt. McCall's admission to the bar in 1866 he rose rapidly in the estimation of the bar and the public and built up a large and lucrative practice and an excellent reputation as a constitutional lawyer, no higher evidence of which could be given than the fact that he has lost but one case before the supreme court in all these years. His activity in educational and religious life has gained for him a state-wide reputation as an exponent of advanced thought along these lines.

In June, 1894, the degree of LL. D. was conferred on Capt. McCall by Mercer university, Macon, Ga. He is also vice-president of the Merchants' and Farmers' bank of Quitman, Ga., which institution is now in successful operation.

BUTTS COUNTY.

THOMAS JACKSON DEMPSEY, a prominent real estate broker of Jackson, Butts Co., Ga., is a native of Cobb county, Ga., and was born in December of 1852. When he became of age, he left the farm and went to work on the railroad, being contractor for the N. O. & N. W. trunk line for a period of nine years. In 1883, he moved to Jackson and entered the mercantile business which he carried on successfully for several years, when he sold out and went into the present real estate business. Since his location in Jackson, Mr. Dempsey has labored faithfully for the welfare of the city and has been honored by public office a number of times. He served one term as mayor of Jackson, having been elected to that office in 1889. Prior to that time he had served several times as a member of the city council. The success of the Jackson institute is due largely to the efforts of Mr. Dempsey, he being a member of the board, and one of the few men who built and who help to maintain it. Having so faithfully labored in municipal affairs the people of the county recognized his true worth and ability by electing him to represent them in the general assembly. He served in the sessions of 1892 and '93, and as a member of the committee on corporations, education and finance, and as chairman of the committee on journal, acquitted himself in his usual creditable manner. In 1877 Mr. Dempsey was married to Miss Narcissus Smith, a daughter of John D. and Irene (Nix) Smith. Mr. Smith was one of the most substantial farmers in Cobb county. His death occurred in February, 1891. Mr. and Mrs. Dempsey became the parents of four children: Elam Franklin, now eighteen, will take a course in Oxford college, and then enter one of the professions; Irene Emma; Ernestine May; and Thomas J., Jr. Mr. Dempsey is the son of Alvin G. and Emeline (Waters) Dempsey, the father being a native of Cobb county, born in 1833. A veteran of the civil war, he did gallant service as lieutenant of his company. After the war closed he entered the ministry, and also took some interest in politics. The mother is a native of Coweta county, and is at present living among her children in Cobb county. The Dempsey and Waters families are of Scotch-Irish descent, emigrating from the north of Ireland and settling in Virginia.

Mr. and Mrs. Dempsey are members of the Methodist church, in which organization Mr. Dempsey holds the office of steward and trustee. A free and accepted Mason, he holds the office of senior warden in his lodge. The foregoing is only a short outline of the life of one who, starting in life with only health and strength as his capital, has by industry and integrity surmounted every difficulty and risen to his rightful place among the foremost people of Butts county.

ALFRED CUTHBERT MILLEN, merchant, Flovilla, Butts Co., Ga., was born in Jasper county, Ga., Feb. 14, 1850. At the age of twenty-four, having acquired but an academic education, he went to Smith's Mills, Jasper county, and entered the mercantile business as a clerk for W. B. Dozier. He remained in this position for one year, when he became a member of the firm, the business being removed to Flovilla, where it was successfully carried on until 1890. In that year he went into business for himself, the success of his former venture still attending him. Elected to the office of alderman of Flovilla in 1883, he is still serving in that capacity, being treasurer of the board. He was married in January, 1883, to Miss Roxie, daughter of Charles and Lou (Watkins) Thornton, and they are the parents of the following children: Bessie, deceased; Myrtle and Olive. Mr. Millen is the son of George D. and May (Sauls) Millen. The family are of German descent and were formerly from New Jersey. Coming to Georgia they settled in Chatham county, where the father followed the profession of law, and also taught successfully in several different counties. He was a veteran of the war of 1812, and also did service in the Indian war of 1836. He was a most successful planter and owned one of the largest plantations in the state. His death occurred in 1861, and that of his wife in 1884. Mr. Millen and his wife are members of the Methodist church of which he is a steward, and he is also a master Mason. He is one of the self-made men of Georgia. He began life without a dollar of his own, but the school of adversity, in which his early life was invigorated, proved an experience which in after years enabled him to overcome discouraging obstacles, and bring success from that which to many a man of less firm purpose would have proved defeat. All of his business transactions are dictated by a shrewd common sense and a correct judgment that seems to be inborn and intuitive, and he impresses those with whom he comes in contact as a man of more than ordinary intelligence and sagacity.

ELI EZEKIEL POUND, mayor of Jackson, Butts Co., Ga., was born in Putnam county, Ga., May 9, 1839. After receiving a common school education at home, he entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., and taking the three years' course, was graduated in 1858. He taught school until the war, at Stanfordville, Putnam Co., Ga., and Macon. He enlisted in the Ninth Georgia regiment, commanded by Rev. P. H. Mell, chancellor of the university of Georgia, but was subsequently transferred to the second brigade of Georgia militia, which participated at the battle of Griswoldville, November, 1864. He passed the remaining days of the war in Savannah. Again taking up the ferule, he served several years as principal of the school at the famous health resort of Indian Springs, Butts Co. He then entered upon mercantile life, which he followed with success until 1860, when he removed to Jackson, where he now resides. While a resident of Indian Springs he served frequently on the board of aldermen, and several terms as mayor; and he has been for many years the efficient county school commissioner of Butts county. He is now serving his second term as mayor of Jackson. In October, 1859, Mr. Pound was married to Miss Sallie Leverett, daughter of William Leverett, of Machen, whose sketch will be found under the head of Jasper county. To this union were born the following children: Florence V., deceased; Augusta E., wife of J. T. Harris, Olivia, Ga.; Osceola A., Grand Rapids, Mich.; Lamar, traveling agent for R. G. Dun; Elia E., teacher at Harmony Grove, Ga.; Myrtle and Eloise—young ladies at home. Mrs. Pound is a lady of refinement and education, and a graduate of the female college at Covington. The parents of Mr. Pound were John B. and Amelia (Gay) Pound. The former was born in 1799, and was one of the most successful planters in the county. The latter was a native of Jones county, Ga., and died in 1841. They were among the most prominent families of Putnam county. Mr. Eli E. Pound is a Baptist in religious belief and has held the office of clerk in his local organization for several years. He is a very enthusiastic member of the masonic fraternity, and an untiring worker. He established the lodge at Indian Springs and was its worshipful master for twenty-five years. He is high priest of the chapter of royal arch Masons at Jackson; thrice illustrious master of the council of royal select masters, and is grand master of the second veil of grand royal arch chapter of Georgia. Col. Pound takes a lively interest in politics; is chairman of the democratic executive committee for the sixth congressional district, and was an alternate elector on the Cleveland ticket in 1884. The foregoing is a sketch of one of the most prominent citizens of Butts county, and is evidence that in church, masonry, education and politics, Mr. Pound is regarded as one of the highest ability and of the purest character.

YOUNG ALEXANDER WRIGHT is the name of the young man who, at the age of eighteen, was made head schoolmaster of the Jackson, Butts Co., Ga., schools, a position he filled in a satisfactory manner for five consecutive years. While teaching Mr. Wright found time and inclination to take up Blackstone, and in 1878 was admitted to the bar. He has since built a lucrative practice. He has served in various public offices and occupies a warm place in the hearts of the people of Jackson and of Butts county. Elected to the office of mayor of Jackson in 1877, and held it for eight years in succession. While representing his county in the lower house of the state legislature, to which office he was elected in 1885, he introduced thirteen bills, nine of which became laws without change, a record unequalled by but few legislators in the history of the state. Mr. Wright is a native of Stewart county, Ga., and was born Jan. 28, 1855, being one of a large family of children, some of whom are: William A., a resident of Kentucky, is the inventor of the terracing machine which has revolutionized the system of planting in the south; Texas, wife of E. M. McCutcheon; Claudia A., Mrs. W. N. Chambliss; Amelia, wife of L. C. Chambliss; Jacob; Annie G., Mrs. James A. Gates; Ada, Mrs. H. McLendon; Minnie and Birdie, at home. The father of these children, Young Frederick Wright, was born in Meriwether county in 1829, his parents having been early settlers from North Carolina. In 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate service, but was subsequently detailed to take charge of the salt works at Saltville village, Va. He is now one of the successful planters of Meriwether county. Mrs. Wright is a native of Randolph county, Ga., and was born in 1838. Her parents came from South Carolina, and are living in Stewart county, Ga. In December, 1882, Young Alexander Wright was married to Miss Ida W. Ellis, a native of Butts county, daughter of Dr. James F. and Elizabeth J. (Amos) Ellis. Mr. Wright belongs to several important secret societies, in which he is an active worker. He is a past master of his Masonic lodge, and is now king of the chapter. He is a Knight of Pythias of Empire lodge, Atlanta, and is great sachem in his lodge of Noble Red Men. At the state convocation of this order in 1893 he was elected great representative of the state. He is also past dictator in the Knights of Honor. Coming to Jackson in January of 1876, Mr. Wright has by his own efforts won his way to the top and is one of the most promising lawyers in the state. He is the senior member of the law firm of Wright & Beck.

CALHOUN COUNTY.

JEDEMAIAH JOHN BECK, lawyer, Morgan, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in La Fayette, Chambers Co., Ala., Feb. 19, 1841. His father, Rev. J. J. Beck, was a Baptist minister, and died two years after the son was born. His mother removed first to Troup county, Ga., and then to Stewart county, Ga., where the subject of this sketch was reared, and received a common school education. While yet a youth of fifteen he commenced teaching, and was a private tutor in South Carolina. At this time, and before the war, he began reading law. When the war began he enlisted in the Twenty-third South Carolina regiment, of which he was made ordnance sergeant, and, subsequently, was made brigade ordnance sergeant. At the close of the war he located in Morgan, taught school and read law, and was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1866, Judge John T. Clark presiding, since which time he has continued in the practice and secured an excellent clientage. He has also held the office of ordinary of the county, been judge of the county court, and served as school commissioner of the county. In 1884 he was elected to represent Calhoun county in the general assembly. Mr. Beck has been twice married. His first marriage was to Miss Sarah C., daughter of Rev. S. Parker, a leading Baptist minister of Randolph county, Ga. This lady died in 1871. His second marriage was to Mrs. Jennie Powell, a widow, of Terrell county, Ga. By his first marriage he had four children: Floy, who married John N. Rogers, teacher, Burke county, Ga.; Walter, aged 13; Jeddie, 10, and Clio, 5. Mr. Beck is a Royal Arch Mason, was worshipful master of Concord lodge, now defunct, and has presided as high priest of his chapter.

CAPT. P. E. BOYD, one of the largest and most successful merchants in Calhoun county, is the son of John and Eliza (Lofton) Boyd, both natives of South Carolina and now deceased. Capt. Boyd was born March 9, 1840, on one of his father's farms in South Carolina. When he was two years old his father moved to Columbia county, Ga., where he remained until he was fourteen years of age. He then went to Webster county and worked on a farm for several years. He started in the mercantile business at Leary in 1873, having been in the same business four years previously in a country store. In connection with his merchandise business Capt. Boyd works some 200 people and runs 100 plows on his plantations. He owns 10,000 acres of land, a large part of which is under cultivation, and raises 800 bales of cotton and 15,000 bushels of corn annually. Capt. Boyd has several stores in Leary, and is one of the largest merchants and planters in Calhoun county. He carries a stock of goods valued at $20,000 in his main store; and works nearly a dozen men there. He is a Mason, having taken the chapter degrees, and is unmarried. Few men have a more creditable war history than Capt. Boyd.

JEFFERSON LAMAR BOYNTON, lawyer and planter, Dickey, Calhoun Co., Ga., son of Willard Boynton, was born in Lumpkin, Stewart Co., Ga., April 4, 1846. His great grandfather, Needham Bryan, was an officer in the revolutionary war. His father was a large planter, a citizen of prominence and influence, who represented Stewart county many times in the general assembly, and died in 1865. Mr. Boynton is a cousin to Gen. Clement A. Evans, the distinguished Confederate general and Methodist preacher. The Boyntons are of English origin, and the branch of the family of which the subject of this sketch is a member—numbering 3,000 or more—has representative reunions annually. Ex-Gov. James S. Boynton, Griffin, Ga., and Gens. H. V. and W. S. Boynton, distinguished Federal commanders, are members of the family. Before the war Mr. Boynton had enjoyed some academic advantages, but his studies were interrupted by the civil war. At the age of fifteen he volunteered and entered the Confederate army, and was in the command of Gen. Joseph Wheeler. He was captured three times: First, at New Haven, Ky., and was carried to Louisville, and after three months' imprisonment he was exchanged. Second, he was captured at the battle of Bradyville, Tenn., and was again sent to Louisville. It was an interesting coincidence that he occupied the same quarters and bunk as before. During his first imprisonment he made a pencil memorandum on the wall, of his regiment, company, etc., and when he returned he found that some Federal had written under it: "A d——d rebel." On being exchanged he rejoined his command. Third, he was captured near Marietta, Ga., and carried to Gen. McPherson's headquarters. He escaped the same night and made his way back to the Confederate lines. After the war he settled in Calhoun county and engaged in farming. In the meantime he studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1882, and has since continued to practice, not neglecting, however, his farming interest. He has been judge of the county court, and is now serving his third term as representative in the general assembly, is chairman of the committee on finance, and, in addition, is a member of the committee on judiciary and rules. Mr. Boynton was married in 1867 to Miss Gertrude, daughter of R. R. Davis, a planter of South Carolina. But one child has blessed this union: Eula, born in 1869, who is the wife of William E. Harvin, planter, Calhoun county. Mr. Boynton sustains a fine reputation in his profession, is establishing a fine practice, is popular and held in high esteem by his fellow-citizens, who seem willing to gratify any political ambition he may have at heart. He is regarded as one of the most conservative and one of the ablest members of the present general assembly.

THOMAS J. DUNN, lawyer and planter, Morgan, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in Twiggs county, Feb. 11, 1821. His father, Jacob Dunn, was a large planter, and died in 1857. The family is of English ancestry—this branch coming from Virginia to Georgia. His mother belongs to the family of Baldwin, distinguished in Georgia history. Mr. Dunn had the advantage of a good English education, and started in life as a teacher, but at the end of a year abandoned teaching. He studied law under Judge Isaac Bower, father of Judge B. B. Bower, now judge of the Albany circuit, and was admitted to the bar Dec. 16, 1844, Judge Lott Warren presiding. (Mr. Dunn was born the same year that Hon. Richard H. Clark was, and admitted to the bar at the same time. Mr. Clark is now judge of the Atlanta circuit.) Mr. Dunn was examined by Phil. Sligh, G. W. B. Toombs (afterward governor), David Cadoo, George Dudley, and Solicitor-General Rease, all distinguished men. Reporting the examination to the court, Gov. Toombs said: "Mr. Dunn comes forward with the most brilliant prospects of any young man I have known in the state of Georgia." He located in Cuthbert, Randolph Co., Ga., where he remained eighteen years, and then removed to Newton, Baker Co., Ga. After a six months' residence in Newton he returned to Cuthbert, where he resided and practiced twelve years, when he removed to Morgan, in 1874, which he has since made his home. At the end of forty years of practice he retired in 1884. In 1872 he was elected to represent Calhoun county in the general assembly. Mr. Dunn was married in 1871 to Catharine N., daughter of William G. Pierce, a pioneer citizen of Calhoun county, ex-clerk of the superior court, and ex-representative to the general assembly. This union has been blessed with three children: Thomas J., Jr., born Nov. 16, 1872; Cora Emma, born in 1873, married to George W. Colley, planter, Morgan; and Frank, born Jan. 9, 1874. Mr. Dunn is now living in the enjoyment of the fine estate he has created, and the respect of his fellow-citizens. He is a master Mason.

J. H. FUTCH, of Leary, Calhoun Co., manager of the branch business of Capt. P. E. Boyd, is the son of Stephen R. and Mary Jackson Futch, natives of Georgia, and was born Sept. 14, 1866, in Calhoun county. His parents are still living. Mr. Futch obtained his education in the common schools and at the age of sixteen engaged as clerk for P. E. Boyd, general merchandise store, Leary, and continued in that capacity for six years. At the expiration of that time he was employed at farming for four years, with great success. He then re-entered the employ of P. E. Boyd, as manager of a branch house, which business he has managed for three years. Mr. Futch was united in marriage to Miss Willie Taylor, one of the esteemed daughters of Col. Tom Taylor, a leading planter of Calhoun county. To this union have been born three children—Stephen R., Rufus M. and Mary W. Mr. and Mrs. Futch were married Feb. 5, 1888. Mrs. Futch is a member of the First Baptist church.

JOHN B. GEORGE, physician and surgeon, Leary, Calhoun Co., Ga., son of James George, was born in Baker county, Ga., Aug. 12, 1862. His father was a prosperous farmer and a prominent citizen; represented the county one term in the general assembly and died Jan. 16, 1882, leaving five children, of whom John B. was the second. Dr. George received a good common school education, attended one course of lectures at the Georgia eclectic college, at Atlanta, in 1883, and the second course at the university of Florida, at Tallahassee, where he graduated. He located at Leary, where he has gained an excellent practice, which is growing. He is the resident surgeon of the Southwestern railway; is a member of the National medical association and of the National railroad surgeons' association. He has been chairman of the democratic executive committee of the county four years, and was a member of the convention which nominated Gov. Northen. In addition to his practice Dr. George has extensive farming interests. Dr. George was married Oct. 26, 1886, to Miss Estelle, daughter of John Colley, of Calhoun county. They have one child, Lila, born Sept. 19, 1887. The doctor is a royal arch Mason, a member of the Albany, Ga., chapter, and is worshipful master of the local master Masons' lodge. He is a member of the Baptist church.

T. R. HAMMOND is one of Leary's progressive business men, and he is the youngest merchant of the place. He was born in Baker county, May 5, 1869, and is the son of T. W. and Fannie C. (Poindexter) Hammond, both of whom are still living. He was educated in the common schools of the county, was engaged in the employ of Capt. Boyd for a while, and then farmed for himself. He finally opened a nice general store in Leary and is doing a fine business. He was married to Neva Brooking, a daughter of F. R. Brooking, and lives in a pretty home in Leary. Mr. and Mrs. Hammond are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and Mr. Hammond is a strong democrat in politics. He has a nice farm of 250 acres near Leary, and carries a stock of about $4,000 in his store. Mr. Hammond though young enjoys a fine reputation for business ability.

WILLIAM J. HORSLEY, agent of the Central railway, Arlington, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in Upson county, Ga., Oct. 27, 1848. His father, James B. Horsley, was a highly-esteemed well-to-do farmer, who died in 1884. He received a good common school education, began life as a member of Company B, Fifth Georgia battalion, and served in the war. After the war he taught school in Randolph and Calhoun counties, Ga., and carried on farming. Since 1877, he has been connected with the Central railway, and is now its agent at Arlington, on what is known as the Blakely extension. Mr. Horsley has been married twice, first to Miss Laura M., daughter of Judge Colley, of Calhoun county, in 1870. She died in 1877, leaving one child, Ida, born Dec. 26, 1876. He afterward married Miss Mattie Taylor, of Upson county. Mr. Horsley is a capable and reliable business man and is popular with the people and confided in by the railway authorities. He is a master Mason.

THOMAS K. LEONARD, physician and surgeon, Arlington, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in Brunswick county, N. C., Sept. 22, 1820. His father, Jacob W. Leonard, was a colonel in the war of 1812, and was colonel-commanding at Fort Johnston during that war. He represented Brunswick district in the North Carolina senate for a number of years, and died in 1824. After receiving the best education to be had when he was a youth, Dr. Leonard entered the medical department of the state university of Pennsylvania, graduating in 1845. He located in Leon county, Fla., and soon secured a remunerative practice. Before the war he represented Leon county in the Florida legislature. He had been lieutenant-colonel of the First Florida cavalry (under command of Col. George T. Ward) for several years. Col. Ward fell at Richmond. Continuing the practice after the war in Leon county, Dr. Leonard relinquished it in 1867, joined the Florida conference of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and entered the itinerant ministry. He traveled five years in Florida and was then transferred to Trinity conference, Texas. After being there one year he was transferred to the South Georgia conference, with which he has remained ever since. Few men in southern Methodism have given more freely of their wealth to the church than has Dr. Leonard, he having spent a snug fortune for the extension of Christ's kingdom upon earth. He is now upon the superannuated list, and has found a sweet refuge after his years of spiritual battles in a comfortable home in Arlington. With the aid of his invalid's rolling chair he is enabled to go to and from his drug store, and still does a considerable amount of office practice. He is assisted by his daughter, who is a practical pharmacist. Dr. Leonard was married in Kingston, N. C., in 1858, to Miss Mary A. Perryman, by whom he has had one daughter, Florence I., who is with her parents. Dr. Leonard is a royal arch Mason; in 1867 he was elected grand king of the grand royal arch chapter of Florida. A fervent, faithful and devoted Christian, he is patiently awaiting the final summons—"Come up higher."

LORENZO D. MONROE, lawyer, Morgan, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in Muscogee (now Chattahoochee) county, Ga., Sept. 30, 1837. His father (same name) was sheriff of the county at one time. He moved with his family to Calhoun county in 1855 and died in 1886, leaving eight children. Mr. Monroe had the advantage of a fairly good education, principally under the preceptorship of James Hoof, an eminent educator. When the family removed to Calhoun county he returned to Muscogee to attend school and to read law. In 1858 he was admitted to the bar, Judge Kiddo presiding. Returning to Calhoun county, he located in Morgan, where his home has been ever since. He was a member of Company D, Forty-sixth Georgia regiment, of which he was a lieutenant, but was transferred to Colquitt's (the Forty-seventh Georgia) regiment when it was organized. In May, 1862, in a skirmish at Jackson, he was seriously wounded—his right leg was broken—and he was made a prisoner. He was paroled in a few days and never saw any more service on account of his wound. On his return home he was elected justice of the inferior court and was continued in the office until the day of reconstruction. Since the war he has practiced law and attended to his farming interests. He is now judge of the county court. Judge Monroe was married March 3, 1870, to Miss Sallie, daughter of Simon Wootten, of Randolph county, and a sister of Col. B. Wootten, of Albany, Dougherty Co., Ga. To this union were born two children: James J., born June 5, 1872, farming with his father, and Simon Lorenzo, born Feb. 22, 1874. His wife died in 1880 and he never married again. Judge Monroe is living a quiet, home life, enjoying the esteem of his fellow-countrymen.

CHARLES A. ROBERTS, M. D., Morgan, Calhoun Co., Ga., was born in Dawson, Terrell Co., Ga., Feb. 12, 1870. His father, Joseph W. Roberts, is a very prominent and influential citizen of Terrell county, having represented the county during the war in the general assembly, and being now ordinary of the county, an office he has held for six years. Dr. Roberts was educated at Dawson college, after which he entered the Louisville (Ky.) medical college in 1890, from which he graduated in 1892. He located in Morgan, where he is enjoying a lucrative practice. In October, 1892, he was married to Miss Hattie L., daughter of Dr. W. D. Cheney, of Morgan. To them one child has been born: Lucille, born Sept. 13, 1893. Dr. Roberts has been very successful, has a growing practice, and has a bright future before him.

WINSLOW D. CHENEY, physician and surgeon, Morgan, Calhoun Co., Ga., son of Dr. F. W. Cheney, an eminent physician, was born in Greene county, Ga., June 8, 1838. After receiving his preparatory education Dr. Cheney entered Mercer university, then at Penfield, Ga., and later attended the state university at Athens. He afterward entered Jefferson medical college at Philadelphia, where he graduated in 1860. He located at Adairsville, but the war coming on, he went to the army and did hospital service in Tennessee and Georgia. After the war he located in Morgan, where he built up a lucrative practice, and continued until 1889. He also has large farming interests which he still conducts. In 1860 he was married to Miss Cornelia, daughter of Thomas Dyson, planter, Thomasville, Ga. Dr. Cheney has five children living: Charles N., merchant, Shellman, Randolph Co., Ga.; Thomas E., farmer, Calhoun county; Hattie, wife of a promising young physician; Dr. C. A. Roberts, Morgan, Ga.; Clifford W. and Frank. Dr. Cheney was very successful as a practitioner, was popular, and accumulated a fine property. He is a non-affiliating master Mason.

CAMDEN COUNTY.

JOHN RUDOLPH BACHLOTT, merchant, St. Mary's, Camden Co., Ga., son of Richard H. and Emily (Rudolph) Bachlott, was born in St. Mary's, Feb. 12, 1860. His paternal grandfather, John Bachlott, was a large slaveholder and planter, and also operated a large tannery. Mr. Bachlott's father was a carpenter and steamboat captain before the war, during which he served as a soldier in the Confederate army. His maternal grandfather was also a large slaveholder, a lessor and contractor, and a large real-estate agent and holder. Mr. Bachlott was educated in the city schools and then attended and was graduated from the Commercial college, Atlanta. In 1882 he went into business with A. C. Wright, under the firm name of Wright & Bachlott, which continued until 1885, when he went into business on his own account. He has an extensive and profitable trade and conducts the leading general merchandise store in the county. He has fine business capacity and financial ability and is one of the solidest and most substantial of Camden county's citizens. He was a member of the city council six years and is at this time treasurer of the county. Mr. Bachlott was married April 2, 1886, to Miss Mollie Frances, daughter of Thomas D. and Mary F. (Bachlott) Hawkins, of St. Mary's, by whom he has had four children, of whom one only, a son, survives. He is a member of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward.

JOHN RICHARDSON, steamboat man, St. Mary's, Camden Co., Ga., son of John Sligh and Elizabeth Susanna (Houston) Richardson, was born in Duval county, Fla., Feb. 27, 1848. His grandfather, Capt. Edmund Richardson, was a native of Reading, Mass., who came south and located at St. Mary's, where he made his home—lived, died and is buried. The Slighs were a wealthy English family. Capt. Richardson's maternal grandfather, John Houston, was a large slave-owner and planter on Talbot island, Duval Co., Fla., which he held under a grant from the Spanish crown. Capt. Richardson's father was born and raised in St. Mary's, was trained by his father in his calling and commanded coasting craft until he became an invalid from exposure. He was well posted on all public affairs, very popular and very successful. Capt. Richardson was raised on the plantation and received a good education at the schools in Duval county. When not quite fifteen years old—during the war—he was captured and carried a prisoner from his father's plantation, where he was working with nothing but a shirt on, he being suspected of being a spy. He was first taken to Fernandina and put to work for the United States government on a pilot boat, but after a while was transferred to a pilot boat on St. John's bar, with a garrison of soldiers, where he remained until the surrender. Returning from the war, he farmed a year or two with his brother-in-law, after which he worked about two years at the carpenter's trade. He next engaged in steamboating, which he has followed ever since, and made a splendid success of. He first engaged with Fox & Burns, who ran boats on the St. Mary's river, and in process of time became a captain. He next went with the St. Mary's river company, and then on the St. John's passenger business with Capt. Jacob Brock, the pioneer steamboat-man of the St. John's. This was followed with a position with Capt. G. R. Kelsey for a year, and then returned to Fox & Burns, with whom he continued until within a year of their closing out. At that time he embarked in steamboating on his own account, with encouragement and patronage from his old employers. His steamers ply between Fernandina and the head of navigation on the St. Mary's river, and by inland or land-locked waterways between Jacksonville, Fla., and Brunswick, Ga. For fourteen years he has carried the mails between Fernandina and the headwaters of the St. Mary's, and during all that time has not made a failure, a very creditable record, and one seldom paralleled. Such energy and enterprise, and such fidelity and punctuality, merit the liberal patronage and abundant success Capt. Richardson enjoys. He began with two steamers, the "Lex," of which he was sole owner, and the "Martha," of which he owned two-thirds. But within twelve months he had himself built two new steamers to take the place of the old boats, one of which is named "Oriol" and the other has been christened "Harry Lee" by millionaire Andrew Carnegie's wife, Mrs. Lucy Carnegie, who owns "Dungeness," where rest the remains of "Light Horse Harry," of ever-glorious memory. He has dealt somewhat in real estate, has been a contractor for railroad ties and construction; has been a road commissioner, and a member of the county board, is one of the trustees of Camden county academy, and has been an alderman, and is now mayor of St. Mary's. So far as business is concerned he now devotes his entire time and attention to steamboating and his extensive planting interests at the old Talbot island homestead in Florida. Capt. Richardson was married to Miss Belle Manley, daughter of John and Maria Bessent, who died Oct. 27, 1885, leaving an only daughter, Maria Elizabeth, who is at home. Jan. 25, 1888, he was married to Miss Amelia, a sister of his first wife. He is a member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is a deacon, and superintendent of the Sunday school.

JOHAN JOSEPH RUDULPH, postmaster, etc., St. Mary's, Camden county, Ga., son of Francis Rudolph and Mary Catharine (Bachlott), was born in St. Mary's, Jan. 28, 1831. His paternal grandfather, Thomas Rudolph, was a native of Germany, and emigrated to this country and settled in Maryland. Later he came to Georgia, lived awhile in Liberty county, and finally settled in Camden county. Mr. Rudolph's father was a slaveholder and planter in Camden county, and an uncle, Capt. Chavalier Rudolph, was a prominent naval officer. His maternal grandfather emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia in 1798, then came to Florida, where his mother was born in 1806, and afterward came to Camden county, Ga. Mr. Rudolph was educated in the common schools of the city, and at the age of twenty-three commenced merchandising. Soon after hostilities began he enlisted in the Twenty-sixth Georgia regiment, from which he was transferred to the Fourth Georgia cavalry, of which he was made a lieutenant, and served through the war. He participated in the battle of Olustee, Fla., and in a number of engagements in upper Georgia, and was at the evacuation of Atlanta. After the surrender he resumed merchandising, which he continued until 1881. In 1877 he was elected ordinary of the county, and on the expiration of his term was elected treasurer, and has been re-elected for seven or eight terms consecutively. He served ten years as deputy clerk of the superior court, and was then elected clerk, which office he now holds, besides which he is postmaster of the city. Mr. Rudolph was married April 19, 1869, to Miss Eleanor C., daughter of John and Maria O. (Howell) Bessent, by whom he has had three sons. He is an ardent democrat, a master Mason, and a prominent member of the Presbyterian church.

ELIPHALET A. M'WHORTER, collector of customs, St. Mary's, Camden Co., Ga., son of Alexander Burnett and Ellen (Youngblood) McWhorter, was born in Edgefield, S. C., July 22, 1830. His paternal grandfather, George Gray

McWhorter, was a Presbyterian clergyman of note, on pastoral duty forty years; was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and fought under Gen. Gates at Camden, S. C., August, 1780. His maternal grandfather was a Youngblood, descended from Hollanders, and married a Miss Simpkins. His grandfather Youngblood, also his great-grandfather and his grandfather Simpkins were soldiers in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His grand-uncle, Col. Eldred Simpkins, was a member of congress. Mr. McWhorter's father was a physician, and migrated from Edgefield, S. C., to Montgomery, Ala., early in 1831, where he rose to eminence in his profession, which he practiced for many years, and became a very prominent member of the community. In politics he was an ardent democrat, and was an exemplary and influential member of the Baptist church, of which he was a deacon. Mr. McWhorter received his primary and preparatory education at the best schools in Montgomery—he was about six months old when his father located in the city—and then entered the university of Alabama, from which he was graduated in the summer of 1851. After his graduation he taught school in Montgomery, and as superintendent inaugurated the public school system of that city. When the call for volunteers was made by the Confederate government he enlisted as a private in the Montgomery mounted rifles. When the First Alabama cavalry regiment was organized he was made commissary, with the rank of captain; and was afterward commissioned as a major in the Sixth Alabama cavalry, and served through the war. In Rousseau's raid through Alabama he was taken prisoner, but was released on parole. He was again captured early in the spring of 1865 by Gen. Steele, and was sent to Ship island prison, where he remained until after the surrender, when he was sent to Meridian, Miss., and paroled. He saw much and arduous service, was in some hard-fought battles, and is seriously afflicted physically, resulting from army exposure. He was in the battle of Shiloh, where he was slightly wounded after capturing a flag, in those around Corinth, and others. At Tuscumbia, Ala., he was detached from his regiment, assigned to duty on Gen. Pope Walker's staff as commissary, and fed Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston's army as it passed through that city. After the war he remained in Alabama and farmed until 1869, when he moved to his present home in St. Mary's. Since his residence here he has led a busy public life—few citizens have been called upon to fill so many offices, city, county, state and Federal—requiring capacity and varied qualifications. He has served the people as justice of the peace, clerk of the superior court, alderman of the city, and notary public, ordinary of the county, deputy collector of customs for a dozen years, and for some years collector. Advanced in years as he is, he is so highly esteemed as a faithful public officer that the people do not wish to give him up. Mr. McWhorter was married July 27, 1853, to Miss Anna Gore, daughter of Job and Abigail (Ellsworth) Shepard, of Athens, Pa. Three sons and one daughter, living, are the fruit of this union: Lyman Ellsworth, Memphis, Tenn; Henry Shepard, Satilla Bluff, Ga.; Alexander Burnett, Waycross, Ga.; Elizabeth Ellen, at home. His wife's father was a prominent farmer and business man in his community, while her mother was a descendant of the distinguished Ellsworth family of Connecticut. Mr. McWhorter is a democrat of the most active sort, a member of the I. O. O. F., and has passed through the chairs; a royal arch Mason and past worshipful master of the blue lodge, and an exemplary and influential member of the Baptist church, of which he is a deacon, and moderator of the local association.

WILLIAM BURNET VAN VALKENBURG, lumber manufacturer, St. Mary's, Camden Co., Ga., son of James and Mary (Church) Van Valkenburg, was born in New York city, June 6, 1835. His original American ancestor emigrated from Netherlands (Holland) in 1614 to what is now New York city, and assisted in clearing the forest and colonizing "New Netherlands" (see Doc. Hist. of N. Y., compiled from original archives). His paternal grandfather was born in Lexington, N. Y., was a major in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and mentioned in J. Fenimore Cooper's works, was a participant in the battle of Saratoga, N. Y., and present at the surrender of Burgoyne to Gates, Oct. 17, 1777. His father was a man of wealth and great enterprise, a member of the Baptist church, in whose work he was prominent and influential; was in 1832 publisher in New York of the Youth's Companion and the Baptist Register, and, later, in 1836 to 1842 was a proprietor of valuable and profitable cement quarries and a large estate near Kingston, Ulster Co., N. Y. Mr. W. B. Van Valkenburg received his primary and advanced education at the Hempstead seminary, Long Island, N. Y., and in the Macon, Ga., academy under Rev. J. S. Ingram, recently deceased in Atlanta. He embarked in the lumber business near Macon when about nineteen years of age, and, later, in Pike county, Ga. He subsequently returned to near Macon and built a mill which he was operating when the "war between the states" was precipitated. He entered and served in the Confederate States artillery, but was afterward detailed as a machinist to duty in the Confederate States arsenal in Macon—where church bells were broken up to make cannon. He actively participated in many of the engagements around Atlanta and Macon, doing efficient service. Three brothers who were in the army were wounded, and one captured, Lieut.-Col. James D. Van Valkenburg, and who was paroled through the influence of Gen. Van Valkenburg, a relative of political prominence in Washington, who was afterward United States minister to Japan, and who was a recent justice of the supreme court of Florida. He, Lieut.-Col. Jas. D. Van Valkenburg, Sixty-first regiment, Gordon's brigade, was later killed at Monocacy during Gen. Early's last march in Maryland. After the war, W. B. returned to the lumber business, first building a mill on the St. Mary's river for a company, which he successfully and profitably operated a number of years. He now operates a mill of his own on North river at St. Mary's, doing a large and profitable business. He is a man of enterprise and public spirit, and takes a great interest in every measure promotive of the development and advancement of his county and section. He has been a justice of the peace for a dozen years or more, has served the county four years as ordinary, and also as an alderman of the city. Mr. Van Valkenburg was married Aug. 7, 1861, to Miss Julia McRee, daughter of Judge McRee, a wealthy and influential planter of Sumter county, Ga., by whom he has had four children, one son and three daughters: Hattie Lou (now Mrs. Thos. McLeod, and mother of Edward Laurence McLeod); Mary Lucia, Julia Isabel, and Frank. Mr. Van Valkenburg is an active and prominent member of the Methodist church.

CAMPBELL COUNTY.

REUBEN CRAWFORD BEAVERS, ordinary, Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga., one of the oldest and most respected citizens of the county, was born in Jasper county, Ga., in 1813, the son of Joseph and Sarah (Fluker) Beavers, the former born in Virginia in 1772, where he spent his boyhood days until 1797, when he was married to Miss Sarah Fluker of Greene county, Ga. There on a farm the young couple spent the first part of their married life, until 1809, when they removed to Jasper county, where they continued farming, up to the time of his death, in August, 1826. After her husband's death Mrs. Beavers, with the courage which is rarely seen in one left in such straits, determined to carry on the farm with the help of her sons. This she did with success until 1866, when she was called to that well deserved rest for which she had worked so hard. They were the parents of nine children, all of whom are deceased but Reuben C., the subject of this sketch: John F., Robert O., Rebecca, James L., Charles B., William A. J., Elizabeth F. and Sarah. They were members of the Baptist church, were very highly respected and much loved in their community, and held the confidence and esteem of all who knew them. Mr. Beavers at the age of twelve years came with his father and mother to what is now known as Campbell county, and spent the greater part of his boyhood and youth upon the farm, finding little time for study, but such as he did receive from the primary schools of his own and Jasper counties he put to good advantage, giving his teachers satisfaction on every side, showing the indomitable perseverance of his mother. When he reached manhood he left the farm and began merchandising. This he followed successfully during the years 1836-37-38. In that year, realizing that there were other things to engage his attention, he entered the Indian war, and for three months served in the cavalry regiment of Capt. James Word. Here he spent the greater part of his time in fighting the Cherokee Indians, and then returned to his home. July 31, 1838, he married Miss Jane McClure, daughter of William and Elizabeth (McMillan) McClure, who came to Georgia in 1832 from Spartanburg, S. C. Mr. McClure was of Irish descent, died in 1849, and his widow survived him until 1883, when she died at the advanced age of 90 years. After his marriage Mr. Beavers followed the occupation of farming for three years. By this time, however, he had gained the confidence and good will of all who knew him, and in 1841 was elected clerk of the court of ordinary. He held this position until 1852, and filled the place so well that he would have, doubtless, continued to hold it had not the court been changed and Mr. Camp elected in his place. This latter gentleman held the position for four years, but at the end of that period Mr. Beavers was elected to the office of ordinary, which he still holds, and has so gained the confidence and good will of all who know him, by his strict integrity and uprightness, that it would be hard to find another who would hold such a place in the esteem of the people as Mr. Beavers. Mr. and Mrs. Beavers have no children of their own, but they adopted and reared a little girl, of whom they were very fond. She was very much attached to her foster parents, and was happily married to the Hon. M. P. Harvey, of Fairburn, Campbell Co., a sketch of whom appears elsewhere. Mr. Beavers belongs to the masonic fraternity, and he and his wife are members of the Baptist church, where they are loved and respected by all who know them.

REV. EDMUND PENDLETON BIRCH. The name of the deceased subject of this sketch will be recognized by a large number of his friends and acquaintances during life, he having been a prominent member of the Georgia conference of the Methodist church for twenty years prior to 1873, and the succeeding ten years a member of the Alabama conference. During his long and useful ministry he was regarded as one of the foremost men of his conference, and also won for himself a high place in the literary world, both in poetry and in prose. We take pleasure in giving the following sketch: Rev. E. P. Birch was the son of Charles C. and Martha (Dilworth) Birch, and was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Aug. 24, 1824. The family of which he was an honored member was of English descent, having settled in Virginia in early colonial days. On the Birch side they were closely connected with the family of the famous peace-maker, Henry Clay, and on that of the Dilworth's with the immortal "Don't give up the ship" Lawrence. His father, Charles C., was born in Petersburg, Va., and was given a thorough education, being an architect by profession. His mother, who was also a resident of Virginia, was a woman of superior intellectual endowments and fine education. After their marriage they came to Georgia, where they continued to reside during the remainder of their lives. There were six children in the family, only one of whom is now living—Mrs. Grubbs, an educator in Texas. Rev. Edmund Birch was given a collegiate education at Oxford college and Collingsworth institute, and for the first six years of his manhood gave his attention to teaching. His mind, however, was of a religious turn, and as early as 1843 he began to preach the gospel. He connected himself with the itinerant ministry of his native state and first became a member of the Georgia conference in 1853. During his connection with this body he served many important stations, among others La Grange, West Point, Newnan and Macon, and at one time was president of the La Grange Female college. The high character of these appointments will indicate the estimation in which he was held by his brethren. In 1873 he was transferred to the Alabama conference and for ten successive years continued in the service of his Master. Loved, honored and respected, he closed up his earthly career amongst those to whom he had so often declared the counsels of God. The following is from the report of a committee read before the Alabama conference in its next session after the decease of our subject: "Brother Birch was a man of superior intellectual culture, extensive in knowledge of books, thorough in his investigation, profound in research, ornate in style and intensely poetical in taste; indeed, he was quite a poetical genius and wrote a number of pieces which won for him considerable reputation. As a preacher he was attractive in manner, clear in exposition, strong in argument, eloquent in expression, and at times presented the truth of the gospel of the living Christ with a power and beauty rarely excelled." Another writer says: "In all his public functions he was instructive and entertaining, evincing the high endowments of intellect and superior literary culture which made him so powerfully effective. And these, united with warm social attachments, earnest piety, great faith and a holy, spiritual life, gave great vigor and effectiveness to his discourses. A great man was he, not in one sphere only, but in almost every one." Rev. E. P. Birch was a most versatile writer during his lifetime. His was one of those poetic natures which overflow in eloquent and chaste diction with little or no effort. It was as natural for him to write as to talk, and pulpit service was fully supplemented by his contributions to the current literature of the day. His efforts covered a large variety of subjects, and were always given precedence in both the religious and secular press. His most noted poems were prompted by events occurring during the late war, and were published in "The Southern Confederacy" and extensively copied all over the south, and even into the New York papers. They were alternately comic and serious in style, as will be seen by the titles given, and were received by the public with the greatest demonstrations of favor. Some of the most noted were: "The Wreck of the Old Union," "Tribute to the Memory of the Gallant Gen. Johnston," "The Devil's Visit to Old Abe," "Yankee Doodle's Ride to Richmond," "The Poetry of Woman's Life," and "What Will She Do with It; or, Woman's Treasures and How She Is to Use Them." In the last named the following most beautiful tribute to woman occurs:

"And thus, when Nature kindly sought to throw
In one sweet form her crowning gifts below,
She gathered all her treasures rich and rare,
In one bright being so divinely fair,
That she should rule all hearts, and proudly claim
Love as her precious dower and woman as her name."

At the time of his death Rev. Birch had finished all but the last chapter of a work of fiction, which is said to have been his crowning effort, and which may at some future day be given to the public. In his home life Rev. Birch was most felicitous. Kind and gentle in manner, but full of life and buoyant in spirit, he was more the companion than the father, and his greatest pleasure was found around his own fireside, in communion with his own family. He was married in Pleasant Hill, Ga., on Jan. 10, 1844, to Miss Margaret, daughter of William and Catharine Douglass, who still survives him, residing at the beautiful home of her daughter, Mrs. Edwin Crissey, of Fairburn, Ga. To the marriage were born eight children: Mary F., wife of Wilbur J. Harwell, Stockton, Ga.; Mattie D. and Kittie D., twins, the first a single lady, the latter the wife of E. Crissey, retired officer of the United States navy, residing at Fairburn, Ga.; George A., a broker and commission merchant of Montgomery, Ala.; Alexander P., owner and operator of a large quarry at Blount Springs, Ala.; Edwin N., deceased at twenty-seven years of age; Lizzie T., deceased at eighteen years, and Julia M., deceased at two months. The death of Rev. Birch occurred at Warrington, Fla., on Sunday, Sept. 2, 1883. He had ended his ministry at that place the preceding year, and still continued his residence there with his son-in-law, Capt. Crissey, who was then stationed at the Pensacola navy yard. In August an epidemic of yellow fever broke out, and before the family could get away the place was quarantined. Day after day they watched the dread monster draw nearer to their home, and at last fall upon its victims, one by one, till Mr. and Mrs. Birch, Mrs. Crissey and her two-year-old baby daughter were in its clutches. The latter was an especial pet of her grandfather, the love existing between the two being almost divine; and it may have been this fact that led the reaper to select the ripe fruit and the yet tender, unopened bud to present to the Father above. They passed away; the others live on, to recall with increasing tenderness the virtues of the deceased.

THOMAS J. BULLARD, merchant and farmer, Palmetto, Campbell Co., Ga., is a son of Thomas and Susan A. Bullard. His father was a native of Chatham county, N. C., where he was born in 1819. About the time he became of age he came to Georgia, where he married and settled in Campbell county, where he spent the remainder of his days. He became a prominent and leading citizen, serving the county at intervals as sheriff and clerk of the court. He also served a term in the state senate, about 1858. He died on the old homestead at Campbellton, Ga., in 1876. He was twice married, first to Miss Anna Beard, who died in 1844, the mother of three children: William, a planter of Putnam county; Sally A., Mrs. McWright, of Campbell county, and J. M., also a planter of Putnam county. Mr. Bullard subsequently married Miss Susan A. Miller, a daughter of John Miller, of Jones county, who bore him two children: Thomas J., the subject of this sketch, and Tallulah F., widow of Dr. Henly, of Douglas county. The mother of these children was a woman of many endearing qualities, a consistent Baptist, and passed to her reward in 1880, at the age of sixty years. Mr. Bullard was born April 4, 1848. He was too young to enter the army during the first years of the war, but later did his duty as a soldier in the Confederate reserves. Returning from the war, he found everything in a chaotic condition, with stock and implements all gone. But with characteristic energy and patience he took up the tangled ends and soon was rewarded by seeing order come out of chaos, and his labors bringing a good financial return. After nine years of plantation life he went into the mercantile business at Palmetto, where he has since been most successful. He is a man of fine public spirit, having served as mayor and as a member of the county board of roads and revenues. His marriage was solemnized Jan. 3, 1867, when Miss Maggie C. Holleman became his wife. She is a lady of superior culture and refinement, and as an earnest and devoted Christian lady has done much to add to her husband's success. She is a daughter of Richard and Mary Holleman, the former deceased in 1862, the latter still living with her daughter. Mr. and Mrs. Bullard have five children, of whom Emma F. is the eldest, she being the wife of F. R. Smith, a merchant; Thomas P., M. D., at home; D. B., a student; Mary S., at home, and James F., also at home. Mr. and Mrs. Bullard are members of the Methodist church, and have for many years been most active workers in the Sunday school.

JOHN L. CAMP, sheriff, Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga., was born in Murray county, Ga., Aug. 2, 1838. At the age of four years he removed with his parents to Campbell county, where he has since resided. He is the son of Langley B. and Christian (McClure) Camp, both born in Spartanburg district, South Carolina, the former in 1805 and the latter in 1814. They were married July 22, 1830, and reared the following children: Mary J.; Sarah J. and Caroline F. are deceased; Georgiana, wife of John F. Beavers, ordinary, Campbell Co.; Josephus, enlisted in the Twenty-first Georgia regiment, and was killed at Chancellorsville; Elizabeth (deceased); William A., also in the Twenty-first Georgia regiment, and killed at Chancellorsville; Margaret, wife of John J. Whitely, of Texas. The mother of the family died June 3, 1880, the father having passed away some years prior. John L. Camp passed his boyhood days on the farm. During the war he was a member of Gen. Morrison's company of cavalry, and was taken prisoner in Virginia by Sheridan. Returning from the war he farmed until 1874, when he was elected sheriff, in which office he served till 1882. After an interval of six years he was again elected to that office, and has been several times re-elected in the face of a determined opposition by the people's party. In the administration of his office Sheriff Camp is utterly fearless, and has taught law-breakers that Campbell county is not the place for them. His public service has been supplemented by a term in the legislature, having been in that body during the sessions of 1883-84. On Dec. 25, 1859, he married Miss Elizabeth McClure, daughter of Charles and Jane (McMillan) McClure of Spartanburg, S. C. Mr. and Mrs. Camp became the parents of these children: Charles L., a planter in Campbell county; Josephus M., in Texas; Georgia May, wife of T. E. Morris; William R., physician, Fairburn; John W., planter, Campbell county; Jennie June, a young lady at home; and David H., a lad of fourteen years. The mother of this family died Sept. 17, 1881, and Mr. Camp was again married May 8, 1892, to Mrs. Sarah Zellers. This lady is a daughter of J. M. T. and Eliza (Gibson) Petty, old and respected residents of Campbell county for long years, both now deceased. To this second marriage has been born one child, Elizabeth R. Mr. and Mrs. Camp are influential members of the Baptist church, of which organization he has been clerk for the past seventeen years. He is also a Mason.

MOSES R. FOSTER, planter, Maud, Campbell Co., Ga. On the Atlanta road, fifteen miles from that city, and ten from Fairburn, Campbell county, lives the above-named gentleman. His home is one of the most beautiful in the county. Being a mechanical genius, and having developed a love for the beautiful, which, by the way, is an index to the refinement shown by himself and family, he has succeeded in surrounding his home with all the conveniences and comforts of modern civilized life. The beauty and coziness of his home are such as to at once attract the passing stranger. As shown by his surroundings, Mr.

Foster is a man of progress and of the highest standing in his community. The following is an outline of his family history: Moses R. Foster, the subject of this sketch, son of Moses and Margaret Foster, was born in Campbell county, near where he now lives, on May 8, 1843. The Foster family comes from Spartanburg district, South Carolina, from which the parents and grandparents of Mr. Foster migrated to Georgia in 1829, settling in the northeastern part of Campbell county. The grandparents died here, as also the father, who was killed by a falling tree Dec. 23, 1863. He had gone to the woods to cut down a tree, but having defective sight, got in the way of it as it fell. He was a member of the Missionary Baptist church, a thrifty man, and lived in great plenty. Later, some of the children moved to Arkansas, and the mother went to live with them, where she died in 1888. There were born thirteen children, all living to maturity but one, Elizabeth, deceased in infancy: Thomas E., died at his home in Atlanta in 1848; Polly Missouri, married Robert McWilliams, of Campbell county, and died Sept. 10, 1893; Ephraim W., Queen City, Tex.; Eliza J., widow of Pierce Childs, Bright Star, Ark.; John O., member of Company E, Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment, died of disease in 1862; Abner J., Bright Star, Ark.; Eleanor E., widow of Madison J. Childs, Bright Star, Ark.; Mildred N., married John W. Smith, and died in 1893 in Texas; Moses R., the subject of this sketch; Polona, wife of Thomas J. Hurt, Bevans, Tex.; Amanda A., wife of Edward Greer, Texarkana, Tex.; Martha N., wife of Mr. Clark, Jefferson, Tex. Moses R. Foster has spent his life in Campbell county. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E, Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment. On the way to Virginia he was taken sick with measles, and this being followed by a more severe illness he was discharged and sent home. After several months spent at home, and on the complete recovery of his health, he joined Lee's battalion at Atlanta, which did police duty about that section, and served there till it was disbanded. He then joined Hood's army as one of a band of scouts whose business it was to gather information concerning the enemy's movements. After Sherman passed he accompanied Hood on his march to Tennessee, but was again taken sick at Blue Pond, Ala., and was not able when he recovered to join the army again on account of the country being infested with Union sympathizers. He soon relinquished the idea and made his way homeward. A few months later he again joined the army as sergeant in Glenn's battery in Atlanta, and did good service till 1865. Oct. 5, 1872, Miss Mary L., daughter of Samuel T. Venable, became the wife of Mr. Foster. She was born in Newton county June 12, 1850. Only one child blessed this union, Lula C., born in 1873. She married James Oliver, and at present resides with her parents. She is the mother of one child, Mary C., a bright, beautiful daughter of two years. The family are members of the Missionary Baptist church. Mr. Foster is a democrat and a member of the county executive committee of his party. In 1892 he was one of the delegates from Campbell county to the senatorial convention at Newnan for the thirty-fifth senatorial district.

HON. M. P. HARVEY, merchant, Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga., was born in Campbell county April 14, 1852, the son of Rev. Spencer and Miranda (Stephens) Harvey. Rev. Spencer Harvey was a native of North Carolina, where he was born in 1811. He came to Georgia about 1830, in the earlier part of his career being a teacher. Later he entered the ministry of the Baptist church, which he continued to serve for a long period of years with zeal and effectiveness. He now resides with a daughter, Mrs. W. F. Lester, at Fairburn. Mr. and Mrs. Harvey were the parents of the following children: Thomas, deceased in youth; Georgia, now Mrs. Braswell, a prominent teacher; Charles A., deceased in 1874.

a successful merchant of Fairburn; William S., Fairburn; Martha, Mrs. William A. McCurry, Fairburn; Letitia, deceased wife of Moses Westbrook, also deceased; Emma, deceased wife of John F. Goodman; Lola, wife of W. F. Lester, Fairburn; and M. P., the gentleman named above. Mr. Harvey was educated at Fayetteville, and at the age of eighteen began his business career by clerking for Landrum & Bro., of Atlanta. Continuing there for a year and a half, he came to Fairburn, where he was engaged for four years in the store of his brother Charles. In 1875 he began business on his own account in Fairburn, starting with a capital of but $500. By careful management and attention to the wants of his customers he gradually built up a fine trade, and is now one of the leading merchants of his town. Mr. Harvey's successful conduct of his private affairs has directed the attention of the public to him, and has brought him many positions of trust. He served the Southern Express company for a number of years, and has also been on the town council. In 1886 he became the candidate of his party for the legislature, and being elected, served in the two following sessions. While a member of that body he did good service on the committees of banking, blind asylum, and education. Mr. Harvey was most happily married in 1881 in Fairburn to Miss Janie, daughter of John F. Beavers. Five children have come to add life and light to their home, as follows: Chester, Harry, Corinne, Henry G., and Mathias P., Jr. Mr. Harvey has been a prominent member of the masonic fraternity for years; of the Knights of Honor; the Golden Chain; and he and his wife are leading members of the Baptist church.

LATHAM. This is another of the old Virginia families which has been transplanted from the Old Dominion. It is of English extraction, and settled in Floyd county, Va., where Henry Latham reared a family of three sons. Thomas A., one of these sons, was born in 1799, and was first apprenticed to the hatter's trade. Evincing some literary ability he was given an education and, studying law, began the practice of his profession in his home county. In 1829 he came to Georgia, where he settled at Campbellton, the county-seat of Campbell county. Here he passed his life as a lawyer and planter. He soon commanded a good practice and until his death was regarded as one of the most profound lawyers in the state. He was an advocate of great power and as a counsellor was looked upon as absolutely safe. He was a man of great public spirit and as a democrat represented his county in the legislature several terms. In 1831 his marriage with Caroline M. Smith was solemnized. She was also a Virginian. Their family consisted of Henry T., who died a cadet at West Point military school; Virginia A., married Owen H. Cochran, and died in 1883; Ella C., deceased wife of W. J. Garrett; William L., Harris county; Thomas W., Atlanta; Mary A. (Mrs. Dr. J. T. Davenport), Fairburn; Joseph L., Campbellton, and George, Fairburn. The father of these children died in 1862 and the mother in 1875. Joseph L. Latham is a prominent merchant and planter and lives at Campbellton, Campbell county, in the old Latham house, where he was born June 23, 1850. Like all boys of his age, the war interfered with his education. His father dying when he was but twelve years old and the rigors of war being on the country, he was compelled to buckle down to physical labor earlier than would have otherwise happened. He conducted the affairs of the plantation till 1874, when he went into the mercantile business at Campbellton, and which he has continued with success to the present time. He is also interested in farming, he and his brother owning the old home plantation of 1,200 acres. He was married April 29, 1880, to Miss Eliza R., daughter of M. H. Collins, and is the father of seven children: Henry T., Molcy B., Joseph L., Jr., Clare C., George, Smith and Mary Ellen. Mr. Latham takes an active interest in the politics of his state and county and is a tower of strength in his party. In 1892 the democratic leaders felt that they must pick the very strongest man in the county to head their ticket for the legislature, as the people's party had developed unexpected strength in Campbell county. The choice fell on Mr. Latham, and so successfully was the campaign conducted a majority of 294 votes resulted in his favor, larger than had been witnessed since the war. He served his constituents faithfully during the following sessions and did important work as a member of the committees on education, penitentiary and corporations. Again in 1894 he became the standard-bearer and again defeated his opponent. He served in the session of last winter and was a member of the following committees: Education, penitentiary, agriculture. Mr. Latham is a Mason, being treasurer of Campbellton lodge No. 76. As a citizen he is popular, and as a gentleman has a large number of friends.

REV. L. P. NEESE, the revered pastor of the Methodist church at Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga., was born in Franklin county, Ga., July 26, 1838. Jacob Neese, his father, born in North Carolina in 1811, came to Georgia while still a young man, where he married and settled on a plantation in Franklin county. After a residence there of some years he removed to Cobb county, where he died in 1860. He was an earnest and devoted Christian, a member of the Methodist church, in which he was an exhorter. His wife, Minerva, was a daughter of John and Elizabeth Sewell, both of Georgia birth and English descent. To them were born eleven children: Rev. Levi P.; Andrew P., a physician in Texas; Jane E.; Mrs. Wm. Freeman, Franklin county; James P., died in Savannah during the war; John W., also died in the army; William P., planter, Milton county, Ga.; Jacob P., merchant, Forsyth county; Mary (Mrs. F. Adair), Forsyth county; D. F., merchant and farmer, Polk county, Ga.; Joseph P., planter, and Martha, who is the wife of Mr. Lewis, near Dalton, Ga. The eldest of this family, Rev. Levi P. Neese, spent his boyhood on the farm, where he received an excellent moral training and his primary education. He was subsequently given the advantages of the Emanuel county high school, where he finished his literary education. In 1858 he entered on his chosen life-work, the ministry of the Methodist church, joining the north Georgia conference, of which body he has since been a member. Of this ministry it is only proper to say that it has been attended, under the blessing of the Lord, with much success, bringing into the fold a large number of erring ones and helping to a stronger and brighter faith many already within the pale of the church. In the pulpit Rev. Neese is earnest and convincing, and is much beloved among his people for his social qualities. His married life dates from 1868, when he was happily wedded to Miss Sue McLeod. Mrs. Neese has been a helpmeet, indeed, and takes a great interest in her husband's work. She is a daughter of Duncan and Amanda (Smith) McLeod. The former, born May 27, 1810, in Georgia, died in the same state Nov. 6, 1889; the latter was born Aug. 6, 1826, and is now living with her daughter, Mrs. Neese. The children born to Rev. and Mrs. Neese are as follows: The first child died at birth; James, born May 27, 1872, is a graduate of Oxford college, practicing law; Pearl E., born Aug. 12, 1874, died Nov. 4, 1882; Marvin, born Feb. 17, 1877; Ruby H., born Aug. 5, 1879, died Aug. 5, 1881; Rebekah M. J., born Dec. 13, 1881; Mamie E. H., born July 27, 1884, and Lutie P., born Dec. 5, 1886.

JOSEPH J. NIXON, planter, Palmetto, Campbell Co., Ga., is the son of Francis and Anna (Ray) Nixon, and was born in Meriwether county, Ga., Oct. 12, 1839. The grandfather of this gentleman, Joseph Nixon, was a native of Ireland, and came to Georgia a young man in the latter part of the last century, settling in Oglethorpe county, where he married. He subsequently moved to Walton county, thence to Coweta, where he lived till his death, which occurred in 1830. The father of Mr. Nixon was reared in Coweta county, but was married in Meriwether county, where he lived until 1853, when he settled in the southern part of Campbell county, near where his son now lives. In 1872 he moved to Heard county, where he died in 1881. In disposition he was a quiet, retired man, a member of the Baptist church, a planter by occupation. He was twice married. Of the six children born to the first marriage, five are living: Joseph J., the subject of this sketch; Martha J., widow of M. M. Smith, Campbell county; Rebecca, wife of J. M. Windom, Carroll county; George, Cass county, Tex.; Wiley, Coweta county, and Thomas, who was a private in Company C, Nineteenth Georgia regiment, was killed at second Manassas. The mother died in 1852 and the father subsequently married Miss Ann Grantham of Meriwether county, who bore him eight children. Joseph J. Nixon was reared in the neighborhood where he now lives. At the opening of the war he was just of age and ready to serve his country. He enlisted as a private in Company C, Nineteenth Georgia regiment, and served in the army of Virginia. He was engaged in the battles of Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Kingston and Bentonville, N. C., the last battle of the war. In the latter fight he was slightly wounded, having gone through the entire war up to that time without a scratch. He was paroled at Salisbury, N. C., after which he settled down to the peaceful pursuit of farming. With nothing to invest except his own strength and perseverance, he rented land near the old homestead till 1873, when he bought 200 acres of the present location, to which have been added about 400 acres more. This plantation is three miles from Palmetto, and was nearly all covered with a dense growth of oak, pine and hickory. Mr. Nixon has cleared this land nearly all himself, and now has about 300 acres under cultivation. He married Miss Louisa M., daughter of John B. and Temperance Smith, Sept. 3, 1869, and has become the father of ten children, seven of whom are living: Moses, planter, Campbell county; Osey, John B., Arena, Thomas J., William and Millie at home. Mr. Nixon enjoys the reputation of being an excellent farmer and is a man whom the people revere for his many noble qualities of head and heart. As a democrat he does his duty quietly at the polls, not having any taste for the excitement of political life. He and his family are members of the Baptist church.

JAMES N. ROBINSON, planter, Goodes, Campbell Co., Ga., is one of nature's noblemen, the son of Robert R. and Susan (Byrane) Robinson. He was born Nov. 12, 1834, in Coweta county, from whence he removed with his parents in 1849 to the neighborhood where he now resides. In 1856 he left home and worked as an overseer till the war broke out. Being near Columbus, Ga., he enlisted in a company which was raised there—Company B, Twentieth Georgia regiment. He went out as second corporal, and by faithful service was advanced to first sergeant, in which position he served the major portion of the four years of the war. In order to indicate the amount of service done by Sergt. Robinson, it is only necessary to state to the student of history that he followed Longstreet. It is hardly necessary to recount here in full the story of bloody fights and weary marches participated in by soldiers under this famous general. The list of battles engaged in personally by Mr. Robinson is as follows: Seven days' fight around Richmond, second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Suffolk siege, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Knoxville, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House, and in the trenches about Richmond. He was wounded by a minie ball in the thigh while gallantly bearing the colors at Malvern Hill, in which battle his company lost heavily. At Sharpsburg his regiment was highly complimented for their gallant defense of Burnside's bridge. At the battle of Gettysburg he was in the brigade which successfully charged Little Round Top on the second day. On the day the lines were broken and Richmond was evacuated Sergt. Robinson was in charge of his company at the point where the break occurred, and had the honor of being personally complimented by Gen. Longstreet in ordering him to deploy his company for the coming charge. But the race was run; and, evacuating the city, Lee's immortal band, after having exhibited a valor which will go down in history as the most wonderful of all time, laid down their arms at Appomattox, where Sergt. Robinson had the mournful honor of surrendering his company. Mr. Robinson had been home on a furlough during the preceding holiday week, and before returning to the army was married to Miss Martha C., daughter of David Murray, of Lincoln county, Ga., the event occurring on Jan. 10, 1865. Returning home to his bride, Mr. Robinson has since been content in the peaceful avocation of agriculture, in which he is regarded as a master. His plantation contains 350 acres, and is one of the most productive in the county. There were four children born to the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Robinson: Robert A., Jacksonville, Fla.; John P., at home; Nannie J., Mrs. James A. Reeves, Campbell county, and William H., who died in infancy. Mr. Robinson is a stanch democrat and has served his party in many conventions, though he has never cared for office. For eight years prior to 1893 he served on the board of county commissioners. As a citizen of Campbell county, "Jim" Robinson is looked upon by all as perfectly sound. The history of the Robinson family may be stated briefly as follows: Henry, grandfather of J. N. Robinson, was a native of Bellomeno, Ireland, made famous as the birthplace of the father of President Andrew Jackson, and Gen. Packenham, of New Orleans fame. As a lad he emigrated to Mecklenburg, North Carolina, where he married and reared his family. Robert Robinson was born in 1813, and accompanied the family, in 1831, to Coweta county, Ga., where he married in 1834. Three children were born to them: J. N., Frances E., Mrs. Jesse Carool, Battle, Texas, and Hannah P., widow of James Hogan, Hogan, Coweta Co. After the mother's death, in 1838, the father again married, the second wife being Miss Elizabeth Attawary. She died in 1857, leaving one son, William T., Campbell county. The father resides near the home of his son, James N., still hale and hearty at eighty-three years of age.

ABNER B. SMITH, planter, Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga. Four miles southeast of Fairburn, on one of the best plantations in the county, lives Abner B. Smith, one of the most respected and influential planters in the county of Campbell. He is a man of undoubted integrity and occupies a respected place in the social life of his community. He comes from one of the pioneer families, being the son of John B. and Temperance (Bailey) Smith, and was born in Campbell county, Dec. 4, 1842. The grandfather, Abner Smith, was a native of Ireland, having emigrated to South Carolina before the revolutionary war. There he was twice married, both wives dying there. He was a soldier in the revolutionary war, during which he was wounded on Sullivan's island. Late in life he, with his children, removed to Coweta county, Ga., settling in the northern portion, on land obtained from the government, he being a pensioned soldier. However, he died within two weeks of his arrival in the county. The children grew to maturity, were married and were widely scattered. Soon after the Bailey family came to Georgia from South Carolina. One of the daughters, Temperance, became the wife of John B. Smith. Eleven children were born to them, five of whom are living: Melvina, widow of Hubbard McWaters, Camp county, Texas; Abner B., the subject of this sketch;

William M., Camp county, Texas; Thomas J., Campbell county; Louisa, wife of James Nixon, Campbell county. The deceased children are: Jesse F., member of a Texas regiment during the war, and died of disease at Little Rock, Ark.; John, Fannie, Elizabeth, Moses N. and James B.. The father was a justice of the peace from his twenty-second year up to the day of his death, which occurred in 1856, the mother dying recently at the age of seventy-six years. He was a man well read in matters of law, a good planter, and one who took a lively interest in public affairs. He took an active part in the Indian war of 1836, being a lieutenant of a company, and was also colonel of a regiment of local militia for a period. Abner B. Smith was reared in Campbell county, the war being the first great event in his quiet life. When but eighteen years of age, in June, 1861, he enlisted as a private in Company C, Nineteenth Georgia regiment. In 1863 he was made lieutenant of his company, in which capacity he served until he surrendered at Salem, North Carolina. He was mustered into service at Lynchburg, and was in the battles of Seven Pines and seven days' fight around Richmond, but was sick in the hospital during second Manassas. When he recovered he joined his command at Shepherdstown, Md., and was in the battles of Fredericksburg, the Wilderness, and was at Richmond when the enemy made a raid on that city, while Lee was at Gettysburg. He was also at the siege of Charleston, the battle of Ocean Pond, Fla.; Drury's Bluff and Cold Harbor; then in the trenches at Petersburg during the winter, where he took part in a large number of skirmishes of that eventful period. During Mr. Smith's service he participated in some of the most hotly contested battles of the war. In the fight at Ocean Pond, Fla., his brigade did most of the fighting. At one time they were stationed near where the famous mine explosion occurred. He was at the fall of Fort Fisher and at the battle of Kingston, his last fight being with Sherman in the last battle of the war—Bentonville. Returning home from such exciting scenes, he settled down to the quiet life of a farmer, and has since followed that occupation. To the marriage of Mr. Smith to Miss Mary H., daughter of Willis Morgan, which occurred Feb. 8, 1866, nine children have been born: Albert Sydney, Bell county, Tex.; Jennie, wife of Dr. Camp, Fairburn; T. E., Atlanta; Mittie, deceased in infancy; Neva A., wife of John Carthron, Campbell county, Ga.; Gertrude E., Dora E., Rosa Lee, and Christmas Belle, all at home. Mr. Smith is a deacon of the Baptist church, having been a member many years before the war. He votes in conformity with the principles of the democratic party, and fraternally is a Mason.

FRANKLIN H. STEED, an influential citizen of Palmetto, Campbell Co., Ga., is the son of Sion P. and Pattie Steed, and was born in 1843, in Coweta county. He received a limited education and followed farming in the early part of his career. He, however, embarked later in the insurance business, and also in the handling of commercial fertilizers, and carried it on with a vigor and snap that soon placed him in easy circumstances. He is at present extensively engaged in farming and in the handling of live stock. When the war began Mr. Steed enlisted in a cavalry company, which served one year under Gen. Forrest, and during the latter part of the war with the famous Alabama general and present congressman, Joseph E. Wheeler. Mr. Steed was very light, physically, and had the distinction of weighing the least of any man in his regiment, being but ninety pounds in weight. Miss Pattie Perkins became Mrs. Steed in 1871. She was a daughter of John and Martha (Parks) Perkins, and became the mother of four children, as follows: Willie, died in childhood; Vedder and Calvin are young people, at home; Annie is deceased. Mr. Steed was one of a family of four brothers and sisters and six half-sisters. The father, who died Jan. 18, 1882, was in his time one of the most extensive planters of Coweta county. He was regarded by all as the best planter in the county, at one time receiving a silver pitcher in attestation of the fact. Five of his sons reached maturity. The eldest, T. N., went to Texas, where he died in 1887, leaving a wife and children and a large property; W. H. is a planter in Coweta county; J. G. was the literary member of the family; he graduated at Bowdoin college and expected to enter one of the professions; he went to the war under Col. McDaniel, was elected adjutant of his regiment, but sickened and died in 1862. J. W. is a merchant at Senoia, Ga.; and Franklin H. Mr. and Mrs. Steed are Methodists in religious belief, as, indeed, have been nearly all the Steeds for generations. They occupy a generous place in the esteem of a large circle of friends and acquaintances, and merit the respect which is cheerfully accorded them.

CAPT. J. E. STEED, planter, Fairburn, Campbell Co., Ga. The great grandfather of this gentleman came from England to North Carolina before the revolutionary war. The grandfather, Clayton Steed, was a soldier in that great struggle, and lived and died in North Carolina. Capt. Steed's father was reared in Randolph county, N. C., and married in Gilbert county. After a few years he moved to Campbell county, Ga., settling on Cedar creek. This occurred in 1839. Later he moved to the central part of the county, where he lived to the time of his death, in 1874, and that of his wife, Jan. 2, 1893. To them were born a family of ten children: Elvira, deceased; John E., the subject of this sketch; Elizabeth C., wife of S. S. Langston, Campbell county; Colyer A., a member of Company C, Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment, killed on picket duty, the second day of the Gettysburg fight; Martha M., wife of E. M. Yates, Carroll county; Stephen A., Douglas county; Mary E., wife of Henry N. Stipe, Carroll county; W. G., Campbell county; Annie E., wife of Thomas M. Orr, Nevada county, Ark.; Frances A., deceased. The father entered the ministry of the Methodist church at thirty years of age, and was a local preacher of that denomination until his death. He was a good farmer, an influential citizen, and a consistent Christian gentleman. Capt. J. E. Steed was born in Randolph county, N. C., July 25, 1838, but has spent the greater part of his life in Campbell county. In 1861 he enlisted in Company C, Thirty-fifth Georgia regiment, as a second sergeant. From Atlanta he went to the army of Virginia. His first battle was at Seven Pines. Sickness kept him away from the seven days' fight around Richmond, where the captain of his company, together with several other officers, was killed. Capt. Steed was soon made second lieutenant, after which he was in the fight at Cedar Run, the three days' fight at Second Manassas, then at Shepherdstown, where he was wounded. Then followed Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg and the battle of the Wilderness, during which latter engagement he was wounded in the shoulder and right lung. The ball never having been extracted has caused much trouble since. As a consequence of his wound a furlough was given him, which lasted till September, when he again joined his company and remained with it till the surrender. To his marriage Dec. 20, 1867, to Miss Katie, daughter of John W. Beck, two sons have been born, Robert E. and Sion J., lads at home. The mother of these boys died Aug. 27, 1880. After two years, Jan. 19, 1882, the second marriage took place, Margaret Caldwell, of East Point, Ga., becoming his wife. She was born and reared in Fulton county, being the daughter of Joseph and Lois (Conolly) Caldwell. The following are the children by this marriage: Aline M., Joseph W., John G., and Annie K. Capt. Steed was county surveyor from 1873 to 1878. He is a populist in politics. For thirty-seven years a member of the Methodist church, of which he is a trustee and steward, no man has been a better or more faithful captain for either the church or the state, or stands higher in the regard of neighbors and friends, than Capt. Steed.

L. M. WESTBROOK, an enterprising and successful merchant of Fairburn, Campbell Co., is a son of W. R. and Frances M. (Black) Westbrook, and was born in the county Feb. 1, 1859. He was given a common school education, and remained at home till he was of legal age, when in company with Mr. W. F. Lester and a brother, J. M. Westbrook, he began his business career at Fairburn. The firm of Westbrook, Lester & Co. changed to Westbrook & Co. after the first year, under which title it did business until 1887, when Mr. Westbrook bought the interest of his partner, and has since conducted the store alone. He carries a general stock of some $3,500, his yearly business amounting to about $10,000. Mr. Westbrook is a man of sterling business ability, and as such has been called upon to serve his town in the council hall quite frequently, having been a member of that body from 1888 to 1892. He was again elected in 1894, and is now a member of that body. He was happily married in the county Feb. 20, 1883, to Miss Annie, daughter of B. A. and Elizabeth Camp, a fine old family of Campbell county, and has four interesting children, Clifford E., Effie, Kate, and Joseph A. The family of which Mr. Westbrook is a member is of English descent, found in Virginia in early colonial days. They came subsequently to North Carolina, and in 1826 Moses, the grandfather of L. M., who had married Edna Gainey, brought his family to Fayette county, Ga., where both parents died in 1834 during an epidemic of bilious fever, which also carried away three other members of the family. W. R. Westbrook now lives near Fairburn, and has followed planting all his life. He is a veteran of the Indian war of 1836, and during the last war served under Gov. Joseph E. Brown. He has been a member of the Methodist church for over fifty years, and enjoys the respect of a large circle of friends in his old age. Mr. Westbrook and Frances M. Black were married Feb. 10, 1847, and are the parents of the following children: Aream, Mrs. James W. Edmonds, Titus county, Tex.; Edna, Mrs. Young H. Thornton, Campbell county, Ga.; Susan A., Mrs. H. H. Wood, Forsyth county; James M., deceased; Sarah F., Mrs. J. D. Smith, Campbell county; Samuel C., in Texas; Lycurgus M., merchant, Fairburn; Wm. J. W., Sipe Springs, Tex.; Cora J., Mrs. D. A. Carmichael, Campbell county; and Mary E., unmarried.

DR. WILLIAM S. ZELLERS, retired physician of Palmetto, Campbell Co., Ga., was born Feb. 7, 1831, in Newton county, Ga. The family is of German descent, though his parents, Sullivan and Emily Zellers, were born and reared in Lowndes county, Ga. The father was born in 1797, and died in 1863; the mother in 1801. Nine children were born of their marriage: John A., deceased; Simeon, merchant, Palmetto; William S., the subject of this sketch; Martha H., wife of H. Moss, Palmetto; Thomas E., merchant, Granitesville, Ga.; Mary N., deceased; Solomon T., deceased; Elizabeth R., wife of E. M. Woodley; and Peter C., who enlisted at sixteen in Company C, Nineteenth Georgia regiment, and was killed during the war. The parents of these children were pious and devout people, members of the Baptist church, and remembered for their great hospitality and generous charity. Dr. William S. Zellers received a common school education. He taught school several years, then attended what is now Vanderbilt university, Nashville, Tenn., for a period, and later took a course of lectures in the Atlanta Medical college, from which he graduated, and commenced the practice of his profession in Palmetto, where he has since resided, though not engaged continuously in the practice. Dr. Zellers has been a man of great service to his community and the state, having been honored with many positions of public trust. In 1872 he was appointed inspector of the port of Savannah, Ga., but resigned after a few months. He served in the state legislature in 1868-69, and again in 1880-81. His public service was marked by intelligent and conscientious performance of the duties devolving upon him, and he retired with the encomiums of an appreciative constituency. Dr. Zellers was first married in 1858 to Miss Anne, daughter of Caborn and Ann Watts, of Campbell county. Her death occurred in 1863, having borne him two children: William A., educated at the Medical College of Georgia, Augusta, and the New York Polyclinic school as a physician, and died in September, 1890; and Kate, also deceased. The doctor's second marriage occurred in 1867, when he was joined to Miss Margaret K. Camp. This lady is a daughter of Col. Benjamin and Winifred Camp, both now deceased. Dr. and Mrs. Zellers have no children of their own, but have for years been accustomed to provide for the education of several in the public schools. They are useful and respected members of the community in which they reside, and hold the love of a host of friends.

CARROLL COUNTY.

Z. T. ADAMS, farmer, Temple, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Absalom and Elizabeth (Reid) Adams, was born in Carroll county in 1845. His grandparents, Adams, were Virginians, and moved thence to Tennessee, whence they subsequently came to Carroll county, where they died. Mr. Adams' father came from Tennessee to Georgia and settled in Carroll county in 1829, where he cleared a farm. He was a soldier in the Indian war of 1838. His great-grandfather on his mother's side, Reid, was a soldier in the war of 1812, during which he was shot in the stomach, the ball passing through the body. A silk handkerchief was drawn through the orifice afterward and he recovered and lived many years. His maternal grandparents, Reid, were early settlers in this part of the state. Mr. Adams was reared on the farm and received a common country school education. Being too young to enter the Confederate service he enlisted, in 1863, in Company F (Capt. Long), Georgia regiment, state troops. Mr. Adams was married in 1864 to Miss Rebecca C. Coleman, daughter of W. A. and Sarah Ann (Barnes) Coleman, old settlers of this part of the state. When he was married he had nothing—was very poor. He has always been a plain farmer; has now a nice improved farm of nearly 200 acres with a comfortable house on it, within the corporate limits of Temple. Mr. and Mrs. Adams have had six children born to them: William M., born Nov. 14, 1865; Henry T., born Jan. 16, 1868, a teacher in Texas; David N., born July 11, 1869; Gilbert E., born Oct. 30, 1872; Z. T., born Nov. 22, 1876; and Bessie, born Feb. 10, 1884. Himself and wife are devoted and exemplary members of the Missionary Baptist church.

G. R. ADAMSON, merchant, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John W. and Mary Ann (McDaniel) Adamson, was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1842. His paternal grandparents were William C. and Elizabeth (Crawley) Adamson. He was born in Wilkes county, Ga., and she was a native of Morgan, where they were married. Mr. Adamson's father was born in Morgan county in 1822, where he was reared and educated. About the time he reached his majority he went to Henry county, settled in the woods and cleared a farm. In 1852 he loaded his ox carts and moved to Carroll county, and again settled in the woods and cleared another farm. A few years after this he went over into Chambers county, Ala., settled in the woods and cleared a third farm. But he liked Georgia too well to be satisfied, so he returned to Carroll county, and for the fourth time settled in the woods and cleared a farm—the subject of this sketch helping him in all, particularly the last three. In 1860 he began the mercantile business in Bowdon, but the war coming on the business collapsed, and everything was lost. In 1862 his father enlisted in Capt. Este's company, Twenty-sixth Georgia battalion; served through the war—and was at Columbus about the time of the surrender, but escaped being captured. After the war he went into business again at Bowdon, and continued it until he died in 1888. In 1861 Mr. Adamson enlisted in Company B (Capt. Charles A. McDaniel), Cobb's legion, infantry. Capt. McDaniel was president of the college at Bowdon, and his company was mostly composed of his pupils, of whom Mr. Adamson was one. He was an active participant in many battles, among them—Dam No. 1, Yorktown, Malvern hill, and South mountain, where he was severely wounded and captured, but was released. As a result of this wound he was disabled, but as soon as he recovered he returned to the army, in Tennessee. Thence he went to Virginia and was at the battle of the Wilderness. While his command was on duty on James river he was released on account of his old wound and returned home. While at Bowdon he was captured a second time, but it happened to be after the surrender. The close of the war left him comparatively destitute. Thus father and son, by their bravery and long continued faithful service, made a record of which they rightly felt proud. After the war he engaged with his father in business; but when he married, he went to another point, where he remained until his father's death, in 1888, when he returned in 1889 to Bowdon, took charge of and continued his father's business, and is now a leading merchant there. Everything, immediate family connections, natural and by marriage, war record, and splendid business capacity, contributed to this result. Mr. Adamson was married in 1868 to Miss Fannie M. Yarbrough—born in Floyd county, Ga., in 1851—daughter of Nathan and Margaret (Lampkin) Yarbrough. Her father was born and reared in Franklin county, Ga., and went to De Kalb county in 1830 and clerked in a store in Decatur. In 1835 he went to Floyd county, and was one of the pioneers, if not one of the founders, and wrote the first charter of the now flourishing city of Rome. Years afterward he migrated to Texas, and is now living—85 years of age—in Comanche county. To Mr. and Mrs. Adamson ten children have been born: Edith, John, Herbert, Ralph, Norma (dead), Claris, Mattie, Ethel, Robert and Nathan. Mr. Adamson is a master and royal arch Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist Protestant church.

MOSES J. BAXTER, farmer, Temple, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John and Elizabeth (Stripling) Baxter, was born in Monroe county, Ga., in 1828. His paternal grandparents were John and Nancy (Dowdy) Baxter. His grandfather was born in England, and came to this country after the revolutionary war. He settled first in Virginia, afterward moved to North Carolina, and finally came all the way from North Carolina to Georgia in an ox cart, and settled in the woods in Monroe county—among its pioneers. He followed farming all his life. He was a soldier of the war of 1812, and during his service had a remarkable experience with a wound. The ball went entirely through his body, and a silk handkerchief was drawn through the orifice, yet he recovered and lived many years in excellent health afterward. Mr. Baxter's father was born in 1807, and came to Georgia when a small boy with his father, who came to Carroll county in 1828; the subject of this sketch was an infant at the time, and the unconscious subject of a thrilling incident. The trip had been made in ox-carts, and when they reached the Chattahoochee river a negro nurse insisted on taking the baby in her arms. When the boat reached the opposite bank, the steers became scared and backed, and the negro jumped overboard with our subject in her arms. When she arose to the surface his father caught and drew them out. His father was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836; and, also, was a member of the Methodist church. His maternal grandparents, John and Mary Stripling, were among the early settlers of Monroe county. Mr. Baxter was reared on the farm in Carroll county, and the very limited education he received was at the old time dirt floor log house, with its unsatisfactory accompaniments. In 1862 he enlisted in Company F, Cobb's legion, and went to the front. But he was soon taken sick and was sent to Richmond, where he remained many months, and when he had apparently recovered he returned to the army. It was not long before he was again prostrated, and, this time, came home on a furlough—he was at home at the time of the surrender. Like thousands of others, the war left him stripped of everything; but like them, he went bravely to work, impaired in health as he was, to build up. By dint of hard work and close management he has a fine, large farm, well improved, with nice dwelling and substantial out buildings, half a mile from Temple; and commands the respect of all who know him. Mr. Baxter was married in 1852 to Miss Sarah J., daughter of James and Elizabeth (Baskin) Stripling, early settlers, by whom he has had eight children: William A., N. N., James D., Robert A., John M., Geo. Ann Florence, Frances, and Martha. Mr. Baxter is a master Mason and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

JAMES H. L. BENFORD, farmer, Victory, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John and Martha (Anders) Benford, was born in Twiggs county, Ga., in 1837. His paternal grandparents, George and Elizabeth Benford, were Virginians, and he was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His father was born in Virginia in 1818, came to Georgia when a young man and settled first in Bibb county; he afterward went to Twiggs county and settled in the woods and cleared a farm. He was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836, and was wounded in the arm. His maternal grandparents, Robin and Elizabeth Anders, were natives of Maryland, but migrated to Georgia, and were among the earliest settlers of Twiggs county. Mr. Benford was reared on the farm in Twiggs county and remained on it until he was eighteen years old, when he removed to Carroll county and settled in the woods on the tract whereon he now lives. There was not a stick amiss on the land, and he cleared the land for his farm by himself. There were four families moved together in ox carts, and all of them occupied an eighteen by eighteen log cabin together, cooking, etc., until they could build. He went to school only one week, and was never taught anything but the alphabet. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, Cleburne's regiment, known as the "Pattison Rangers." He participated in quite a number of battles—Gatling's farm, Petersburg, Columbia, etc., but was most of the time on scouting duty, and often on special courier service. For nearly a month, at one time, his command was chased by Gen. Kilpatrick, fighting nearly every day. He was captured once in Virginia, and when commanded to surrender his gun he threw it down and broke it; and then put his foot on his saber and broke that, too; he then told his captors to take him if they wanted to. As they were taking him to their lines, after dark, dangerous as the attempt seemed, he succeeded in eluding their vigilance and escaped. For a long time he was a courier for Gen. Lee, whose pass he bore permitting him to go where and when he pleased at his discretion. At the time of the surrender he was scouting in the rear of the Union army. He came out of the war with nothing but his land, and when his father died had his family to care for, giving the children a fair education. He owns now 1,500 acres of good land, including a well-improved farm, and has the reputation among his neighbors of being one of the most progressive and one of the best farmers in Carroll county. He certainly ranks among the solidest and most substantial of the county's citizens. In 1865 Mr. Morris was married to Miss Fannie Morris, born in Meriwether county and daughter of William and Sarah (Ayers) Morris. Fifteen children have blessed this union, of whom thirteen are living: Henry, Price, Alice, Lity, Warren, Terrell, Eugenia, Perdue, Anna, Sula, Edell, Artentious, and Pious. Mr. Benford is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

GEORGE A. BONNER, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Zadoo and Lucy (Ridgeway) Bonner, was born in Carroll county in 1844. His great-grandfather was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His grandparents, Zadoc and (Johnson) Bonner, were natives of Georgia, and his grandfather was born during the revolutionary war. Mr. Bonner's father was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1804, and was reared there on a farm and removed to Carroll county in 1829. He was a man of great energy, progressive and aggressive, and possessed unusual force of character. During the Indian war he raised a company, but the war closed before he could be mustered in. Although the county was always overwhelmingly democratic and he was a whig in politics, he was repeatedly elected a justice of the inferior court. When he moved to Carroll county he settled in the woods, lived to accumulate a very large estate and to become one of the county's most influential and honored citizens. His maternal grandparent, Drury Ridgeway, was an old settler of Georgia, who subsequently went to Alabama. Mr. Bonner was reared on the farm and received his early education in the common schools of the county. He then entered Bowdon college, where he was when the civil war began. In 1862 he enlisted in Company D, Capt. William Tumlin, First Georgia regiment, and served about eighteen months, during which time he participated in many hard-fought battles, among them Richmond, Ky., Frankfort, Shelbyville, Camp Dick Robinson, Perryville, Crab Orchard, Murfreesboro, Stone Hill, Winchester, Tullahoma, Munfordville, etc. Returning home he was engaged in gathering saltpeter and lead for the Confederate government until the surrender, and then he returned to the old farm where he now lives. His last service was the bearing of a dispatch from Jacksonville, Ala., to La Grange, Ga. When he reached his destination he found La Grange in the hands of the Union forces, but he was sharp enough to escape capture. He has been a jury commissioner for the last five years. Mr. Bonner was married in 1872 to Miss Mattie E., daughter of Green and Martha (Freeze) McGuire, of Irish descent, but among the early settlers: To Mr. and Mrs. Bonner eight children have been born: Zadoc M., Ola G., George L., Bessie B., Flora I., Lona Mc., Georgia and Ruth N. Mrs. Bonner, who was a devoted member of the Methodist church, died in 1893. Mr. Bonner has been a master Mason since he has become of "full age" and is one of Carroll's public spirited and progressive citizens. His family for generations have been among the most prominent and respected, but having been members of the minority party before the war seldom held office. This family is related by blood to that so prominent in New York.

S. J. BROWN, ordinary of Carroll county, Carrollton, Ga., son of Samuel and Ruth T. (Brooks) Brown, was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1842. His grandfather, Burrell Brown, came to Georgia late in the last century and settled in the woods. Mr. Brown's father was born in Burke county, Ga., in 1800. After receiving his education he taught school a number of years himself, finally settling on some lands in the woods in Newton county, living alone and working hard to open a farm. In 1836 he married his wife, a daughter of Terrell Brooks, and reared a family of nine children. In 1854 he removed to Carroll county, where the future ordinary took his lessons in and enjoyed the beauties and facilities of pioneer life. Judge Brown was reared on the farm, and attended the common county schools. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B, Capt. Charles A. McDaniel, Cobb's legion, Gen. T. D. R. Cobb, and participated in many important battles; Dam No. 1 on the Peninsula, in April, 1862; the retreat toward Richmond; in the seven days' fight, Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862; Chancellorsville, May 1, 1863, when he was wounded in making a charge on the enemy's breastworks, and returned home in June. Although disabled by the loss of the use of his arm, he determined to return to the army and to his company, and as he could do nothing else he carried water and waited on the sick and wounded, exhibiting a patriotic, self-sacrificing disposition very rare. After his return he participated in the battles of the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Hanover Junction, Cold Harbor, Petersburg and several other battles, remaining in the field until July, 1864, when he was retired on account of disabilities. After the war he attended Bowdon college, remaining from 1867 until 1871, and then he taught school until 1875. In 1876 he was elected county school commissioner, and held the office eight years. From 1881 to 1884 he taught school again. In 1885 he was elected ordinary of the county, and has held the office continuously since. Judge Brown was married Jan. 10, 1871, to Miss Charlotte C., born in Lee county, Ala., a daughter of W. T. and Ann (Stringer) Colquitt, by whom he has had eight children: Ruth, Belle, Mary Lee, Helen, George C., Samuel D., Mattie and Lamar. Judge Brown is a Primitive, and his wife a Missionary Baptist. He has made an upright, faithful officer, is esteemed by everybody, and will probably hold the office as long as he wants it.

W. F. BROWN, lawyer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of James C. and Emily M. (Knight) Brown, was born in Carroll county in 1850. His grandfather, John Brown, was born in South Carolina, whence he came to Georgia in ox-carts and settled in the woods on land now included in De Kalb county. They lived in tents until they cut the logs to build their cabin, and then cleared the land for cropping. In 1832, ten years after De Kalb county was laid off, he removed to Carroll county, organized a year or two before, and again settled in the woods, practically repeating his experience in making the home he had left. Mr. Brown's father was born in what is now De Kalb county in 1815, and accompanied the family to its new home. His mother's parents, John C. and Emily (Hopkins) Knight, were among Carroll's early settlers. Mr. Brown was reared in Carroll county and received a good common school education. When nineteen years of age he began teaching school and continued it seven years, and also began reading law. In 1876 he entered the literary department of the University of Georgia, and was graduated in 1878. He was admitted to the bar, and entered upon the practice of law in 1880, and has been eminently successful. He is recognized as being as well read in law as the majority of the profession practicing in his circuit, as one of its leading lawyers, and gains his share of the cases intrusted to his management. He has a good and growing clientage. No citizen stands higher or better in the estimation of the people than Mr. Brown. In 1884 he was elected to represent Carroll county in the general assembly and served the term. Mr. Brown was married in 1873 to Miss Emily, daughter of Archey and Malinda (George) Hagan. The father was one of the early settlers in Coweta county—the mother was born in Jackson county, Ga. Of the eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown these seven are living: Earl I., appointed to a cadetship at the West Point Military academy, after passing a crucial competitive examination; Ralph S., Emily, Paul F., Willie G., Harry D., and Eveline. Mr. Brown is a member of the I. O. O. F., and in masonry a royal and select master. Himself and wife are working members of the Methodist church—he being superintendent of the Sunday school. He is also one of the trustees of the Hucheson Collegiate institute. He is now judge of Carroll City court under appointment of Ex-Gov. Northen. Altogether Mr. Brown is a thoroughgoing, progressive and most worthy citizen.

O. D. BUNT, farmer and merchant, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John R. and Frances J. (Morris) Bunt, was born in De Kalb county, Ga., in 1857. His paternal grandfather, Thomas Bunt, was a native of South Carolina, and came to Georgia early in this century. He was a soldier during the revolutionary war. Mr. Bunt's father was born in South Carolina in 1825, and came to Georgia with his parents when a child. In 1861 he enlisted in Capt. Potts' company for two years, and in 1863 re-enlisted and served until the surrender. He had acquired a large property before the war, but lost it all; and when he returned from the army he had to make a new start. His maternal grandparents, Obadiah and Sarah (Binion) Morris, were native Georgians. Mr. Bunt was reared on a farm, and as the war was raging, and school facilities were limited, during his boyhood he was favored with but limited schooling. But he had capacity, and with it ambition and pluck, and so he pressed forward in the race of life. Without money, but with the qualities mentioned, he is fairly on the road to wealth and position. He now owns a 350-acre farm of fine land, and has supplemented his farm with a general merchandise store, building up a good trade and largely increasing his income. Mr. Bunt was married in 1884 to Miss Nora P., daughter of L. J. and Ada J. (Hood) Aderhold, all born in Carroll county. Her father was a son of G. W. Aderhold, who was born in 1843, and served gallantly in the Confederate army under Gen. Bragg, and was a physician of some note. Three children have blessed this union: Ethel, Leola and Hettie. Mr. and Mrs. Bunt are members of the Methodist church, with cheering prospects of a prosperous and happy future.

JAMES W. BURNS, farmer, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Samuel and Jane (Morris) Burns, was born in Florida, Dec. 19, 1838. His grandfather on his father's side, James Burns, came from Ireland to the United States early in this century, settled in North Carolina, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. He was a near relative of the poet, Robert Burns. In 1835 he came to Georgia and settled and cleared a farm in Henry county. Some years subsequently he removed to Carroll county and settled. Mr. Burns' father was born in Ireland in 1804, came to this country with his father, and with the family from North Carolina to Georgia. His grandparents on his mother's side, William and Hannah Morris, were natives of Virginia, whence they came to Georgia and made their home in De Kalb county, being among the county's pioneer settlers. Mr. Burns was reared on the farm, received only the limited education obtainable between "laying-by" and "fodder-pulling" time at the old-time school house two and a half miles away. In early manhood he taught school two years. In 1861 he enlisted in Company E (Capt. James Blalock), First Georgia cavalry; for a while he was with Gen. Forrest, and afterward with Gen. Wheeler. To have been with either of those generals means that he saw as much continuous hard service and bore a part in as much hard fighting as any one during the war. He was engaged in the battles of Perryville, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge and Franklin, and was with Johnston and Hood all the way to Atlanta; and under Wheeler made the raid all the way to Nashville, and was with the forces that harassed Sherman when "marching through Georgia;" while in the service he was sergeant of his company. After the war he returned to Georgia. Mr. Burns was married in 1865 to Miss Elizabeth F. Moore—born in Henry county—daughter of Harrison Moore, a native of Georgia, who removed from Henry to Carroll county, and who, though starting poor, lived to become rich. To the happiness of this household eleven children were added, nine of whom are living: Sarah J., Lula, James M., Beulah, Benjamin L., Samuel H., Ed, Katie and Joseph. After his marriage he began life without a dollar, but by hard work, economy and good management he has accumulated a fine property, including 1,000 acres of excellent land, with an improved farm and a delightful home in Bowdon. He is solid, substantial, popular. Mrs. Burns is a member of the Missionary Baptist church.

WILLIAM B. CANDLER, merchant, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Samuel C. and Martha (Beall) Candler, was born in Carroll county in 1847. An ancestor of the family, which is one among the most distinguished in Georgia at this time, was an officer in Cromwell's army. Mr. Candler's great-grandfather, William C. Candler, came from Ireland to America before the revolutionary war and was an officer in the patriot army. His paternal grandparents, Daniel and Sarah (Slaughter) Candler, were native Georgians. Mr. Candler's father was born in Upson county, Ga., in 1809, and removed to Carroll county in 1832, where he began life by working in the gold mines at $6 a month. His life success affords another and striking illustration of the opportunities this country affords for acquiring fortunes and achieving distinction. He served as a justice of the inferior court of the county a number of years; he represented the county in the general assembly—once as senator and twice as representative—and was in Charleston in 1860 at the democratic presidential convention. He was one of eleven children, all of whom are living but one; he was a "live" member of the masonic fraternity, and at the age of sixty joined the Methodist church. From a poorly-paid workingman he rose to wealth and honor and lived to a ripe old age. Mr. Candler's maternal grandparents, Noble and Justain (Hooper) Beall, were of Scotch descent and early settlers in Georgia. Mr. Candler was reared on the farm within a mile of where he now lives, and attended school at the "regulation" log school house. But, as during his youthhood war raged the fiercest, and there was the direst necessity for field labor, his educational advantages were seriously curtailed. After the war ended he taught school six months and after that (1868) embarked in the mercantile business, in which he has been exceptionally successful. In 1871 Mr. Candler was married to Miss Lizzie Slaughter—born in Carroll county—daughter of Dr. J. T. and Melvina (Freeman) Slaughter. Dr. Slaughter was a leading and one of the most prominent physicians in the state. Four children blessed this happy union: Eugene, Florence, Lizzie and William B. Mr. Candler and two of the children are members of the Presbyterian church, and Mrs. Candler and the other two children are members of the Methodist church. Mr. Candler rates high in the commercial world as a man of practical business and financial ability, while in social life himself and family are outranked by none.

W. A. COLEMAN, farmer and banker, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Henry A. and Sarah Ann (Barnes) Coleman, was born in 1838. His paternal grandparent, George Coleman, was a native of South Carolina, and came from that state to Georgia early in this century. His father was born in Putnam county, Ga., in 1814, was reared a farmer, and was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. For many years he was bailiff, and also a major of militia in Cobb county, Ga., when to be a major was something of a distinction locally. He was a prominent member of the Missionary Baptist church. His maternal grandparents, James and Sarah (McKenzie) Barnes, were among the early settlers of Lincoln county, Ga. Mr. Coleman was reared on a farm in De Kalb county, and what little education he received was at the old-time log school so many times described elsewhere in this volume, and in obtaining it had to go three or four miles barefooted. In October, 1861, he enlisted in Company E (Capt. Sharpe), First Georgia cavalry, and continued in the service until April 26, 1865. He was in many hard-fought battles, notably Chickamauga, Resaca, Kennesaw and Marietta—all the way to Atlanta and Savannah. He was on the skirmish line when Stoneman surrendered, and although he was neither wounded nor captured during the war, he narrowly escaped both. A spirit of enterprise and adventure took him to Honduras, Central America, in 1868, when he carried with him the necessary machinery and implements to engage extensively in saw-milling, fruit growing and cane-culture. He sawed the first lumber ever sawed and baled the first cotton ever baled for shipment in that country. His extensive manufacturing, agriculture and property interests in Honduras are now in charge of his son, William F., who resides there. From that source he derives a very large income, in addition to that from a large, well-improved farm in Carroll county, for, in addition to successfully managing enterprises so large and so remote, he prides himself on being one of the best farmers in his county. His success in everything he has undertaken has been phenomenal. He changed his residence from his farm to Carrollton, where he has an elegant home, so as to educate his children. He is one of the directors of the Carrollton bank. Mr. Coleman was married in 1858 to Miss Cynthia Riggs—born in Butts county, Ga.—daughter of John and Jane (Florence) Riggs, early settlers. Mr. Riggs was born in South Carolina, ran away from home and came to Georgia when sixteen years of age, and afterwards became a Baptist minister of note. This wife died in 1877, leaving one child, William F., now in Honduras. In January, 1879, Mr. Coleman married Miss Clara, daughter of Valentine and Eliza (Gant) Kolb, a family of wealth, and among the first settlers of Meriwether county, Ga. By this marriage two children have been born to him—Laura and James. Mrs. Coleman is a member of the Missionary Baptist church and Mr. Coleman is a master Mason.

HENRY F. CRAWFORD, farmer, Temple, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Gallant and Katie Crawford, was born in what is now Spalding county, in 1846. His paternal grandfather, William Crawford, was a native Virginian, came to Georgia in ox-carts in 1810, and settled in the woods. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Crawford's father was born in what is now Henry county, in 1816, and was reared a farmer, and followed farming all his life. He was a soldier in the Indian war of 1836. His maternal grandparents were among the first settlers and wealthy citizens of that part of the state. Mr. Crawford was reared on the farm and had to work hard, and so had to be content with a very limited education. In 1864 he enlisted in Company F (Capt. Thomas), Phillips' legion, and, although his service was not lengthy, it was rough and arduous. He participated in the Bellfield creek raid—three days' fighting—the battle of Petersburg, and the stirring events of the closing scenes of the war. He was in the engagement at Orangeburg, S. C., and Salisbury, N. C., and was at Charlotte, N. C., at the time of the surrender. After the war he came home and engaged in farming. In 1870, Mr. Crawford was married to Miss Nancy, daughter of John and Eliza (Weidner) Lee. Mr. Lee, her father, was born in Kentucky in 1818, and when seventeen years of age ran away from home and came to Georgia with some hog drivers, and never returned. Having fine business capacity, and being a shrewd trader he became very rich, but the war about ruined him. When Mr. Crawford married he was very poor, but not discouraged, and his wife proved a helpmeet, indeed; she worked with him in the field during the day, and at night spun and wove the cloth and made the clothing for the family. Thus they worked together and struggled on as plain farmers, until now he has a good 200-acre farm and comfortable home where he lives, and, nearby a 250-acre tract of choice land. To them six children have been born: Alice, wife of Cas Cantrell; Robert, Frank, William H., Rilla, and O. V. Mr. and Mrs. Crawford are members of the Missionary Baptist church, content with their success in life, and happy in the consciousness of having the confidence and esteem of their neighbors.

ELISHA CREEL, farmer, Mandeville, Carroll Co., Ga., son of George and Harriet (Belcher) Creel, was born in Fayette county, Ga., in 1847. His maternal grandfather, William Belcher, was a Clayton county, Ga., pioneer and was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Creel's father was born in what is now Monroe county, in 1816; but while yet a young man he removed to Fayette county, among its earliest settlers, settled in the woods and cleared a farm. From this small beginning he has become by hard work and economy, and careful management, one of the wealthiest men in the county. Mr. Creel was reared on the farm and received but a limited education. In 1866, he married Mary Ann Miller—born in Campbell county—daughter of Jefferson and Eliza (Eidson) Miller, early settlers of Campbell county. Of thirteen children born to them these nine are living: George J., Joe, Wiley, Robert, Alice, Alvin, Hattie, Mary and Anna. Mr. Creel began life without a dollar and for some years had a very hard time. He moved to Carroll county in 1869 and in a few years began to prosper. He has now an excellent 750-acre farm, well improved, is recognized as one of the best farmers in the county, and is getting rich. He is another and a convincing example of what can be done in farming in Georgia when the farmer works intelligently, and works hard and early and late, saves a surplus and judiciously invests it. He commands the confidence and respect of all who know him. Mrs. Creel is a member of the Baptist church.

JOHN F. CULPEPPER, SR., Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Joel and Elizabeth (Whitaker) Culpepper, was born in Coweta county, Ga., May 17, 1835. His paternal grandfather, Malachi Culpepper, was one of the early settlers of Morgan county, and was a soldier in the revolutionary war. His maternal grandparents, John and Polly Whitaker (nee Holliway), were among the early settlers of Coweta county. His father was born in Morgan county, April 1, 1802, where he was reared, and lived until 1827, when he removed to Coweta county and settled in the woods. Mr. Culpepper was reared in Coweta county, and received a good common school education, earning the money himself that paid his school expenses one year. In 1855, he engaged as a clerk in a store in Carrollton, and after one year's experience "opened up" for himself, and continued in business until 1862, when he enlisted in Company B, Seventh regiment, Confederate cavalry (Capt. L. J. Smith). At the end of a year he hired a substitute, and entered into a contract with the secretary of war to gather material for the manufacture of ammunition for the armies, which contract continued until the surrender. After the war he entered mercantile life again in Newnan, Ga., and in 1877 lost everything, and went on the farm where he now lives. He made two starts in life, and failed to attain his end; but in his last undertaking, that of farming, he has succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations, and rightly feels proud and exultant over his success. Mr. Culpepper was married in 1857 to Miss Epsie Boon—born in Carroll county—daughter of Jesse and Nancy (Lester) Boon, old settlers of the county. To them five children have been born—three living: Lucinda, wife of W. C. Branan; Anna, wife of T. E. Walten; and Vela. Mrs. Culpepper is a member of the Methodist church, and he is a royal arch Mason. Mr. Culpepper is a wide-awake, progressive farmer, and very much respected by all who know him.

F. M. FIEDLER, retired farmer, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Terrell and Rebecca (Nolan) Fiedler, was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1823. His great-grandparents, Jasper and Mary (Stewart) Fiedler, came from England to America before the revolutionary war, and settled in Virginia. Among the passengers aboard the same vessel was a Welsh family named Stewart—husband and wife and little daughter. The parents died during the voyage, and the little girl was reared by a family named Fiedler. She afterward became the wife of James Fiedler and lived to be nearly 100 years old. Mr. Fiedler's grandparents, James and Sally (Benga) Fiedler, migrated from Virginia to Georgia and settled in the woods in Greene county, whence in a few years they removed to what is now Morgan county and cleared another farm, where they made a permanent home and remained until they died—he in 1813 and she in 1830, aged seventy years. Mr. Fiedler's father was born in what is now Morgan county in 1797, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. On reaching manhood he was ordained a minister of the Missionary Baptist church, and preached in Morgan and adjoining counties. Having drawn some land in Meriwether county for his services in the war of 1812, himself and his brother-in-law, Sam. Harris, removed to Meriwether county, in 1833. They settled in the dense unbroken forest, in which Indians and wild animals roamed and prowled at will. His father organized a Baptist church—the first in that part of the state—in an old dilapidated log house, which had been built and used for a sheep pen. He afterward, in 1851, moved to Tallapoosa county, Ala., where he died in 1873, aged seventy-six years, peacefully closing a life faithfully spent in doing good and preaching the gospel. His maternal grandparents, George and Rebecca Nolan, were natives of South Carolina, who, coming to Georgia, settled near Madison, Morgan county. Mr. Fiedler was mostly reared in Meriwether county, and had the benefit of but a few months' schooling, and that was obtained at the old sheep pen where his father organized the church, after a four-mile walk, barefooted. He began life with nothing, and the first land he had he bought on credit, and before the war owned a 600-acre farm and ten slaves. Farming has been the pursuit of his life; and, although not wealthy, he has a fine farm, and a beautiful, comfortable home in Villa Rica. He served as notary public, ex-officio justice of the peace, two years. He was too old for regular service in the army, but served about six months in the Home guard. Mr. Fiedler was married in 1848 to Miss Martha Dobbs—born in South Carolina—daughter of Silas and Nancy (Myers) Dobbs, natives of South Carolina, who settled in Carroll county, in 1852. To them four children have been born, two of whom are living: Rebecca, wife of Dr. G. W. Strickland; and Silas O., who married Florence, daughter of William Candler. Mr. Fiedler joined the church when seventeen years of age and has lived a consistent Christian life; and himself and his devoted companion are both members of the Missionary Baptist church.

W. W. FITTS, physician and surgeon, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Walker and Ann P. (Christian) Fitts, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1830. His grandfather, Tandy Fitts, was born in Virginia, and was a soldier during the revolutionary war. His father was also born in Virginia, and came to Elbert county and settled in the woods in 1820. In 1829 he went to Monroe county, Ga., and again cleared a farm in the woods. His grandfather on his mother's side, William Christian, was born in Virginia, moved to Georgia, and was among Elbert's early settlers. Dr. Fitts was reared in Monroe county, and was educated in an old-time log schoolhouse with dirt floor, lighted through apertures cut in the logs, the seats being of slabs from the near-by sawmill, with holes bored in them in which to insert the legs. There he was instructed in the old blue-back Webster's speller, reading, writing, and in Smiley's arithmetic, by Prof. Newnan. In after years he attended a good school, taught school himself and studied medicine. In 1856 he went to Atlanta, placed himself under the preceptorship of Drs. J. G. and W. F. Westmoreland, and entered Atlanta Medical college, where he graduated in 1860, and located in Calhoun county, Ala. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K (Capt. Ridley), Forty-fourth Alabama regiment (Col. Dent). Before the command went to the army he was made surgeon. He remained in the service until 1863, when he resigned on account of sickness and returned home. Dr. Fitts was married in 1855 to Miss A. W. Brown—born in Newton county—daughter of Samuel and Ruth (Brooks) Brown, who has borne him six children: Emma, wife of C. B. Simonton; William L., M. D., a graduate of the Atlanta medical college, and eleven years in practice; Robert H., druggist; Anna, wife of R. N. Moses, postmaster, Carrollton, Ga.; Eugenia, wife of Frank Weens, of Rome, Ga., and James W., merchant. Dr. Fitts moved to Carrollton in 1863, took the lead there at once in his profession, has established a large and remunerative practice, and enjoys the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens. He has been a Mason since 1855, and is a member of the Council of Royal and Select Masters. He has filled all the offices below that of W. M. in the blue lodge, and was a representative of the lodge many years. Himself and wife and family are members of the Baptist church.

JUDSON T. FULLER, farmer, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Alfred and Amanda (Evans) Fuller, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., in 1851. His paternal grandparent, William Fuller, was a native of South Carolina, and came to Georgia in 1828 and settled in the woods in Meriwether county. He was one of the pioneers, started on labor and pluck, and became one of the county's leading and wealthy citizens. Mr. Fuller's father was born in South Carolina, came to Georgia with his father, and helped to clear and then work the farm. His maternal grandparents, Elijah and Mary (Reed) Evans, were also natives of South Carolina, who came to Georgia about the time Meriwether county was laid out, and were among the early settlers in its woods. He was a tanner by trade and became rich. Mr. Fuller was reared on the farm, and as he passed through youth during the war enjoyed quite limited educational advantages. In 1866 he came to Carroll county and began life by hiring out. By persistent, well-directed effort, economy and good management he has acquired a fine property—1,400 acres of good land, including a large, well-improved farm within five miles of Villa Rica, and an elegant home in the little city, where he is living a contented life, happier than if he were a millionaire. Such men are the nation's reliance in extreme emergencies. Mr. Fuller was married in 1872 to Miss Mary E. Johnson—born in Walton county, Ga.—daughter of William and Elizabeth (Malcom) Johnson. This marriage has been blessed with seven children: Beulah, Lela, Maggie, Hardy, Thomas, Maude and De Witt. Mrs. Fuller is a consistent and devoted member of the Baptist church. It is almost needless to add that Mr. Fuller is one of the little city's most substantial and reliable citizens, and he and his interesting family rank with the best.

ALLEN M. GAY, farmer, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Gilbert and Sarah (Stamps) Gay, was born in Coweta county in 1831. His paternal grandparents, Allen and Abigail (Castleberry) Gay, were Virginians by birth, and he was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Some years after that they migrated to Georgia and settled in Hancock county—bona fide pioneers. Here Mr. Gay's father was born in 1811. When he was thirteen years of age he went to Wilkinson county, Ga., whence a few years afterward he moved to Coweta county. In 1848 he removed to Heard county and settled on Jumping Creek, where he ended his days. Mr. Gay's mother was a daughter of Moses and Ann (Eason) Stamps, who came to Georgia and settled in the woods in Jackson county in 1795. He cleared a farm and also did work as a gun and blacksmith. Leaving Jackson, he went to Gwinnett, and after two years went to Clarke county, where he staid two years, and then went back to Jackson county. From Jackson he went to Fayette, and lastly to Coweta county, where he died. June 29, 1894, Eson Stamps, Mr. Gay's uncle, his mother's brother, was one hundred years old, and he was given a birthday dinner—spread picnic style on the grass under the trees—at Mr. Gay's home. There were about 500 people there, of whom he fed 300. The Grandfather Stamps was a soldier during the war of 1812, in the wars with the Indians, and was captain of a company in the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Gay was reared a farmer, and was given such education as the schools afforded during his boyhood—taught as they were in log houses, with dirt floor and slab or split log seats. In 1851 he was married to Miss Martha Stamps—born in Jackson county in 1822—daughter of Eson and Polly (Watts) Stamps, who has borne him five children, of whom only one, Sarah F., wife of Jeff Butler, is now living. When he married himself and wife had but one change of clothing, but now he has a well-improved 350-acre farm and is a well-to-do farmer. Himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church and are much respected by all who know them.

JAMES P. GRIFFIN, merchant, Temple, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Charles W. and Sarah (New) Griffin, was born in De Kalb county in 1838. His paternal grandparent, James P. Griffin, was a native of South Carolina, came to Georgia in 1818, and settled in what is now De Kalb county. At that time they had to tramp their wheat out on the floor. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Griffin's father was born in Abbeville district, S. C., in 1811, came to Georgia with his parents when he was seven years old, and was reared on the farm originally settled. He followed farming all his life, was a soldier in the Indian war in 1836, and was a member of the Methodist church. His maternal grandparent, Joel New, was a native of South Carolina and among the early settlers of De Kalb county. Mr. Griffin was reared on a farm in Carroll county, where he went with the family when he was eight years old. His father being a very poor man, and he the eldest boy of eleven children, had to work very hard, and was almost entirely deprived of the school advantages he yearned for. Oftentimes, too, he had to plow through briar patches and his feet would get so badly torn he could hardly walk. After he became of age he "boarded himself" and went to school. In 1862 he enlisted in Company E (Capt. Blalock), First Georgia cavalry, and during the war was in many hard-fought battles, among them Richmond, Ky., Wheeler's Gap, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Resaca, and thence to Atlanta and on to Macon. At the time of surrender he was at Greensborough, N. C. He was in numerous minor engagements, and during his service had several horses shot from under him, but was so fortunate as to escape being wounded or captured. A part of the time he acted as orderly-sergeant. After the war Mr. Griffin worked a farm at fifty cents a day and taught school. Struggling on, working hard, and saving his money, he at last came into the ownership of a 500-acre farm of good land, and well improved. In 1881 he engaged in a general merchandising business at Temple, where he has built up a good and profitable trade and has made and is making money. For six years he served as justice of the peace. Intelligent, industrious, and economical, in connection with energy and judicious enterprise, it may be expected his achieved success will be far exceeded by that of the future. Mr. Griffin was married in 1868 to Miss Sarah A. Adams—born and reared in Carroll county—daughter of Absalom and Elizabeth (Reid) Adams, by whom he has had seven children: Joseph, Ryburn, M. E., Bettie M., Lewis, Ella and Claudie. Mr. Griffin is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and himself and wife and all the children except the baby are members of the Methodist church.

R. L. GRIFFIN, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Charles W. and Sarah (New) Griffin, was born in De Kalb county, Ga., in 1848. His father was born in what is now De Kalb county in 1812, where he was reared a farmer, and moved to Carroll county in 1850. He settled on a farm about eight miles from Carrollton. His mother was the daughter of John and Mary New. Mr. Griffin was reared mostly in Carroll county, a plain farmer, and was educated at the "old field" school, taught in a log cabin. After reaching manhood he taught school about ten years and then engaged in farming. In 1887 he was elected tax collector and served two terms (four years) and discharged the duties of that office to the entire satisfaction of the people. In 1869 Mr. Griffin was married to Miss Georgia Holmes—born in Coweta county—daughter of Thomas and Mary Holmes, by whom he has had nine children: Charles M., Mattie, Thomas, Percy, Herbert, Mary, Lee, Ellen and Barron. Starting with nothing, Mr. Griffin has now one of the best improved farms, containing 360 acres, in his locality, and is well thought of as a wide-awake, progressive farmer. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

S. E. GROW, lawyer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Paschal P. and Elmyra (Wollcott) Grow, was born in Carroll county in 1851. The family is of English origin, and among the early settlers of Vermont, in the person of John Grow, the great-great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch. His great-grandparents were Joseph and Tirsah (Sangor) Grow, and his grandparents were Samuel and Jerushia (Stowell) Grow. His great-grandfather and his grandfather were soldiers in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. His parents were school teachers, and migrated from Vermont to Georgia, and settled in the woods in Carroll county in 1836—bona fide "pioneers." In the early history of the county his father was one of its leading citizens. Three of his sons were in the Confederate army: Paschal P., who was in the battle of Manassas, died while in the service; Jacob C., now a Presbyterian minister in Llano, Tex., and Lewis K., who was killed in the charge at Petersburg. Mr. Grow's father died in 1861. Mr. Grow was reared in the county and received a good common school education. He began teaching in 1874, also read law and was admitted to the bar in Florida, May 10, 1875. Returning to Georgia, he was admitted to the bar in Carrollton, June 1, 1875, and has been in the practice in Carrollton ever since, holding his own with his professional compeers. No one of the local bar outranks him, and he is held in the highest esteem professionally, politically and socially. A safe counselor, and an able and impressive advocate, he has secured a valuable clientage which is augmented every year. In 1882 he was mayor of Carrollton. He was chairman of the democratic fourth congressional committee in 1892, and for four years was chairman of the democratic executive committee of his county and has been re-elected for another term. In 1893 he was appointed clerk to the committee on pensions in the fifty-third congress. He has been a delegate to several state conventions, but although he has always taken great interest in politics, he has never sought or been a candidate for office. Mr. Grow was married in 1877 to Miss Lenora, daughter of Col. Charles A. and Victoria A. (Hines) McDaniel. Her father was colonel of the Forty-first Georgia regiment, and was killed at the battle at Perryville, Ky. When the civil war began he was president of the college at Bowdon, Carroll Co.—a college and town which he founded—and very many of his pupils went with him into the army. To Mr. and Mrs. Grow these children have been born: Samuel E., Dudley M., Victor D., Elmyra, Stephen and Helen. Mrs. Grow was born in Bowdon. Mr. Grow is a member of the I. O. O. F., and is a member of the council and a select master, of which he has been thrice illustrious master. He has also been worshipful master of his local lodge seven years. He is now district grand deputy. Himself and wife are members of the Presbyterian church. A record such as Mr. Grow's needs no comment—it speaks for itself with emphasis.

ARTHUR D. HARMAN, a farmer, and engaged in milling and cotton ginning business, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William M. and Nancy (Dillard) Harman, was born in Monroe county, Ga., Nov. 14, 1832. His great-grandfather, Hezekiah Harman, emigrated from England to Virginia some years before the revolutionary war, and then moved to North Carolina. His grandparents, Merriman and Nellie (May) Harman, were born in North Carolina, migrated to Georgia in 1828, settled first in Monroe county, and then went among the first settlers to Meriwether county. There they lived the first year on a dirt floor, and as there was no sawmill near, he split out puncheon with which to lay a floor. Mr. Harman's father was born in Chatham county, N. C., in 1805, where he grew to manhood; then (1826) he came to Georgia and settled in the woods. In 1830 he was married to Nancy, daughter of Arthur and Mary (Abney) Dillard, who were born in South Carolina, and moved thence to Georgia and settled in Jones county in 1826. Both families for generations were farmers. To this union five children were born: Eliza J., Emeline E., Nancy A., Martha F. and Arthur D., the subject of this sketch—all of whom are now living except the eldest daughter. Mr. Harman was reared in Meriwether county and was schooled in the log cabin of that day and locality, with dirt floor, puncheon seats, a chimney made of clay and sticks and square holes cut through the logs for windows. The only time he had for schooling was between "laying-by" and "fodder-pulling" time. Before the war he was captain of the militia, when the position had some local distinction, but in 1861 he enlisted as a private in Company A (Capt. J. D. Frederick), Tenth Georgia battalion (Maj. Rylander). He was on some of the most hotly contested fields—the Wilderness, Petersburg, Davis Farm, Blow Up, Deep Bottom, Turkey Ridge, Hatcher's Run, Suffolk, etc. After Suffolk he was transferred to Gen. Ranse Wright's brigade and remained with it until the surrender at Appomattox. For a considerable time during the war he acted as commissary, and in this position was faithful and prompt in the discharge of every duty. After the war he returned to his farm and has since engaged in farming. In 1892 he moved to Carrollton and invested in milling and cotton-ginning. Mr. Harman was married in 1857 to Miss Jane I. Fincher—born in Troup county—daughter of Isaac and Elizabeth (Brooks) Fincher, who were among the early settlers of Meriwether county. To them eight children have been born: William I., born March 26, 1859; Arthur D., born July 11, 1861; John A., born July 13, 1864; Betsy B., born February 15, 1867; James R., born March 3, 1870; Luther M., born Jan. 26, 1872; Edgar S., born March 21, 1875, and Anna I., born Nov. 12, 1878. Mr. Harman is a royal arch Mason and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church. He is a man in whom everybody has the utmost confidence and possesses no inconsiderable influence, and he and family are highly esteemed.

SAMPSON W. HARRIS, judge of Coweta circuit, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Sampson W. and Paulina (Thomas) Harris, was born in Alabama, in 1838. His great-grandfather, Simpson Harris, was a native of Wales, and emigrated to Virginia before the revolutionary war. He came to Georgia in 1795 and settled in the woods. His grandparents were Stephen W. and Sarah (Watkins) Harris. His grandfather was one of the first graduates of the university of Georgia, Athens, Ga., was an eminent lawyer, and for many years a judge of the superior court. The father of the subject of this sketch was born in Elbert county, Ga., Feb. 23, 1809, graduating from the university of Georgia in 1828, and removed to Alabama in 1837, where he practiced law and rose rapidly professionally and politically. He represented the Fourth congressional district of Alabama for ten years and died in Washington, while in congress, in April, 1857. Judge Harris was reared on the plantation, and received a good common school education. He entered the university of Georgia, in 1853, and graduated in 1857; studied law and was admitted to the bar in Oglethorpe county, Ga., and entered upon the practice. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K (Capt. John T. Lofton) Sixth Georgia regiment, which was assigned to Gen. A. H. Colquitt's command. He served through the war, and was in many hard fought battles. He was seriously wounded and was captured by Sherman's army just before the surrender, but was paroled. He entered the army as first lieutenant, and was gradually promoted until he reached a colonelcy just before the close of the war. After the war he planted a few years, in Chambers county, Ala., and then resumed his law practice. He moved into Georgia in the seventies, and was a member of the constitutional convention of 1877. That same year, also, he was appointed solicitor-general of the Coweta circuit, which office he held until 1880, when he was elected judge of the circuit—a position he still holds. In May, 1894, Gov. Northen tendered him the office of secretary of state to fill a vacancy, but he declined the appointment. In 1866 Judge Harris was married in Alabama to Miss Lucy, daughter of Henry and Emily (Watkins) Todd. This union has been blessed with six children: H. F., physician, graduate of Atlanta medical college, and of Jefferson medical college, Philadelphia, been in practice three years; Sampson; Stephen, graduate of Atlanta medical college; Isabella, Paulina, and Lucy. Judge Harris is a master Mason.

HAMILTON HOGAN, farmer, Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of James and Elizabeth (Spraggins) Hogan, was born in Pendleton district, South Carolina, March 1, 1820. His paternal grandparents, William and Nancy (Dillard)

Hogan, were Virginian born; and Mr. Hogan was a soldier in the revolutionary army. His maternal grandparent, Thomas Spraggins, was a native South Carolinian, and a soldier in the patriot army during the war for independence. In 1824, Mr. Hogan's father came from South Carolina to Georgia, settled in Habersham county, and rented a farm with a cabin on it preparatory to bringing his family. In 1825 he went for some needed articles, and to bring them he cut two poles to serve as shafts, and fastening the box containing his articles on one end, hitched his horse between the poles at the other end. He then put little five-year-old Hamilton, the subject of this sketch, on his horse, and returned to Georgia, he walking all the way. This shows one of the methods by which the "Empire State of the South" was peopled. In 1832 his father moved to Coweta county and cleared a farm on which he ended his days. Mr. Hogan attended school in the old-time schoolhouse, and after he "graduated" he taught school himself five years, by which he earned his first money. He next engaged in farming, which has been his life pursuit, in which he has been successful, and acquired a competency. In 1862, he enlisted in Company H, third Georgia battalion (Col. Stovall) and served one year, when his health failed and he was discharged. As soon as he recovered his health he re-enlisted, this time in Company H, of which he was made orderly sergeant, Sixty-sixth Georgia regiment (Col. Nesbit). He was captured at Decatur, Ala., and after being held some time was paroled. While at home the conflict terminated, and he is now the proud possessor of two one-hundred-dollar bills paid him for his services. Although he was not wounded during his service in the army, the numerous perforations in his clothes show how narrowly he escaped not only wounds but death. He was in the battle of Missionary Ridge, and the charge on Peachtree creek, and many other engagements. In 1876 he was elected a representative from Carroll county to the general assembly, and was re-elected in 1878, but did not serve out the term. He is now serving his second year as county commissioner, and while serving as such he was largely instrumental in having erected the really elegant new courthouse, as good as any in the state, and, all things considered, one of the cheapest. Mr. Hogan was married in 1846 to Miss Jane Watson—born in Carroll county—daughter of Tyre and Clarissa (Sockwell) Watson—Georgia born—by whom he has had nine children: Helen, wife of J. T. Jones; Elizabeth, wife of L. J. Jones; Sarah J., wife of John A. Byers; Ellen M., wife of N. C. Morris; Fannie, James T. and Gus A., who are living; and Louisa J., wife of Henry G. Jennings; and Hepsie A., wife of John W. Duncan, deceased. Mr. Hogan is one of the most substantial and influential citizens of Carroll county, and is held in the highest esteem by everybody. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and is a useful and exemplary member of the Methodist church.

JOHN HOUSEWORTH, farmer, Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John J. and Catherine (Lyons) Houseworth, was born in Carroll county, in 1848. His grandparents on his father's side were Philip and Katie (Hollensworth) Houseworth. His grandfather's parents came from Germany to America before the revolutionary war, and his father dying when he was quite a child he was reared by a charitable institution in South Carolina. After reaching manhood and marrying he came to Georgia and settled first in Newton county, and afterward moved to De Kalb county. Here Mr. Houseworth's father was reared and married his wife, daughter of George and Kate Lyons, of English descent. Of ten children reared three sons enlisted in the Confederate army: Robert and Abraham, in Company K (Capt. Bark), Seventh Georgia regiment, which was in Early's command. Robert was a lieutenant, and he with his brother were in all the engagements in which his company bore a part, and was wounded at Knoxville, Tenn. Philip was in the western army under Capt. Kendrick. Mr. Houseworth was reared on the farm cleared by his father, and is living in the house in which he was born. He received a common school education, and started in life with a good constitution, good health, and a determined and willing spirit as his patrimony and capital. Mr. Houseworth was married in Carroll county in 1869 to Miss Harriet A. Holland—born in the county—daughter of Linsey and Elizabeth (Lassetter) Holland. Ten children are the offspring of this union: Delvous, Wyley, Walter, Della, Frank and Lee (twins); Katie, Tiney, Anna, Gordon. Mr. Houseworth is a well-to-do prosperous farmer with more than 600 acres of productive land, doing well, and is highly respected.

ARTHUR HUTCHESON, deceased, for years the president of the Hutcheson Manufacturing company, Banning, Carroll Co., Ga., was the son of James and Sophia (Montgomery) Hutcheson, and was a full-blooded Irishman, having been born in Ireland in 1818. His father died in 1827 and his mother in 1856. In 1836, when eighteen years of age, he left Ireland for America, on whose shores he landed after a journey of six weeks, and came to Campbell county, Ga., and stopped with an uncle living there. This uncle, James Hutcheson, left Ireland for this country in 1818, and his first stop in Georgia was in Milledgeville. From there he went to McDonough, Henry Co., and thence, in 1827, he removed to Newnan, Coweta Co. From Newnan he went, in 1832, and settled in the woods and cleared a farm, and here on this farm Arthur Hutcheson, without education or money, started in life. But he had good common sense, indulged in no bad habits, was frugal, and invested his earnings with rare good judgment. What he amassed was not made by sharp, tricky trading nor semi-gambling speculation. No "blood money" stained his purse. He did not accumulate rapidly, but he did it safely and surely, nor was he a millionaire, nor could he ever be, but he left a comfortable fortune, though he provided generously for himself and those dependent upon or serving him. During the war he was in the commissary department under Maj. Shackelford, whose headquarters were in Atlanta. He had a cousin in the army who saved the Confederate general, Bates, from being captured on one occasion when posting his pickets. After the war he engaged in merchandising at County Line, Carroll county, and in 1878 he bought an interest in what was then known as Amos' factory, to which he subsequently devoted almost his entire attention. At that time there was one mill, and that supplied with old-style, run-down machinery. The old foggy shareholders were gradually bought out, and under Mr. Hutcheson's able management improved modern machinery displaced the old. He next proceeded to organize a joint stock company with a capital of $93,000, of which he was elected president and general manager. Additions and improvements were continued and now they have a 5,000-spindle (and preparation) cotton factory, a paper mill, two pulp mills, and a grist and sawmill, all fully equipped with the best made, modern improved machinery, and all within a mile along the creek, propelled by water retained by one dam. This company operates one of the three mills in the United States that make striped paper. The company owns 1,300 acres of good land, employs 210 hands, and when all their machinery is running full time, 240. Workers are furnished house room and a garden spot free, and the company has built a school house for the children and a church for them to worship in. Mr. Hutcheson looked after the physical comfort of his employes and gave attention to their moral training and conduct. He was kind and considerate, and treated them humanely, respecting them himself and stimulating them to cultivate self-respect for themselves. It is superfluous to add that Mr.

Hutcheson was esteemed very highly by all who knew him in financial circles as well as in the humbler walks of life. His true worth as a man could not be better appreciated than by his employes and their families, in whose welfare he took so much interest, and to them his death fell with the heaviest hand. He was a master Mason and an exemplary member of the Methodist church. He died on the morning of April 5, 1895.

REV. W. W. KELLEY, Baptist minister, Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Andrew Wilson and Elizabeth J. (Pitts) Kelley, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1847. His paternal grandparents, John and Mary (Hews) Kelley, were natives of North Carolina, and came to Georgia about 1810. His grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Kelley's father was born in North Carolina, came to Georgia with his father, and had a very fair education for his day. He was a member of the Baptist church and a man of considerable prominence in his day. His maternal grandparents, Archey and Charlotte (Burnett) Pitts, were South Carolinians, were Baptists, and early settlers of Georgia. Mr. Kelley was reared on a farm and received a good common-school education, and attended a theological school at Greenville, S. C., a part of one term in 1873. His father being a poor man, he earned the money himself to pay for his higher education. In 1863 he became his father's substitute in Company G, Second Georgia regiment, and served two months, when he was relieved. During this time he was sent to Grayville, Tenn., to engage in a battle, but it had been fought before he and his comrades reached the field. In 1864 he enlisted in Company I (Capt. J. Johnson), Bell's battalion, his company performing guard duty most of the time. He began life after the war very poor, but feels that he has been wonderfully sustained and blessed by Providence. He was ordained a Baptist minister in 1871, but the first pastorate to which he was called was that of Whitesburg in 1874, since which time he has been actively engaged in the Master's service. He is now pastor of the churches of Central Hatchee, Heard Co.; Corinth (at Banning), and Salem, Carroll Co., and Effices, in Douglas county, Ga. He aided in the organization of the three last named, and also in the organization of Friendship, in Heard county, and Friendship and Ebenezer, in Douglas county. He was pastor of Friendship for fifteen months. In addition to this arduous work he taught school in 1874-75-76 and a part of 1877. During his ministry he had baptized about 1,000 persons and made scores of couples happy by uniting them in marriage. Rev. Mr. Kelley was married to Miss Elizabeth T., daughter of James D. Moore, a pioneer settler, in 1877, who has borne him five children, of whom three, James A., William B. and Charles S., are living, and two, Carrie E. (Mrs. Van D. Sewell) and Thomas Mercer are dead. Rev. Mr. Kelley is a master Mason and Mrs. Kelley is a member of the Baptist church. He has a fine farm and comfortable residence in the edge of Whitesburg, is an exemplary Christian minister, and a useful and very highly esteemed citizen. To Andrew W. and Elizabeth Kelley ten children were born, eight sons and two daughters. Of these W. W., Thomas A. and James M. were ordained Baptist ministers, and actively engaged in the ministry. Andrew W. died in infancy and Newton Calvin at the age of eighteen. J. M. and Mary K. were twins. The latter married Mr. Capes, and the other sister, Amanda J., is the wife of W. M. Hunter.

J. R. LASSETTER, general superintendent of the Hutcheson Manufacturing company, Banning, Ga., son of William and Parthenia (Brown) Lassetter, was born in Carroll county. His grandfather, Benjamin Lassetter, came from Virginia to Georgia in 1828, and went to Milledgeville and bought the fractions of land in Carroll county on which he settled and began clearing for a farm that year. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain. His father, a farmer, was born in Carroll county, and was a member of the cavalry company commanded by Capt. Shuford three years during the late "unpleasantness." Mr. Lassetter received a good common-school education. His father died when he was young, but being of the stuff that men are made of, he has persistently struggled toward the front, where, before many years, he will be. As soon as qualified he began teaching, and after following it a few years engaged in merchandising. Having the misfortune to be burned out, he went back to the old farm, which he bought on credit, and after much privation and hard struggling he paid for and began to lay up money. In 1891 he went to work for the Hutcheson Manufacturing company, and in 1893 bought an interest in it. He has since been made general superintendent—a well-earned and deserved compliment to his pluck and energy and his superior general capabilities. He is a thorough-going young man, recognized as promising to become one of the most influential of his generation in the county. Little is known in Georgia of this Hutcheson Manufacturing company; on a small scale it is but a sample of many, in other localities in Georgia, of like topography and surroundings, and demonstrates the grand manufacturing possibilities of the state. Mr. Lassetter richly deserves the confidence he has secured, and the success he has attained. With the position he holds in the company, the natural manufacturing advantages of the mills' site, the possibilities of greater development and expansion, and the advantages of the experience and instruction of the company's president, Arthur Hutcheson, this rising young manufacturer has before him a brilliant future.

J. W. G. LASSETTER, farmer, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William and Mary Parthenie (Brown) Lassetter, was born in Carroll county in 1858. His grandfather, Benjamin Lassetter, settled in Georgia early in the present century. Mr. Lassetter's father was Georgia-born, was reared a farmer, and came to Carroll county and settled on Snake Creek when it was a wilderness, in 1841. He cleared a farm and made a home there and reared a family of fourteen children, all of whom made good citizens. His maternal grandparents were also among the early settlers of upper Georgia. Mr. Lassetter was bred a farmer, received but little schooling, but enough to enable him to teach a short time. In 1883 he married Miss Mary Barnett, born in Georgia, daughter of Waddie H. and Nancy (Butler) Barnett, who were native South Carolinians, but came to Georgia many years ago. Two children, Erie and William C., have blessed this union. The first died in his youth. Mr. Lassetter began life with a horse and $200, has steadily pursued farming as a business, and has succeeded admirably. He has a nice 250-acre farm, a comfortable dwelling and substantial outbuildings, and is a progressive and prosperous farmer. Himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church, and are exemplary farmers, citizens and church members.

W. D. LOVVORN, farmer and miller, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of James and Bashaba (Traylor) Lovvorn, was born in Henry county, Ga., in 1831. His great-grandfather, Elijah Lovvorn, came from Ireland to this country before the revolutionary war, and was a soldier in the patriot army, during which time he suffered many privations and great hardships. His grandparents, James and Hannah (Smith) Lovvorn, were born in Virginia, whence they moved to North Carolina, and afterward to Georgia, about 1800, and settled in what is now Morgan county. Subsequently they moved to St. Clair county, Ala. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Lovvorn's father was born in Morgan county in 1807 and went with his father to Alabama, where he died. His mother was a daughter of Mijman and Lidy (Lang) Traylor. Mr. Traylor was a soldier in the war of 1812 and was captured and confined in Fort Pickens. He was fond of fun and jokes, and on one occasion when sweeping the floor an officer passed him, and on the impulse of the moment he gave him a playful swipe with the broom. The officer resented the apparent indignity, and the incident came near involving him in serious trouble. He also served through the Indian war of 1836. Mr. Lovvorn was reared on the farm, in Alabama, and was educated in the common country schools (walking three miles, sometimes barefooted in the winter), taught in a dirt floor log house with split log seats. After "graduating" he taught school himself a few years. He was a justice of the peace many years, and in 1872 was elected to represent Randolph county in the legislature of Alabama—the last republican elected from the county. In 1878 he removed from Alabama to Carroll county, Ga., and bought and settled the large farming property on which he now lives, and on which he has built and runs a large custom mill. Mr. Lovvorn was married in Alabama in 1851 to Miss Sarah D. Burden—born in Elbert county, Ga.—daughter of Henry and Sarah (White) Burden. Her parents were born in Virginia, migrated to Georgia, and settled in what is now Hart county, and afterward moved to Alabama, where he died. Ten children blessed this union: Thomas J., Mary, Gaines W., William J., Sarah R., Robert M., Martha E., Cindonia and Henry O. Mr. Lovvorn and his wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church. He was one of the first county commissioners of the county, a man of large property and a most substantial and highly-respected citizen.

D. R. MARTIN, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John C. and Emily (Bates) Martin, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1846. His paternal grandparents migrated from South Carolina to Coweta county in 1830. They came in the old-time block-wheel ox carts, and it took them three weeks to make the journey. His grandfather was born in South Carolina and was a farmer—he, however, supplemented farming with blacksmithing and wood-working. Like other early settlers, he had to clear the land on which he made his home. His father was born in South Carolina in 1821, and his mother, daughter of David and Rhoda (Evans) Bates—old settlers—was born in Wilkes county, Ga., in 1824. Mr. Martin was reared in Coweta county, and, as were other boys at that time, was educated in an old-time dirt floor log cabin and subjected to all the inconveniences incident to them. In May, 1863, he enlisted in Company K (Capt. George Short), First Georgia regiment (Col. Lester), for six months; when the time expired he enlisted in the First Georgia cavalry (Capt. H. A. North, under Col. Cruse) and was in many battles. He was in front of Gen. Sherman's army from Marietta to Atlanta, and during the "March through Georgia." He was in North Carolina at the time of the surrender. Immediately after the event he returned to Carroll county penniless, but with a firm will and a stout heart went to work. In 1869 he bought a tract of land with not a stick amiss on it, and proceeded to make a farm and lay the foundation for a fortune. He made a specialty of raising Irish potatoes and fruit, and his great success has demonstrated his sagacity and wisdom. In 1893 he bought the land on which he now lives, also virgin forest, which he has transferred into one of the best improved farms in this community, and has built on it one of the finest modern residences in the county. He is recognized as one of the leading and most successful farmers in Carroll county; rich and getting richer. In 1869 Mr. Martin was married to Miss Mary Ann, daughter of E. B. and Ruth Ann (Curtis) Martin, both born in Gwinnett county, Ga., who were among the early settlers of Carroll county, by whom he had the following children: Henry C., Lou, Ida, Mary and Claude. The mother of these children died in 1887, and in 1888 Mr. Martin married Nannie, widow of Thomas Dixon, and daughter of Otha and Eliza (Curtis) Bell, born in Randolph county, Ga. To them two children—Laura and Susie—have been born. Mr. Martin is a Knight of Honor, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church. In farm management Mr. Martin is acknowledged to have few equals—no superiors. Content with the superior management of his 240-acre farm, its profitable returns and the esteem of his neighbors, he is unambitious of public honors. Whatever he has is the result of honest toil.

JAMES P. MOORE, capitalist, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John and Levisa (Petty) Moore, was born in Spartanburg district, S. C., in 1839. His paternal grandparents, Hugh and Elizabeth (Thomas) Moore, were natives of South Carolina. His grandfather was a soldier in the revolutionary war and his grandson—the subject of this sketch, is “a chip of the old block”—has the musket he “toted” all through that memorable struggle. His maternal grandfather, Charles Petty, was also a soldier in the patriot army. Mr. Moore was reared in South Carolina and received a limited education, and when a mere child had to walk three miles daily to obtain it. April 1, 1861, he enlisted in Company H (Capt. Joe Walker), Fifth South Carolina regiment (Col. Jenkins), which was assigned to the command of Gen. Beauregard. He served in this company nearly a year, when another company was formed known as the First Palmetto Sharpshooters, which caused some changes, and in the reorganization of Company H Mr. Moore was made captain, which he continued to be until the surrender. He was present at the firing on Fort Sumter. When it fell he went to Virginia, and beginning with First Manassas, participated in many of the bloodiest and most fiercely contested battles during the entire war—including every battle in which Jenkins’ brigade was engaged. That he was in the foremost on every battlefield it is needless to say, for with a double strain of revolutionary blood in his veins, and South Carolina blood at that, nothing else could be expected. It has been stated above that he had in his possession the musket which his Grandfather Moore carried during the war for independence. The following incident will show why he should be doubly proud of it—first, its family and historic interest; second, the circumstances attending its retention. After the war, in pursuance of a military order, the union soldiers proceeded to gather up all the arms in private hands in the south. When this old musket was demanded Mr. Moore refused to give it up, and when the soldiers attempted to take it by force he foiled them and made his escape with it. It is asserted that many a Federal soldier “bit the dust” in after attempts to capture him, and on roll call was reported “missing.” Although he escaped capture, the continual danger he was in determined him to leave the state; so, in 1873, he came to Georgia and settled in Carroll county. He was a brick-mason, and worked at his trade, but he has done so well and managed and invested his gains so judiciously that he now ranks as one of the moneyed men of the county. In 1867 Mr. Moore was married to Miss Honora Elkin, daughter of Elbert and Mary Elkin. Mr. Moore stands well in Carroll county and is very much esteemed by all privileged with his intimate friendship.

JAMES D. MOORE, farmer, Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Abraham and Ann (Dismukes) Moore, was born near Raleigh, N. C., in 1814. His paternal grandfather was Abraham Moore, who was a soldier in the revolutionary army. His maternal grandparents, George and Elizabeth (Thompson) Dismukes, were North Carolinians, and his grandfather Dismukes served through the revolutionary war as a major in the patriot army. Mr. Moore's father was born and reared in North Carolina, but his father and mother died, and he was left an orphan when a very small child and was reared in Pittsboro, N. C., in the home of his grandfather Dismukes. He learned but little from his books, but was taught to work, and thanks to his inborn will-power and energy has made a success. In 1834, when twenty years of age, he came to Georgia and settled in Carroll county. The following fall he located where he now lives, where for many miles around the clearings were few and far between. He came to Georgia with a horse and a pair of saddle-bags; now he has 1,800 acres of good land lying on the Chattahoochee river, on which he has one of the most productive and best improved farms in all that section, and ranks as one of the most substantial and reliable citizens, as well as one of the best farmers in Carroll county. During the war a small battle was fought on his farm, during which shot and shell flew thick and fast all about. All the windows in his house were shattered, and there remains a hole in the wall of his house where one shell, coming into a window, passed out on the opposite side. Fortunately no one about the premises was hurt. Mr. Moore has owned a ferry across the Chattahoochee river at this place from the time he first settled there. On one occasion he was getting some parties across the river who were fleeing before the Federal army, among them Mr. William Amos, when the skirmish began. Before the boat reached the opposite shore the troops reached the river and fired upon the passengers. Mr. Amos fell by his side, but he stood by them and the boat, and at the risk of his own life saved them. In 1837 Mr. Moore was married to Mrs. Caroline (nee Martin) Malone, daughter of Benjamin Martin, of Jones county, granddaughter of Mr. Lester, of the same county. Mr. and Mrs. Moore were the parents of seven children, five of whom are living: Mrs. W. A. Parks; Mrs. Robert Early; Mrs. W. W. Kelly; George W., deceased; James D., Jr.; Dr. John F., deceased, and Benjamin F. The two surviving sons, J. D. and B. F. Moore, are hardware merchants of the Moore & Handley Hardware company, Birmingham, Ala.

C. C. MORRIS, farmer, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of J. L. and Elizabeth (Almond) Morris, was born in Carroll county in 1856. His paternal grandparents, William and Hannah (Biggars) Morris, were natives of South Carolina, came to Georgia early in this century, and settled in what is now De Kalb county. He was a farmer, and, also, a Missionary Baptist minister and preached in the old log churches. He was a soldier in the revolutionary army. Mr. Morris' father was born in De Kalb county in 1826, and was a farmer. He enlisted in 1861, was a lieutenant in his company and remained in the army through the conflict. His maternal grandparents, Asbern and Jane (Biggars) Almond, were early settlers, and the grandfather was a revolutionary soldier. Mr. Morris was reared on a farm in Carroll county, and received a fair common school education. Adopting farming as a pursuit, but without means, he acquired a good farm, and is among those at the head of the list as progressive farmers, manages well, is much esteemed and is prosperous. He has a tract of more than 200 acres of choice land, productive, with good improvements. In 1882 Mr. Morris married Miss Rebecca Lovvorn, daughter of W. D. Lovvorn, an old and influential settler, who has borne him six children: Eva, Mattie, Joseph and Otto, living; and Lillian and Anna, deceased. Himself and wife are members of the Baptist church.

H. L. MORROW, farmer and miller, Whitesburg, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William H. and Nancy (Elliott) Morrow, was born in Newton county, Ga., March 15, 1823. His grandparents on his father's side, Robert and Nancy (Herly)

Morrow, were Virginians, and came to Georgia in 1795. His grandfather was a soldier in the revolutionary war. His grandparents on his mother's side, George and Mary (Cloud) Elliott, were natives of Virginia, and the grandfather was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. Mrs. Morrow's grand-uncle, Zeke Cloud, joined the patriot army when but fourteen years of age, and remained with it until independence was achieved. Mr. Morrow's father was born May 12, 1788, in what is now Morgan county, Ga., and his mother was born Dec. 12, 1790, in what is now Jasper county, Ga. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, in which he served as quartermaster. He also served as sheriff of Newton county for many years. Mr. Morrow was reared in Newton county until he was twelve years old, when the family moved to Henry county. His father died when he was only seventeen months old, and from that time until he became of age he had a hard time of it. When he first went to school it was under an old tent, then in the old-time dirt floor log school house, with puncheon seats and stick and mud chimney, etc. But such was the necessity for work to help his widowed mother that he received very little schooling—he couldn't be spared from the field. In 1863, he enlisted in Company E (Capt. Mann), Seventh Georgia regiment, was at one time acting lieutenant, and most of the time was on guard duty in and around Atlanta. Mr. Morrow was married Dec. 17, 1844, to Miss Mary A. Gilbert—born in Henry county, Ga., Nov. 15, 1826—daughter of Matthew and Tabitha (Mathews) Gilbert, North Carolinians, who came to Georgia, and settled in the woods in Henry county in 1820. Eleven children have blessed this union, of whom eight are now living: James R., born Sept. 12, 1845; Jane T., Jan. 19, 1847; Zachary T., Feb. 19, 1849; Nancy T., Dec. 3, 1850; Polly Ann, Feb. 4, 1853; William D., Jan. 30, 1855; Millard F., Dec. 25, 1856; Mary J., Dec. 24, 1859; Lizzie O., Sept. 12, 1862; Roberta L., June 7, 1865; Joe J., July 30, 1870. When he was married he had nothing but good health and habits, a robust constitution and sturdy manhood trained to labor and self-reliance. The first year after his marriage he rented land, afterward bought some land and settled on it. In 1848 he commenced milling in a small way, and as he prospered added more and improved machinery. It is, however, what is known as a "custom mill," grinding for toll, and makes meal and flour as good as the best. Mr. Morrow has a splendid mill property on a well-improved and productive 800-acre plantation, besides a pleasant residence and "home place" in Whitesburg. His success is a striking and instructive illustration of what is possible in Georgia, with industry, economy and integrity, when coupled with a determined will. Though not a millionaire in the popular sense he is wealthy, as are many thousands just like him, beyond computation. No citizen of Carroll county is more highly esteemed. Fifty years a master Mason he has exemplified its teachings in his life. Himself and wife are members of the United Congregational church.

M. E. MURPHEY, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William and Martha (Murphey) Murphey, was born in Talbot county, Ga., in 1827. His father was born in South Carolina, in 1798, came to Georgia when a young man on pack horses, and settled in the woods in Wilkes county, where he cleared a farm. A few years afterward he removed to Talbot county, and thence to Sumter county, in 1836. He was a soldier in the Indian war of that date, and lived to be seventy-six years of age. Mr. Murphey's mother was a Murphey, who first married James Willis, who died, and then she married Mr. Murphey. M. E. Murphey was reared in Sumter county and educated in the historic dirt floor log school house, split log seats and mud and dirt chimney, etc., and walked three miles, generally barefooted, to school. In 1861, he enlisted in what was known as the "Nelson Rangers," under Capt. Nelson, who was killed at Tupelo, Miss., and was succeeded by Capt. Ragland. He experienced some very hard and trying service, and was engaged in many very hot skirmishes, but although he kept in the field until the war ended, he escaped both wounds and capture. When he came out of the war all he had, he says, "was a spell of chills and fever and a horse." He first went to Coweta county and went to work on a farm with a vim, and remained there until 1883, when he moved into Carroll county, where he now owns a 600-acre well-improved farm, a beautiful home in Carrollton, and "cash in advance." Mr. Murphey was married in 1860 to Miss Sarah Kampson—born in South Carolina—daughter of Peter and Mary (Long) Kampson, natives of South Carolina who came to Georgia from that state in 1844. This union has been blessed with six children: Peter, Beulah, Jeffy, Katie, William J. and Lizzie. Mrs. Murphey, who was a member of the Lutheran church, died in 1892.

B. J. M'CAIN, merchant, Temple, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William B. and Margaret N. (McCain) McCain, was born in Troup county in 1843. His grandparent, Hugh McCain, was a native of North Carolina and was a soldier in the revolutionary war. His parents were born in North Carolina, came to Georgia and settled in Troup county in 1840, where his father cleared a farm and built for himself two mills, merchant and saw mill. His maternal grandparents, Joe and Margaret (Moore) McCain, were also born in North Carolina. Mr. McCain was reared on the farm and his early education was obtained at a country school. In 1863 he enlisted in Company F (Capt. B. F. Long), cavalry, with which he served six months. He then enlisted in Company F (Capt. George Austin), Georgia State troops, with which he remained until the close of the war, and of which he was a corporal. He was in two battles, both fought at Coosahatchie, and at the surrender he stacked arms at Albany, Ga. After the war he returned to the farm, but in 1868 he attended school in Carrollton. The next year he worked on the farm, and the one following he attended a private school four months. In 1871 he finished his preparatory commercial education by attending Moore's business university at Atlanta. In August, 1872, he engaged as a clerk with J. C. Carter, with whom he remained four years. After that he entered into partnership with Gus Smythe, but at the end of fifteen months he sold out to his partner and formed a new partnership with L. P. Barnes. Twelve months after he retired from this business, and with George and John McGahee and I. Y. Sawtell organized the Atlanta Wild Land company. He remained in this company ten months, and then, in the fall of 1878, located in Simsville, Ga., and engaged in a general merchandise business in which he was satisfactorily successful. In 1882 he closed out in Simsville and permanently settled in Temple, where he is now, and where he has built a large and profitable trade, and is a leading business man and citizen of that part of the county. In 1875 Mr. McCain was married to Miss Tallulah V., daughter of Maj. D. A. and Nancy W. (Collier) Cook, of Atlanta, by whom he has one child surviving, Ida Tallulah. They have an adopted son, William B. Mr. McCain is a master Mason and he and his family are members of the Methodist church. He exerts a well-earned influence in the community and county.

G. A. M'DANIEL, farmer and miller, Victory, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John and Sarah I. (Terry) McDaniel, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in 1820. His grandparents, Henry and Mary (Rucker) McDaniel, were natives of Virginia, whence they migrated to South Carolina. They afterward came to Georgia, but in a few years returned to South Carolina, where they died. Mr. McDaniel's father was born in Virginia in 1781, came to Georgia in 1810, and settled in Elbert county, where he remained until 1822, when he moved to Henry (now De Kalb) county. The only property he had was a horse, that ran away, and he had to make his crop with a grubbing hoe. He walked to South Carolina to get another horse. He lived in a tent until he could build a log cabin (dirt floor), had to go twenty miles to mill, and lived principally on corn pone and wild game. His mother was the daughter of Henry and Mary (Baldwin) Terry, native South Carolinians. Her father was a Methodist Episcopal minister and devoted his life to church work. Mr. McDaniel was reared in De Kalb county, and educated at schools taught in the old-time dirt-floor log house. About 1847 he went to Atlanta, but staid there but a short time. He then went to Spalding county, where he remained until 1854, when he removed to Bowdon, where he farmed until the war began, then he engaged in merchandising, and continued it for twenty years. He then moved to the farm where he now lives, on which he had years before built a mill. Beginning without anything, he now owns 2,000 acres of excellent land, including one of the best improved farms in the county and a mill site, and is one of the richest men in Carroll. Mr. McDaniel was married Dec. 25, 1850, in Spalding county, to Miss Martha J. Lavender—born in Henry county—daughter of James and Malinda (Ansley) Lavender, native Georgians. This union has been blessed with ten children: Sarah A., Mary M., deceased; Eliza A., Ella J., John L., Martha J., Ida B., T. Henry, Lula B. and Emma B. Mr. and Mrs. McDaniel are members of the Methodist Protestant church and he is regarded as one of Carroll's very best and worthiest citizens.

JOHAN C. M'GARITY, farmer, Victory, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Jones and Mary (Embry) McGarity, was born near Atlanta in 1848. His paternal grandfather was a native of Ireland and came to America before the revolutionary war and was a soldier in the army. His grandfather, Abner McGarity, was a native of South Carolina and came to Georgia in an ox cart and settled in the woods in Elbert county in 1795 and cleared a farm. Here Mr. McGarity's father was born and reared on a farm. Starting out in life for himself, he came to De Kalb county, where he lived until 1848, when he removed to Carroll county, settled in the woods, and cleared a farm, where Mr. McGarity now lives. Mr. McGarity's mother was a daughter of John Embry, and his mother was a distant relative of Thomas Jefferson. Mr. McGarity was reared on the farm and was educated at the common county school. When the war began he was too young to enter the army, but he served a short time before the war closed. He supplemented his farm work by teaching school, and taught from 1871 to 1892. In the meantime he was elected justice of the peace, and served eight years. In 1892 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly. Mr. McGarity was married in 1875 to Miss Martha J. Darden—born and reared in Coweta county—daughter of Elzie and Susan (Upshaw) Darden. Her father was a soldier in the Confederate army. This union has been blessed with six children: Pearl, Ruth, David, John, Joseph and Katie. Mr. and Mrs. McGarity are members of the Baptist church. Mr. McGarity is an acknowledged leader in Carroll county and no citizen commands more respect.

WILEY NIXON, farmer, Mandeville, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Joe and Martha (Ward) Nixon, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Sept. 15, 1816. His father was born in what is now Wilkes county, Ga., about 1775. (This territory was acquired from the Indians in 1773 and Wilkes county was laid out in 1777.) He was bound out when a boy and learned the carpenter's trade; when older engaged in farming also, and was a soldier in the war of 1812. He moved to Coweta county in 1830, settled in the woods and lived in a dirt floor log cabin. Mr. Nixon's maternal grandparents, Sam and Eda (Hudson) Ward, were among the early settlers of that part of Georgia. Mr. Nixon grew to manhood on the farm and attended school at the historic log school-house. The first house he lived in the boards were fastened on with wooden pins. He came to Coweta county with his father and lived in that county until 1874, when he moved and settled on a partly-cleared farm in Carroll county, afterward clearing what he wanted. He began life very poor, has worked hard on the farm all his life, and although not rich he has a competency and is rich in the possession of sincere friends, and the consciousness of a well-spent life. He owns 600 acres of good land, a farm well-improved and a good home in which to spend his declining years. Mr. Nixon was married to Miss Elizabeth Fullenlove (born in Coweta county), daughter of Lud and Als (Freeman) Fullenlove. To them nine children have been born: Weldin I., J. Page, Fannie, Rebecca, Meda, Ludwell, Nanna, William and Ada. Mr. Nixon has been a member of the masonic fraternity more than forty years, and is regarded as one of the most substantial, and is among the most respected of the county's citizens.

WILLIAM T. OGLETREE, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Absalom and Matilda (Stewart) Ogletree, was born in Monroe county, Ga., in 1834. His paternal grandparents were William and Martha (Bird) Ogletree. His grandfather was born in Virginia in 1764, and came to Georgia and settled in Wilkes county about 1784, and was married in 1785. When he came to the county it was a wooded wilderness, and he suffered all the trials, hardships and privations incident to pioneer life. He was the Daniel Boone of Wilkes county. Mr. Ogletree's father was born in Wilkes county in 1811, where he was reared on a farm, but at the age of twenty he entered the ministry and continued in it through life. His mother was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., and was the daughter of Thomas and Nancy (Russell) Stewart, early settlers of the county. Her father was a farmer and lived to a good old age. Mr. Ogletree's mother, eighty years old, is still living. Mr. Ogletree was reared on the farm in Oglethorpe county and received a good common-school education in Monroe county, Ga. After receiving his education he taught school awhile. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F. (Capt. D. J. Bailey, afterward Capt. Andrews, Capt. Bailey having been elected colonel), Thirtieth Georgia regiment, which was assigned to Gen. Mercer's command. He participated in some of the most hotly-contested battles of the conflict. Among them: Jackson, Miss., and Chickamauga, where his brigade opened the fight; Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, Resaca, New Hope church and in nearly every engagement from Resaca to Atlanta. He was wounded at Peachtree creek, Atlanta, which compelled him to retire for two months. On his recovery he hastened to rejoin his command, with which he remained until Dec. 16, 1864, when he was captured at Nashville and sent to Johnson's island and held until the close of the war. On his release he came to Spalding county, Ga., where he remained until 1881, when he removed to Carroll county and settled where he now lives. He had to begin anew after the war, and in the battle of life has been as courageous and true as he was on the tented field, and has done well. Mr. Ogletree was married in 1859 to Miss Cordelia Colbert (born in Spalding county), daughter of Albert G. Colbert, descendant from the early emigrants from Ireland to this country. One child only, Wilbur S., has blessed this union. Mr. Ogletree is a member of the Christian church, and his wife is a member of the Methodist church. While living in Spalding county before the war he served as a justice of the peace. Mr. Ogletree is one of Carroll's most substantial, as well as one of its most highly esteemed citizens, to whom his neighbors are attached because of his kindly nature.

HENRY G. PARKER, farmer, Mandeville, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John and Margaret (Byrum) Parker, was born in Pike county, Ga., in 1841. His paternal grandfather, Enoch Parker, came from North Carolina to Georgia in 1795, and settled in the woods in Lincoln county, where his father was born in 1800. His maternal grandfather, Beverly Byrum, was a native of North Carolina, came from there to Georgia in an ox-cart early in this century, and cleared himself a farm and a home in the virgin forest. Mr. Parker was reared in Pike county, worked on the farm, and went to school only four days. In 1862, he enlisted in Company H (Capt. Redman), Forty-fourth Georgia regiment, and remained in the service until May, 1863. He was in two hard fought battles—Gainesville and Sharpsburg, in which last his company had twenty-six killed. He lost his right leg, and being thereby disabled for further service, came home. He went to Coweta county and lived there and farmed until 1875, when he removed to Carroll county and bought a nice 300-acre farm, which he has paid for and so improved as to make him a comfortable home. He came out of the war a very poor and a disabled man, yet has secured a good home by his own industry and economy, and reared a not small family of children. Mr. Parker was married in 1868 to Miss Sarah Cannon—born in Pike county—daughter of George and Mary (Elliott) Cannon, who were among the early settlers of Pike county. This union has been blessed with eight children: Jennie, Mary, Henry S., George, Lizzie, Ella, Harriet and Leila. Mrs. Parker is a member of the Protestant Methodist church, and Mr. Parker is worthily held in esteem by the community in which he lives.

WILLIAM H. MALONE, merchant, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of J. D. and Mary (Hale) Malone, was born in Atlanta, Ga., in 1858. His paternal grandparents were Jones and Lucy (Dumas) Malone, his grandmother Dumas being a Huguenot refugee. Mr. Malone's father was born in Union district, S. C., in 1811. He was educated at the Presbyterian college at Marysville, Tenn., and came to Georgia and settled in Atlanta in 1852. He engaged in merchandizing and continued in business until Gen. Sherman entered the city in 1864. He was then sent a prisoner to Cambridge City, Ind., where he remained until after the surrender, when he came back to a farm he had in Cobb county, Ga. Soon after that he re-entered business in Atlanta, but in 1869 he had the misfortune to be burned out, and returned to his farm. Subsequently he went to Villa Rica, where he died in 1887. He was a local preacher in the Methodist church, an active worker and a liberal contributor to all movements having in view the advancement of the church and the progress and upbuilding of the city. It was a genuine pleasure to him to be helpful to others, especially the poor, and many are the deeds, agreements and wills on record in Fulton county written by him. A true man and a sincere Christian, he lived beloved and died regretted.

On his mother's side Mr. W. H. Malone traces his ancestry far back and through prominent family lines. The great-great-grandfather, George Hale, came from England to America with Lord Baltimore. George, a descendant of his, was a soldier during the revolutionary war, and married a Miss Nancy Grant, who was a Scotch refugee. Alexander Hale, their son and Mrs. Malone's grandfather, was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1768, and some time not long afterward his parents migrated direct to territory since erected into the state of Tennessee, and settled in what is now Blount county. John B. Hale, Mrs. Malone's father, son of Alexander and Sarah (Billingslea) Hale, was born in Washington county.

Tenn., and married Miss Jane McClung, daughter of William and Euphemia (Cunningham) McClung. The families of her parents were early settlers, and prominent in Savannah, Ga., in social and commercial circles. Early in the history of Tennessee her parents moved to that state, and the house they lived in is still standing. Hon. J. C. Hale, Mrs. Malone's brother, is an ex-state senator of Tennessee, and now holds a very important position under the government at Washington. Mr. Malone was reared in Atlanta, where he received a good education, and afterward took an eclectic course at the university of Georgia. At the age of eighteen he began teaching, and taught as many as six different schools in different places. A part of the time he taught in Forsyth county, where he read law and was admitted to the bar and practiced four years. He taught school in Villa Rica three years. When his father died, 1887, he abandoned all other pursuits and assumed control of his estate, in the management of which he has been pre-eminently successful, and has become the leading merchant and citizen of that part of the county. He took great interest in the establishment of a high grade school in Villa Rica and was instrumental in the accomplishment of the object. He was elected president of the board of directors, and occupies that position to-day. Every movement inaugurated for advancing the interests of Villa Rica has had his support and substantial aid, and he contributes liberally to all church and moral enterprises. In 1894 he reluctantly consented to become a candidate for the general assembly, and received 975 out of about 1,200 votes, although for competitors he had two of the best citizens of the county. As he lives in an extreme corner of the county the result is a very significant compliment. Mr. Malone was married in 1884 to Miss Mary A. Knox, born and reared in Forsyth county, Ga., daughter of Dr. J. R. and Martha (McAfee) Knox. Her parents on both sides are among the best known and most influential families in Cherokee county, Ga. To this happy union three children have been born: Robert K., William H., and Ralph G. Mr. and Mrs. Malone are active and prominent members of the Methodist church, and Mr. Malone is a member of the masonic fraternity. In view of his age and what he has already attained to in general popularity, in his standing in the commercial world and in the political field, it is safe to predict for him wealth, influence and political honors—prosperity and usefulness.

F. F. PRITCHETT, merchant, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Robert and Anna Eliza (Alexander) Pritchett, was born in Virginia in 1849. His grandfather, Joshua Pritchett, was of French descent, born in Virginia, and of considerable local influence. His father was a native of Virginia and a manufacturer of tobacco, a business which he followed with success and profit until 1856, when he came to Georgia and settled on a farm, where he remained until he died. His maternal grandparents, Frank and Nancy (Bell) Alexander, were natives of Newton, S. C., whence they went to Mobile. There he engaged in business, and was also agent for the bay boats many years. Subsequently he was appointed to a position in the custom house which he held until he was seventy-five years old, when he retired and located on the bay, finishing his days there. He lived in Mobile and on the bay about fifty years, and bought his land from the French. Mr. Pritchett was reared mostly in Georgia, and received but a limited education. He was too young to enter the army during the war, but he served in what was known as the home guard. He went into business in Villa Rica and soon, by assiduous attention and energy, established a large and profitable trade. In 1882 he built one of the largest and best business houses in the little city, and in 1888 formed a partnership with W. H. and G. B. Malone, and has established the best paying business of any person or firm in that part of the state. Mr. Pritchett is a thoroughbred, thorough-going business man of the strictest integrity, possessing the unusual confidence of the people; while Mr. Malone is a young man of irreproachable character and remarkable business and financial ability. Mr. Pritchett was married in 1881 to Miss Lucy J. Malone, born and reared in Carroll county, daughter of Jerry D. and Mary (Hale) Malone, by whom he has had four children: Karl, Robert H., Florence, and Mary E. Mr. and Mrs. Pritchett are active members of the Presbyterian church.

HENRY W. REID, farmer, Mandeville, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Robert and Lucinda (Chandler) Reid, was born in Carroll county in 1841. His paternal grandfather, Henry Reid, was a native of South Carolina, and migrated to Georgia about 1820. His father was born in South Carolina in 1806, and came with his parents to Georgia. They settled in Gwinnett county, and he remained with them until he was eighteen years of age, when he went to Franklin county, Ga. Subsequently he removed to Carroll county, settled in the woods and made his log cabin home where the subject of this sketch now lives. He was a soldier in the Florida Indian war. Mr. Reid's maternal grandparents, Wyatt and Mary B. (Liner) Chandler, were natives of North Carolina. Mr. Chandler was a soldier in the war of 1812, removed to Georgia and settled in the woods in Carroll county early in its history, his nearest neighbors being seven miles away. Mr. Reid was reared on the farm where he now lives, and was educated at the common schools of the county. In 1862 he enlisted in Company H (Capt. Parrish), Fifty-sixth Georgia regiment, but he remained only a short time—as his father was taken seriously sick, and he, being the only child, came home and remained with him until his recovery—sending a substitute to take his place in the army. In 1863 he enlisted in a state battalion, in which he served six months, and then re-entered the regular service, enlisting in Company E, Capt. Shuford, First Georgia cavalry, and served until the surrender. He joined the army at Resaca, under Gen. Johnston, and saw much very hard service between there and Atlanta. On one occasion a comrade near him was shot through the head and some of the blood and brains flew on him, leaving stains which remained until the clothing was worn out. A wife and two children and an old cavalry horse were the sum total of his possessions at the close of the war. But with a light heart and a strong will he went to work to regain lost ground, and now he has a well-improved farm of 500 acres and a comfortable home. Mr. Reid was married Dec. 20, 1860, to Miss Nancy C.—born in Meriwether county, Ga.—daughter of James G. and Sisley (Hammock) Davenport. Mr. and Mrs. Reid have had thirteen children born to them, of whom James R., Charles J., Henry M., Martha F., Sallie A., John T., Nancy I., George W., Amanda, Elijah, and Irene J. are living, and Lucinda and William R. are dead. Husband and wife are members of the Primitive Baptist church, and no citizens of the county are more highly esteemed than they.

ALBERT C. ROBINSON, merchant and farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John W. and Mary M. (Burrow) Robinson, was born in 1856. His grandfather, John Robinson, was a native of Virginia, whence he removed to North Carolina, and subsequently to Georgia and settled in the woods in Carroll county, near where the subject of this sketch now lives. Mr. Robinson's father was born in North Carolina in 1827 and came with his parents to Georgia when a small boy. His mother was a daughter of William and Eliza (Bradbury) Burrow, who were among the earliest settlers in that part of the state. His father enlisted in 1861 and remained in the service until the surrender. Mr. Robinson was reared on the farm and in consequence of the war, which was at its fiercest when he was of school age, his education was limited. But he was endowed with pluck and perseverance, and enterprise and energy, and was also possessed of a thorough-going disposition, which have told wonderfully on his prosperity. He first began business at Shiloh, but last year he removed his business to his farm near that place. When he was married he was not worth a dollar; now he has a fine, large farm, and is doing a large and increasing mercantile business. Mr. Robinson was married in 1879 to Miss Mary M. Arthur, daughter of Kabus and Ann (Barnes) Arthur, who were among the earliest settlers of Marion county, Ga. Mr. Arthur lost his life during the late war. Seven children have blessed this union: Emory C., William M., Zella V., Luther L., Verdie E., Lizzie M. and Minnie Pearl. Mr. and Mrs. Robinson are members of the M. E. church. He is one of the rising young men of Carroll county with a bright future.

MARTIN ROOP, deceased, one of the earliest settlers, and when living, a very prominent citizen of Carroll county, was the son of John and Phoebe (Pilcher) Roop, native South Carolinians, and was born in South Carolina in 1810. He attended and received his education at the old field school. In 1845 he migrated from South Carolina to Georgia (nine days on the road by wagon) and settled in Jackson county. At the end of a year he bought a piece of cleared land, on which he lived four years, and then removed to Coweta county, and cleared a part of the tract for a farm. When he made this change his wife rode nearly all the way on horseback. After remaining here four years he removed to Carroll county and settled where the flourishing town of Roopville, named in honor of his son, John K. Roop, now stands. There was not a stick amiss. To many it will sound odd to relate that when Mr. Roop settled in Carroll county, his family made use of the now unknown (and almost forgotten) pewter dishes, and that Mrs. Roop carded, spun and wove the cotton and wool into cloth, and then made the clothing for the family. During the war all the time that could be spared from household duties she employed in providing socks and clothing for the soldiers. Mr. Roop himself was exempt by law from going into the army. Mr. Roop was married in 1839 to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Abraham and Lucy (Bradford) King, South Carolinians, by whom he had ten children: John K., William W., Robert H., Benjamin J., Thomas M., Henry O., James G., Sarah Elizabeth, Savannah and George W. Mr. Roop was made a master Mason during the war and himself and wife were members of the Missionary Baptist church. The family have been, and is yet, one of prominence and influence, and enjoy the confidence and esteem of the people.

JOHN K. ROOP, leading merchant, Roopville, Carroll Co., Ga., was born in Union district, South Carolina, Oct. 20, 1839. He was reared on a farm, and what schooling he had was obtained at the common country schools of that period. When grown he taught school some himself. In 1861, when the civil war reached the fighting point, he enlisted for six months in Company D (Capt. J. R. Thomason), First Georgia regiment, and at the end of that time he enlisted in a cavalry company in Phillips' Legion, and remained in the service until the surrender. While in the service he did a great deal of scouting, notwithstanding which he participated in many of the hardest-fought battles of the war, among them: Sharpsburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Culpeper courthouse, Mine Run, etc. He was also a considerable time with Gen. Wade Hampton. As was the case with many thousands he came out of the war without anything but its sad experience, and entered upon the work of reconstruction in Carroll county. In 1880 he opened a store, building the first house on the spot; established a mill in 1874 and has succeeded in securing a large and profitable trade. Population increased, and a post-office being wanted one was established in 1881 and named "Roopville," for the founder of the embryo town. He served as justice of the peace at Roopville for eight years, and when the board of county commissioners was organized in 1886 he was elected a member and continued in office six years, until 1892. He has been solicited to become a candidate for the general assembly, but has always refused, as he craved no political honors. Mr. Roop was married in 1872 to Miss Eliza Moore (born in Henry county), daughter of W. H. and Sarah (Barnes) Moore, natives of Georgia. Her grandfather, Joshua Moore, was an early settler in Henry county. Mr. and Mrs. Roop have had born to them five children: Nora L., wife of Dr. B. J. Veal; Henry A., Charles C., Bessie and Fannie. Mr. Roop was a prominent member of the Farmers' alliance and president of the Carroll county organization. He is a master Mason, and has been worshipful master of his lodge many years. He and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church. Beginning with nothing at the close of the war, he has become the leading merchant in his part of the county; has acquired some two thousand acres of fine land, and is recognized as one of the most influential citizens of Carroll county.

GEORGE W. ROOP, merchant, Roopville, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Martin and Elizabeth Roop, was born on a farm where Roopville now stands, Sept. 25, 1858. He was educated at the common country schools, and after completing his education, he in 1880 engaged in a general merchandise business in Carrollton with profitable results. Two years later he went "down the river," where he remained two years, still prospering and then returned to his old home, Roopville, where he is in business to-day. He started on $200 given him by his father, which he has used with such superior judgment as to place him on the high road to fortune. He has now a large store-house and stock, a large and profitable trade and a fine home, his store and dwelling, the result of his own supervision and contributed labor. He stands high as a business man of capacity and integrity, and takes a great interest in all movements promotive of the advancement of his community, to which he gives liberal financial encouragement. Mr. Roop was married in 1880 to Miss Eliza Almon (born in Heard county, Ga.), daughter of Zachariah and Antoinette (Babb) Almon, by whom he has four children: Major C., Quanah Parker, William and Addie. Mr. and Mrs. Roop are members of the Baptist church, and Mr. Roop is a master Mason.

MOSES R. RUSSELL, superintendent of county schools, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Harris and Leah (Steed) Russell, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in 1835. His grandparents, Gabriel and Patsey (Bell) Russell, planters, were born and lived and died in North Carolina. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and died at the age of sixty-six years. His wife lived to be ninety-two years of age. Mr. Russell's parents were born in North Carolina, migrated to Georgia in a wagon in 1833, and settled in the woods in Coweta county; occupied a dirt floor log cabin which a brother who had come to Georgia built for them a year or two before. Mr. Russell's mother was the daughter of Sarah (Harris) Steed, born in North Carolina, whose ancestors were among the pioneers of that state. Mr. Russell was reared on the plantation and was educated in a dirt floor log cabin school-house, with its big fire-place and dirt and stick chimney, and its square holes cut through the logs to let the light in. He rather gleefully relates the following incident of his boyhood days: When fourteen years old a brother was married. Until then he had worn only the "regulation" copperas-colored clothes, but his mother, wishing him to make as impressive an appearance as possible on so important an occasion, bought some blue cottonade goods costing about seventy-five cents, and made him a suit which excited the admiration of the girls and the envy of his boy schoolmates. When eighteen years of age he left home and went to Alabama, where he remained for twelve years, then returned to Georgia and settled in Carroll county on the farm where he now lives. He taught school several years and then merchandised at Lineville, Ala., about two years, after which he engaged in farming. In 1862 he enlisted in Company D, Capt. Hester, Seventeenth Alabama regiment, Col. Johnson, and was stationed at Mobile about eighteen months. Becoming disabled by sickness he returned home and sent a substitute. But in 1864 he enlisted in Company B, De Armand's battalion, with which he remained and helped to fire the last cannon of the war at Silver run, Talladega county, Ala., eight days after Gen. Lee's surrender, which killed thirteen Yankees. The Yankees afterward captured the gun and brought it to Georgia, and within a quarter of a mile of where Mr. Russell now lives they loaded it, then piled rails on it, which they set fire to, and when the cannon exploded it shot over the house in which he lives. He has been superintendent of county schools ten years, a member of the board of education seventeen years, of which he was president five years, and has been county commissioner eleven years; he has been on the executive committee of the State Agricultural society thirteen years, and one of the managers of the state fairs six years. In 1857 Mr. Russell was married to Miss Fannie Bell (born in Coweta county), daughter of Sylvanus and Betsey (Stripe) Bell. Her parents were descendants of some of the first Scotch emigrants to North Carolina. Six children were the offspring of this union: Elizabeth, George B., Josephine, Robert L., Marvin E. and Katie. This wife, who was a devout member of the Methodist church, died April 23, 1873. Mr. Russell celebrated his second marriage, with Miss Elizabeth L. Brown, Oct. 7, 1873. Her parents, Franklin and Agnes (Stripe) Brown, were natives of North Carolina, but she was born in Coweta county. By this marriage he had seven children born to him: James H., Lula, Annie, Buena Vista, Frank, Hugh B. and Grover C. Mr. Russell is a member of the I. O. O. F. and in Masonry a royal and select master. Himself and wife are active and influential members of the Methodist church. The many important and responsible county and state agriculture offices Mr. Russell holds show in what estimation his fellow-citizens hold him, while in local social standing himself and family rank among the highest.

F. FRANK SIKES, farmer, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Darling and Sarah (Cochran) Sikes, was born in Baker county, Ga., in 1853. His parents were born in North Carolina, and migrated by wagon and on horseback to Georgia and settled in the woods in Baker county in 1851. There he had cleared a farm and had just got well settled when the "unpleasantness" was precipitated. In 1861 he enlisted in Capt. Kendricks' company, Fifty-first Georgia regiment, and was in the service nearly four years, and most of the time was "one of Stonewall Jackson's men," and was in the battle and under the command of that distinguished officer when he was killed. Mr. Sikes was a sharpshooter, and was killed at the battle of the Wilderness. He was always a farmer, and was a consistent member of the Baptist church. His mother was a daughter of Eli and Mary (Griffin) Cochran, also Carolinians, who came to Georgia and settled in Baker county about the time Mr. Sikes' family came. They, also, were members of the Baptist church. Mr. Sikes was reared in Baker county, received but little education, came to Carroll county when only sixteen years of age, and settled where he now lives. He had nothing but good health, pluck and self-reliance to start with, but was a live, wide-awake farmer, worked hard, and lived and managed closely, and now has a large enough farm, well improved, a two-story dwelling, and a good substantial barn and out-buildings. Mr. Sikes was married in 1875 to Miss Virginia Green—born and reared in Carroll county—daughter of Alexander and Eliza (Chappel) Green, by whom he has had three children: Walter C., Anna B., and Lois G. Mr. and Mrs. Sikes are members of the Missionary Baptist church, and enjoy in the highest degree the respect and esteem of their friends and neighbors.

ABNER A. SIMONTON, miller and cotton gin operator, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Albert and Mary (Reed) Simonton, was born in Alabama in 1849. His paternal grandparents, Abner and Nancy (Bailey) Simonton, were of Scotch-Irish ancestry and came to America before the revolutionary war. They first settled in Virginia, then moved to North Carolina, and finally, in 1805, came to Georgia in ox carts, and settled in the woods in Greene county—encountering and suffering all the dangers incident to pioneer life. His maternal grandparents, James and Rebecca (Duke) Reed, were also early settlers. Mr. Reed was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Simonton's father was born in Greene county in 1809, and died in 1859. Mr. Simonton was partly educated in the "old field" log school house, common in that day, with its dirt floor, slab seats, great fireplace in a chimney built of sticks and stiff mud, and square holes cut through the sides to let in the light. He began life after the war without a dollar, but full of energy and enterprise, and went to work to make a living and a competency. In 1873 he had the courage to go heavily in debt for an outfit for a corn mill, cotton gin and saw mill. To the corn mill machinery were added mills for making flour. His energy and determination were exemplified by his working in his mills, sawing lumber, grinding and ginning, oftentimes far into the night. His financially independent circumstances to-day amply attest his success. Besides his beautiful home in the outskirts of Carrollton, surrounded by a fine tract of land, he has a large plantation on the river, with fine water power, where his mills are located. More than sixty years ago this power was utilized. In September, 1830, corn mill machinery was put in operation here, and ground corn for the Indians; and in 1848 machinery for grinding wheat was added. With the ravages of war these went down, but the energy and progressive spirit of Mr. Simonton have replaced them—the machinery improved and increased. In 1887 he had the misfortune to have his dwelling, tenement houses and out-houses—all except his mills, miller's house and smithy—destroyed by a cyclone, but they have all been restored, and he now rejoices in being in better condition than ever before, and proudly contemplates and enjoys the reward of his enterprise and labor. Mr. Simonton was married in 1878 to Miss Margaret Johnston, born in Catoosa county, Ga., in 1850, daughter of William H. and Susan (Adams) Johnston, who came to Georgia from North Carolina. Five children have blessed this union: Cora M., Susan R., Albert A., Margaret E., and William J. Mr. Johnston, Mrs. Simonton's father, came to Catoosa county in October, 1846, as a pioneer Presbyterian minister, having consecrated himself to the Master's cause. Mr. Simonton is a master Mason and himself and wife are members of the Presbyterian church.

B. A. SHARP, cotton broker and guano dealer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Andrew and Martha (Elliott) Sharp, was born in Alabama in 1840. His father, son of John Sharp, was born in the emerald isle, and came to the United States in 1818. He stopped in South Carolina a short time, and then, when about fifteen years of age, came to Georgia in an old-fashioned block-wheel cart, in which he afterward made many trips to South Carolina and back. He came as a teacher and followed that calling for many years. Mr. Sharp's mother, born in South Carolina, was a daughter of John Elliott, a soldier in the war of 1812, came from South Carolina to Georgia about 1835, lived in that state a few years, and then moved to Alabama, where her parents passed their lives. Mr. Sharp was reared on a farm in Alabama, and was educated in the historic log cabin school house. Thus equipped, he "opened school" himself, and was making a satisfactory record when the civil war broke out and he enlisted in 1861 in Company K (Capt. E. B. Smith), Thirteenth Alabama regiment (Maj. Marks, Col. B. D. Fry), which was assigned to the command of Gen. Raines. Among other engagements, he participated in the following important battles: Williamsburg, Seven Pines, and Richmond, and others in northern Virginia, was at Appomattox at the surrender, and walked all the way from there to Washington, Ga. He now began life in earnest, without a dollar, farming on shares. He was industrious, saving, successful, and now has a choice 365-acre farm in the county, and an interest in forty acres close to—partly inside—the corporate limits of Carrollton. He is engaged also in buying cotton and selling guano. He served four years satisfactorily as county commissioner. Mr. Sharp was married in Alabama in 1866 to Aphra A., daughter of Asa W. and Eliza Roundtree. To them four children have been born: Emmett A., Belle, Leila, and Bertram. Mr. Sharp is a member of the Farmers' alliance, a Knight of Honor, a member of the I. O. O. F., and a Royal Arch Mason. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church. No citizen is more esteemed than he for business capacity and integrity, and no family enjoys a more enviable social position than his.

EDWIN R. SHARPE, editor and proprietor of the "Free Press," Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of William O. and Susannah (Harrell) Sharpe, was born in Chambers county, Ala., in 1841. His great-grandfather on his father's side, Rev. Thomas Reese, was a noted Presbyterian clergyman, and one of the signers of the Mecklenburg declaration. His paternal grandparents, Elam and Elizabeth (Miller) Sharpe, were natives of North Carolina, but moved to Pendleton, S. C., at an early age, where they lived and died. His father was born in South Carolina in 1819, and lived, in boyhood, in the same town with the great South Carolina statesman, Calhoun. When about seventeen years of age he left his South Carolina home and went to West Point, Ga., in Troup county, where he engaged as a clerk in a store, and later went into business with Dr. J. A. Cherry, in which he remained several years. After his marriage, his wife's father having given him a fine tract, 600 acres, of land in "Miller's Bend," he engaged in farming. He was an enthusiastic and active politician, but would never accept an office. His great-grandfather on his mother's side, Miller, was born in Wales, was exiled on account of some publication in London, and came to South Carolina and published the first newspaper issued in the state, the "Pendleton Messenger." Mr. Sharpe's maternal grandparents were Samuel and Susannah (Heath) Harrell, he being a native North Carolinian. Mr. Sharpe was reared in Chambers county, Ala., and received his early education in the common schools of the day. He then went to a college in Tennessee, to prepare for entering the state university of Virginia, but in about a year the war began, and he quit college and joined the state troops. Soon after he enlisted in the Fourth Georgia regiment, Gen. Dole's brigade, and served through the war, a long time as sergeant. He was in many hotly contested, fiercely fought battles, and was severely wounded in the battle of the Wilderness on the skirmish line at Charlestown, W. Va., each time in the leg, the last time receiving three separate wounds, and was temporarily disabled for active service. After the war he went to West Point, Ga., where he taught school three years, when he and Judge Longley began the publication of the West Point "Shield," and continued it until 1871. Mr. Sharpe then came to Carrollton, where he established the "Carroll County Times," and published it until 1882, when he sold it. He then went to Texas, but soon returned, and in 1883 established the "Free Press," which he has continued to publish with financial success. In addition to the paper he has profitably conducted a farming interest. In 1888 he was elected to represent his senatorial district in the general assembly, and in 1890 he was elected to represent the county in the same body. That he served his constituency faithfully and well is evidenced by his election in 1894 to represent his senatorial district again. In 1868 Mr. Sharpe was married to Miss Annie E., daughter of H. H. and Eliza Greene, an old Georgia family of Greene county, said to be related to Gen. Nathaniel Greene. To them eight children have been born: Edwin, Annie, Robert L., Hamilton H., Lucy E., William O., Elam H., and Marcus L. He is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Presbyterian church, in which he has been an elder since he was twenty-six years of age. He is progressive, "a man of affairs," and deservedly popular and influential.

WILLIAM M. SPENCE, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Hiram and Angeline (Cheney) Spence, was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1845. His paternal grandparents, George and Mary (Knight) Spence, were born in Maryland, came to Georgia in ox-carts in 1798 and settled in the woods in what is now Morgan county. He was a delegate to the secession convention, served many years as a justice of the peace and lived to be a very old man. Mr. Spence's parents were born in Morgan county, his father in 1821, and removed to Carroll county in 1847, settling in the woods and clearing for a farm the place where Mr. Spence now lives. He was a justice of the peace many years. During the war he served in the state militia and participated in the defense of Atlanta. Both parents were members of the Primitive Baptist church and were much esteemed by their neighbors. The parents of his mother, Thomas and Lucy Cheney, were born in Maryland and came to Georgia in 1798. They ranked among the best people in every respect. Mr. Spence was reared on the farm where he now lives, and taught by his mother, he learned his A B C's out of the old family bible. Then he attended school in a log cabin in the woods, with dirt floor, seats made of slabs and the chimney of sticks and mud, with square holes cut through the sides for windows. In March, 1864, he enlisted in Company K, Second Georgia regiment, known as state line troops, and after the Confederate army entered Georgia, served under Gens. Johnston and Hood. After the war he resumed farming, at which he has prospered and placed himself in comfortable circumstances. Mr. Spence was married in 1868 to Miss Delphia McPhearson (born in Carroll county), daughter of Elijah and Sarah McPhearson, who migrated from Tennessee to Georgia and were among the early settlers of the county. To him nine children have been born: Leon, Ella, Ida, Cora, William, Newton, Albert, Mary and Ivey. Mr. Spence is regarded as one of the county's most substantial and reliable citizens, and is highly respected by all who know him. Mrs. Spence is a member of the Primitive Baptist church.

HENRY H. STRICKLAND, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John M. and Sarah (Knight) Strickland, was born in Coweta county in 1842. His father was born in Butts county, Ga., in 1811, and his mother was a daughter of John Knight. Mr. Strickland was reared on the farm and received a good common-school education. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B (Capt., afterward Col. Ector) Thirteenth Georgia regiment, and was first in Gen. Lawton's brigade, then in Gen. J. B. Gordon's and lastly in Gen. Clement A. Evans'. He was with Gen. Evans when the following incident occurred: Gen. Evans received an order from Gen. Lee to assault and capture a certain position, but afterward, believing it too hazardous, Gen. Lee countermanded the order. When Gen. Evans received the first order he made the assault and received the counter order in the captured position. Mr. Strickland was in the battles at Cotton hill, Martinsburg, Winchester, Cedar run, the seven days' fight, Spottsylvania court house, Sharpsburg and second Manassas, and in innumerable skirmishes in the valley, at one thirty days of almost continuous fighting. He was wounded three times—at Sharpsburg, Cedar run and second Manassas—one wound disabling him for nearly three months, but he escaped capture. After the war he attended Bowdon college two years and a half, afterward taught school three years and then engaged in farming, at which he has prospered, owns a fine landed estate, including a farm and property in Bowdon. Mr. Strickland was married in 1871 to Miss Mary E. Camp, born in Coweta county, daughter of G. W. and Mary A. (Colbert) Camp, and to them ten children have been born: Maud, George, Henry, John, Sallie, Lillian, Colbert, Lee, Warner and Katie. Mr. and Mrs. Strickland and all of their children save Sallie, are members of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and Mr. Strickland is a Master Mason. He has honestly obtained the high estimation in which he is held.

JAMES R. THOMASON, physician and surgeon, Mabry, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Bartlett and Mary (Thomason) Thomason, was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1826. His great-grandfather, William Thomason, was born in Ireland and came to America before the revolutionary war and was a soldier in the patriot army. His grandfather, William Thomason, was born in Virginia, whence he migrated to South Carolina. His grandfather was a soldier in the war of 1812. His parents were born in Abbeville district, South Carolina, and came to Georgia and settled in the woods of what is now Walton county, in 1816. They came in a borrowed ox-cart, and when they reached their destination their "goods and chattels" were disposed under a large tree and their friend took his departure. He and his wife then cleared an "opening" and began to farm, their principal food being corn and wild game. After enjoying this luxurious life a few years they moved into what is now Newton county, where his father bought his first land and cleared a farm. In addition to farming he practiced as a botanic doctor in the neighborhood for a number of years. He also "exercised" as a Methodist exhorter, and on many occasions in his early life he went to his "appointments" on foot and barefooted, and barefooted stood and delivered his message. When he was married it was in a home-spun and wove home-made suit of white cotton cloth; it knew no dye pot. Dr. Thomason's grandfather on his mother's side, John Thomason, was a native of South Carolina and settled in what is now Newton county, early in the century. Dr. Thomason was reared on his father's farm and received his education in the primitive, oft described dirt floor log school-house, with its puncheon seats and mud and stick chimney. In 1844 he determined to be a doctor and began to study, he at the time being a clerk in a store where a doctor had an office, who gave him the privilege of using his books. In 1848 he went to his brother's in Coweta county, who became his preceptor. In 1849-50 he attended the medical college of Georgia at Augusta, and in 1850 located in Carroll county, remaining there three years; then removed to where he now lives. In 1860 he attended the Atlanta Medical college, and graduating just as the war begun, tendered his services to the Confederate army, which were rejected. He next made up a company and went to the army, but was sent home, not participating in a single battle. He managed, however, to serve awhile at one time during the war as captain of a militia company. After the war he resumed his practice, which he has continued since. In 1870 he was elected to represent his county in the general assembly and was re-elected in 1872, serving two terms. Dr. Thomason was married May 2, 1852, to Miss Maria L., born in Hancock county, Ga., in 1832, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth (Harris) Colbert, who moved to Coweta county in 1838. Her father was a Methodist preacher, born in Georgia in 1796, and was a son of John and Elizabeth Colbert. Mrs. Thomason's mother, born in South Carolina in 1806, was a daughter of Thomas and Martha Harris. To Dr. and Mrs. Thomason six children have been born: James H., Francis G., Walter C., Benjamin B., John M. and Joseph R. Dr. Thomason is a member of the I. O. O. F. and has been a Master Mason since 1850. Himself and wife are members of the Methodist church, and he has been an ordained preacher since 1854. He is a popular and useful citizen and is very much liked by the community in which he lives.

D. N. TILLMAN, farmer, Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Asa and Marinda (Sparks) Tillman, was born in Fayette county, Ga., in 1835. His father was born in South Carolina, and while yet a youth ran away from home. He went into the army during the war of 1812 as a substitute for a man named Felix Simonton and served through the war. In after life he drew a pension for this service. Mr. Tillman's maternal grandparents, John and Elizabeth (Small) Sparks, were natives of Ireland, who came to Georgia early in this century and were among the pioneer settlers of Newton county. Mr. Tillman was reared on a farm in Carroll county and went to school in all his life only six days. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F (Capt. Curtis), Nineteenth Georgia regiment, which was first assigned to Gen. Hampton's command, afterward to that of Gen. J. J. Archer and finally to Gen. Colquitt's brigade, in which he remained until the surrender. He participated in quite a number of battles, some of them the most important fought during the war. He was at Seven Pines, May 30 and June 1, 1862, and in the seven days' fight around Richmond, commencing June 26, 1862, and was wounded in the right breast by a ball near Gaines' Mill, June 27, 1862. He was at Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862; at Mecklenburg, Dec. 13, 1862, where he was wounded in the left hand; Chancellorsville, May 1, 1863; Kingston, N. C.; siege of Charleston, Morris Island; Olustee, Fla., Feb. 20, 1864, where he was wounded across right arm; Bentonville, N. C., and the siege of Petersburg, June 18, 1864, where he was wounded in the right leg by a piece of shell. He was in every battle in which his command was engaged except when temporarily disabled by wounds. He rendered good and faithful service in the ranks throughout the war. The war being over he returned to Carroll county and engaged in farming, and although he had to start on nothing but good health, a strong will and a determined spirit, he has a good, well-improved farm and comfortable home. Except serving eight years as justice of the peace, he has devoted all his time and energies to his farm, which he manages on the progressive principles of the day. Mr. Tillman was married in 1865 to Miss Mary A. McPherson, born and reared in Carroll county, daughter of Elijah and Sarah McPherson, early settlers of Carroll county, coming in 1829. To them five children were born: Amanda, Charles N., Henry, Dora and Daniel. Mrs. Tillman, who was a member of the Primitive Baptist church, died in 1885. Oct. 20, 1885, Mr. Tillman contracted a second marriage with Miss Nancy J. Adams, born in Carroll county, daughter of Robert and Martha A. (Jones) Adams, early settlers of Coweta county. This marriage has been blessed with three children: Samuel, Robert W. and John. Mr. and Mrs. Tillman are members of the Primitive Baptist church, and their unostentatious worth commands the general respect and esteem of all who know them.

J. THOMAS TOLBERT, farmer and retired stock-trader, Villa Rica, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Roland A. and Elizabeth (Tolbert) Tolbert, was born in Villa Rica in 1836. His paternal great-grandparents, Thomas and Judia (Reeves) Tolbert, were natives of Ireland, came to America in the last half of the last century and settled in North Carolina. He cleared and cultivated a farm, and also engaged in gold-digging. He was a consistent member of the Methodist church. Mr. Tolbert's father was born in North Carolina, July 3, 1799, and is now alive and in good health at the home of the subject of this sketch. His educational advantages were meager, as he had to work hard and long and late on the farm. He came to Georgia and settled in Madison county in 1827; but in 1832 came to Villa Rica to work the gold mines. He continued this until 1853, when he engaged in farming and followed it until 1872, when he went to live with his son. When he came to Carroll the country and the mines were rough, whisky was freely drank and free fights of the fists and skull, rough-and-tumble sort, were common. Mr. Tolbert was usually "at home" for all comers, though he sought no conflict. He was a member of the military force which escorted the Indians to their new homes, and draws a pension now for that service. He was the eldest of eight children, and is the only one now living. He is a devout and exemplary member of the Methodist church. Mr. Tolbert's maternal grandparents were Josiah and Bersheba (Cranford) Tolbert. He was born in North Carolina, and she was of English parentage; was born in 1795 and died in March 25, 1872. She was a strict member of the Methodist church from childhood, and was the mother of six children, who all grew to maturity, and two of whom are now living—a daughter and the subject of this sketch. J. Thomas Tolbert was reared on the farm, and work was such an imperative necessity that he attended school but little. In 1862, he enlisted in Company A, Ninth Georgia battalion artillery, Maj. Austin Leyden, with which he served until July, 1863, when he was transferred to Company E, First Georgia cavalry. On one occasion he and five others were out on a scout and suddenly came upon a company of guerrillas, who chased them five miles, shooting at them all the time; but they finally escaped. He was in many hard fights, but never wounded. At the siege of Knoxville—1864—he was captured by the same men, an interesting coincidence, who chased him when scouting. He was held until after the surrender—sometimes, he alleges, on starvation rations. After his release he went to Cincinnati, where he remained about seventeen months, and then returned to his old home in Carroll county. Mr. Tolbert was married Dec. 19, 1866, to Miss Elizabeth W., daughter of Valentine Mc. and Elizabeth (Rice) Hodgson, of English descent. Six children have blessed their marriage—Thomas W., Elizabeth H., wife of Lyman Stutts; Minnie R., and Elba, living, and Abby Estelle and Montra May, deceased. After marriage Mr. Tolbert went to farming, supplementing it with trading in stock, prospering beyond his most sanguine expectations. He is now one of the most substantial and ranks among the best citizens in Carroll county. Mr. Tolbert's success illustrates the great possibilities of life in Georgia when pluck and perseverance are coupled with energy and fair business judgment. Financially and socially himself and family occupy first-class positions. Himself and wife are members of the Presbyterian church.

HENRY M. WILLIAMS, physician and surgeon, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John B. and Mary (Strother) Williams, was born in Meriwether county, Ga., Aug. 5, 1834. His great-grandfather was a native of Ireland and came to America about the middle of the last century and settled in Virginia. His grandparents, Samuel and Susan Williams, were born in Virginia, migrated thence to South Carolina, and from there they removed, in 1805, to Georgia and settled in Jones county—moving, as was the fashion and the necessity in those days, in ox-carts. Dr. Williams' father was born in 1800 in Edgefield district, S. C., and came with the family to Georgia in 1805. When growing up he only received six months' schooling, but learned a great deal at home by studying by the light of a pine-knot firelight at night. His lifetime pursuit was that of a farmer, and from choice and necessity he was his own blacksmith, wood-worker, and shoemaker. He removed to and settled in Meriwether county in 1825, where he made himself a good farm and a comfortable home. He was a Primitive Baptist in religion, and in forty years' preaching gained an enviable local reputation. It was his custom on preaching day to carry his shoes with him to the field, where he would work until the last minute, then take his shoes in his hand and go bare-footed until he crossed the last branch, when he would wash his feet, put on his shoes, and go to the church and preach. Returning, he would remove his shoes and walk home bare-footed. Dr. Williams' maternal grandfather, John Strother, was a native Georgian. Dr. Williams was reared and attended school at Rocky Mount, in Meriwether county. The school was of the "regulation" order of architecture of the period—log house, dirt floor, split-log seats, stick and mud chimney, and square apertures cut through the sides for windows. In 1858 he began the study of medicine, Dr. M. H. Westbrook being his preceptor, and in 1859 he entered the medical college at Nashville, Tenn., attended one course, and commenced the practice. In 1861 he enlisted in Company F (Capt. I. Curtis), Nineteenth Georgia regiment (Col. W. W. Boyd), Colquitt's brigade. He was in many battles, notably Seven Pines and the seven days' fight around Richmond. At the last-named fight he was wounded on the first day and was off duty for ninety days, but immediately on his recovery he returned to his command and participated in the battles at Bunker Hill and Chancellorsville and was afterward with Gen. Colquitt in Florida in the battle of Olustee, where he was again wounded, this time in the left leg, and disabled for active service. He, however, entered the state militia, with which he remained until the surrender. After that he went to Alabama, where he remained a year, and then came to Bowdon and located and established himself in his profession—under a license. In 1874 he attended a course of lectures at the Georgia Medical college, Augusta, and in 1875 he was graduated from Atlanta Medical college. He has continued in the practice at Bowdon, where he has established a fine reputation and secured a large and remunerative practice. He is the leading physician and the highest medical authority in that locality. Dr. Williams was happily married in 1869 to Miss Cora Hight—born and reared in Carroll county—daughter of William B. and Mary (Tolbert) Hight. Mr. Hight was a pioneer, a farmer, and a leading merchant. This union has been blessed with eight children: Anna, Nora, Paul, Ernest, Ida, Jonnie, Willie and Manzie. Dr.

Williams is a royal arch Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Baptist church. Anna, Nora and Ernest are members of the Baptist church.

JASPER J. WILLIAMSON, a wealthy and prominent citizen of Carrollton, Carroll Co., Ga., son of Robert and Matilda (Goggens) Williamson, was born in South Carolina in 1838. His grandfather, John Williamson, was born in South Carolina in 1791 and was a soldier in the war of 1812-14. His maternal grandfather, James Goggens, was also a South Carolinian. His father came from South Carolina to Georgia in 1850, bringing all he had in a four-horse wagon and a one-horse cart, laid his claim and settled in Coweta county. In 1854 he removed to Carroll county and settled four miles west of Carrollton. Mr. Williamson was twelve years old when his father came to Georgia, and received such an education as could be imparted by a plain teacher in a dirt-floor log cabin, with openings cut in the logs to let the light in and furnished with puncheon seats. He walked three miles to school and attended only in the intervals between working the crops. After his graduation he taught school himself a while. In 1861 he enlisted in Company K (Capt. J. D. Calhoun), Eighteenth Alabama regiment (Col. Bullock), and was assigned to Gen. Gladden's command. He was in several hard-fought battles, among them Shiloh and Chickamauga, where he was wounded. He was captured at Marietta, Ga., and sent to Camp Douglas, Ill., and held a prisoner until after the surrender. After the war he returned to Alabama, where he lived and farmed for three years, when he moved to Carroll county and conducted his plantation until 1886; then he removed to Carrollton to enjoy his ample income and the social advantages of town life. He has a fine plantation and two large brick business houses in Carrollton. In 1866 Mr. Williamson was married to Miss Julia A., daughter of Louis and Nancy (Brown) Walker, by whom he has had one child—Nancy E. Mrs. Williamson is a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Williamson is a master Mason.

JOHN H. WORD, merchant, Bowdon, Carroll Co., Ga., son of John Bryson and Amelia (Sparks) Word, was born in Carroll county in 1836. His great-grandfather, Charles Word, was a revolutionary soldier and was killed in the battle of King's Mountain. His grandparents, William and Elizabeth (Bryson) Word were North Carolinians, and he was a soldier in the revolutionary army. His father was born in Surry county, N. C., Jan. 1, 1796, and his mother in Franklin county, Ga., June 15, 1803. He came to Georgia when a young man and settled in Franklin as a school-teacher and taught there for many years, many of the scholars coming as many as seven miles to school. Himself and wife were married July 22, 1819. In 1836 he removed to Carroll county, where he soon rose to considerable prominence and was elected a justice of the inferior court, and for many years was a justice of the peace. On one occasion he married a couple and a short time afterward they called on him to "un-marry" them. For many years he was a deacon of the Baptist church. Mr. Word's mother was a daughter of Elijah and Amelia Sparks, early settlers in the country near Atlanta. Mr. Word was reared on the farm, which he made his home until he married. He received a good common-school education and taught school a short time. In 1861 he enlisted in Company B (Capt. Charles A. McDaniel), Cobb's legion, and participated in many hard-fought battles—among them Dam No. 1, Yorktown, seven days' fight around Richmond, concluding with Malvern Hill, etc. He went to Maryland, but was too late for the Second Manassas. He was at the battle of South Mountain, Sept. 14, 1862, where he lost his left leg and was taken prisoner. Only four of his company escaped death or wounds. A month elapsed before his leg was amputated; after it was done he took the smallpox, was struck by lightning, and then he had to submit to a second amputation. In 1863 he was elected clerk of the superior court and served two years, and was made a notary public and filled the office six years at Bowdon. In the meantime he began a general merchandise business at Bowdon, and although he had but very small capital he has been eminently successful. He made his first start in business before the war closed, but some Federal troops passed that way, took everything he had and broke him up. In 1884 he was elected to represent the county in the general assembly and served one term. In 1893 he was elected county commissioner of Carroll county and took an active and prominent part in building the new court house. In 1866 Mr. Word was married to Miss Virginia, daughter of William and Ann (Stringer) Colquitt, South Carolinian born. Mr. Colquitt was a soldier in the Confederate army during the war, and a part of the time was a guard at the Andersonville prison. When he was married he and his wife began housekeeping with only a frying-pan and two old chairs, but they are better, and more comfortably, if not luxuriously, "fixed" now. Himself and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church. He is a liberal contributor to all worthy enterprises.

CATOOSA COUNTY.

J. W. ANDERSON, physician, Ringgold, was born in Catoosa county, March 12, 1863. His father is John R. Anderson, a native of Virginia, born Dec. 13, 1823, who settled at Crawfordville, Ga., in his youth with his parents and became a citizen of Catoosa county in 1848. In 1857 he married Hattie Samas, of Calhoun, formerly of Monroe county, a lady highly connected. Her grand-uncle was Hon. William H. Crawford. Her uncle was Hon. N. C. Barnett, for many years secretary of state, and one of the leading citizens of Georgia. By their marriage they had two children, J. W. and Carmetia, the wife of Dr. Thomas Hackett, of Catoosa county. Dr. Anderson was reared in Catoosa county and was educated at the Masonic Literary institute in Ringgold. For several years he was in the service of the Western Atlantic Railway company as conductor. He resolved to prepare himself for the medical profession, and began the study of medicine at Ringgold with Dr. T. Hackett. Later he entered the college of physicians and surgeons at Baltimore, Md., and prosecuted his studies at this institution during 1883-84, completing his course at the Southern Medical college in Atlanta, where he was graduated in March, 1885. In 1889 he commenced the practice of his profession at Ringgold, where he has attained excellent success and enjoys a large general practice in Catoosa county and in the state of Tennessee. In his professional calling he has acquired the confidence of his patients and the public generally by reason of his skill as a physician, and his standing as a gentleman and a citizen. His standard of professional ethics is high, and he is popular among his professional brethren. On December 23, 1890, he was married to Miss Annie L. Jones, daughter of Capt. R. J. Jones, of Catoosa county, and at present clerk of the superior court. The mother of Dr. Anderson died in Catoosa county in 1886. His father is still living in this county. Dr. Anderson is a member of the masonic fraternity, Quitman lodge No. 106, at Ringgold.

WILLIAM JEROME BAZEMORE, M. D. Dr. Bazemore is an esteemed citizen of Ringgold and one of the leading physicians of Catoosa county. He is a native of Crawford county, Ga., where he was born June 30, 1844. His father was Washington Bazemore, a native of Alabama, who served in the Florida Indian war in 1836-37. Washington married Eliza Wright, born in Crawford county, Ga., daughter of Robert Wright, a native of Ireland and an early settler in Crawford county. By this marriage they have six children: Dr. G. M. Bazemore, now an eminent physician of Cleveland, Tenn., and surgeon for the Southern Railway company at that place; R. M., of Dalton, who served in the Sixth Georgia regiment during the late war, and lost a leg at Gettysburg; Missouri E., who married Dr. R. A. Wilson, of Aphison, Tenn.; William J.; Susan, deceased, and Nannie J. Turrentine, of Richland, Fla. The father of Dr. Bazemore died in 1855 and his mother in 1853. He was at an early age deprived of the care and council of his parents, and practically thrown upon his own resources. But he soon developed courage and energy in the battle of life. He attended the schools of Crawford county until the commencement of the war, and in July, 1861, at the age of seventeen, he enlisted in the Twenty-second Georgia state troops, commanded by Col. Barklew, his brigadier-commander being William H. Harrison. For one year he saw service at Savannah and on the eastern coast, where he was engaged in erecting and perfecting coast defenses. His term of service having expired, he went to Virginia, where he visited Richmond during the seven days' fight, his object being to re-enlist in the Sixth Georgia. However he changed his mind and returned to Georgia, bringing with him to Macon Col. T. J. Simmons, who is now one of the judges of the supreme court of the state, and who had been severely wounded in the campaign around Richmond. On his return to Georgia he joined the Ocmulgee rangers, under Col. Charles T. Goode, and was ordered to Chattanooga, where he participated in the Tennessee campaign under Gen. Peghrum. He fought at Chickamauga and at Missionary Ridge in 1863, and in the campaign of 1864 he saw active service and constant fighting under Johnston from Dalton to Atlanta, being engaged at Resaca, New Hope church, Kennesaw mountain, Peachtree creek and in the siege of Atlanta. He was special escort for W. H. T. Walker when killed at Decatur. He fought at Jonesboro and at Fairburn. He accompanied Wheeler's cavalry through east Tennessee to the Salt Works in Virginia and was engaged in the battle of Aiken, S. C., and Bentonville, N. C. He was mustered out of service with the surrender of Johnston's army at Smithville, after undergoing four years of hard and perilous service in defense of the Confederacy. He proved himself a gallant soldier, was only absent thirty days from his command, and suffered the most painful hardships without a murmur. He returned to Crawford county without means or property, but with courage undaunted, and the experience of four years' trial in that kind of service, which is well adapted to test the patience and endurance of man. His education was still unfinished and his means inadequate to effect his advancement. For two years he superintended a cotton plantation for W. H. Ross, and in 1868 he moved to Fort Valley, Ga., and then completed his literary education. He was anxious to enter one of the learned professions, and in 1869 entered the Jefferson medical college at Philadelphia, where he engaged in the study of medicine and surgery during 1869-70, and in 1871-72 he continued his studies in the medical department of the university of Louisville, Ky., where he graduated in the latter year with high honor and received a diploma for one of the best essays delivered. He settled in Catoosa county and entered upon the practice of his profession, in which he continued for five years. He moved to Chattanooga in search of a larger field for his professional labors, and forming an alliance with his brother, Dr. G. M. Bazemore, he acquired a very large and lucrative practice. Owing to ill health in his family he was compelled to return from Chattanooga to Ringgold, where he has resided since 1891, still engaged in the duties of his profession. He is recognized as an able, talented and experienced physician and surgeon. In 1873 Dr. Bazemore married Miss Amelia Gray, of Grayville, Ga., daughter of R. T. Gray, and a niece of Hon. John T. Gray. They had six children, five of whom survive: Malcomb G., Fannie E., Charles Washington, Jerome and Ruth E. Royden J. is the deceased child.

WILLIAM E. MANN. This well-known member of the Catoosa county bar is a resident of Ringgold. He was born in Gordon county in 1862. His father is Dr. Joel J. Mann, a prominent physician of Floyd county, and his paternal grandfather is Edmund S. Mann, a native of Georgia, now living at an advanced age in Gordon county. Dr. Mann married Miss Sally Hunter and had eight children: Anna, wife of Preston B. Smith; William E.; Rev. A. J. Mann, a minister of the Presbyterian church, now living at Everett Springs, in Floyd county; Joel J., Jr.; Lula, deceased wife of Monroe Parrot; Robert Lee, at present engaged in teaching in Whitfield county; Alice and Della. The mother of Mr. Mann is still living. His father, Dr. Mann, entered the Confederate service and served through the war. William E. was reared in Gordon and Floyd counties, his parents settling in the latter county in 1870. He attended the common schools and the high school at Subligna. In 1880 he entered the North Georgia agricultural college at Dahlonega, where he pursued a classical course of study during two years, and was graduated in 1882 with the degree of bachelor of arts. He had already formed a strong inclination for the legal profession and began the study of law in the office of Dabney & Fouche at Rome, Ga. In 1883, at the fall term of the superior court of Floyd county, he was admitted to the bar by Hon. Joel Brannon, presiding judge. Immediately thereafter he settled in Ringgold and entered upon the active duties of his profession. He soon found himself riding on the wave of success and popularity. He received retainers in important railroad litigation pending in his county and rapidly acquired a reputation for success in the management of corporate cases and a knowledge of the principles of this important branch of jurisprudence. Commensurate with his growing reputation as an advocate and counselor, his practice increased in the Cherokee circuit, and he now ranks among the leading lawyers of that circuit, so long distinguished for its legal talent. His practice, which has been of a general character, together with his studious habits, has familiarized his mind with the various branches of jurisprudence and he is alike at his ease as an advocate before a jury, or in discussing the technical niceties and distinctions of the rules of equity jurisprudence in a court of chancery. Mr. Mann has never taken an active interest in political affairs, but during his life he has ever clung to the teachings of Jefferson, and the cardinal doctrines of the democratic party. He served two terms as mayor of Ringgold to the satisfaction of its inhabitants and has always taken an active interest in the progress of his town. He is in every sense a man of affairs, active and energetic, in whom the public have implicit confidence, and for whom the future has much in store. On Sept. 27, 1892, he married Miss Irene Gordon, of Ringgold, daughter of Judge Thomas M. Gordon. Mr. Mann is an active member of the Presbyterian church. He is also a member of the masonic fraternity at Ringgold—Quitman lodge No. 106. On June 24, 1895, a son was born to Mr. and Mrs. Mann, whose name is William Gordon Mann.

CHARLTON COUNTY.

JOHN J. UPCHURCH, lumberman, Race Pond, Charlton Co., Ga., was born in Nassau county, Fla., March 18, 1861. He was the son of N. S. and Sarah A. (Parker) Upchurch, and of a family that early settled in that state. He attended the common schools and completed his education by private instruction. Before reaching manhood he was embarked in business, at the same time displaying a liking for the excitement of politics. After a warm contest he was elected one of the representatives of Nassau county in the Florida legislature in 1887 and 1888, enjoying the distinction of being the first democrat to represent that constituency in the lower branch of the state legislature. In 1889 Mr. Upchurch moved to Race Pond, Ga., and engaged in business. He also entered into the councils of his party and took a prominent part in shaping its campaigns. In 1894 he was elected to the Georgia senate from the fourth senatorial district, and served on several important committees of that body. Mr. Upchurch was married April 7, 1890, to Miss Susan Hawkins, a daughter of Dr. T. D. Hawkins, an eminent physician of King's Ferry, Fla. She was born March 28, 1867. Three boys—George, Frank and John—have blessed this union. Mr. Upchurch is a partner in the sawmill firm of Dyal & Upchurch and enjoys a high standing in a business as well as a social way.

CHATTAHOOCHEE COUNTY.

WILLIAM H. BAGLEY, sheriff, Cusseta, Chattahoochee Co., Ga., son of Samuel M. and Mary A. (Goody) Bagley, was born in Chattahoochee county, March 24, 1862. His father was a prominent planter and quite influential and popular politically, was a soldier in the Confederate army during the late "unpleasantness," and for some years was sheriff of the county. When Mr. Bagley was eight years old his father went to Louisiana, where he remained eighteen months, and then returned to Chattahoochee county, which has since been his home. When in Louisiana he attended school about six months, and had only limited schooling afterward. At the age of nineteen years he went on a farm by himself and commenced farming. He has been quite successful and is already one of the popular citizens of the county. After having acceptably served four years as bailiff he was in 1892 elected sheriff, an office he bids fair to be elected to for many succeeding terms. Mr. Bagley was married Dec. 2, 1881, to Miss Princess E., daughter of George Willis, formerly a prosperous farmer, who was killed while serving in the army during the late war. To them five children have been born: Henry Amber, Bertie Lee, Mary Agnes, Flossie and Willis Frank. Mr. Bagley's public service has but just begun.

CHATTOOGA COUNTY.

HON. ANDREW PERRY ALLGOOD. That portion of Georgia commonly denominated the mountain region has, since its earliest settlement, been chiefly noted for its agricultural products. With every natural advantage for the maintenance of manufactures and the mechanical arts, with a water power unexcelled and fuel in abundance, rural customs, ideas and occupation predominate in the minds of its people. To this general rule, as applied to the industrial progress of this section, there are a few notable exceptions, as is evidenced occasionally by the sound of the hammer and the hum of business industry heard in the mountain fastnesses. The rich and blooming Chattooga valley, the Eden of north Georgia, is far in advance of other localities in the happy possession of this mark of industrial progress in the country. To the business thrift and enterprising spirit of the founder of the Trion Manufacturing company the public of Chattooga county are indebted for the benefits and the advantages accruing from the establishment in their midst of an institution destined in many ways to enhance the value of property and contribute to the wealth and material prosperity of the people. In the business circles of this state and beyond its boundaries the name of Andrew P. Allgood has long since been familiar. He was a native of South Carolina, having been born in Laurens district, Nov. 23, 1816. His father was De Forrest Allgood, also a native of Virginia, born in 1787, of French extraction, and a gentleman of the old school, who possessed a highly cultivated intellect and the polished manners of his time and associates—the planter class of South Carolina in Calhoun's day. In 1837 he settled in Walker county, Ga., on a plantation where he resided until 1842, when he moved to Mississippi, where he remained until the late war. Returning to Georgia, he spent his remaining years with his son, Andrew P., dying in Chattooga county, June 9, 1877. His wife survived him until March 17, 1883. The issue of their marriage was five children: Elvira, who married William T. Parks, of Pontotoc county, Miss.; Andrew P., Barnett Jefferson, William H. and Margaret B., who married Dr. Andrew Berry, of Walker county. All are now deceased. Andrew P. Allgood settled in Walker county in 1838 and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was among the first merchants of that county and one of its early pioneers. Possessing that skill, tact and judgment which, be they natural or acquired, are ever characteristic of the successful business man, he prospered, and in 1845 he settled on a large and valuable plantation in Chattooga county, which still remains in the possession of his family. His shrewd judgment and observing eye was quick to discern the facilities which the country afforded for the establishment of a plant adapted to the manufacture of the cotton product, and the value of such an institution to himself and others. Accordingly, in March, 1846, together with Spencer S. Marsh and William K. Briers the well-known establishment now bearing the corporate name of the Trion Manufacturing company, located in the heart of Chattooga valley, for the manufacture of cotton goods, commenced business. For upward of forty years he was the head and one of the chief pillars of this institution, now ranking among the most successful and reliable of the kind in Georgia. From its early infancy he nursed its growth, expanded its powers and capacity, and by that energy and perseverance which ever accompanied him in hours of progress, and that courage which never deserted him in hours of trial and in financial panics, he lived to build his own monument by the permanent establishment of an industry which has been fruitful of blessings past and to come to the people of Chattooga county and the adjacent territory. About 300 hands are now employed at the Trion factory and upward of 700 looms and 25,000 spindles are in operation. During the war Mr. Allgood received notice from the Federal authorities to suspend the operation of his plant or incur the penalty of its destruction by the torch of the brigand invaders. And in consequence for a period the company were thus compelled to discontinue business. He continued at the head of the company and largely conducted its affairs until 1882, when, after half a century of usefulness and remarkable business success, he died in the bosom of his family at his home in Chattooga valley, universally lamented by an extensive list of social friends and a large circle of business acquaintances. Georgia has produced men of greater distinction, but it may well be doubted whether any citizen of this state deserves more highly the gratitude of the mass of the people, or with the opportunity at his disposal, contributed more generally by his acts and deeds to promote the public welfare. He had no taste for politics and neither sought nor desired political preferment. But during his long life in Chattooga county he was active in promoting the public interest, and was regarded as a leader and trusted counselor in the management of county affairs. For many years he served as justice of the inferior court. His friendships were strong and lasting and his benevolence unbounded. Ever ready to acknowledge by act and example the spirit of righteousness and sound morality among men, he did not hesitate to condemn wrong, believing it to betray pusillanimity of character whenever or wherever manifested. Mr. Allgood married in 1842 Miss Mary Marsh in Walker county. Her father was Spencer S. Marsh, a native of Chatham county, N. C., born Nov. 24, 1800, and died at La Fayette, Ga., in 1875. His name has already been mentioned as the associate of Mr. Allgood in the founding of the Trion factory. He married Miss Ruth Brantly of North Carolina and reared six children, viz.: Edwin W., now a leading and prosperous business man of Atlanta; Mary, who married Mr. Allgood; Joseph, Emily, Addie and James. Of these Edwin, Addie and Mrs. Allgood survive. Joseph was for many years a practicing physician. He entered the Confederate service and served through the war in Longstreet corps as surgeon of the Eighteenth Georgia regiment. He was with his regiment during all the battles and campaigns in which the army of Northern Virginia was engaged, and which made that army famous in military annals. He died in Walker county in 1888. By their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Allgood had born to them six children: Addie, De Forrest, Alice, Mary, Margaret and Maude. Of these Mary is deceased. De Forrest succeeded his father as president of the Trion Manufacturing company and died in 1890. Margaret married Alfred S. Hamilton, at present president of that company.

FRANK CORDLE, a practicing physician and surgeon residing at Trion, was born in Chattooga county in 1859. His father is Calvin Cordle, a planter residing in that county, and a native of Virginia, where he was born in 1832. He settled in Chattooga county in pioneer days and married Miss Martha Green, of Floyd county. They reared three sons and two daughters: Edwin C., a mechanic and farmer at Birmingham, Ala.; James C., engaged in planting in Chattooga county; Lizzie, wife of W. P. Wood; Fannie, wife of John Bennett, and Frank, all of Chattooga county. The mother of Dr. Cordle died in that county in 1872. Calvin Cordle entered the Confederate army and was attached to the hospital service. He served in that capacity through the war. Dr. Cordle was reared and educated under Capt. J. M. Jackson in Chattooga county. Before attaining the age of twenty-one he was elected tax collector of his county, and discharged the duties of that office creditably during the term of two years. He resolved to enter the medical profession, and commenced the study of medicine and surgery in 1879 with Dr. J. W. Clements, of Subligna. In 1881 he entered the Atlanta medical college and pursued a course of study during 1881-82, and graduated in 1883. He commenced the practice of his profession with his former preceptor, Dr. Clements, at Subligna, where he continued with success until 1891, when he accepted an offer from the Trion Manufacturing company to act in the capacity of regular physician and surgeon for that institution. He located in Trion and has since that time continued to serve that company. His practice, which has been of a general character, has been very successful, and with the public and his professional brethren he ranks high as a physician and surgeon and as an active and energetic citizen. In 1883 he married Miss Claudie Murphy, of Floyd county. They have three children: Lollie Hix, Myrtis Cavender and Tom Howard. Dr. Cordle is a royal arch Mason, and with his wife is a member of the Baptist church. His paternal grandfather was Absalom Cordle, a native of Virginia, born in 1794. He married in Virginia and reared a family. He was a soldier in the Mexican war and was a well-known and highly respected citizen of Chattooga county, where he died in 1886, at the advanced age of ninety-two years. The maternal grandfather of Dr. Cordle was James P. Green, a native of this state, who early settled in Floyd county, where he died in 1876.

WILLIAM M. RANSOM, educator, Menlo, Chattooga Co., Ga., was born in Walker county, Jan. 7, 1869. His father was Reuben Ransom, born in Mecklenburg county, N. C., in 1825. There he grew to manhood, and was educated first at Mecklenburg and later at Griffin college, Georgia, where he pursued a classical course and was graduated with the degree of master of arts. He read law and was admitted to the bar, but owing to ill health was forced to abandon his profession and engage in farming, which pursuit he followed during the remainder of his life. He died in Walker county, April 22, 1872, where he had resided twenty-seven years. He had three brothers and one sister: Washington, John, Milton and Parmelia. The four brothers entered the Confederate service and Milton was killed in battle. The father of Prof. Ransom was a lieutenant in the Confederate army. He fought with the army of Northern Virginia, and was present and actively engaged in the memorable battle which made that army famous in the history of the war—the Wilderness—Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, and the second battle of Manassas. He followed Longstreet to Chickamauga in September, 1863, and fought in that battle. He returned to his home at the close of the struggle and resided in Walker county until his death. He married Miss Caroline Owens, daughter of John and Harriet Owens. His wife was born in Spartanburg, S. C., in 1828, and moved with the family to Walker county in 1845. By this union they reared four sons and three daughters: Parmelia, wife of John C. Wall; John M.; Ocea, wife of C. C. McConnell; George W., James B., William M., and Cora, wife of T. W. Hasleria. All are residents of Walker county. In 1889 Prof. Ransom entered the junior class of Emory college, Oxford, Ga., and continued his studies in that institution until June, 1891, when he graduated with the degree of bachelor of arts. Since graduating he has been engaged in teaching in Chattooga county; since 1891 he has been principal of the Menlo high school in that county, which institution he established. He has devoted his entire time to building up this school in the heart of Chattooga county, where, by untiring zeal and at great personal sacrifice, he has succeeded in providing for the youth of that county and adjacent territory the advantages of a higher system of education. The average attendance at the school is 250 students. There are three departments of study, the literary, musical and elocutionary. The higher mathematics and the learned languages, Greek and Latin, are also taught. In the attendance both the states of Tennessee and Alabama are represented, and in Georgia the attendance is made up from the counties of Chattooga, Dade, Walker, Whitfield and Murray. From the start the school has been successful, and Prof. Ransom has given universal satisfaction. On Dec. 26, 1894, Prof. Ransom married Miss Hattie Belle Wyatt, daughter of R. Wyatt, of Chattooga county. Prof. Ransom is a member of the Methodist church, and Mrs. Ransom belongs to the Presbyterian communion.

ROBERT YOUNG RUDICIL, a well-known physician and surgeon residing in Chattooga county, was born in Spartanburg district, S. C., on Aug. 8, 1832. His father was Philip Charles Rudicil, a native of Lincoln county, N. C., the son of George Rudicil, a native of Wurtemberg, Germany, who accompanied the celebrated Baron De Kalb to America during the revolutionary war and fought throughout that struggle for American independence. He joined the continental army at Trenton and was present and endured the sufferings at Valley Forge in the winter of 1777. Three of his brothers were in the continental service, and all four of the brothers were wounded. Dr. Rudicil's grandfather served under Greene and De Kalb in the Carolinas and was present when Count De Kalb was killed at the battle of Camden, where he was wounded and sent to a German settlement in North Carolina. As soon as he recovered he rejoined the army and saw further service on the famous retreat of Greene, through the Carolinas. He was present at the siege of Yorktown, and witnessed the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. At the close of the war he settled near Lincoln Court House, N. C., on a fine plantation and resided there until his death about 1820. He married a Miss Johnston, of Virginia, and reared three daughters—Susan, who married George Hovis; Eva, wife of John Mostiller; Ann, wife of John Stroup—and four sons—John, Jacob, Michael and Philip Charles, who was born in 1804. Philip Charles settled in Spartanburg district, S. C., about 1826, and in 1828 married Miss Mary Ann MacMillan, whose mother was Jane McDowell, daughter of Robert McDowell. He was a planter and also engaged extensively in mechanical pursuits. They reared five children: Dr. R. Y., Elizabeth J., David Luther, Seleni C., wife of James A. Greene, and Mary A., who married Gabriel Greene. The father of Dr. R. died in 1861, and his mother died in Chattooga county in 1881. The family settled in Chattooga county in 1860. Dr. Rudicil was educated in Spartanburg district, and after completing his literary course in the schools of Spartanburg he resolved to embrace the medical profession. He accordingly entered the medical college of South Carolina and pursued a course of study in that institution in medicine and surgery. Graduating therefrom in March, 1855, he settled in Summerville, Ga., and commenced the practice of his profession, where he has resided ever since and has enjoyed a large and most successful practice. At the opening of the war he entered the service of the Confederacy as a surgeon, and with his command was in the famous march under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston from Winchester to Manassas, and remained at Piedmont on Sunday, reaching the battlefield on Monday morning, where he was at once assigned to duty. He continued in active duty until September, 1861, when he returned to his home, remaining until May, 1862. He was appointed assistant surgeon to Smith's legion and reported for duty at Nelson Springs, Gordon Co., Ga., and accompanied that army to Tennessee and participated in the Kentucky and Tennessee campaign in 1862. He was present at the battle of Perryville, Richmond and at the last battle at Rock Castle river. In February, 1863, he was appointed by the secretary of war surgeon of the Sixth Georgia cavalry regiment. He continued in the service during the summer and accompanied his regiment to the battlefield of Chickamauga in September following. He was present during the four days' fight, Sept. 18, 19, 20 and 21, under Gen. John Pegram, and was with the general when he moved on Alexander bridge on the afternoon of Sept. 18, and when he crossed at Byrum ford, and was present at the opening of the fight at Jay's mill at sunrise on the morning of the 19th. Later, after the victory at Chickamauga, his brigade led the charge on Minty's brigade of Thomas' corps at Mission Ridge, where Lieut.-Col. Fain, commander of the regiment, was severely wounded. After Mission Ridge his regiment followed Longstreet to Knoxville, and was in the siege of Knoxville and the battle of Dandridge, and throughout the winter of 1863-64 was in active duty in the field, enduring the trying hardships of a severe campaign. On May 8, 1864, his regiment, then in Martin's division, joined Johnston at Resaca and was present at the battle fought there. He continued with his regiment during the celebrated campaign of that year and was at New Hope Church, Kennesaw Mountain, Peachtree Creek and in the siege of Atlanta. He was present when Walker was killed near Cobb's mill, and later accompanied Wheeler into Tennessee, and was present at the battle of Murfreesboro. His command penetrated Tennessee as far as Nashville and Franklin. At Campbellville Dr. Rudicil sustained a severe injury by a fall of the horse on which he was mounted. His command crossed the Tennessee at Colben Shoals, swimming their horses in the night, and after constant service and hard riding finally joined Johnston at Macon. Later he was present at the battle of Aiken, S. C., and the last fight in the war, the battle of Bentonville, N. C., and was discharged, as appears from the parole, on May 3, 1865, after having given the best years of his life to the Confederacy in defense of the institutions and cause of the south. Returning to his home, he endeavored to resume his practice and at the same time engage in the pursuit of agriculture. The severe financial losses which he, among hundreds, sustained as a result of the war and the new order of things were finally overcome and prosperity restored. His practice was very large and his experience in the service necessarily enhanced his value and service as a physician and surgeon. He took an active and prominent part in political affairs, designing thus to promote the public welfare of Georgia and its people. In 1873 he became the candidate of the democratic party for representative of Chattooga county in the general assembly and was elected. He served on several important committees and was chairman of the committee on the institute for deaf and dumb, and took an active part in the deliberations of that body both in committee work and on the floor of the house. Since his valuable legislative service he has continued his large practice in Chattooga county, among whose citizens he stands foremost as a gentleman of broad, liberal and conservative views, and in whose confidence and esteem he justly occupies a high place. He is a member of the Confederate Veterans' post at Summerville, a member of the Presbyterian church at that place, and a royal arch Mason. On April 19, 1857, Dr. Rudicil was married to Eliza Agnes Knox, daughter of Capt. Samuel Knox. They have two surviving children—Madora A., wife of Judge W. M. Henry, of Rome, born July 25, 1860; C. C. L. Rudicil, born March 11, 1866, now a practicing physician. Madora was educated at the Rome female college and was graduated from that institution. Dr. C. C. L. was educated and is a graduate of the university of Georgia, Athens. He entered the Atlanta Medical college, of which institution he is a graduate, and later was graduated at the New York Polyclinic institution, and is now engaged in the practice at Chickamauga. He married Miss Lydia Rowland, a granddaughter of Maj. John S. Rowland, of Bartow county, a well-known Georgian; David Luther was born Nov. 26, 1867, and died Dec. 6, 1869; Leon D. was born June 11, 1869, and resides at home with his parents, engaged in farming. Dr. C. C. L.'s wife graduated at Oxford, Miss.

HON. WESLEY SHROPSHIRE. The Shropshire family is of English origin and is among the oldest of the pioneer settlers of Chattooga county. Wesley Shropshire was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., April 3, 1801, and was one of a family of seven boys and two girls, children of Spencer Shropshire and his wife, whose maiden name was Pollard. Spencer Shropshire was a successful planter in Oglethorpe county and was a soldier in the war of the revolution. The grandfather of Wesley was a native of England, who was sent as a missionary to Virginia in the last century before the commencement of the revolution. He, too, was a soldier in that war, and fought in the continental army. Mr. Shropshire, from his youth, displayed original traits of character, at all times self-reliant and confident of his powers and ability to discharge every duty and obligation he assumed. He was surrounded by few of the opportunities and advantages possessed by the youth of the present generation, but was quick to grasp at such as came in his way, and made the most of his early position in life. In his youth the school system of the present day was rather a Utopian vision than an accomplished fact. But despite these manifold disadvantages for intellectual improvement, he acquired in time a practical education. His mother taught him to read, but he had passed his majority before he had acquired a practical and serviceable knowledge of the art of reading and writing intelligently. At the age of twenty he purchased his time from his father, and was employed as an overseer of a plantation, and for several years he continued to serve in that capacity, and by practical economy saved some money. At the age of twenty-six he married Miss Nancy Swanson, with whom he lived happily until her death, which occurred in April, 1852. The offspring of this marriage were five daughters, only two of whom—Mrs. J. A. Bale, Rome, Ga., and Mrs. Barksdale, of Chattooga county—are now living, and one son, Francis C. Shropshire, the father of the present Wesley Shropshire, representative in the general assembly from Chattooga county. He became a successful planter in Oglethorpe county, and as early as 1826 was elected to the office of justice of the peace, the first of numerous public favors to be afterward conferred upon him. The opening of the Cherokee country in North Georgia afforded excellent opportunities for such aggressive and enterprising spirits as Mr. Shropshire, and he resolved to embark for the new field then attracting the attention of all Georgians and settlers in adjoining states. He accordingly settled in Floyd county in 1835 with his family upon two lots of land, at present within the corporate limits of East Rome, where he resided for several years, became possessed of valuable property, and rose to prominence as a public character. After one year's residence he was, in 1836, appointed deputy sheriff of Floyd county under W. R. Williamson, and at the ensuing election was elected sheriff. He held the office by re-election, and continued in the discharge of its duties until the summer of 1839, when he was elected to the legislature of Georgia as the candidate of the democratic party. He took a very active part in the legislation of that session among colleagues whose lives have since become a part of the history of our common country. His enterprising spirit led him to take a prominent part in the passage of the act providing for the building of the state road to Chattanooga. In 1840 he was again a candidate for the legislature on an independent ticket, having encountered violent opposition in the democratic party in consequence of his support of the railroad enterprise, but he was again elected and served through the session which followed. In 1841 he settled in Dirt Town valley, Chattooga county, on what is now known as the Chaney mill property, where he built and established these mills and acquired a large and valuable landed estate. His services were still sought after by the public, and in 1846 he was again elected sheriff of Chattooga county. In 1855 he became the candidate of his party for the state senate, and after a hard-fought contest was elected over the know-nothing candidate, and in 1857 was re-elected over an old-line whig. The very eve of the war found him in the public service of his state at a time when the eyes of the whole union were turned upon Georgia. At this momentous period of our history Mr. Shropshire was an ardent union man and pronounced advocate of the policy of Stephens and his school. He was opposed to secession and was elected in 1860 to the secession convention at Milledgeville, and was present and participated in the deliberations of that famous body in the winter of 1860-61, first at Milledgeville and later at Savannah. He took strong grounds against the policy of withdrawing from the Federal union, but on the passage of the ordinance declaring that the state of Georgia had withdrawn from the union of states, he gave his support to his state and his approval to the acts of his colleagues. Throughout the war he was known as a union man, but his son, Francis C. Shropshire, died in the Confederate service. He attended the first convention that nominated Hon. Joseph E. Brown for governor of Georgia. He was appointed on the select committee from the Cherokee country to determine on the choice of a candidate for governor, and the action of that committee resulted in the choice of Joseph E. Brown. Judge A. R. Wright was also a member of that convention, and in the course of the contest he was offered the nomination, but declined, having been chosen a member of the convention in the interest of another candidate. At the close of the war Mr. Shropshire recommended the wisdom of the policy providing for the return of Georgia to the union. In 1868 he was elected to the constitutional convention from the forty-second senatorial district. His years of experience in public life made him an important factor in the deliberations and labors of the convention. This was his last public service, although he continued to live and enjoy comparative good health for twenty-six years thereafter, dying in Chattooga county, Dec. 31, 1894, at the great age of ninety-four years. In his long and remarkable career changes and counter-changes had occurred in the social and political condition of men and empires. "He had seen nations born and die." His life extended through the administration of twenty-one presidents of the United States, having been born in the second month of Mr. Jefferson's first administration. His first vote was cast for Jackson in 1824. Francis C. Shropshire, the son, was born in Oglethorpe county in 1829. He was educated at Mercer university, Penfield, and was married early in life to Miss Mary Wright, daughter of Judge A. R. Wright, of Rome, Ga. He prepared himself for the practice of law and was admitted to the bar. He was elected clerk of the house of representatives in the Georgia legislature in 1859 and served through the session. At the commencement of the late war he entered the Confederate service and was rewarded with a commission. He continued in active service until 1862, when he died of disease at Cumberland Gap. By his marriage he had five children: Beulah, wife of A. B. S. Mosley, of Rome; Lizzie, deceased; Octavia, wife of N. E. Adamson; A. W., and Hon. Wesley Shropshire, the present representative of Chattooga county, and a well-known member of the Chattooga bar. Mr. Shropshire was educated in the schools of Chattooga county and in 1883 commenced the study of law with Hon. F. A. Kirby, of Summerville. After pursuing a course of study he was admitted to the bar, and immediately thereafter commenced the practice of his profession in Chattooga county, where he has continued to reside and enjoy the emoluments of his profession. In 1892 and 1893 he was elected and served as mayor of Summerville, receiving in both elections every vote cast. In 1894 he became the candidate of the democratic party for representative in the general assembly, and after a vigorous contest was elected over F. G. Little, populist candidate, by a large majority. During his legislative service he served on the committees on judiciary, railroads, deaf and dumb institute, and on enrollments. His legislative service was marked by considerate and conservative action in dealing with public questions and measures, and both in committee and on the floor of the house he became prominent among the young legislators who participated in the labors of the session. He represents an element rapidly gaining vantage ground and recognition in Georgia affairs, and in the social and political life of this state, and the future opens before him replete with opportunities of advancement and usefulness. He married in 1884 Miss Hattie Marshall of Shelbyville, Tenn., daughter of Moses Marshall. They have one child, Beulah. Both Mr. and Mrs. Wesley Shropshire are members of the Methodist church.

CHEROKEE COUNTY.

THOMAS BELL is an old resident of Cherokee county and resides near Fort Buffington. He was born in that county in 1851 and has always resided there, and is engaged in farming. His father is Thomas Reuben Bell, born in Henry county, this state, in 1815, and still lives in Cherokee county, where he is engaged in agricultural pursuits, in which he has been remarkably successful. He was a soldier in the late war and saw active service in the state troops. In 1834 he was married to Miss Surena Messer, daughter of David Messer, of Henry county, where she was born in 1819. His wife is still living. On Aug. 22, 1872, Thomas Bell was married to Miss Kinness Chanlee, daughter of Judge Tilman Chanlee, of Cherokee county. Eleven children—eight boys and three girls—were born to them, all of whom survive: James L., born Aug. 3, 1873; John K., born April 3, 1875; Suviler, born Nov. 26, 1876; Andrew B., born Nov. 18, 1878; Cherokee D., born Feb. 15, 1881; Samuel W., born Jan. 9, 1883; Oscar W., born March 23, 1885; Thomas Tilman, born April 17, 1887; Fred, born Jan. 22, 1890; Cleopatra, born Dec. 28, 1891, and William F., born March 29, 1894. Mr. Bell belongs to a family of fourteen children, nine of whom are still living. His sister Roda is the wife of G. W. Tippets; Martha is unmarried; Jefferson; Mary is the wife of W. F. Chanlee, and Luvenia is married to W. H. Robertson; Franklin; Reuben G.; Nancy Jane, wife of R. B. Clark. His brother John, who served in the Twenty-third Georgia regiment during the war, was killed in battle under Stonewall Jackson in Virginia. Alfred died in 1853; William; Bethaney and two more children died early in life. The survivors all reside in Cherokee county. Mr. Bell takes an active interest in politics and was nominated by the populists for the legislature in 1892 and again in 1894, but was defeated both times—and unjustly, so many of his adherents think.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BROOKE, farmer, Canton, was born May 8, 1829, in Hall county, Ga., and was the son of John Prescott and Esther (Bennett) Brooke. His father, a large planter, was an influential citizen of Hall county and was sheriff and several times member of the legislature. Mr. Brooke was the tenth of thirteen children. He was educated in the common schools, the facilities for higher learning that we now enjoy not then existing. When he was about twenty-one years old he accepted a situation as clerk in a mercantile establishment at Marietta, Ga., where he was employed for several years. His health failing, he left the store to begin a farm life in Cherokee county, which he has since followed, only being interrupted by the civil war. He married Mary E., daughter of Joseph L. and Aratenta Dial. Mr. Dial was a large planter living in Cherokee county and one of the earlier settlers of this region. There were but few families living in the county when he took up his abode there, the Indians having full possession of the country. Mrs. Brooke's ancestors came from South Carolina. There have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brooke seven children, six of whom are living: Malissa T. married Mr. N. K. Scott and they have five children. Jefferson Prescott Brooke married Miss Maud Howell, and they are the parents of four children. Elizabeth Hastings married Joseph E. Johnston, and they have two children. George Washington, Mary Myrtle, and Trelly John are the other children. Ida E. is the deceased child. Mr. Brooke enlisted in Company G, Third Georgia regiment, cavalry, and was in the western army. He was in the battles of Chickamauga and Lookout Mountain and was captured at Dalton, Ga., being held prisoner until after the surrender of Gen. Lee. Mr. Brooke is a member and deacon of the Missionary Baptist church, having united with this denomination when a young man. He has been successful as a farmer and has accumulated considerable property. He owns an elegant home in the beautiful city of Canton.

LEVI F. BURTZ, farmer, Modesto, Cherokee Co., was born April 15, 1832, in Pendleton district, S. C., and is the son of Levi and Sallie Burtz. His parents were of German descent and were Quakers in religious training and belief. The father was a farmer and school teacher, and when Levi was about four years old brought his family to Georgia. Levi Burtz was the youngest of eight children and was given the benefit of the educational facilities offered by the common schools of Georgia. When he reached manhood he started in business for himself as a tanner and pursued the same with success until the civil war broke out. He was among the first to respond to the call of the South for volunteers, and, leaving family and business, he enlisted in 1861 in the Confederate service and served until the war closed. He was in the western army and in a number of notable battles. Chickamauga was probably the hardest fight for him. He was at Murfreesboro, Tenn., and Missionary Ridge, and was taken prisoner in Kentucky. After a few months' imprisonment he was exchanged and joined his regiment at Vicksburg. When the war closed Mr. Burtz returned to Cherokee county, his home, and resumed his business. In a few years he became interested in farming, which he has since continued. In January, 1893, Mr. Burtz was elected county treasurer and filled that office for two years. He has been a member of the Methodist church for forty-five years—since he was eighteen years of age—and holds a license as a local minister, issued in 1867. Mr. Burtz was married Aug. 28, 1851, to Hester Ann Dobbs, of Cherokee county. There were born to them five children—four living and one dead—Joseph M., Cicero M., George Allen, Sallie Marguerite, Franklin Pierce (deceased). All the children are married and all belong to the Methodist Episcopal church, as does Mrs. Burtz.

JESSE MILLER BURTZ, one of Cherokee county's prominent citizens, was born Jan. 22, 1825, in Pickens district, S. C. His ancestry on both sides were German-Dutch, and both of his grandfathers were in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, his mother's father serving under Gen. Greene in the battles of Guilford C. H., and Camden. Mr. Burtz' father moved to Georgia and located in Cherokee county in 1839, and died there March 13, 1875, aged eighty-two years. His mother died in 1840 in her forty-fifth year. Mr. Burtz was a boy only fourteen years old when he came with his parents to his new home in Georgia. He received a common-school education and learned the tanner's trade, and when of age entered into this business for himself. This he followed until the civil war broke out, at which time Mr. Burtz had made about $24,000. His devotion to the cause of the Confederacy was shown in his equipment of 156 men, whom he enlisted in the ranks and sent to the war. Of these there were not over twenty-five that returned from the conflict. Mr. Burtz was captain of Company F, Twenty-eighth Georgia regiment, and was first under Gen. Fetherston, later under Gen. Alfred H. Colquitt. He was in all the battles around Richmond, at the second battle of Manassas, Sharpsburg, Fredricksburg and at Ocean Pond, Fla. His health failing, he went into the cavalry service, and also conducted a tannery for the Confederate government. After the war Mr. Burtz spent fourteen years in Mitchell county, Ga. He was mayor of Camilla and representative of that county one term in the legislature. He was United States commissioner eight years and filled other offices of responsibility. He married Miss Eliza L. Mothershed, daughter of Isaac T. and Emma Mothershed. Mrs. Burtz came with her parents to Georgia in 1846 and was married Dec. 30, 1847. They have three living children: Charles, Franklin Pierce and Susan, wife of Mr. Stewart. Mr. Burtz is a Mason. After a long and busy life Mr. Burtz is pleasantly spending his declining days with his family on his fine farm near Canton.

ALFRED BURTON COGGINS, retired merchant, Canton, was born Oct. 22, 1838, in Gilmer county, Ga., and is the son of John Lilly and Elizabeth (King) Coggins. His father was born in Tennessee and his mother in North Carolina. They took up a home in Gilmer county before the Indians were removed to their reservation, and were among the first settlers of the county. They were devout members of the Missionary Baptist Church and brought their children up in the teachings of a Christian character. The mother died at the age of sixty-five years, but the father lived to be seventy-three, dying in May, 1891. Alfred Coggins was the third of nine children. He was sent to school in the neighborhood of his home, and at the age of twenty-one began life for himself as a farmer. A year later he was wedded to Miss Louisa Smith, daughter of Balus and Matilda Smith. This marriage has been blessed with nine children, all living, viz.: John Judson, Georgia, Kansas, Augustus Lee, Charles Cicero, Thomas Raleigh, Lillie, Maggie and Burton Franklin. Mr. Coggins was in the mercantile business twenty-six years, first in Gilmer county, afterward in Pickens county, and sixteen years in Canton. In 1894 he retired from active business life, though he has interests in the Coggins gold mines, which have been operated with a yield of $100 per ton. In May, 1862, Mr. Coggins enlisted in the Sixth Georgia regiment, (cavalry), Company D, under Gen. Wheeler. He was in a fight at Philadelphia, Tenn., at the siege of Knoxville, and in a number of other engagements, serving until the end of the war in 1865. Mr. Coggins is a member of the Missionary Baptist church of Canton, and belongs to the fraternal order of Knights of Honor. Mrs. Coggins is a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Coggins is a thorough business man, with an experience in life and knowledge of men that makes him invaluable in counsel. He has never taken an active part in politics, preferring to leave that to others. He is well acquainted in his section of the state and enjoys the esteem of all.

JOHN W. FIELD, M. D., is a practicing physician of Cherokee Mills. He was born in Cherokee county on March 22, 1872, was educated in the common schools, and finished his studies at Reinhardt Normal college. In 1890, having resolved to enter the medical profession, he commenced the study of that science under the guidance of his brother, Dr. Charles H. Field, of Kennesaw, Ga. Later, in 1891, he entered the Atlanta college of eclectic medicine and surgery, pursuing a full course of study in that well-known institution, and graduating therefrom on March 2, 1894, standing high in his class. Immediately thereafter he commenced the practice of medicine at Cherokee Mills, where he has already acquired a good and growing general practice, and is rapidly rising to merited prominence and acquiring an excellent reputation as a physician. The father of Dr. Field is Logan Field, of Cherokee Mills. He was born in Greenville district, S. C., on March 24, 1834. Nine years later he moved with his parents to Georgia, settling in Habersham county. At the age of eighteen he visited the west, traveling through the states of Texas, Arkansas and Kansas. Returning to Georgia, he settled permanently in Cherokee county. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Forty-third Georgia regiment, and participated in the battles of Bridgeport, Chattanooga and Tazewell, Tenn., Cumberland Gap, Richmond and Lexington, Ky. He fought at Murfreesboro, Chickasaw Bayou, near Vicksburg, Big Black River and throughout the entire siege of Vicksburg. After the capture of that city he was paroled, and later, having been exchanged, he was engaged at Missionary Ridge, Resaca, New Hope Church, Kennesaw Mountain, Peachtree Creek and throughout the siege of Atlanta. He then returned with Hood by way of Florence, Ala., and was engaged in the destructive battles of Franklin and Nashville. On the return from Nashville he was taken prisoner and confined at Camp Chase, Ohio, until June, 1865, when he was released. His military record is a remarkable one. He was a soldier who never shirked duty nor wanted courage. His family was ruined by the war. Three of his brothers died in the service of the Confederacy; one was killed in the battle of Chancellorsville, another wounded during the seven days' fight at Richmond, and died in the hospital, while the third died in the service. In 1859 Mr. Field was married to Miss Jane C. Rippie, daughter of Rev. A. J. Rippie, of Cherokee county. Two children were born of this marriage: Mary Levella, wife of Dr. J. W. Loringood, of Cherokee county; his other child, together with his wife, died during the war. In 1868 Mr. Field was again married to Miss Minerva Kennett, daughter of George Kennett, of Cherokee county, and by this marriage they have four children: Dr. Charles H. Field, of Kennesaw, Ga., the subject of this sketch; Mattie E. and Sally L. The father of Mr. Field was Gen. J. R. Field, a native of Gifford county, N. C. He was a prominent citizen of Habersham county, where he died at the hands of an assassin, in Clarksville, in 1846. The mother of Mr. Field was Polly Perkins, daughter of William Perkins, of Lincoln county, N. C. She died in Cherokee county in 1889. By their marriage J. R. and Polly Field had nine children: Catherine, wife of Presley Payne; Mary Jane, wife of P. Iry; Eliza, wife of W. H. Ferguson; Nancy, wife of R. M. Fortner; Susan, wife of A. B. Iry; William, who died in the service of the Confederacy at the commencement of the war; Joseph W., wounded in the seven days' fight at Richmond, and died in the hospital; John W., killed at the battle of Chancellorsville, and Logan Field. The family of Mr. Field on his mother's side is of Scotch-Irish descent, and on the side of his father is of English descent.

JAMES GORDON KINCAID, of Cherokee county, is a native of Arkansas, where he was born in 1870. In 1876 he settled with his parents near Hickory Flat, in Cherokee county, where he was reared and educated, and where he now resides. He has acquired a practical knowledge of mechanics, and is engaged in manufacturing and agriculture, conducts an excellent farm and a saw-mill, of which he has made a success in the manufacture of lumber. In 1891 Mr. Kincaid was married to Miss Bana Barrett, daughter of B. and Lerina Barrett, of Cherokee county. They have had two children: Mattie Ozella, born March 13, 1892, who died Sept. 1, 1893, and Benjamin Jefferson, born April 18, 1894. The father of Mr. Kincaid is William J. Kincaid, a native of Georgia. In 1868 he settled in Arkansas and removed to Georgia in 1876. He now resides in Cherokee county. Early in 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate service, in the Second Georgia regiment. He served through the war and participated in the first and second battles of Manassas, in the seven days' fight in defense of Richmond, and in most of the engagements of the army of northern Virginia. The mother of Mr. Kincaid was Mary A. Ragsdall, who was born in Cherokee county, Ga., and is still living. Mr. Kincaid belongs to a family of five children: Mattie, Mrs. C. W. Miller, Tennessee; Odella, Oscar, Oda and James. Mr. Kincaid is a young man of engaging presence and agreeable manners, and bids fair to succeed in life.

ADONIRAM SYLVESTER KING, farmer, Canton, was born March 22, 1837, in that part of Buncombe county, N. C., which is now Henderson county. He was the son of Benjamin Franklin and Mary Ann King. The father was a native of North Carolina, and his father and grandfather were Virginians. Mr. King is of Irish-English ancestry. His great-grandfather was of Scotch-Irish and English parentage, and his great-grandmother on his father's side was Irish. His paternal great-grandfather was a soldier in the revolutionary war. Benjamin King was a Baptist minister and large planter. With his wife he came to Georgia in 1845, and located in Whitfield county. He enlisted in the Confederate army and was made captain of Company F, Thirty-third Georgia regiment. Mr. Adoniram King was a member of Company F, Second Georgia regiment, and after twelve months' service he re-enlisted in Company B, Forty-third regiment. The first year he was in the army of Virginia, and later in the western army. He was in the first and second battles of Manassas, Upson heights, Evansville, and a number of lesser engagements, when in the Virginia army. He was in the battles of Chickamauga, Tenn.; Bridgeport, and near Knoxville, and was through Kentucky, engaging in the fights at Crab Apple, Perryville, Henderson, and thence to Tennessee, participating in the battles of Franklin and Murfreesboro. He was at Vicksburg, Miss., and in a battle at Bull's Run, near Vicksburg, where he was struck by two balls, one fracturing his hip and lodging in his back-bone, and one striking his leg below the left knee, fracturing the bone. He was left on the field for dead, and remained there for a day and night. When found he was put in charge of the enemy and was sent to Enterprise, Miss., to the hospital. When his father returned from the Virginia army he brought the son home, where he remained until the battle of Chickamauga. He entered this memorable fight on one crutch and a stick. When Mr. King was transferred from the army of Virginia to the western army he was major of the drill. He was at Lookout mountain and Missionary ridge, and in the campaign from there to Atlanta. He was in all the engagements around Atlanta, and was captured there, July 31, 1864, and sent to Johnson's island. Mr. King was married, May 19, 1859, to Miss Martha Matilda Evans, daughter of John and Elizabeth Evans, of Cherokee county, Ga. There were born to them one son and three daughters: Jackson Sylvester, born June 21, 1861; Martha Theo-dosia, born April 19, 1864; Mary Elizabeth, Jan. 7, 1867; Talulah Christina, April 20, 1869. After the war Mr. King removed his family to Arkansas and resumed his farmer's life. While living there, in 1871, the wife died, and Mr. King immediately returned to Georgia, locating on a farm near Atlanta, where he remained three years. From there he moved to Meriwether county, where, July 18, 1875, he wedded Miss Nancy Reader Folds. This union was favored by the birth of six children: Thomas Erwin, born April 28, 1876, died in infancy; Olin Carlton, born May 14, 1877, died in infancy; Benjamin Adoniram, July 9, 1878; William Theophilus, July 9, 1881, died in childhood; Marion W., Sept. 11, 1883, and Luther Franklin, born July 5, 1887. Mr. King returned to Cherokee county in the early part of 1886. He has been engaged in farming all his life. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal church nearly a quarter of a century, and his wife is of the same religious faith. Mr. King has been a class-leader, superintendent of the Sunday school and steward of the church for years. He is a man of strict probity, and by his energy and industry and fair dealing with his fellow-man has prospered.

PATTERSON HAMPTON LYON, mayor of Ball Ground, Cherokee Co., was born March 14, 1836, in Rutherford county, N. C., and is the son of Asher John and Nancy Lyon. Mr. Lyon's grandfather was John Lyon, and was a native of North Carolina, in which state his ancestors for the past century have lived. Mr. Lyon's father and grandfather on his father's side moved to Cherokee county in 1847, and took up a home at a place one and a half miles from where Mr. Lyon now lives. His father was a school teacher, and taught in North Carolina and Georgia, and while following this vocation in Missouri died in 1875, in his sixty-third year. There were born to Asher and Nancy Lyon thirteen children: Patterson H., John Benjamin, Peter Calvin, Stephen, Elizabeth D., David Benedict, Merrit Rickman, Amanda, Virginia, Abram Asher, Millison, Emily, and Joseph Emerson Brown. Mrs. Nancy Lyon died in 1859 at the age of forty-two. Mr. Lyon's grandfather on his father's side died in 1873 in his eighty-first year, and his grandmother died in 1875 at the age of eighty-three. Mr. Lyon was eleven years old when his father came to Cherokee county, and in his boyhood attended the schools of the neighborhood and received private instruction at the hands of his father. When he reached his twenty-first year he began farming for himself. When the war broke out Mr. Lyon enlisted for six months in the state militia, and in May, 1862, he joined Company A, Forty-third Georgia regiment, under Col. Harris. He was in the battle of Chattanooga in 1862, at Tazewell, Cumberland Gap, Tenn., Covington, Ky., Lancaster, and Richmond, Ky. He participated in an engagement near Vicksburg, Miss., and at Baker's creek, where he had part of his ear shot off. He was in the forty-seven days' siege of Vicksburg, and was wounded in the leg on the Kennesaw line July 1, 1864. In 1863, Mr. Lyon was made lieutenant of his company, and in September, 1864, was promoted to captain. The entire company was captured at Jonesborough, Ga. Capt. Lyon was home on a furlough at the time, but before his leave expired he made up another company and led it into service. He was at Kingston, Ga., when Gen. Lee surrendered. Following the war Mr. Lyon engaged in the mercantile business at Marietta. He was deputy marshal and then marshal of that city for four years. In 1877 he moved to Ball Ground, to improve his property in that vicinity, and engaged in sawmilling. He owned several hundred acres of land where the town is now located when the railroad was built. He has since continued to look after his property and officiate as mayor, having been elected to this office five times. Capt. Lyon drew the charter for the town, and was the first mayor. He is an active member of the

I. O. O. F. Capt. Lyon was married to Miss Nancy A. Carpenter, daughter of Jacob D. and Sarah E. Carpenter, of Cherokee county. There were born to them twelve children: Alfred Cicero, Sarah Elizabeth, James Buchanan, Annie, Laura, Robert Lee, Lottie Belle, Cora Ophelia, Leila (deceased), Winnie Davis (deceased), Merrit Clifton, and Mamie. Eight are married, the last two named being single.

HOWARD WALKER NEWMAN, lawyer, Canton, Cherokee Co., was born in Knoxville, Tenn., July 16, 1840. His parents were Jacob and Caroline H. (Austin) Newman, natives of the valley of Virginia, the father being born in Shenandoah county and the mother in Albemarle county. Jacob Newman was a prosperous contractor. On both sides are found ancestors who served their country on the battlefields of the revolutionary war. Mr. Newman's grandfather, on his mother's side, was a near neighbor and intimate friend of Thomas Jefferson, and of the same politics of the great leader. His mother was a Baptist, and her husband, Jacob, was a free thinker. There were born to them seven children, of whom Col. Howard Newman was the youngest. His early education was had in the schools of Knoxville, and he completed his studies at Emory and Henry colleges in 1857. He further pursued studies at the East Tennessee university in 1858. He enlisted in the First Tennessee regiment (Peter Turney's regiment), Company C, and was made captain. He was in all the engagements that embraced the army of Virginia, and was with Gen. Lee at the surrender. He received several wounds while in service. After the war he read law under Gov. Peter Turney in Winchester, Tenn., and was admitted to the bar in 1866. He remained in Winchester, where he practiced his profession, until 1876, when he moved to Canton, Ga. Here he has since followed his profession with satisfactory results. In 1888, Col. Newman was a democratic presidential elector for the ninth Georgia congressional district. He was married Jan. 17, 1867, to Maggie, daughter of Judge Joseph Donaldson, of Cherokee county. Four children have blessed the union, only one of whom has been spared the parents—Howard Roy. Mr. Newman is an Odd Fellow, and has always taken much interest in the order. He has investments in farming lands, and devotes some attention to agricultural pursuits. Col. Newman is one of the leading lawyers of the Cherokee bar, and commands a large practice in county, district and the supreme court.

REV. JOHN WESLEY PAYNE, of Cherokee county, was born in Rutherford county, N. C., on June 5, 1820. In 1828 he moved with his parents to Habersham county, this state. In 1835 he settled in Lumpkin county. His occupation has been that of a farmer. At the commencement of the civil war, Mr. Payne was a strong Union man, having been schooled in the democracy of Jackson's day. During the war he rendered efficient service to the Federal government. During 1864 he was engaged as a scout and guide, and in January, 1865, he formally enlisted in the service of the United States, engaging in military duty, and acting as chaplain of his regiment during the remainder of the war. On Aug. 21, 1840, he married Miss Nancy Potts, daughter of Samuel Potts, of Habersham county. By this marriage they had nineteen children, seven of whom survive: Charles C., of Arkansas; William J., of Cherokee county; John C., of Pickens county; David A., of Bartow county; Susan, wife of J. B. Lively; Melinda, wife of Marion Anderson, and Louisa, wife of Adolphus Smith. The father of Mr. Payne was Charles C. Payne, a native of Rockingham county, Va., who married Sally Crowder, of North Carolina. He died in 1867, in Habersham county. The mother of Mr. Payne died in that county in 1841. His grandfather was Thomas Payne, also born in Rockingham county, Va. He commanded a company under Gen. Washington in the war of the revolution, and served throughout that struggle. He was a soldier of high character, and a citizen of worth and reputation. During his service as a scout in the late war, Mr. Payne was taken prisoner near Pine Log church, in Bartow county, by Wheeler's cavalry. He was first taken to Augusta, where an attempt was made to execute him as a spy. His life having been spared, he was sent to Augusta for trial, and on his way to that city he escaped from his guard by leaping through the car window. After enduring severe hardship, he finally made his way to his home in Cherokee county, traveling on foot, and experiencing the pangs of hunger and fatigue. His wife died on Feb. 19, 1891, and in May following he married Miss Sarah McCreary, of Pickens county, daughter of William and Catherine McCreary. Mrs. McCreary died in 1863. Mrs. Payne has two brothers and five sisters living: William, a resident of Indian Territory; John, of Kansas City, Mo.; Eliza, wife of Mr. Reagan; Martha, wife of Dr. David Wade, of Macon, Ga.; Nancy, wife of Mr. Hales; Hulda, wife of James Ledford, of Clay county, N. C., and Emily, wife of G. W. Little, of Pickens county. She had two brothers in the late war, one in the Confederate and the other in the Federal service. Mrs. Payne is a native of Lumpkin county, Ga., where she was born in 1843. Mr. Payne is an elder of the Church of Christ in Pickens county, and for thirty-seven years has been a minister of that church. Mrs. Payne is also a member of the Church of Christ.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN PERRY, a well-known newspaper man and insurance agent, and a prominent citizen of Canton, Cherokee Co., was born at Marietta, Ga., July 27, 1859, where he was raised and educated in the common schools of Cobb county, where he received a limited education. In 1876 he graduated at Moore's business college in Atlanta, where he attained an excellent record for efficiency in the course of study which he pursued at that well-known institution. After finishing his course he followed the occupation of clerk and book-keeper, and in that capacity his services were engaged by different prominent business houses in Marietta. In 1877-78 he was in the service of the Marietta Paper Manufacturing company, where he acquired a practical knowledge of the art of making paper. In 1871-72-73 he was in the employ of the Marietta "Journal" and there acquired a knowledge of printing. In May, 1879, he located at Canton, and became business manager of the Georgia "Advocate," an organ of the Methodist church south, until that paper was moved to Atlanta. In January, 1880, he established the Cherokee "Advance" at Canton. The paper succeeded fairly well, but as the rent paid for the material was exorbitant, he gave it up at the end of the year, and kept books for Capt. J. M. McAfee until January, 1884, when he bought, on credit, the materials, "good will" and books of the "Advance" and devoted himself to the building up of that newspaper. The paper had changed proprietors several times in the interval between 1881 and 1884, and had proved a business failure. By persistent work and close attention to business, Mr. Perry succeeded in paying for the outfit and has since put in new type, presses and a steam engine. The "Advance" is now on a firm basis and has over 1,400 subscribers. Mr. Perry's aim has properly been to make it a live, progressive, clean and pure newspaper, and he has made it the instrument for developing and advertising his section. In times of election and other important happenings, couriers on horse and the telegraph are employed to gather the fullest and most authentic information for earliest publication. Two instances deserve mention: The day after the cyclone of 1885, the "Advance" contained four columns of the most reliable account of it, the facts being obtained by Mr. Perry in a night's visit and stay in the devastated portions of Cherokee county. The morning after the meeting of the Georgia Press association at Canton in 1888 the "Advance" contained a full report of the meeting, including a synopsis of all the speeches delivered at the banquet only a few hours before. The Georgia Weekly Press association has honored Mr. Perry with its presidency, and the Georgia Press association with its vice-presidency. He is now secretary of the Georgia Press association. Mr. Perry is in his thirty-seventh year—he is the type of physical manhood and mental austerity. He is a gentleman of affable and agreeable presence, of polished manners and diffident bearing. He has doubtless a bright and promising future, and bids fair to reach the front rank in journalism, to the pursuit of which he is devotedly attached, and toward which he successfully directs a well-preserved energy, supported by a sense of high honor and business integrity. Mr. Perry has never sought nor desired political preferment, although frequently solicited to become a candidate for such honors. He was, however, a member of the town council of Canton from the time of its organization until a very recent period. In 1891 he was elected mayor of Canton without solicitation or desire on his part. In 1892 he was strongly solicited to become the democratic candidate for the office of senator in the thirty-ninth senatorial district of Georgia, comprising the counties of Cherokee, Milton and Forsyth, but a dislike for political advancement and a sense of duty to his profession as a journalist induced him to decline the proffered honor, although the nomination was equivalent to an election. Mr. Perry is an active member of the Methodist Episcopal church south, and is superintendent of the Sunday school in that church at Canton. He has been president and secretary of the County Sunday School association, of which association he is now vice-president. He is also superintendent of the Sunday school association of the twenty-first district of Georgia, comprising the counties of Cobb, Cherokee, Milton and Pickens, which position he also held in 1892. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and is secretary of Royal Arch lodge, No. 71, and holds the same office in Masonic lodge, No. 77. He is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which lodge he has also been secretary, vice grand, etc. He has always taken an active part in temperance work, and organized a lodge of Good Templars at Canton in 1880. Mr. Perry is ever ready to advance the temporal and industrial interests of his town and section, and was instrumental in establishing the bank of Canton. He is a member of the board of directors of this bank and is secretary of the board. On March 27, 1893, he was appointed postmaster at Canton, and was the first postmaster of the fourth class appointed in the state of Georgia under the Cleveland administration of 1893-97. At the death of James L. Jordan, clerk of the superior court of Cherokee county, in the fall of 1892, Mr. Perry was appointed to fill out the unexpired term, which appointment he accepted, but he declined to become a candidate at the general election in January, 1893, although urged to do so as the democratic nominee. In January, 1894, he was elected a member of the board of education of Canton public schools for the term of six years. On June 24, 1880, Mr. Perry was united in marriage to Miss Addie Blanche Upshaw, daughter of John R. Upshaw of Alabama. Seven children were born of this marriage: Mabel Blanche, born Feb. 17, 1882; Benjamin Franklin, born June 14, 1883; Clarence Atkins, born March 23, 1885; Charles Roe, born Dec. 13, 1886; Mattie Estill, born Nov. 26, 1888; Ella Grady, born Nov. 5, 1890; and Julia Thene, born May 5, 1893. The father of Mr. Perry was Anselum Roe Perry, a native of South Carolina, where he was born March 30, 1826. He settled in Georgia early in the fifties. His occupation was that of a paper maker and book-binder. On Oct. 18, 1855, he married the mother of the subject of this sketch at Marietta, Ga. Her maiden name was Parthenia Adeline Gault. She was the daughter of Joseph Gault, a prominent lawyer of Marietta. She is still living with her son in Canton. Anselum Roe Perry died at Marietta March 4, 1872.

WILLIAM T. SATERFIELD, educator and farmer, Ball Ground, Cherokee county, was born April 15, 1836, in Pickens county, S. C., and was the son of Thornton D. and Mary Ann (Powell) Saterfield. His immediate ancestry were natives of South Carolina and his grandfather Saterfield was a brave soldier in the revolutionary war. Mr. Saterfield's father came to Georgia in 1841, and located in Habersham county, now embraced in White county, eleven miles west of Clarkesville. Mr. Saterfield was only six years old at this time. He was educated at Zion high school, under the principalship of Prof. W. N. Swift. He left school when seventeen years of age to engage in teaching in White county, and from that time has labored in this profession. He has been interested at times in mercantile pursuits and in farming, but he has never relinquished his hold on the ferule. Mr. Saterfield enlisted in the first company that left Lumpkin county, which was rejected, after which he volunteered in Young's battalion and was honorably discharged after an active service of two years. Mr. Saterfield was married to Miss Susan C. Huff, daughter of John and Susan Huff, on Nov. 17, 1868. They have two children, one son and one daughter. Martha, a daughter, married Marcus L. Thatcher of Cherokee county. They have three children, William, May, and Ernest. Joseph M. Saterfield married Miss Josie Rudicil, of Cherokee county. They have two children, Joseph and Azzie. Mr. Saterfield has been a member of the Missionary Baptist church for fifteen years, and has served as clerk of the congregation with which he is connected. He is an Odd Fellow and a royal arch Mason, having been a member for thirty years of the masonic lodge and sixteen of the I. O. O. F. He has filled all the chairs in both fraternities. Mr. Saterfield has been a citizen of Ball Ground for three years, and by his honorable character has won the esteem and high regard of the people of this thriving town.

COL. JOHN J. A. SHARP, a well-known citizen of Cherokee county, residing at Walesca, was born in Pickens district, S. C., in 1828, where he was raised and educated. In December, 1853, he settled in Cherokee county, where he now resides. He taught school for two years and then engaged in mercantile business at Walesca until the commencement of the war. In 1857 he was commissioned colonel of militia. In August, 1861, he raised a company for the Confederate service, of which he was made captain. His company was attached to the Twenty-third Georgia regiment, commanded by Col. Thomas Hutchinson of Cherokee county. This regiment was ordered to Virginia and there was annexed to Colquitt's brigade. He participated in the siege of Yorktown and in the fight at Williamsburg and in May, 1862, his command was engaged in the battle of Seven Pines. His company suffered severely in this battle. His command was actively engaged in the seven days' fight in defense of Richmond and from there moved to Manassas by way of Orange court house, arriving on the field at Manassas too late to take part in the battle. He was next engaged at Sharpsburg, or Antietam, retreating to Winchester, destroying railroads and burning bridges on the route. At Winchester Col. Sharp, having previously received a major's commission, was placed in temporary command of his regiment and acted in that capacity until the battle of Chancellorsville. He was with his command in the battle of Fredericksburg, and in May, 1863, participated in the celebrated battle of Chancellorsville, where, after severe fighting, he was captured, together with 100 of his men. He was taken to the old capitol prison at Washington, D.

C., where he remained about twenty days a prisoner of war, yet kindly treated. Having been exchanged, he rejoined his regiment at Kingston, N. C. His command was next ordered to Richmond, Wilmington and James island, doing active duty at Morris island. After a stay of six months in the vicinity of Charleston he went with his command to Florida, where he met the enemy at Lake City and fought at the battle of Ocean pond, when the Federals fell back to Jacksonville. He encountered Butler at Drury's bluff and his regiment finally joined the army of northern Virginia at Second Cold Harbor. The fight at Cold Harbor was one of the severest battles of the war. After a siege lasting fifteen days the army returned to Petersburg and was engaged throughout the prolonged siege of that city, being constantly under fire for the ensuing three months. His division was next engaged at Fort Harrison and at Fort Fisher. After the fall of Fort Fisher, his command fell back to Wilmington, Kingston and Bentonville, where Col. Sharp was engaged for the last time in the defense of the Confederacy and the honor of the south. While leading his regiment in a charge on the enemy's breastwork on Sunday evening, March 18, 1865, he was severely wounded, having been shot down in the assault. He had given his best efforts to uphold the Confederate cause and now, at the close of the long contest, his blood was finally shed in its defense. He was carried from the field and removed to a hospital, and later was conveyed in the president's ambulance to Salisbury. His record throughout the war is the story of a career as active as it was chivalrous and patriotic, having been engaged in most of the historic battles fought by the army of northern Virginia. He was promoted first from a captaincy to be major of his regiment and later to be lieutenant-colonel, and frequently was its commanding officer. At the close of the war he returned to his home penniless, was elected to the lower house of the legislature and served one term. He was again elected to the legislature in 1873. He engaged in mercantile and agricultural pursuits at Walesca, in which he was successful. He has taken an active interest in promoting the mental welfare of his community and took a leading part in the establishment of Reinhardt Normal college at Walesca, of which he is an able supporter. Col. Sharp was first married in 1859 to Miss Martha Moss, daughter of David Moss of Cherokee county. She died during the war. On Nov. 18, 1868, he was again married to Miss Mary J. Reinhardt, daughter of Lewis W. and Jane Reinhardt. They have six children: Ramsey Colquitt, born Nov. 9, 1870; Homer Franklin, born Feb. 24, 1873; Hettie Marvin, born April 5, 1875; May Hampton, born April 11, 1877; Rubie Augusta, born Feb. 14, 1880, and Garnett White, born May 15, 1883. The father of Col. Sharp was John Sharp, a native of North Carolina, where he was born in 1805. He died in Pickens district, S. C., in 1880. The mother of Col. Sharp was Catharine White, daughter of Alexander and Agnes White. She was born in South Carolina about 1805. His paternal grandfather was John Sharp, a native of Germany, who migrated to North Carolina in his youth after the close of the revolutionary war. Alexander White, the maternal grandfather of Col. Sharp, was born and raised in Abbeville district, S. C., about the close of the revolution; he died in Pickens district, S. C., in 1852.

CLARKE COUNTY.

DANIEL M. AARON, merchant, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of John R. and Melissa F. (Mathews) Aaron, was born in 1845. Mr. Aaron's grandfather was born in the old dominion, but when a youth ran away from home and came to Georgia, where he settled and married, and where Mr. Aaron's father was born in 1815. The reason why his grandfather ran away from home was this: His father died when he was quite young and his mother married again. This last husband was cruel to his mother and one day when he was whipping her Mr. Aaron's grandfather seized an ax and threw it at his step-father, which hit and felled him to the ground. Without waiting to see the effect of his act he ran away from home and came to Georgia. Although Mr. Aaron's great-grandfather left a very good property when he died, his grandfather was afraid not only to return to his native state, but to make inquiry about any share he might have in the patrimony. Farming was the principal occupation of Mr. Aaron's father, but during the late civil war he worked in a cotton mill, making cloth and clothing for the soldiers. Mr. Aaron had the misfortune to lose his arm when he was nine years old while working in a cotton factory, but received a very good common-school education. He taught school awhile when a young man and then worked in a cotton mill ten or twelve years, at the same time conducting a farm. About six years ago he came to Athens and engaged in merchandising and is doing a very good business. Attentive and accommodating and prompt in meeting his obligations, monetary, religious and social, he enjoys the confidence of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Aaron was married in 1871 to Miss Melinda, born in Franklin county, Ga., daughter of John and Sallie Bennett, who has borne him nine children. Those living are Sarah M., Melissa J., Mary E., Nancy C., William R., Walter J., Upson and Henry. He is a member of the I. O. F. F. and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

REV. SAMUEL BENEDICT, deceased, doctor of divinity, was born of Congregational ancestry in Litchfield, Conn., Sept. 16, 1824. He first became interested in the Episcopal church through the friendship of the Rev. Dr. Payne, rector of the parish at Litchfield, but he was not confirmed until his freshman year in college. He was graduated from Trinity college, Hartford, Conn., in 1847, at the head of his class. After leaving college he was for a time head master of the Episcopal academy at Cheshire, Conn. He then studied theology at the Berkley Divinity school, finishing his course there in 1850. On Nov. 20, of that year he was ordained deacon by Bishop Brownell. Shortly afterward he was appointed tutor and then adjunct professor of ancient languages in Trinity college. He was ordained priest in 1853. His first charge in the ministry was St. James parish, West Hartford, for four years, from 1852 to 1856. He was afterward assistant minister to the famous Dr. Croswell, in Trinity parish, New Haven, for two years, from 1856 to 1858. He was next rector of St. James' church, Marietta, Ga., for nine years, from 1858 to 1867, with the exception of eighteen months during the war, when he was curate of St. Andrew's church, Gumsby, Canada; then rector of St. John's church, Savannah, Ga., for ten years, 1867 to 1877, and finally rector of St. Paul's church, Cincinnati, Ohio, for fourteen years, from Oct. 23, 1877 to Oct. 6, 1891, when he died, aged sixty-seven years. His honors and services were many and marked. The honorary degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon him by William and Mary college, Virginia, in 1870. For several years he was a member of the standing committee of the diocese of Georgia; was chairman of the standing committee in southern Ohio from 1880 to 1889, and for twenty-one consecutive years was deputy to the general convention. There he was long distinguished as one of the committee on amendments to the constitution; and more recently as a member, also, of the committee on the revision of the Hymnal. In 1888 he was nominated for assistant bishop of the diocese of southern Ohio; and in all the diocesan conventions bore a prominent and influential part.

SAMUEL CALDWELL BENEDICT, physician and surgeon, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Samuel (D. D.) and Julia Bush (Hicks) Benedict, grandson of Andrew Benedict, was born at Hartford, Conn., Sept. 20, 1855. His early school days were passed in Savannah and Marietta, Ga., and he received the degree of bachelor of arts in 1876 from the university of Georgia. He taught school and raised the money necessary for his collegiate and medical education; he also spent three years at hard work on a farm, which gave him a fine physique and stamina. He attended one year's lectures at the Medical College of Georgia, Augusta, and two courses at the Miami Medical college, Cincinnati, Ohio, receiving from the latter the degree of M. D. in 1879. He was resident physician to Cincinnati hospital in 1879-80; and was acting assistant surgeon, United States army, 1880-81, chiefly in the field, and in charge of field hospital at Fort Cummings, New Mexico, in the war against the Apaches, under Victorio, and first settled in civil practice at Athens, Ga., in 1882, which has since been his home. He has been professor of medical jurisprudence in the university of Georgia law school since 1883; and was appointed by Gov. John B. Gordon delegate from Georgia to the quarantine conference, Montgomery, Ala., in 1889. By appointment of Gov. Northen he was a delegate from Georgia to the Pan-American Medical congress in 1893, and was made honorary chairman of section on railway surgery. He is a member of the Medical Association of Georgia, American Medical association, National Association of Railway Surgeons, of which he was vice-president in 1892; of the committee on medical legislation for Georgia; surgeon for the Clarke Rifles, and for several railway companies, and medical examiner for several life insurance companies. He is also a member of the association of Acting Assistant Surgeons, United States army. In 1894 he was orator of the Georgia Medical association—his subject being: Suggestion and Its Therapeutic Value. Among Dr. Benedict's more important papers are: Aseptic vs. Antiseptic Surgery, Transactions Medical Association of the State of Georgia, 1886; The Value of Blood Clot for Dead Spaces, Transactions National Association of Railway Surgeons, 1892; Pathology and Pathological Anatomy of Injuries to Spinal Cord Without Fracture of Vertebrae, idem, 1893. Dr. Benedict's most important surgical operation was reported in the "Medical Record," March 5, 1892—An Enormous Congenital Umbilical Hernia Without Cutaneous Covering; Operation and Recovery; the first successful operation of the kind on record, and the child is now living. This operation excited much interest among the profession. Dr. Benedict is particularly interested in surgery and in diseases of children. He is a Knight of Pythias, of which he is past chancellor commander and past deputy grand chancellor of Georgia. Dr. Benedict was married July 27, 1882, to Miss Annie Rodgers Bloomfield, of Athens, Ga., and to them three children have been born: Ravaud, Nancy and Julia Benedict.

WILLIAM ELLISON BOGGS, D. D., LL. D., chancellor of the university of Georgia, Athens, was born in Ahmednuggur, presidency of Bombay, India, May 12, 1838. The family is of Scotch-Irish descent, and Dr. Boggs' ancestors emigrated to this country in 1704, and settled in Maryland, their descendants migrating southward to Virginia and the Carolinas. His grandfather, Joseph Boggs, was a native of South Carolina, served under Gen. Sumter during the revolutionary war, and was a famous scout and rifle shot. Dr. Boggs' father, Rev. George W. Boggs, was born in Pickens district, South Carolina, was a Presbyterian minister, and for seven years was a missionary in India, a work to which he was devoted, but was compelled to relinquish on account of the complete failure of his wife's health. It was during Dr. Boggs' early childhood that his parents returned by way of Liverpool, England, to Charleston, S. C. He received his preparatory education at Winnsborough, in that state, and then entered the South Carolina college, Columbia, from which he was graduated in 1859. Of his classmates but few survive the disastrous "war between the states." After his graduation he entered the Theological seminary, at Columbia, with a view to entering the Presbyterian ministry, where he remained until the spring of 1861, when he served as a private in the Sixth South Carolina regiment. At the end of active operations for the year he resumed his studies, was ordained, and in the spring of 1863 returned to his regiment as its chaplain, serving as such until with his command he surrendered at Appomattox. After that event he returned to his home in South Carolina and preached a year in Winnsborough, when he was called to the pastorate of the Presbyterian church at Columbia, S. C. In 1871 he accepted a call from the Second Presbyterian church in Memphis, Tenn., where he remained through the fearfully fatal yellow fever epidemics of 1873, 1878-79. In December, 1879, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Central Presbyterian church in Atlanta. After three years' acceptable service there he resigned—in the fall of 1882—to fill the chair of church history and government in the Presbyterian Theological seminary at Columbia, S. C. He retained that chair until the case of Dr. James Woodrow came up, when Dr. Boggs, finding it impossible to condemn his colleague because of his scientific opinions, resigned his professorship, and returned to Memphis to resume the charge of the church, of which he had been pastor formerly. At this post he remained until the spring of 1889, when he was elected to and accepted the chancellorship of the university of Georgia. Dr. Boggs has been the recipient of the following collegiate degrees: In 1859 he received the degree of A. B. from the South Carolina college; later, the degree of D. D. was conferred on him by the Southwestern Presbyterian university, at Clarksville, Tenn., and the degree of LL. D. by the Central university of Kentucky, at Richmond. As an educator, and as an educational administrative official Dr. Boggs ranks with the foremost in the Union, and is placing Georgia's university on a high plane as a scholastic institution. Dr. Boggs was married in 1870 to Miss Marion A., daughter of the late Adam L. Alexander, Esq., of Washington, Ga., and to them there have been born six children, of whom five survive—four sons and one daughter.

SAMUEL DOWSE BRADWELL, the ex-state school commissioner of Georgia, was born in Liberty county, Ga., Jan. 5, 1840, on his father's farm near the little village of Hinesville, the county seat. His father was an educationalist and gave his son his primary education up to the age of thirteen, when the father died. The son then attended the private schools in Liberty county for the next three years, and at the age of seventeen went to Oglethorpe university near Milledgeville. This was a Presbyterian institution, from which Mr. Bradwell, with the Rev. Dr. Samuel Knox Talmage, uncle of the famous Brooklyn divine, graduated in July, 1859, with the degree of A. B. The late poet, Sidney Lanier, was also one of his classmates. On leaving Oglethorpe university, Mr. Bradwell came to Tattnall county and taught school there until 1861, when he returned to Liberty county and took charge, as principal, of the academy in which his father had taught for many years, and which was afterward known as Bradwell institute. He remained there from January to August, 1861, when he organized a company known as the Liberty Volunteers, of which at the age of twenty-one he was elected captain. The company was assigned to the Twenty-fifth Georgia infantry and known as Company H. Capt. Bradwell served as such officer until July 22, 1864, when he was incapacitated from further service by wounds received at the battle of Atlanta, which obliged him to go on crutches for four years thereafter. Capt. Bradwell was in the following battles: Secessionville, S. C., Jackson, Miss., Chickamauga, Resaca, Rocky Face, Powder Springs (where he was slightly wounded in the left hand), Atlanta (where he was wounded by the fragment of a shell which kept him in bed for seven months and on crutches for four years). For three months he lay in bed and taught school, slowly recovering from his terrible wound in his right leg. About a dozen of his old scholars came to his room. Neither they nor their parents had anything to pay him, but whenever they could get a chicken, duck, turkey, or anything that a man in his condition could relish they would bring it to him. While Capt. Bradwell was thus lying on a sick-bed, the Federal general, Kilpatrick, and his command camped near by, and, of course, swept the country clean of everything required by a man in Capt. Bradwell's state of convalescence. While he needed delicacies he was, in fact, deprived of everything except the very coarsest food, several times having nothing but dried peas. Some of the Federal soldiers, however, were good to him, bringing him occasionally a fowl or some delicacy they had secured by foraging. After his recovery he returned to Tattnall county, and there taught for one and a half years. Then he returned home, took charge of the old academy, and within a year, on a capital of $150, started the Hinesville "Gazette," a weekly newspaper, conducting the dual enterprise for twenty years. He taught himself to set type, and though the paper at first was not much larger than a sheet of foolscap, he built it up until it had a circulation of 1,500 weekly and was of good size. For four or five years Capt. Bradwell lived five miles from a railroad and was compelled to carry his edition that distance to the depot. To his school came scholars from fifteen counties in Georgia. He was noted as a successful teacher, and was beloved by his scholars. Twenty-six children are named after him by his old-time pupils. Capt. Bradwell retired from active educational life in 1890, having been appointed in December of that year, state school commissioner, the duties of which he assumed Jan. 1, 1891. While compelled to seek the aid of crutches Capt. Bradwell studied law, and in 1867 was admitted to the bar in Liberty county under Judge W. B. Fleming of the superior court for the eastern circuit. Notwithstanding, Capt. Bradwell has never devoted himself to the legal profession, but has been somewhat prominent in politics. He was an elector for Hancock and English, and in 1886 was an unsuccessful candidate for a congressional nomination. In 1888-89 he represented the second senatorial district (Liberty, Tattnall and McIntosh counties) in the state senate, and was made chairman of the committee on common schools. In 1893 he traveled ten thousand miles in Georgia and made one hundred addresses on the educational question. He has some original ideas on this subject with relation to the negro as well as the white race, and will probably hereafter embody his views in book form, for which his newspaper experiences eminently qualify him. Capt. Bradwell was married Jan. 2, 1868, to Elizabeth, daughter of Col. William Clifton, his wife being a pupil of his when she was fourteen and he nineteen years old. She fell in love with him after the war when he was on crutches, it being another case of Othello and Desdemona, she loving him for the dangers he had passed. They had three children, one son and two daughters. Capt. Bradwell's father was James S. Bradwell, who was born in Liberty county, Ga., in 1796 and died in 1853. He was a lawyer, doctor and educator, but spent the best of his energies in teaching. Capt. Bradwell's grandfather was Thomas Bradwell, who was born in North Carolina, but came to Georgia, settling in Liberty county when he was a young man, and there he was married. He was a major in the war of 1812. Capt. Bradwell's great-grandfather was Nathaniel Bradwell, a native of North Carolina, and a colonel in the revolutionary war. He is supposed to have been the family's emigrant ancestor from England. Capt. Bradwell's maternal grandfather was Simon Fraser, a native of Scotland. Capt. Bradwell never tasted a drop of intoxicating liquor in his life, and his whole experience has fitted him well for the proud position he so creditably and honorably filled.

WILEY BAXTER BURNETT, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Rev. Jackson S. and Mary E. (Alexander) Burnett, was born at French Broad, N. C., July 9, 1852. His father was a native of Tennessee and a Methodist preacher; during the latter part of the war he was in the Confederate service, and died in 1894, aged seventy-three years. His mother was a daughter of Mitchell Alexander, a very prominent citizen of Asheville, N. C. His parents raised three children to maturity: Alice F., deceased in 1868, wife of W. C. Kirkland; Wiley B., the subject of this sketch; and Wilbur E., cashier of the National bank of Spartanburg, Spartanburg, S. C. Mr. Burnett's parents refugeeed soon after the beginning of the civil war to Spartanburg, S. C., where he was schooled at Wofford college and remained until 1869, when he went to Boston and engaged as traveling salesman in the south for a wholesale shoe firm. He remained with the firm until 1879, when he came to Athens and in partnership with C. W. Baldwin established the shoe firm of Baldwin & Burnett. He continued in this business until 1884, when he sold out, commenced the study of law, and in 1885 was admitted to the bar, securing at once a good practice and an influential clientage. In 1888 the law firm of Lumpkin & Burnett was founded, special mention of which will be found in the sketch of Edwin K. Lumpkin in these Memoirs, indicating an influential clientage of large volume and value. During President Cleveland's first administration he was postmaster at Athens. Mr. Burnett was married in December, 1872, to Miss Annie R., daughter of the late Maj. Abram Jones, of Trenton, S. C., the fruit of which union are five children: Mary L., wife of Howell Cobb, Jr., Athens; Jackson Wilbur, Annie R., Fannie L., and Wiley B. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and is a royal arch Mason.

JOHN R. CRAWFORD, merchant-farmer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Ebenezer S. and Mary E. (Richards) Crawford, was born in Madison county, Ga., in 1849. His paternal grandparents were John M. and Mary E. (Maddox) Crawford. His grandfather was a native of North Carolina, came to Georgia on horseback about 1800 when a young man, and settled in what is now Jackson county. He was a miller, and later in life bought land, cleared a farm and engaged in farming. He was a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. Crawford's father was born in Jackson county in 1831, was educated in the old field school taught in the dirt floor log house, and later at an advanced school at Woodstock. He enlisted under Capt. Dabney Gholston in the Thirty-seventh Georgia regiment, and though sick a great part of the time was in many hard-fought battles. He followed farming and saw-milling all his life, and was twice married. He was first married in 1848, and by this marriage had three children, of whom the subject of this sketch is the only survivor. He also had three children—Thomas B., Ebenezer S., and Mary E.—by his second wife. He died in 1866, and himself and wife were members of the Missionary Baptist church. Mr. Crawford's maternal grandparents, Royal and Rebecca (Towns) Richards, were raised in Madison county, and Mr. Richards conducted a farm and taught school. Mrs. Richards was a devout, working member of the Methodist church. Mr. Crawford was reared on the farm and received a very limited education. He began life on a farm without a dollar, lived economically, and worked hard six years without making anything. He then came to Athens and went into the mercantile business and opened a wagon yard. He has established a good and profitable trade, and an excellent reputation for correct business methods and integrity, and is a progressive and rising man. Mr. Crawford was married in 1866 to Miss Louisa J., daughter of John Y. and Sarah A. (Strickland) Williams. His wife's great-grandfather was John Williams, and her grandparents were Elijah and Amelia Williams. He was born in North Carolina in 1785, and came to Georgia in 1792 with the family, who settled in the woods. Mr. Crawford's wife died in 1870, leaving three children: Thurston C., Viola A., and Thomas R. In 1875 Mr. Crawford married Mary E., sister of his first wife, who has borne him three children: Elmer J., John A., and Mary J. Mr. Crawford and wife are members of the Missionary Baptist church.

ALEXANDER S. ERWIN, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Alexander and Catharine (Wales) Erwin, was born in Clarkesville, Habersham Co., Ga., July 19, 1843. His father was a native of North Carolina, came to Georgia in 1828, and engaged in merchandising in Clarkesville, where he died in 1876. His mother was a native of Connecticut. They were the parents of four children, three of whom were boys: William S., now deceased, was a prominent lawyer, a captain in the Eleventh Georgia cavalry regiment, and who subsequently represented Habersham county and the senatorial district in the general assembly; Joseph B., who was a quartermaster, and Alexander S., the subject of this sketch. Mr. Erwin was raised and educated in Clarkesville, where, in April, 1861, he enlisted as a second lieutenant of infantry in Phillips' legion, and after a year was made first lieutenant. In 1863 he was promoted to a captaincy, which rank he held at the time of the surrender. He was a gallant participant in Gen. Floyd's campaign in West Virginia, where he was engaged in few battles, but many skirmishes; second Manassas, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Chickamauga. Two days later, near Chattanooga, he was severely wounded in the right arm, which was crippled for life, and also in the hip. While at home convalescing he served in the conscription department. In January, 1865, he rejoined his command, near Richmond, and two weeks before that city was evacuated he came back to Georgia on post duty, which he was discharging when the war closed. On his return home he began the study of law, and in October, 1865, was admitted to the bar in Hiwassee, Towns county. He located in Clarkesville, where he practiced two years, and was solicitor of the county court of Habersham a year. In 1868 he resigned the office and came to Athens, where he made his permanent home. He has established an excellent professional reputation, ranks high as counselor and advocate, and is popular with all classes. He has been a member of the city council of Athens; in 1878 he was elected judge of the western circuit, and held the office four years—the circuit comprising eleven counties—and in 1885 was appointed a railroad commissioner by Gov. McDaniel, which he held six years. Judge Erwin was married, in 1872, to Miss Mary A., daughter of ex-Gov. Howell Cobb, a union which has been blessed with nine children, seven of whom are boys. Judge Erwin is a member of the Presbyterian church, of which he is a deacon.

JOHN GERDINE, physician, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of William L. and Lucy (Lumpkin) Gerdine, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Feb. 28, 1840, the eldest of sixteen children, of whom seven survive. His father was a prominent planter of Oglethorpe county, and his mother a daughter of ex-Chief Justice Joseph H. Lumpkin, the first chief justice of the supreme court of Georgia. When he was four years old his parents moved to Mississippi, where they lived ten years, and then came to Athens. Completing his preparatory education, he entered the university of Georgia, from which he graduated as Bachelor of Arts, in 1859. After studying medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. Joseph B. Carlton, he attended a course of lectures at Jefferson Medical college, Philadelphia, then went to the medical department of the university of Louisiana, from which he graduated in 1861. The war between the states having begun, he enlisted, May 12 of that year, as a private in Blythe's Mississippi regiment, and after serving a year as such was made assistant surgeon of the Ninth Confederate regiment. At the end of twelve months he was transferred to hospital duty at Durant, Miss., where he remained a year, and then was assigned to duty with Gen. Peter B. Starke. During his arduous and useful army service he was in the following, among other, battles: Belmont, Shiloh, near Grenada, and West Point, Miss.; Fort Pillow, Franklin, Spring Hill, Columbia, Johnsonville, Tenn., and Selma, Ala. Three of his brothers were also in the Confederate army. After the surrender he rode from Gainesville, Ala., to his old home, near West Point, Miss., where he followed farming a year, and then commenced the practice of his profession, which he successfully prosecuted there until 1876, when he came to Athens, which has since been his home, and where he has held important and honorable civic and professional positions. From 1880 to 1885 he was lecturer on medical jurisprudence in the university of Georgia. He is an honored member of the State Medical society, of which he was vice-president in 1888, and was censor from 1882 to 1887. In 1892-93 he served as alderman on the city council of Athens. A gentleman of the highest literary culture and professional attainments, none outranks him in the public esteem. Dr. Gerdine was married in Mississippi, in 1871, to Miss Susan, daughter of the late Thomas W. Golding—a union which has been blessed with nine children: Thomas G., Susan G., John, Lucy, William, Mary E., Sarah H., Lynton and Marion C. The doctor is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an elder.

J. H. GOSS, physician and surgeon, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., was born in Banks county, Ga., April 28, 1853. When ten years of age he went with his family to Fayette county, Ala., and after living there five years returned to Georgia, and was in the merchandise business for two years—during which time he studied medicine. He then attended the medical college at Louisville, Ky., from which he graduated in 1875. The ensuing year he took a post-graduate course at the same institution, after which he located in Madison county, Ga., where he successfully practiced his profession three years. He then went to New York, where he attended what is now the medical department of Columbia college. Returning home, he resumed his practice and continued it until 1889, when he took a course in the post-graduate school and hospital in New York, also a course in the New York Polyclinic, and attended the Loomis laboratory, in New York, from which he was graduated in 1889. He then came to Athens, where he located, in January, 1890, and commenced the practice of his profession. But in the winter of 1894 he returned to New York and took a special post-graduate course at Columbia college, and may now be considered as exceptionally well equipped and permanently located. He is a member of the State Medical association and of the American Medical association. He was a member of the ninth international medical congress, which met in Washington, D. C., in 1887, and also of the Pan-American medical congress, which met in the same city in 1893. Comparatively a young man, unquestionably devoted to his profession, and ambitious of attaining the highest excellence, he certainly has before him a brilliant professional career. Dr. Goss was married, in 1878, to Miss Everleila, daughter of John M. Montgomery, now deceased, of Madison county, Ga., by whom he has had three children: Ralph M., Agnes C. and Leila G. Dr. Goss is a Knight of Pythias, a member of the I. O. O. F. and a master Mason, and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, president Athens Electric Railway company, son of Robert Holman, was born in Bowling Green, Ky., in 1844. The family is of English extraction, and when members of it emigrated to this country they settled in Virginia. Mr. Holman's father was born in the "old dominion," followed farming all his life, and died in 1860, aged sixty years. Mr. Holman was reared and educated in Bowling Green, and in June, 1862, he enlisted in Company L, Second Kentucky regiment, which was assigned to the command of Gen. John H. Morgan. He was in the battle of Lebanon, Ky., besides some minor engagements and numberless skirmishes, and was with Gen. Morgan in his famous raid into Indiana and Ohio. He was captured during this daring incursion and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, and afterward to Camp Douglas, Ill., and held from July, 1863, to January, 1865, when he was exchanged and joined the army of northern Virginia. He afterward started to join Gen. Johnston's army at Greensborough, N. C., but learning that that general had surrendered his command, went to Charlotte, N. C., where President Davis was. From here Mr. Holman, with nine others, went to Salisbury, N. C., and escorted Gen. John C. Breckinridge to Charlotte to meet the president. From here President Davis and Gen. Breckinridge started for the trans-Mississippi department, under the escort of 1,500 men, Mr. Holman bearing a very conspicuous part in the movement. The party was headed off at Woodstock, Oglethorpe Co., Ga., and the president and Gen. Breckinridge having separated from the escort, the command surrendered. It will be observed that Mr. Holman bore a very hazardous and important part in the closing scenes of the war; that his relations were quite confidential with its illustrious chiefs, and that he was among the very last to surrender. During his service he was wounded—but only slightly—by both shell and saber. In 1868 he went into the live stock business in Bowling Green, in which he was successful and prosperous. Two years later he established branch headquarters in Athens, and in 1873, so satisfactory was his business, he moved to Athens to live—continuing his business at Bowling Green until 1877. He does a very large business, his sales amounting to more than 1,300 horses and mules annually. Besides transacting this business, he owns a dairy and stock farm near Athens; is president of the Athens Park and Improvement company, and of the Athens Electric Railway company. This is sufficient to show that he is a man of great energy and judicious enterprise, as well as unusual business capability. A brother of his—Leander—was in the Confederate service as a sergeant in the Ninth Kentucky regiment. He was captured, was a prisoner in Fort Delaware, and died in Philadelphia soon after his release, while on his way home. Mr. Holman was married, in 1877, in Danville, Ky., to Agnes, daughter of the late James Spears, who died in 1892, leaving five children: Annie, Mary, Lena, Maggie and Robert. Mr. Holman is an Ancient Odd Fellow, and worships at the Baptist church.

GEORGE H. HULME, wholesale grocer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of George W. Hulme, was born in Elbert county, Ga., in June, 1859. His father was a native of Elbert county, enlisted in the Confederate army when the civil war began and died at Richmond while in the service. When Mr. George H. Hulme was about nine years old he went with the family to Newton county, Miss., where he remained about eight years. Returning to Georgia he stopped in Franklin county a few months and then went to Hartwell, Ga., where he went to school two years and finished his education. He taught school one term in Hart county and about 1880 came to Athens and engaged as a clerk in a family grocery store. After clerking three years he commenced a retail grocery business on his own account, which he continued until September, 1894, when he changed his retail to an exclusively wholesale grocery business. Since he went into business for himself his trade increased rapidly and he has been exceptionally prosperous. He started on a capital of $2,000 and has done an annual business amounting to $200,000. He has already established a very large wholesale trade with a promise of its ultimately reaching immense proportions. Mr. Hulme was married in 1884 to Miss Willie, daughter of the late William Matthews of Athens, by whom he has had three children: George Harold, Jr., Kathleen and Marguerite. Mr. Hulme is a master Mason and a prominent member of the Baptist church.

JOHAN A. HUNNICUTT, capitalist and banker (retired physician), was born in Coweta county, Ga., Sept. 16, 1838. He was reared and schooled in his native county, among other schools attending Longstreet institute until 1858, when he went to Madison college, Madison county, Miss. In 1860 he graduated from this institution and returned to Georgia, where in 1861 he enlisted as a private in the Seventh Georgia regiment and served through the war, surrendering at Appomattox. He participated in the battles at Yorktown, Williamsburg, Wilderness (where he was slightly wounded), Petersburg and on the retreat to Appomattox. After the war he walked to Greensborough, N. C., and thence rode and walked via Salem, N. C., to Newnan, Ga. He taught school some months and read medicine, and then entered Atlanta Medical college, from which he graduated in 1866. Locating in Newnan he practiced his profession with growing reputation and steadily increasing patronage until 1870, when he moved to Athens, and has since been chiefly engaged in banking and various important enterprises requiring superior financial management. From 1883 to 1893 he was president of the Bank of the University, of which he is now one of the directors. Since his retirement from the presidency of that bank he has been president of the Athens Savings bank, and is also president of the Athens Gas company and the Athens Fertilizer company, and is on the board of directors of the Southern Mutual Insurance company, a position he has held for twenty years. He has served several terms as a member of the city council of Athens and also as mayor of the city. He was one of the best and truest and most progressive officials the city ever had, and has ever been foremost in any and every movement looking to the interest and welfare of the people and the upbuilding of the city—gas, electric lights and its sanitary improvement. For the poor and distressed he has always had a soft heart and an open purse. Dr. Hunnicutt was married Feb. 22, 1870, to Miss Mary L., daughter of the late Louis J. Deupree (of Huguenot lineage), by whom he has had eight children: Martha A., Lucy E., Deupree, Mary H., Sarah E., Eleanor K., John A., Jr., and Nellie G. Dr. Hunnicutt is a prominent member of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward and trustee.

EDWIN K. LUMPKIN, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Prof. W. W. Lumpkin (now of Atlanta), was born at the home of his maternal grandfather in Marion, Ala., Jan. 2, 1854. His paternal grandfather was Ex-Chief Justice Joseph Henry Lumpkin of the supreme court of Georgia. While yet very young his father returned with his family to Athens, where Edwin K. was reared and educated, graduating at the university of Georgia in 1872. Among his classmates were Judge John L. Hardeman of Macon, Ga., and Joel Hurt of Atlanta. After graduating as a civil engineer he followed that profession three years, when he engaged in farming and land surveying for three years. He then began the study of law under the preceptorship of Ex-Senator Pope Barrow, and in 1878 was admitted to the bar at Oconee superior court. He immediately located in Athens, his present home, where he rose rapidly in his profession, in which he now occupies a high rank. In 1888 he formed a partnership with W. B. Burnett, which still exists. He makes a specialty of anti-incorporation practice, in which his firm has been connected with a very large number of the most important cases which have been litigated. Mr. Lumpkin was the active moving power which forced the Southern Mutual Insurance company to distribute its immense accumulated surplus (about $1,000,000) in 1888. Mr. Lumpkin was married in 1878 to Miss Mary B., daughter of John G. Thomas of Milledgeville, Ga., and to them seven children—four girls and three boys—have been born. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

PATRICK HUES MELL, D. D., LL. D., late chancellor of the university of Georgia, Athens, was the second of the children and the eldest son of Maj. Benjamin and Cynthia (Sumner) Mell, and was born in Walthourville, Liberty Co., Ga., July 10, 1814. His father was a very wealthy planter, sympathetic and generous to a fault. Unfortunately he endorsed ruinously heavy for a friend, who, failing to meet his obligation Maj. Mell had to pay the debt, thereby wrecking his fortune. Under this financial reversal his health gave way and within two years he died, followed two or three years later by his widow. Thus Dr. Mell at the early age of seventeen found himself burdened with the care of a ruined estate and of his brothers and sisters. Generously relinquishing his portion of the patrimony saved from the wreck he started to work out life's problem—obtain an education and regain if possible the property and social position lost by his father's misfortune. Fortunately previous thorough training and good schooling had laid a foundation deep and strong on which to build. This was largely due to his excellent mother, and a friend of the family writes that he was "a perfect reproduction of his mother in form, in features, in character and in mind," proving the old saying: "That men of mark are chiefly indebted to their mothers for their superiority." In the excellent English and classical school at Walthourville the opportunity was afforded of paying for his higher studies by teaching the primary classes, of which he availed himself. He was soon offered a good position at an academy near Darien, Ga., which was under the direction of Col. Bradwell, where, as a teacher he could pay his way as before. In a letter written to him by his mother just before she died and while he was at school, the longings of the mother's heart and her influence over her boy stood out glowingly and lovingly in the following passage: "Earnestly as I wish a son of mine to be a minister, yet I tremble at the idea of educating and devoting a son to the sacred profession without previously satisfactory evidence that his own soul was right with God. My heart burns to see you in every sense of the word a true Christian. Other studies are very commendable and right, but let those which tend directly to religious subjects have the first place in your thoughts and affections. Let these pages, my dear boy, be a testimony before God and keep them as a sign between you and me, that I am in earnest as to a subject where indifference would be sin." The devoted mother did not live to see the fruits of her work, but God answered her prayers by giving to the country a noble life, the influence of which was felt for more than fifty years through the length and breadth of this southern land. In 1832, a few years after the date of the letter quoted from, Dr. Mell was baptized at North Newport Baptist church in Liberty county. His struggles to obtain an education attracted the attention of a wealthy gentleman—Hon. George W. Walthour—who offered to pay the expenses of a collegiate course. His offer was accepted and in 1833 he entered Amherst college, Amherst, Mass. To reduce expenses he taught during vacations and six weeks into the new term, keeping up with the studies and standing an examination on resuming studies in college. Being high-spirited, with a keen sense of independence, he determined to call on his benefactor for as little money as possible. For reasons of a private nature he declined further assistance before his college term closed. Subsequent unjust treatment on the part of the faculty and individual professors determined him to leave the college. With only five dollars in his pocket he walked to Springfield, twenty miles, found a vacancy in West Springfield and was installed as a teacher. This was in 1835. There he spent a year; then yielding to earnest solicitations he became associate principal of the high school in East Hartford, Conn., where he remained twelve months. About this time Col. McAllister of Savannah, a wealthy gentleman and formerly a friend of Maj. Mell, met him and offered to pay his way through Yale college, but he refused the proffered aid. Declining eligible offers he returned to Georgia in 1837 and engaged in teaching and preaching. In 1856 he was appointed to the presidency of Cherokee college, Ga.; principal of the Columbus, Ga., male high school; principal of the Baptist Female college, Talladega, Ala.; pastor of the Talladega Baptist church and professor of ancient languages in the university of Georgia. He declined all except the last; was elected and in January, 1857, entered upon the discharge of his duties. In accepting, however, he had stipulated that the duties of his chair should not disturb his relations with the churches at Antioch and Bairdstown, and that Sunday and Saturday of each week should be allowed him. This arrangement was maintained until he was elected chancellor of the university in 1878. In 1856 Dr. Mell was elected president of the Georgia Baptist convention, and except when kept at home by sickness was continuously re-elected until his death in 1888. In 1858 Freeman university of South Carolina conferred on him the degree of doctor of divinity. Dr. Church resigned the presidency of Franklin college (now university of Georgia) in 1859. This left vacant the chair of ethics and metaphysics, to which Dr. Mell was elected in 1860, holding it until it was abolished in 1872. He was a strong sympathizer with the south; so strong that when, in 1861, a company called the Mell riflemen was organized, he was tendered and accepted the captaincy and was duly commissioned by Gov. Brown. This company was assigned to Cobb's legion, and he was preparing to leave when, July 6, 1861, his wife died, leaving a large family of children—some quite young. He reluctantly resigned, but had he gone his family would have been left helpless and destitute. He contracted a second marriage Dec. 24, 1861, with Miss Eliza E. Cooper of Screven county, Ga., by whom he had six children, of whom five are living. In 1863 the people of Athens resolved to organize for the defense of north Georgia, and Dr. Mell was waited on by a committee of citizens and invited to take command with rank of colonel. He accepted, and the chancellor and faculty and nearly all the students joined, and the command went into camp at Rome, afterward at Savannah, served through the war and at its close was mustered out. On Jan. 1, 1866, the exercises of the university were resumed. In 1868 permission was asked of Dr. Mell to present his name for the presidency of the university of Alabama. Having determined to devote his life to Georgia he refused. July 2, 1869, Howard college of Alabama, conferred on him the degree of LL. D. As a presiding officer and parliamentarian he was regarded as having no superior, and in all the gatherings of his denomination he was quickly given a front position. This statement is verified by the fact that he was clerk of the Georgia Baptist association six years, 1845-46-1851, and afterward its moderator thirty years; secretary of the Georgia Baptist convention ten years, 1845-46-1855, and then president of it twenty-six years, and for seventeen years, to the date of his death, was president of the southern Baptist convention. In response to a request by resolution Dr. Mell prepared a manual of parliamentary practice, which was adopted and published by the southern Baptist convention in 1868. During the entire time he presided over the several conventions he encountered but one or two reversals. The Georgia Baptists had for a hundred years met on a certain day, but such was their esteem for him as a brother, and appreciation of him as a presiding officer, that in 1885 the day was changed to meet his convenience. Notwithstanding his arduous and multiplying engagements he found time to write and publish much. Some of his most highly prized publications are: On Baptism, History of Georgia Baptists, Predestination, Calvinism, God's Providential Government, Philosophy of Prayer, Keep the Sabbath, The Lord's Supper, Coming to Christ, College Government—the Dormitory System, University of Georgia—Defended, University of Georgia—Reply to Criticisms, The Fathers of Our Association (Georgia). Dec. 12, 1887, he preached his last sermon, and died Jan. 12, 1888, his last utterance being: "I commit my soul to God in Christ Jesus, glory be to God."

THOMAS SUMNER MELL, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Patrick H. and Lurene (Howard) Mell, was born in Athens Feb. 1, 1859. His father was chancellor of the university of Georgia (see sketch of Patrick Hues Mell in these memoirs). Mr. Mell was raised in Athens, where he enjoyed the very best educational advantages and graduated from the university of Georgia in 1878 with the degree of bachelor of arts, and in 1879 with the degree of master of arts and civil and mechanical engineer. He then engaged in the study of law and at the July term, 1880, of Oconee superior court was admitted to the bar. He stands high professionally, has a large practice and the confidence of the people and is very popular. In 1893 he was city attorney for Athens and in 1894 was elected to represent the county in the general assembly, and was appointed chairman of the committee on enrollment and member of committees on finance, general judiciary and rules. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, of the I. O. O. F. and of the Baptist church.

SYLVANUS MORRIS, professor of law, university of Georgia, Athens, son of Charles and Mary (Minor) Morris, was born in Goochland county, Va., Oct. 8, 1855. His father was a native of Virginia. In 1869 he came to Athens to accept the professorship of belles-lettres in the university of Georgia. Mr. Morris has lived since infancy in Georgia and was raised and educated in Athens. He graduated from the university with the degree of master of arts in 1875, then taught school in Athens two years, in the meantime preparing for the legal profession under the preceptorship of Ex-United States Senator Pope Barrow, now of Savannah, Ga. In 1877 he was admitted to the bar, entered into partnership with Hon. Emory Speer, now judge of the United States district court, southern district of Georgia, and located at Jefferson, Ga. This partnership was dissolved in 1878, when Judge Speer was elected to Congress and Mr. Morris moved to Athens, which has since been his home. He was appointed by Gov. Colquitt solicitor of the city court of Athens and held the office ten years, performing faithful and highly appreciated service, and for three years was connected with the law department of the Richmond & Danville railway. Prof. Morris was married in January, 1890, to Miss Annie L., daughter of Robert Walker Lewis of Richmond, Va. Two children were born to them, but both died. He is a member of the Protestant Episcopal church.

RUFUS LAFAYETTE MOSS, cotton commission merchant, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of John D. and Martha (Strong) Moss, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., Jan. 13, 1825. His father was a native of Mecklenburg county, Va.; came to Georgia and settled in Oglethorpe county in 1806, removed to Athens in 1854, where he died in 1863, aged seventy-one years. He was a soldier in the last war with Great Britain, and, after retiring from military life, he devoted his time and enegies to farming, owning plantations in Georgia and Alabama. In 1824 he married Miss Martha Strong, daughter of Charles Strong, of Hanover county, Va. Mr. Strong enlisted in 1781 as soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, was in the battle of Yorktown and present at the surrender of Cornwallis. Mr. Moss spent his boyhood days on his father's plantation in Oglethorpe county, and was educated in the country schools of the time. He began business when seventeen years of age, engaging as clerk with a general merchandise firm in Athens, receiving for the first fifteen months a salary of $150 and boarding himself. The next year he received $200, and the succeeding year $250. In 1846 he formed a partnership with Maj. Blanton Hill, and embarked in a general merchandise business in Athens, with a stock of $7,500. Five years afterward the partnership was dissolved, Mr. Moss selling his interest, the firm having cleared in that time $22,500. In 1851-52 he had charge of the Athens Foundry and Machine works, of which he was one of the original stockholders. His next venture was in a general merchandise store in Athens, with a branch store in Lexington, Oglethorpe Co., Ga. This business he successfully conducted for four years. Later, in partnership with W. H. H. White, he went into the dry goods business in Athens, under the firm name of Moss & White. In 1860 Mr. Moss bought his partner's interest and continued the business until the beginning of the civil war. In 1862 he enlisted under the command of Gen. Howell Cobb, and was assigned to duty in Florida as assistant clerk in the commissary department. In November, 1864, he was transferred to Atlanta and placed in charge of the commissary department there, retaining the position until the surrender. For eighteen months after the surrender, his health having been greatly impaired, he was disabled by sickness from engaging in business. On his recovery, he was placed in charge of Princeton (cotton) factory, which position he held for two years. Following this he went into the shoe business, and, later, took charge of the Pioneer Paper mill, located four miles from Athens. Resigning this position at the end of two years, he went into the cotton commission business, which he has conducted successfully to the present time, his first partner being Maj. John J. Thomas. His present partner is his son, John D. Moss. The uprightness, integrity and purity of the life Mr. Moss has lived before the people of Athens and the business world, have given to his financial standing the strength which has enabled him to stand firm in the midst of panics and hard times. As city councilman, by personally endorsing the notes of the town, he raised its credit from fifty cents on the dollar, to par value.

He was director of the State bank, at Athens, for ten years, and has been for twenty years director of the First National Bank of Athens. Mr. Moss was married in Athens in 1848 to Miss Mary Anthony, daughter of Rev. Samuel Anthony, one of the most influential and revered Methodist preachers of his time. This lady died a month after her marriage, while on their bridal tour, at Rome, N. Y. In 1856 he contracted a second marriage, wedding Miss Elizabeth Luckie, daughter of the late Dickinson Luckie, of Covington, Ga., a union which has been blessed with eight children, of whom six survive. Of these, Rufus Lafayette, jr., is an energetic young business man, rendering efficient service in the interest of the Central Railroad of Georgia; John D. Moss is the junior member of the firm of R. L. Moss & Co., and Wm. L. is a student of the state university. His daughters are, Mrs. Emmet J. Bondurant, Eliza B. and Sarah H. Moss. To say that Mr. Moss is a member of the Methodist church, and has been a steward therein for forty years, fails to give an idea of the beauty and benevolence of the straightforward, simple, Christian life of this venerable southern gentleman, the motto of whose life seems, to one who knows him, to be, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth."

B. PHINIZY. No two names in Georgia, particularly in Clarke county, are more widely and none anywhere more honorably known, than those of Billups and Phinizy—the first in legislative and political circles, the last as progressive business men and financiers, and both in the very best social circles. The best blood of both mingles in Billups Phinizy, banker, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., who was born in Augusta, Ga., Feb. 27, 1861. When only two years old he was brought to Athens by his parents, where he was educated and grew to manhood. He took an engineering course at the university of Georgia, completing it and graduating in 1881. His first business venture was in the grocery business, which he carried on with profitable results for seven or eight years. He is now president of the Bank of the University and of the Athenaeum company. He is also a director of the Southern Mutual Insurance company, and of the Athens Manufacturing company; and, also, senior partner of the cotton firm of Phinizy & Griffin, positions which bear ample testimony that his fellow-citizens recognize in him the very highest business sagacity and qualifications and financial ability. Mr. Phinizy was married in 1886 to Miss Nellie, daughter of Bolling A. Stovall, and to them four children have been born: Anna B., Bolling S., Mattie S., and Nellie. He is a prominent member of the Presbyterian church.

REUBEN NICKERSON, president Athens Hardware company, Athens, Clarke Co., was born in Bucksport, Maine, in 1829. The family is of English-Scotch extraction, Mr. Nickerson being the youngest of eight children, of whom two, beside himself, are now living: Sarissa B., widow of Capt. Rufus Cole, and Isaac H., now of Athens. After receiving his primary education, he was apprenticed to learn the machinist trade at Bangor, Maine. In 1851, on the completion of his term, he went to Rensselaer institute, Troy, N. Y., where he perfected himself in drafting. He went thence to Schenectady, N. Y., where he obtained employment for a year in the locomotive works. He came to Athens in 1853 and engaged with the Athens Foundry and Machine works, of which, at the end of three months, he was placed in charge, and retained the position for thirty years. His administration of its affairs proved to be in the highest successful and profitable. When he assumed the management the company was heavily in debt; he not only paid off the indebtedness, but largely increased the capacity of the works and improved them, and made it dividend-paying stock. In 1866 he embarked in the hardware business in Athens, with A. K. Childs, under the firm name of Childs & Nickerson, which later was changed to Childs, Nickerson & Co. This firm was succeeded in 1889 by the Athens Hardware company, of which Mr. Nickerson was made president. Its business has been large and profitable. He is also president of the Santee Mining Company of Georgia; a director of the Bank of the University, and in the Southern Mutual Insurance company. He has served two terms on the city council of Athens, and has also been a member of the county board of school commissioners. In 1859 he was largely instrumental in organizing the Athens fire department, and was the first captain of Athens Fire Company No. 1. Mr. Nickerson was married in Augusta in 1855 to Miss Maria E., daughter of the late John Cook, who was a native of New York—but he has had no children. He is a royal arch Mason, and an ardent working member of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward, and for thirty years has been a Sunday-school superintendent.

JOHN J. C. McMAHON, banker, Athens, Clarke Co., son of Allen and Rhoda (Stokely) McMahon, was born in Newport, Cocke Co., Tenn., Dec. 30, 1846. His paternal grandfather was a native of North Carolina; and his father was born in Tennessee. His father was clerk of the superior court of Cocke county fifteen years; and was then elected judge of the inferior court, and held the office until his death in 1856. He raised six children: Elizabeth, wife of Stephen Huff, Oglethorpe county, Ga.; Eveline, deceased, wife of Jasper Hopkins, Crawford, Ga.; Royal A. McMahon, Oglethorpe county; Mary Ann Louisa, wife of J. P. Wilson, Athens; John J. C., and Martha E., wife of Henry M. Witcher, Athens. Mr. McMahon's maternal great-grandfather—Stokely—was an Englishman, and came to this country before the revolutionary war, during which he served in the Continental army. His mother, who died in 1882, was a daughter of Royal Stokely. Mr. McMahon was raised and educated in Cocke county, Tenn., where, in August, 1864, he enlisted as a private in the Fifth Tennessee cavalry, and served until the end of the war. He was in the battles of Averasboro and Bentonville, N. C., and surrendered at Greensborough. After the war he came to Cobb county, Ga., hauled wood for the railroad about four months, and then returned to Tennessee. He made a crop there in 1866, then came back to Cobb county in February, 1867, and farmed a year. He went thence to Crawford, Oglethorpe Co., where, after clerking for his uncle five years, he opened a store and operated it six years. In 1878, under the firm name of Stokely & McMahon, his uncle and himself formed a partnership, and did business in Crawford. Retaining his interest in the store in Crawford, Mr. McMahon went to Augusta and engaged in the cotton business; and, after remaining there four years, returned to Crawford and continued in business there until 1886, when he came to Athens and went into the clothing trade, in which he continued until 1895. In November, 1890, he was made president of the Exchange Bank of Athens, which responsible office he now holds. He is also a director in the Clarke County Building and Loan association. While living in Crawford he was postmaster two years, and was also elected a captain of militia. He is a man of superior business qualifications, energetic and enterprising, and has been unusually successful. Mr. McMahon was married in 1868 in Acworth, Cobb Co., to Miss Georgia, daughter of John M. Myers, and has five living children: Leila M., Robert I., Thomas C., James L., and Helen I. Mr. McMahon is an active and prominent member of the Baptist church.

J. E. POPE, physician and surgeon, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Cadesman and Susan E. (Atkinson) Pope, was born in Pike county, Ga., June 18, 1848. His father was a native Georgian whose life-pursuit was planting. He was born in 1789, was a soldier in the early Creek wars, and died in 1885 at the advanced age of ninety-six years. His mother was a native of the "Old Dominion." Dr. Pope lived in his native county until 1864, when he enlisted in the Georgia state troops, with which he served until the close of the war. During his short service he participated in the battle of Griswoldville, and in the battles around Savannah, where he was wounded in the neck. After the war he entered Emory college, Oxford, Ga., from which he was graduated in 1868, with the degree of arts bachelor. Three years later his alma mater conferred on him the degree of arts master. After his graduation he studied medicine in the office of Dr. J. C. Pope, in Eufaula, Ala., and in 1869 entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons (now medical department of Columbia college), New York, from which he was graduated in 1871. Returning to Georgia he located in Athens in 1872, where he has since resided, practicing his profession with pecuniary success and professional distinction. Professionally and socially Dr. Pope enjoys an enviable position. Dr. Pope was married in 1873 in Washington, Ga., to Miss Mattie, daughter of the late Judge Nicholas L. Wylie, and to them children as follows have been born: Clara B., deceased; Edwin N., deceased; Wilbur B., Henry L., Miriam, Cadesman, and Walter. Dr. Pope is a devoted member of the Methodist church.

J. H. RUCKER, cotton merchant, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of Tinsley W. Rucker, was born in Elbert county, Ga., Nov. 2, 1846. When he was eight years old his parents moved to Athens, where he was educated and grew to manhood. He was graduated from the university of Georgia in 1868 with the degree of A. B., in the same class with Henry W. Grady, W. W. Thomas, P. W. Meldrim, and others. After his graduation he went to Savannah and entered the employ of Garrard & Holcombe, large cotton merchants, with whom he remained until 1874. That year he returned to Athens, where he established himself as a cotton merchant, and has continued the business since. He is very public-spirited, and progressive or nothing, appreciating which his fellow-citizens of Athens have called him to their service for two terms in the city council and three terms as mayor. He was one of the members of the first school board of Athens, and a member and chairman of the committee which built the new water works. It is a misfortune that a citizen possessing such estimable and valuable social and public-spirited characteristics should have neglected to transmit them to coming generations—Mr. Rucker is unmarried. He is a prominent member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Protestant Episcopal church.

JOHN J. STRICKLAND, lawyer, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., only child of Samuel G. and Catharine (Stapler) Strickland, was born in Madison county, Ga., Jan. 30, 1856. His paternal grandfather, Jacob Strickland, of Scotch lineage, was born in Virginia, whence early in life he migrated to Georgia. Mr. Strickland's father was born in Madison county and was a prominent farmer. He volunteered and served as a private soldier in the "war between the states," from 1861 to 1864, in the western army. His mother was also Georgia born. Mr. Strickland remained on the farm and attended the nearby schools until he was seventeen years of age—1873—when he entered Martin institute, Jefferson, Jackson Co., Ga., and stayed there teaching and studying until 1877, when he entered the university of Georgia, at Athens. He was graduated from this institution in 1879, receiving the degree of A. B. and B. L. (law course), and the same year—August term, Jackson county superior court—was admitted to the bar. Locating at Danielsville, county seat of Madison county, he entered upon a fine practice, and remained there until 1888, when he came to Athens, where he has steadily gained in reputation and clientage. In 1894 he was a candidate for judge of the western circuit, but although he made a strong race was defeated. Possessing marked ability, pluck and energy, and young, he may confidently look forward to professional and political preferment. Mr. Strickland was married in Oconee county, Ga., Oct. 15, 1879, to Miss Lucy, daughter of the late Rev. Dr. J. G. McNorton, who has borne him four children: Norma L., Roy, Samuel Guy, and John J., Jr. Mr. Strickland is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the masonic fraternity, and is an influential member of the Baptist church.

WILLIAM W. THOMAS.—Clarke county has been the birth-place or the home of many of the brave and grand men who made her history, whose achievements on battle-fields, in the walks of science and literature, in legislative halls and in the forum have lent luster to its pages. Of these, for true bravery and moral courage, morality and social purity, unsullied honor and unswerving integrity, none rank higher than that of Thomas, a name which one of the subdivisions of Georgia worthily bears. Of this noted family is William Winstead Thomas, president of the Southern Mutual Insurance company, son of Stevens and Isabella Thomas, who was born in Athens in 1849. Mr. Thomas' father was born in Athens in 1814, and died there in 1891, aged seventy-seven years. He was a trustee of the university of Georgia for many years—1867-1881—and for twenty-six years—up to the time of his death—secretary of the Southern Mutual Insurance company. Receiving his preparatory education, Mr. Thomas entered the university of Georgia, from which he was graduated with the degree of arts bachelor in 1868, in the class with Henry W. Grady, Walter S. Gordon, Peter W. Meldrim and others who have since attained distinction. In 1869 he received the degree of C. E., and later that of A. M. After his graduation Mr. Thomas followed the profession of civil engineering in Georgia and South Carolina until 1875, when he entered the employ of the Southern Mutual Insurance company as adjuster. He held this position until 1891, when he was elected secretary, and in 1894 was elected president. He was a trustee of the university of Georgia from 1881 to 1891, when he resigned. From 1883 to 1889 he was an efficient and valuable member of the state capitol commission which built the state capitol. This commission was one of the very few, if not the only one, of the kind which erected a public building within the appropriation and returned a balance to the treasury. He is also a director in the Georgia Railway and Banking company, and in the Augusta and Savannah Railway company. He worthily represents and sustains the fair fame of the honored name he bears. Mr. Thomas was married in 1878 to Miss Pamela J., daughter of the late William Spenser Brown, who was a son of Gen. Jacob Brown, commander-in-chief of the United States army from 1821 till 1828. Mrs. Thomas is also a niece of the wife of Hon. Charles J. Jenkins, who was the first elected governor of Georgia after the war, and ex-associate justice of the supreme court. To Mr. and Mrs. Thomas two children have been born, Gertrude and Isabel. Mr. Thomas is a member of the Presbyterian church.

H. C. WHITE, professor of chemistry, university of Georgia, Athens, was born in Baltimore, Md., in 1850. His family is of English origin, and his father, Levi S. White, born in Maryland, was in the Confederate service during the late civil war. He was in the ordnance department, in which he attained to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. After receiving an excellent preparatory education in the schools of Baltimore, Prof. White entered the university of Virginia, from which he graduated with the degree of B. S. in 1868, and received the degree of C. E. in 1870. Soon after his graduation he was attached to the Peabody institute in Baltimore; subsequently he accepted the chair of chemistry at St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., which he occupied until 1872, when he came to Athens to fill the chair he now holds. In 1880 he was appointed state chemist and held the appointment ten years, when he was made vice-director of the state experiment station and president of the state college (science department of the university), which position he still retains. He is a fellow of the Chemical society of Great Britain, corresponding member of the British association, and a member of other learned societies at home and abroad. He has been a very useful member of the faculty, and in his specialties has been of very great service to the state as a whole, and to such of its citizens as sought the benefit of his knowledge. He is the author of several scientific works, a contributor to scientific journals, and author of numerous published essays and addresses. He has served two terms in the city council of Athens. Prof. White was married in 1872 to Miss Ella F. Roberts, of Baltimore, Md. He is a member and a vestryman of the Protestant Episcopal church.

JOHN R. WHITE, president of The Georgia Manufacturing company, manufacturer and planter of Whitehall, Clarke Co., Ga., son of John and Jeannett Richards White, was born in Clarke county in 1847. His parents were natives of Ireland, where they were married in 1836, and emigrating to the United States the same year, settled in Clarke county. His father, being a practical manufacturer with a knowledge of bookkeeping, secured the position of general manager of the Georgia factory situated on Oconee river, five miles below Athens, said factory being built by Augustus Clayton and Thos. Moore in 1828. Being master of his business, industrious and frugal, of superior executive and financial ability, he saved money and when the opportunity offered bought stock, until he owned the entire plant and was phenomenally successful and prosperous up to his death, which occurred in 1881. He organized and started the national bank of Athens in 1866, of which he was president when he died. His management of the bank was very successful, paying large dividends to its stockholders besides laying aside a large surplus fund, there only being thirteen national banks in the United States having as large a surplus in proportion to its capital. He contributed largely to the building of the Northeastern railroad of Georgia and to the upbuilding of Athens. He was a man of extreme promptitude and punctuality, exact to a cent in all money matters and the soul of honor and integrity. He reared four children: Rosena, wife of State Senator W. J. Morton; James, cashier of the National bank of Athens; Maggie, wife of W. P. Welch, and John R., the subject of this sketch, all of whom were born and reared in Clarke county. The parents in religious faith were Unitarians. Mr. J. R. White received a good common-school education and at the age of seventeen entered the Confederate army as private in Toomb's regiment. Either directly or indirectly he has been connected with the mill all his life. In 1892 the factory was burned, rebuilt in 1893 with larger capacity and equipped with the latest improved machinery. In May, 1895, he added a factory for the manufacture of pants, shirts and drawers with a capacity of thirty dozen per day, which will soon be increased to meet the growing demand. Mr. White inherits the sterling business characteristics of his father and is one of Clarke county's most substantial and solid citizens. He is a justice of the peace and mayor of Whitehall. Mr. White was married in 1882 to Miss Lillie Paine of Newton county, daughter of James G. and Rebecca (Graves) Paine and granddaughter of the late Bishop Paine of Mississippi. They have four children: John R., Hugh W., Robert Paine and Sarah Frances.

JAMES WHITE, banker, Athens, Clarke Co., Ga., son of John White, manufacturer and capitalist, was born near Athens, in Clarke county in 1839, and received his early schooling at the near-by schools and in Athens. He attended the University of Georgia awhile, but did not graduate. During his youth he was practically trained to succeed his father in the management of his large manufacturing interests, about four miles south of Athens, and later in the management of his augmented capital. Originally the cotton manufacturing plant belonged exclusively to his father, but subsequently was incorporated as the Georgia Manufacturing company. In 1863 Mr. White enlisted in a company organized in Athens, of which he was commissioned captain and the company assigned to Adams' battalion. After six months' active service he engaged in manufacturing for the Confederate government, and continued in the business until after the close of the war. After being engaged in manufacturing about fifteen years he entered the national bank, in which his father was a very large stockholder, as cashier—a position he still holds, and whose responsible duties he discharges with the utmost efficiency and exactitude. Mr. White was married in 1884 to Miss Julia D., daughter of the late John D. Ashton of Waynesboro, Burke Co., Ga., by whom he has had one child, Rosena A. He is not a member of any secret order, but affiliates with the Presbyterian church.

CLAY COUNTY.

JAMES N. BIGBIE, a prominent citizen and leading farmer of Clay county, post-office, Coleman, Randolph Co., Ga., is a native of South Carolina, but was reared in Georgia. He was born Oct. 17, 1826, in Abbeville district, S. C., and was the son of Thomas Bigbie. The father was also born in the same district and during his lifetime was distinguished in the practice of medicine and in the pulpit. He married Rebecca Robinson, a native of Anderson district, S. C., who died in Abbeville in 1835, and was the mother of nine children. Dr. Bigbie was the second time married to Miss Burnett of South Carolina. In 1838 they moved to Georgia and settled in Coweta county, later removing to Talbot, thence to Harris and later to Randolph county. Dr. Bigbie finally located in Early county in 1850. In 1860 he moved to Alabama, dying there in 1870, aged seventy-five years. He was an old-line whig until after the war, when he became a democrat. He was for years a justice of the peace in South Carolina and later in Georgia. His wife died during the war. Both belonged to the Methodist church. By his second marriage four children were born (the first two were twins, both of whom were soldiers in the late war): Thomas died in Douglas prison and Benjamin F., taken prisoner at Gettysburg, is supposed to have died at Point Lookout from wounds received in battle; the third child, Llewellen W., lives in New Mexico; Margaret A., the fourth child, married M. Burch and lives in Geneva county, Ala. Of the children born by his first marriage but two of the nine are living: James N., the subject of this sketch, and Nancy Colton, the latter living in Florida. John Y. died in South Carolina, aged about twenty-one; A. E. died in Clay county in 1884; George died in South Carolina of yellow fever; Wm. S. married in Talbot county and moved to Mississippi, dying in Attala county; Annie married M. R. Ship and moved to Mississippi and later to Illinois; Rebecca married A. M.

Brown and died in Illinois, and one died in infancy. Archibald Bigbie, grandfather of James N. Bigbie, was a native of Virginia, and left an orphan at an early age. Later he went to South Carolina and there married Miss Madison, a native of Virginia and first cousin of President Madison. John Robinson, the maternal grandfather of James N. Bigbie, came from North to South Carolina, where he married Miss Carr for his second wife. She was in the fort on Brand river during the revolution and lived to an extreme old age. The subject of this sketch lived in South Carolina until about twelve years of age, attending the schools a few months each year, and mastering his education by the aid of the pine-knot at night. In 1843 he located in La Fayette county, Miss., and from there went to the Mexican war in 1846, joining Company F of the First Mississippi volunteers, known as the Mississippi rifles, under command of Jefferson Davis. At the battle of Buena Vista he was wounded and lost his left arm, but remained until his term of service expired. He then came to Georgia and in 1847 located in Harris county, and was elected messenger of the legislature. He then returned from its capital to Harris county and engaged in merchandising. He was elected tax collector and justice of the peace, serving in such positions till the breaking out of the war, when he was elected captain of the First Volunteer company of Harris county, but not receiving orders did not take the field. He was married to Miss Jane Grant, a native of South Carolina, but raised in Georgia, and during the war he moved to Clay county, where he has since resided. Mr. Bigbie has been a member of the county board and served as one of the jury commissioners and for the past ten years has been one of the county commissioners. Before the war he was a whig, now he is an ardent democrat, taking an active part in county, state and national politics. Mrs. Bigbie is a member of the Baptist church. To them have been born six children: Franconia, the wife of John W. Rhodes of Grenada, Miss.; John E., deceased; Mattie, who married J. A. Whaley of Randolph county; Mary J., wife of W. H. Ingram, now deceased; William Deley, who lives on the home place, and James P., deceased. Mr. Bigbie is guardian of the two children of John E. Mr. and Mrs. Bigbie live in a pleasant home eleven miles east of Fort Gaines.

W. D. R. CRAWFORD, a prominent planter of Clay county, Ga., was born in Newton county in 1839, and is the son of Joel H. and Sarah A. (King) Crawford, both of whom were natives of Greene county, Ga. They were the descendants of the old Crawford family first identified with the state's history in the earliest settlements of Columbia county, and for generations distinguished in agricultural pursuits. Joel Crawford was born in 1812, and was the son of David Crawford, who married Frances H. Crawford, the daughter of Joel Crawford and Frances Harris of Columbia county. In 1835 David Crawford and wife moved to Newton county, and in 1853 to Decatur county, where they died some years later full of years and respected and beloved by all who knew them. Joel H. Crawford, the father of the subject of this sketch, was one of five children, and spent his boyhood days in Newton county, receiving his education from the common schools and those valuable instructors, experience and observation. In 1838 he was married to Miss Sarah A. King, who was born in Greene county in 1818, and was the daughter of William J. King, an old Virginia family, which located in Newton county in 1826. Mr. and Mrs. Crawford remained in Newton county until 1859, when they removed to Decatur county, where they lived for five years, and then migrated to Clay county, where they continued to reside. He farmed all his life, and never took an active part in politics. He was a whig until after the war, since which time he is a democrat. Although not a member of any church, he was a Christian gentleman, highly revered by all who knew him. Mrs. Crawford is still living, and resides with her son. She is a member of the Methodist church, to which she has belonged for over half a century, and enjoys excellent health for one of her age. One son was born to this union, Wm. D. R., the subject of this sketch. He was married to Miss Martha R. Hayes, daughter of Jonathan and Nancy Hayes. She was born in Talbot county and reared in Muscogee county. To this union were born: Minnie Laura, wife of John S. Hastings of Clay county; and William J. H., who lives on the home place with his parents. Mrs. Crawford is a consistent member of the Methodist church. They reside on a pleasant homestead three miles from Bluffton. In politics Mr. Crawford is a democrat. During the war he served in the state militia in and around Atlanta, and was in front of Sherman on his march through the state, belonging to Company D, Tenth Georgia regiment, under the command of Col. Davis, of Calhoun county.

THOMAS R. DAVIS, planter and tax receiver of Clay county, Bluffton, Ga., was born in North Carolina in 1831, and is the son of John and Sarah (Blue) Davis, natives of that state. In 1834 the parents moved overland to Georgia and settled in Early county, in what was then known as the fourth district, on what is now called the Tennell place. Here he purchased a tract of land, for which he gave a horse in payment, and settled down to work the soil. After the Indian war of 1835-36 he moved farther south, and on Lime Branch in Early county built a water mill, the first in that part of the state. A few years later he erected a mill at Bluffton. In 1848 he purchased land on Spring creek near which the son now lives. The father and a son, Duncan, served in the Indian war, and the former was bailiff of the county court. Agriculture and building occupied his attention almost exclusively. Although not a member of any church he was a respecter of religion, a liberal supporter of all the denominations, with a leaning toward the Presbyterians. He was twice married, the mother of the subject of this sketch dying while they lived at Bluffton. She was a member of the Methodist church and the mother of eight children, all of whom lived to be grown men and women. Duncan, the eldest son, was a member of the general assembly from Early county in 1857. The others were Nancy Cowart, John Davis, Elizabeth, Margaret Fulton, William, Daniel B., and Thomas R. The father married for his second wife Mrs. Rowe, who after his death in 1857 moved to Arkansas, where she died at the home of her daughter. Mr. Davis was prominently and favorably known throughout Clay and surrounding counties. He was a true gentleman whose world-wide charity endeared him to all. Thomas R. Davis was but a baby when his parents moved to Georgia. He grew to manhood on the farm and received his intellectual training in the common schools. At twenty-one years of age he started for himself in farming, only to be interrupted by the war. He enlisted in Company F, Thirty-second Georgia regiment infantry, commanded by George P. Harrison, Jr., and did service along the coast from Ocean Pond, Fla., to Wilmington, N. C. In the bombardment of Fort Sumter he lost his left arm by a piece of flying shell. He was also injured in the hip by the same shell and so disabled that he was compelled to retire from the service. He was in the engagements of his regiment at Ocean Pond, Ft. Sumter, Battery Wagoner, and many minor skirmishes. Mr. Davis first married Miss Sophronia Todd, a native of Early county, Ga., and daughter of Wilson Todd, who was killed near Macon, Ga., during the war. To them were born five children, T. Jefferson Davis, born January, 1862, alone living. Mrs. Davis died in 1865, and Mr. Davis was married to Miss Ann Eliza Fain, daughter of Reuben Fain, and granddaughter of Matthew Fain, who settled in Georgia about 1836. His sons, Davis and Reuben, settled in Early county and reared large families. By this second marriage six children were born to Mr. Davis, three of whom are living: Ella Arkadelphia, wife of George T. Fair; Annie Elizabeth, and Amo Vincy. Mr. and Mrs. Davis are members of the Baptist church. In politics he is a democrat and was re-elected tax receiver for the third time, and is the nominee for the fourth term. He is popular with all who know him, irrespective of party, and is an efficient and painstaking officer. He lives in a pleasant home on the Dawson and Dover road, three miles from Bluffton.

JOSEPH B. GRIMSLEY, planter, Ft. Gaines, Clay Co., Ga., was born in Stewart county, Ga., in 1841. Joseph Grimsley, the head of the Grimsley family in Georgia, was a native Carolinian, coming to Georgia when a young man, and settling in Baldwin county. Here he married and had a family of children: Priscilla, Richard, Mrs. Odom, and Walton. In the early part of the twenties he moved to Early county on what is now known as Herrod's creek. Here he built mills which he conducted up to the time of his death, Oct. 24, 1860, aged 80 years. In politics he was a whig, in religion he belonged to the Methodist church. He was a captain in the war of 1812, and served with distinction. He was possessed of a good education for the times, and was a lover of sport, taking much pleasure in the hunt and with the rod. A brother of Joseph, Richard Grimsley, located in Early county some years before him and settled the plantation now owned by Mr. Naramore, and the first court ever held in Early county was held at Richard Grimsley's house. He afterward moved to Kalomokee creek, in Clay county, and built one of the first mills in that section of the state. He lived there up to the time of his death in 1840, when the property was turned over to the heirs of Joseph Grimsley, Richard having died without issue. Richard Grimsley, the eldest son of Joseph Grimsley, and the father of the subject of this sketch, was born Feb. 14, 1807, and died July 2, 1885. His early life was spent in Early county, with a few years in Stewart county. He was married to Miss Harriet Hawkins, and in 1851 he returned to the mill property of his uncle on Kalomokee creek. He afterward moved to a farm near there, where he lived until his death. During the Indian war he served as a soldier. In politics he was a whig until after the war, when he became an active democrat. Though not a member of any church he was a man of high moral character, honest and upright in all the walks of life, and respected by all who knew him. His wife, Harriet Hawkins, was a native of North Carolina, and an excellent Christian lady, belonging to the Missionary Baptist church. She died Jan. 16, 1889, aged eighty years. To this union were born nine children: Sarah C., Mary R., Harriet J., Richard S., Joseph B., William C., Versey P., Jeremiah W., and Benjamin F. Joseph B. Grimsley came to what is now Clay county with his parents when a lad. Here he grew to maturity, receiving his education in Early county, where he lived with his grandfather and attended Glen Springs Academy. When the war broke out he entered the Confederate service in Capt. Fowler's company from Ft. Gaines, state troops, for six months. Returning home the company was reorganized as the Cotton Planters' guard under command of Capt. Bass, of Ft. Gaines, and became Company E, Fifty-ninth Georgia regiment, and was assigned to duty in the army of Virginia. He participated in the battles of Suffolk, Va., and Gettysburg, when at the latter place he was captured and imprisoned twenty-two months in Fort Delaware. He was also wounded in that engagement. Since the war Mr. Grimsley has been engaged in farming. His home, five miles south of Ft. Gaines, is one of the finest in the county, and the estate comprises 5,000 acres, more than one-half of which is under a fine state of cultivation. All this is the result, altogether, of the energy and push of Mr. Grimsley, who, for a few years after the war, was working for wages. He married Miss Sallie E., daughter of John P. Best, a planter of Clay county. She is a member of the Missionary Baptist church.

JERRY W. GRIMSLEY, merchant and planter, Fort Gaines, Clay Co., Ga., is a highly respected citizen of the county. He was the eighth child of Richard and Harriet (Hawkins) Grimsley, and was born in Stewart county in 1850. He remained at home with his parents in Clay county until twenty-four years of age, receiving his education in a little log school-house of the primitive order, a few miles from his home, and helping in the milling and farming. He then leased a farm in Clay county, which he worked for three years. With his profits he commenced a merchandise business in Fort Gaines. After five years in this enterprise he moved to his present location, about eight miles southeast of Fort Gaines on the Bluffton road, where he is engaged in planting and general merchandising. He has 600 acres of choice land under a fine state of cultivation, besides many acres of woodland. Mr. Grimsley is one of the very progressive farmers of Clay county and operates grist and saw-mills in connection with his farming. He married Mrs. Parmelia West (nee Foster), daughter of Alexander Foster of Fort Gaines. She was the wife of Edgar West, by whom she had two children: John B. and Erline. To Mr. and Mrs. Grimsley two children were born: Harriet Louise and Nellie Pearl. Mrs. Grimsley is a member of the Baptist church and he is a prominent member of the masonic fraternity. They enjoy a pleasant home with their interesting family near his place of business.

WILLIAM ROBERT HARRISON, tax collector and prominent planter of Clay county, post-office, Bluffton, Ga., is a native of Beaufort district, S. C., and was born near the present county site of Hampton county. He was born in 1839 and was the son of Henry David, a native of the same district in South Carolina, who was born in 1805, and was the son of Amos Harrison, a native of that state. The Harrison family, of Irish descent, came to America at an early day, locating in South Carolina. Amos, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was a boy during the revolutionary times and remembered those stirring times distinctly. He followed farming and his sons were big rice planters in lower Beaufort. He afterward moved to the upper part of the district, where he died, aged eighty-six years. He was a democrat and a member of the Primitive Baptist church. He was married to Sarah Ann Hamilton Oct. 4, 1804; she lived to a good-old age. To them six children were born: Henry, David, George, Hamilton, Mary, Elizabeth and Sarah, all deceased. Henry David, the father of William Robert, lived in South Carolina on a farm adjoining his father's until 1857, when he came to Georgia, settling in Clay county, having purchased the McElvy mills and farm, which place is now owned by J. W. Harrison. The first mill in this section of the state was erected here by Thomas King. For years the place was renowned throughout southwestern Georgia. When the county was formed the justice's court was held here and Mr. McElvy's mills was the scene of the adjustment of legal difficulties for the people from all over the county. Mr. Harrison was prominent in politics, but would accept no office. He was successful in his business affairs and died in 1864, lamented by all who knew him. His wife was Caroline Ulmer, a native of the old state of South Carolina. She was born in 1814 and died in 1890. They both belonged to the Primitive Baptist church. To this union were born twelve children: Mary E. married John A. Cordray in South Carolina, where she died before her people came to Georgia; Amos J., who came to Georgia with his family, but returned to South Carolina; William R.; Sarah H., who first married James H. Killingsworth and then James B. McCord, who now lives near Bluffton, Clay county; Amanda M., married Ebenezer Fain, lives in Spring Creek, Clay county; Ursula married Moses Fain; Martha Ann married John Killingsworth, now deceased; Henry Ulmer, who lives in Clay county; Caroline, deceased; Irene, who married E. S. Jones, deceased; Emily died in childhood; John W., who lives in the old home place. William Robert Harrison was partly reared in South Carolina, where he attended the common schools. With his family he came through to Georgia, and he remembers very well the trip, which took over three weeks. He remained on the home place until enlisting in the Cotton Hill company with Capt. J. E. Pruden, a merchant of Cotton Hill. The company did service at Savannah, Ga., as state troops, for six months, when it was reorganized in the regular service. Mr. Harrison then became a member of Company F, Thirty-second Georgia regiment of volunteers, under command of Col. George P. Harrison, doing service along the coast of Georgia and Florida, and around Charlotte, S. C., and was in the Ocean pond fight. After leaving Charleston, S. C., they went to North Carolina and there joined Johnston's army and participated in the battles of Averasboro and Bentonville, N. C., fighting Sherman. After the close of the war he returned to the home place and took hold of the plow again. In 1869 he married and settled where he now lives. The place had no improvements at that time, but Mr. Harrison had energy, and soon was the possessor of a grand farm well under cultivation. He opened a store on his place in 1878 and in 1880 moved his stock to Bluffton, where he continued the business until 1885, when he returned to his farm. He married Miss Victoria J. Tinsley, daughter of Judge Philip Tinsley. She was born and raised in Clay county. To this union five children were born: Wesley H.; Eula, educated at the Bluffton high school and Andrew Female college; Henry, Claude and Wallace. Mr. Harrison is a democrat in politics and was elected tax collector in 1889, is now holding the office for the third term, and is a candidate for the fourth term. The family enjoy a pleasant home about one mile north of Bluffton.

JOHN W. HARRISON, a prominent planter and miller of Bluffton, Clay county, was born in July, 1855. He came with his parents to Clay county when a young lad and received his education in the near-by country schools. When eighteen years of age he commenced doing business for his mother. In November, 1876, he married Miss Molly E. Jones, a native of Calhoun county, Ga., and daughter of B. J. Jones, a planter. Mrs. Harrison was reared and educated in Calhoun county. To this union were born seven children: Henry B.; John Calvin; Nettie Estelle; William Elijah; Luther Lloyd; Coy Winneford; Carrie Lizzie. Mr. Harrison is justice of the peace of the Fifth district, Clay county, and in politics is a stanch democrat. His home is on the old family place, and is what is so familiarly known as the "Harrison's Mills," two and one-half miles from Bluffton. Mr. Harrison is extensively engaged in farming and is one of the progressive planters of the state. He is a Mason in high standing. Possessing literary tastes, he takes an active part in the education of his children, who show a just appreciation of the opportunities given them by their studious habits.

JOSHUA J. HAYES, a prominent planter of Bluffton, Clay Co., Ga., was born in Muscogee county, Ga., April 21, 1849, and was the son of Jonathan and Nancy (Wilson) Hayes. Jonathan Hayes was a native of South Carolina and lived there until he reached manhood when, with his brother Joshua, he came to Georgia, locating in Jasper county. There he met and wedded Nancy Wilson, the daughter of an esteemed citizen and old resident of the state. He soon afterward removed to Talbot county, later to Muscogee county, and in 1864 to Fort Gaines, Clay Co., where he died in 1871 at the advanced age of seventy-four years. He was a man honored and revered by the people of his county, who knew him as a model citizen, kind father, and conscientious Christian. He took an active and prominent part in church affairs, and was an officer in the Baptist church. He served in the Indian war of 1835-36, and was a strong advocate of secession, furnishing six sons to the Confederate army, five of whom gave up their life during the conflict. Mrs. Hayes died in 1880, aged seventy-four years, and was an active member of the same church as the husband. To this happy union were born thirteen children, four of whom are living: John, the eldest son, was killed during the war near Atlanta; Mary, who married John Hughes, deceased; Emily, married to E. Grant, of Talbot county, deceased; Nancy, married to Neal Grant, of Talbot county, deceased; George, died in the service during the war; Frances, married to Felix Davis, living in Texas; Mildred died in childhood; Henry J., living in Early county; James, who died from exposure in the army; William, died in a Federal prison; Mattie R., married to W. D. Crawford, living in Clay county, and Joshua J., the subject of this sketch. He was the thirteenth child and was reared in Muscogee county, where he attended the common schools until fifteen years of age. He continued his studies in Clay county after his parents moved there in 1864, and commenced his vocation as tiller of the soil in 1869, which he has since continued without any interruption. He was interested in milling from 1880 to 1890, and that year he added ginning to his other interests, both of which pursuits he continued until 1894. He moved to Bluffton, where he now lives, in 1880, and has seen it grow into a thrifty and enterprising city. The energy and progressive ideas exhibited in the development of the place are to be found in all of Mr. Hayes' business ventures. Mr. Hayes was first married to Mrs. Blocker, the widow of Dr. John E. Blocker, a practicing physician of Bluffton. Mrs. Blocker was a Miss Beckham of a prominent family of Calhoun county, Ga., just before the war. She died in 1885, and Mr. Hayes was married in 1890 to Miss Drucilla Reid, a native of Alabama, and to this union were born two children, one, Ella Ilene, alone surviving. Mr. and Mrs. Hayes belong to the Methodist church. In politics he is a democrat, taking an active part, but always refusing office. Their home is a beautiful place in Bluffton, where the hospitality characteristic of the true southern home is freely and cheerily dispensed.

JAMES C. NEVES, miller and planter, Fort Gaines, Clay Co., Ga., was born July 8, 1852, on Kalomokee Creek, and is of an old Virginia family which settled in Georgia toward the close of the last century. In 1787 William Neves, the grandfather of the subject of this sketch, came from Virginia and settled in what became Jones county—now known as Putnam county. He was one of the earliest settlers in that part of the state. With him came his wife, who with three children shared in the hardships of the long overland trip. He followed farming till in 1822, when he moved to what is now Clay county, settling on the Chattahoochee river below where Fort Gaines is now located. Here he engaged in farming and built a gin, one of the first erected in that section of the state, and continued to reside there until he retired from active work. He died suddenly while on a visit in Alabama in 1852, at the age of ninety-four years, and is buried near Columbia. He was a member of the Primitive Baptist church, taking a prominent part in all church affairs. He served seven years in the revolutionary war under Gen. Washington and was in the last war with Great Britain in 1812, and also in the Indian wars in that section of the state. He was a brave and honored man. One of his chief delights was hunting. Socially he was popular. In politics always a consistent democrat, he was a leader in his community for years. His wife was a Miss Ballard, a native of Virginia. She was a devoted wife and loving mother. She died in 1850, aged eighty-four years. To this union were born three sons and four daughters: Mary, married William Hardin, both deceased; William, died at Fort Gaines; Elizabeth, married Capt. Jones, deceased; John Alsey, Charlotte and Daniel. John Neves, the second son, and father of the subject of this sketch, was born Oct. 31, 1802, in what is now Putnam county, Ga., and came to what is now Clay county at the age of twenty, where he married his wife, Miss Garnett Smith, a native of Georgia, in 1827. She died in 1836, leaving three children: Amanda, Sarah and Simeon, all deceased but Amanda, who is now the wife of William Harris, of Florida. For his second wife Mr. Neves married Miss Julia Smith in 1837. She was born in 1820 in Georgia and was the daughter of David Smith, a distinguished Virginian, who settled at an early date in Jones county, and later removed to Early (now Clay) county, where he died at the age of seventy-two. She was educated in the common schools of Early county, and died in 1874, aged fifty-four years. She was an active member of the Primitive Baptist church. Her husband died in 1891 and is buried at the home place of Mr. Bryant, his son-in-law. During the Indian wars he served on guard duty at Fort Gaines. He was a member of the Baptist church and a democrat in politics. To his second union were born six children: John, who died in 1862 at Savannah, Ga., in the Confederate service; Frances, who died in early youth; Theodosia, married Cyrus Naramore, now living in Early county; J. C., the subject of this sketch; Alice, wife of T. J. Bryant; Emma, died at the age of sixteen. Mr. Neves was a man who had few enemies, and during the Indian wars the braves used to visit his plantation almost daily. Thrown in contact with them, he became friendly to them, and this friendship was of great benefit to the early settlers. He was active in religious affairs and a deacon in the church for over sixty years of his life. Mr. James C. Neves, the subject of this sketch, was educated in the common schools. The war interrupted his educational advancement, and in 1873 he began farming, continuing in this occupation ever since, at which he has been very successful. In 1890 he purchased the Freeman mill property, and is now engaged in milling and ginning in connection with his farming. Mr. Neves married Miss Versia P. Grimsley, Jan. 22, 1882, and to this union were born three sons and one daughter: Bennie May, John Richard, Joseph Groves and James Ennis. Mr. and Mrs. Neves are located seven miles southeast of Fort Gaines, and one mile east of the Chattahoochee river, where their beautiful home is situated.

MARK M. SHIVERS, physician and planter, Clay county, is a native of Hancock county, where he was born in 1821. He is the son of Barnaby and Rachel (Cowan) Shivers, natives respectively of Warren county and Sparta, Hancock Co. Barnaby Shivers was a planter and lived to be about seventy-five years old. He was a deacon and a prominent member of the Baptist church at Mt. Zion, Hancock Co., near where he lived. He was a whig, and at one time was elected justice of the inferior court. His father and the paternal grandparent of Dr. Shivers was Jonas Shivers, a native of Virginia. He moved his family to Georgia, and settled at what is now known as Mayfield, on the Ogeechee river, in Warren county. He was one of the pioneer settlers of the county, and for years followed planting and milling. He was quite a prominent citizen in his day and built the beautiful home of Mayfield. He took no active interest in politics, though voting the whig ticket, and gave his whole time to his extensive milling and farm interests. He died well up in years. He was the father of five sons, all of whom are dead. The father of Dr. M. M. Shivers was the oldest. The mother of Dr. Shivers was born three miles north of Sparta and was the daughter of Capt. George Cowan, who was an officer in the revolutionary war, and was of Scotch ancestry. Mary, his wife, was a Miss Porter, and came to America with her family from Scotland, first locating near Salisbury, N. C. Later the family moved to Georgia, where she died Aug. 31, 1855, aged ninety-two years. She and her husband were faithful members of the Presbyterian church. The mother of Dr. Shivers was a Baptist, relinquishing her connection with the Presbyterians to gain the religious faith of her husband. She was a noble Christian woman, who was idolized by her children. Mr. and Mrs. Barnaby Shivers were blessed by the birth of twelve children, of whom Dr. Shivers was the youngest. He is now the lone surviving child.

Dr. Mark M. Shivers was educated at Mt. Zion under the direction of the celebrated Dr. C. B. Beman, and his nephew, C. P. B. Martin, who was succeeded later by Ex-Gov. Northen. He commenced the study of medicine in Columbus, Ga., under Dr. R. T. Sankey, a leading physician of that city, and then took lectures at the university of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia. He began his professional career at Waverly Hall, Harris Co.; then, in January, 1862, he moved to Pumpkintown, Randolph Co., where he continued his practice until the fall of 1858. While there his practice was very large, and he accumulated considerable property. He came to the present place of Cotton Hill for the main purpose of educating his children at a big school kept by Norman F. Coolidge, one of the leading educators in southern Georgia at that time. His school attained considerable fame, and was continued until some years after the war. The doctor resumed his practice here, and had a large territory to cover in responding to the demand for his service. His happy domestic life was begun when he wedded Harriet Rebecca Harwell, Dec. 31, 1843. She was the daughter of Samuel B. Harwell, of Alabama, and was born in Troup county, Ga., but reared in Chambers county, Ala., to which place her parents had removed. They afterward returned to Georgia and settled in Stewart county. This union has resulted in the birth of five sons and one daughter; the latter is Mary Oriska, wife of Dr. D. F. Gunn. The sons are: George Oscar, of Covington, Ky., and in business in Cincinnati; Olinthur Clay, and Locke Olin, near the home place; Grigsby Orville, living in Arizona; Lucius Omar, of Albany, Ga. Dr. Shivers and wife have adopted the children of his son, O. C. Shivers. They are Ethel, Clyde, and William Mark Shivers. The Baptist faith is that of the Shivers, and the doctor, wife and four children belong to the church. He was superintendent of the Sunday school for many years. Cotton Hill enjoys the distinction of being one of the healthiest places in southwestern Georgia, and here the doctor and family live in a pleasant home. While he has a farm and is engaged in merchandising, the doctor gives his whole time to his profession, which always has been uppermost in his business life. He is a broad-minded man, sympathetic and gentle in disposition—such traits of character as place a man of his profession in the front rank. An uncle of Dr. Shivers—William—and Ex-Gov. Schley are credited with building the first cotton factory in Georgia, near Mayfield, on the Hancock side of the river. While Dr. Shivers lives at Cotton Hill, he gets his mail at Morris station.

P. H. THOMPSON, physician and surgeon, Bluffton, Clay Co., Ga., was born at Ft. Gaines, in what is now Clay county, Ga., in 1851. He was the son of Robert Thompson, who was born in North Carolina, and came to Georgia with his parents, who settled near Ft. Gaines, where he married, followed the vocation of farming, and reared a family. The father of Dr. Thompson served as a soldier in the Indian wars of 1835 and 1836, and after peace was secured, returned to Fort Gaines and engaged in the construction of buildings until the time of his death in 1855. His wife died in 1863, aged forty years. Both were exemplary Christians and members of the Methodist church. To this union were born four children, two of whom are living: Dr. P. H., the subject of this sketch, and O. F. Dr. Thompson was reared in southwestern Georgia, received his primary education in the common schools, and in 1872 commenced the study of medicine under Dr. Webb Willis, at Milford, Baker Co. He then attended lectures at Mobile, Ala., and subsequently was graduated from the medical department of the university of Louisiana. He commenced the practice of his profession in Taylor county, Ga., afterward moved to Neshoba county, Miss., and finally permanently located at Bluffton, where he has built up a large and lucrative practice. In addition to this he profitably manages a fine 500-acre plantation. Dr. Thompson is a member of the State Medical society and of the American Medical association, and was a delegate to the ninth medical congress. He is considered one of the best physicians and surgeons in southwestern Georgia. He is very prominent in masonic affairs, and belongs to the blue lodge, chapter and council of this fraternity. Dr. Thompson was married to Miss Willie Tinsley, born Feb. 15, 1858, daughter of Mr. Philip Tinsley, by whom he has had four children: Regina M., Patti H., Hugh and Bessie Olivia. He is a democrat in politics, and in connection with his practice conducts a drug store in Bluffton.

PHILIP TINSLEY, lawyer, and prominent citizen of Bluffton, Clay Co., as well as one of its early settlers, was born in the third district of Lee county, Ga., in 1828, and was the son of Philip Tinsley, a native of Columbia county, Ga., who was born in 1780. He was the son of James Tinsley, a native of Virginia. The great-grandfather of Philip Tinsley, the subject of this sketch, and the head of this family in America, came from England about the year 1700, when a young man, and settled in Virginia. While on his way to this country in a sailing vessel the crew were attacked by pirates and were about to be overpowered, when young Tinsley and others jumped overboard and swam ashore, landing on the shores bordering Virginia and North Carolina. For a day and a night they were in the water, experiencing narrow escapes from death, and much suffering. This brave man was married in Virginia and had a large family of sons and daughters. James Tinsley was the eldest of these children and was reared near the family home and served in the revolutionary war. He moved to Richmond, Va., between 1765 and 1770, where he located on a farm, which he continued to occupy up to the time of his death. He was twice married. His second wife was a Miss Crawford, a cousin of William H. Crawford, governor of Georgia. By the first marriage he had five sons and two daughters, and by the second two daughters and a son, all of whom are now deceased. The father of the subject of this sketch was by the first marriage and was born in Columbia county, where he was reared, receiving an excellent education for the advantages then offered. When a young man he went to Morgan county, Ga., where he married Miss M. A. Tarpley. They moved to Lee county in 1827, and located among the Indians; later he migrated to Randolph county, settling at Fort Gaines, now in Clay county, where he continued to reside until his death. He served in the war of 1812, was at Mobile while the famous battle of New Orleans was fought, and during the Indian wars was one of the officers in command of the fort at Fort Gaines, guarding the women and children while the Indians were passing through the country. He was a very successful farmer, and left a large estate. He died in 1850, a member of the Methodist church. He was a man of hearty and strong constitution, possessing great energy and an iron will. He was an uncompromising democrat. His wife died in 1875, in her eighty-fourth year. To this union were born six children. Two sons and one daughter are now living, as follows: Thomas, living at Blakely, Early county; Ameta, married James Jackson, now living in Alabama; and Philip, the subject of this sketch. Mr. Tinsley was the youngest child, and when eight years old moved with his parents from Lee to Randolph county, where he was educated. When grown he commenced farming for himself and first settled on a farm near Ft. Gaines. In 1854 he moved to a farm near Cuthbert, Randolph Co., where he lived until 1866, when he moved back to Clay county. While living near Ft. Gaines he was twice married. The first wife was Miss Emily Jackson, daughter of John Jackson, a prominent planter of Randolph county, by whom he had two daughters: E. V., married to F. Belcher, and living in Alabama, and V. J., married to W. R. Harrison. His second wife was Miss Mary A. Singleton, of Randolph (now Clay) county, daughter of William N. Singleton, a prosperous planter. To this union one daughter was born, W. M., the wife of Dr. P. H. Thompson, of Bluffton. Mr. and Mrs. Tinsley are consistent members of the Methodist church. In politics he is a democrat, having voted the ticket for forty-five years, and taking a prominent part in the councils of his party. During the latter part of the war he entered the Georgia militia, and was elected captain of Company C, Tenth Georgia regiment. He participated in all the campaigns and battles from Atlanta to Savannah, being wounded at the former place, and at Griswoldville he had ten of his men killed in a place not more than fifteen feet square. The company was in all the battles around Atlanta for about forty days, and in the fighting of July 22 and 28, 1864, when the troops lost 6,000 men. After the surrender Mr. Tinsley returned to his farming interests. He now lives in Bluffton, but has a plantation on Spring creek, Clay Co., a region noted for its fine farms.

CLINCH COUNTY.

WILEY BOOTH, merchant, Dupont, Clinch Co., Ga., son of William Booth, was born in Marion county, Ga., Nov. 1, 1846. His father was a well-to-do, prosperous farmer, and bestowed upon him such education as the country schools afforded. Soon after the war between the states began he enlisted in Company B, Thirty-second Georgia regiment, and was slightly wounded in an engagement on Johnson's island, S. C. At the end of twelve months his mother had him discharged on a writ of habeas corpus, on account of his being under age. He then worked in the government oil cloth works, at Columbus, Ga., and joined the provost guard in that city. As soon as he arrived at conscript age, in 1863, he enlisted in the Twenty-eighth Georgia battalion (Maj. Bonard), Olustee, Fla., and remained with the command until the close of the war. After his return from the army he engaged for several years in farming and saw-milling in Washington county, Fla. He then came to Clinch county and accepted a position as section foreman for the Savannah, Florida & Western railway, in which he continued for eight years. He then embarked in a general merchandise business at Dupont, which he has conducted with unusual success, and continuously increasing patronage. He is among the most progressive and substantial of Clinch county's citizens.

Mr. Booth married Mrs. Elizabeth Weaver (widow), of Early county, Ga., by whom he has had six children—four sons and two daughters—all of whom are living. He is a member of the masonic fraternity.

ROWAN B. JOHNSON, planter, Dupont, Clinch Co., Ga., was born in Lowndes county, Nov. 29, 1830. Three years afterward his father moved to Ware, now Clinch county. He was raised on the plantation, and has devoted himself to agriculture all his life. His education was limited to such as could be obtained at the common schools of the county. When only sixteen years of age he was elected captain of the militia—District 1280—at a time when it was regarded as a local distinction; and in 1850 was elected a justice of the peace. In 1862 he enlisted in Company B, Second Georgia battalion, and was made first lieutenant. In 1863 he joined the Sixth Georgia regiment, Western division, was commissioned captain of Company I, and served through the war. Returning from the war he resumed farming, and was soon afterward elected a justice of the inferior court, and served a term of four years. In 1892 he was again chosen to represent Clinch county in the general assembly and as a democrat defeated his populist opponent by an overwhelming majority—more than doubled him. In 1884 he was nominated to represent Clinch county in the general assembly and defeated his opponent by a large majority. Two years later he was again a candidate, and was defeated by a small majority; but in 1869 he was elected to fill the unexpired term of Hon. James P. Mattox (deceased), showing that the people appreciate his ability and services, and have confidence in him as a faithful custodian of their interests. While in the general assembly he was a member of the committees on agriculture, counties and county matters, military affairs and penitentiary. These frequent political successes testify to the strong hold he has on the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Johnson has been married three times. His first wife was Miss Aleph, daughter of John Tomlinson, who died in 1862. For his second wife he married Miss Amanda, daughter of Jason Floyd, who died in February, 1870. He next married Mrs. Emeline (nee Dame), widow of William H. Clifton, and daughter of George Dame. He is a master Mason, and a prominent member of the Primitive Baptist church.

LUCIUS CORNELIUS MATTOX, physician and planter, Homerville, Clinch Co., Ga., son of Col. Elijah Mattox, was born in Tattnall county, Ga., May 5, 1829. His father was a native of Colleton district, S. C., came to Georgia and settled in Tattnall county when young, and was aide-de-camp to Gov. Charles J. McDonald. His maternal grandfather held an office in the colony of Georgia under King George III. Dr. Mattox received as good an education as the common schools of the time and locality afforded, and, part of the time, was under the private instruction of a tutor. After preliminary preparation he entered the Eclectic Medical college, at Macon, Ga., in 1849, from which he was graduated in 1851. He located in Madison county, Fla., and after practicing there two years he came back to Clinch county, where he has practiced since. In 1862, he enlisted in the Fifth Georgia cavalry, which was assigned to duty with the army of the west. During a part of the time he served as a surgeon. He was wounded, but not seriously, at Saltville, Va. After the war he returned to the practice of his profession, ranks the foremost practitioner of it in the county, and enjoys a very large and very remunerative practice. In addition he conducts very extensive planting interests, takes great pride in agricultural matters, cultivates scientifically, and by his neighbors is considered a model farmer. In 1890 he was elected a member of the general assembly from Clinch county, and served on the committee on agriculture, insane asylum, temperance, and deaf and dumb asylum. He was nominated for congress by the people's party, in opposition to Congressman Henry G. Turner, and was defeated. Dr. Mattox was married April 6, 1854, to Miss Sarah A., daughter of Thomas J. Shinholser, of Macon, Ga., by whom he has had six children. She died January 2, 1882; and he afterward married Miss Eliza L., daughter of Rev. Robert F. Lanier, Jasper, Fla. He is a member of the masonic fraternity; in religious belief is a Second Adventist, and is a regularly ordained minister of that faith.

DAVID J. SIRMANS, farmer, Dupont, Clinch Co., Ga., son of Benjamin Sirmans, was born in Emanuel county, Ga., March 1, 1819. After his birth his father moved first to Appling, and afterward to Lowndes (now Clinch) county. Mr. Sirmans was raised on the farm, and educated at the common schools of the county; and when he reached manhood entered upon farming and stock-raising, which he has followed all his life, with satisfactory success. He served during the Seminole war as a volunteer soldier under Capt. John J. Johnson, Col. Brown's regiment. In 1845, he was elected tax receiver and collector of the county, and served one term. In 1859, he was elected to represent his senatorial district in the general assembly, and has served as tax assessor in both Echols and Clinch counties. Mr. Sirmans has been married twice: First, in 1840, to Miss Eliza, daughter of John Wilkinson, of South Carolina, who died in 1886. His second marriage was to Miss Lucinda, daughter of William Roberts, of Echols county, Ga. He has two sons living: Ezekiel, farmer, Clinch county; and Benjamin, farmer, near Waycross, Ware Co., Ga. Mr. Sirmans is a quiet man, devoted to home and its associations, and is highly esteemed by his fellow citizens.

FRANKLIN B. SIRMANS, farmer, Dupont, Clinch Co., Ga., son of Ezekiel J. Sirmans, was born in Clinch county, Sept. 22, 1853. His grandfather, Benjamin Sirmans, came from Emanuel to Lowndes (now Clinch) county, and was among the first settlers of the county. Mr. Sirmans was raised on the homestead, and was educated at the common schools of the county. On attaining to manhood he engaged in farming and stock-raising, which he supplemented with a general merchandise business. Such has been his foresight, and so wisely and energetically has he managed that he has been extremely successful in all his enterprises. In 1886 he was elected to represent the Fifth senatorial district in the general assembly, defeating by a large majority one of the most popular men in the district—a gentleman who had served ten terms in the general assembly and had been a delegate to one constitutional convention. In 1892, he was again elected, defeating the people's party candidate by over 2,000 plurality. During his last term he was chairman of the auditing committee, and a member of the following standing committees: Banks, finance, agriculture, penitentiary, journalism and education. Young, enterprising, progressive and public-spirited, he has a bright prospect for the future, presenting to him a field for great usefulness. Mr. Sirmans was married Feb. 28, 1878, to Miss Amanda, daughter of Charles Strickland, of Clinch county (sister of L. and B. Strickland, at Valdosta, Ga.). Two children are the fruit of this union: A son, Chandler, born Aug. 29, 1880, and a daughter, Edna, born Oct. 16, 1892. He is a member of the masonic fraternity, and very prominent in the local lodge.

MOSES TOMLINSON, farmer, Stockton, Clinch Co., Ga., son of John Tomlinson, was born in Clinch county, Dec. 29, 1840. His father was a well-to-do farmer, and was reared on the farm and given such education as was obtainable at the common country schools. He enlisted in Company H, Twenty-ninth Georgia regiment, Aug. 31, 1861, which command was assigned to Gen. W. H. T. Walker's division. He was made second sergeant of the company, and served until disabled by the loss of his arm—Aug. 31, 1864, the third anniversary of his enlistment—in an engagement near Jonesboro, Ga. In 1873 he was elected ordinary and held the office two terms—eight years—and afterward was elected tax collector, to which office he has been continuously re-elected since. He still follows farming, and is a good farmer, enjoying the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens. Mr. Tomlinson married Miss Elizabeth, daughter of H. P. Matthis, who has borne him nine children—five sons and four daughters—all of whom are living. They are as follows: Orin L., Lawton H., Horace C., John B. G., Wayne P., Laura E., Hattie P., Jessie E. and Alice M., all of whom reside in Clinch county.

COBB COUNTY.

GEORGE H. CAMP, Marietta, Cobb Co., Ga., a retired cotton manufacturer and capitalist, son of George and Elizabeth Camp, was born in the city of Utica, N. Y., in 1818. His grandfather, Talcott Camp, was a native of Connecticut, but moved to Utica and was in its early history the first mayor of that city. Mr. Camp's father was born in Connecticut, and was related to the first and most conspicuous member of the Hale family, the descendants of whom have marked their way by deeds of patriotism and valor. He commenced business life as a publisher and editor in Utica. Upon removal to Sacket's Harbor, N. Y., he established the "Gazette" in 1815, which he edited some years. Subsequently he became connected with the Sacket's Harbor bank, as president, which position he held until the removal of the bank to Buffalo, N. Y. Remaining in Sacket's Harbor, he engaged in the drug business, in which occupation he continued until his death. Mr. Camp's mother, who was a daughter of E. Hitchcock, was born in Connecticut, and was descended from prominent social and revolutionary families, Admiral Foote, Commodore Hitchcock and Commodore Howell of the United States navy being among her relatives. Mr. G. H. Camp was raised in Sacket's Harbor and was principally educated in the excellent high school of Jefferson county. In 1842 he came to Georgia and settled in Roswell, Cobb Co., where he identified himself with the Roswell Manufacturing company, just then started by Mr. Barrington King. In that business he continued until 1864, at which time he retired from the presidency of the factories—they having been burned by the Federal armies that year. Since that time he has not been actively engaged in any business. Mr. Camp was married in 1850 to Miss Jane M. Atwood, who was born in McIntosh county, Ga., in the year 1830. She was the daughter of Henry and Ann (McIntosh) Atwood. Mr. Atwood was a native of Connecticut and a lawyer by profession. He came to Georgia quite early in life and settled in Darien, where he practiced his profession several years. After his marriage he became a planter of Sea Island cotton, and owning a large number of negroes who were endangered on the coast during the war, he purchased the cotton mill at Curtright, Greene Co., Ga., to which place he removed his negroes for employment in the mill. Mr. and Mrs. Camp have five children living:

George K., who was educated at the Virginia Military institute at Lexington, and after graduating he went to Albany, N. Y., where in the celebrated law school in that city he graduated, to engage in his chosen profession; Walter A., was educated at the Washington-Lee college in Virginia, then spent several years in France and Germany perfecting his knowledge of medicine and surgery, and after concluding his full course he adopted the eye, ear and throat specialty, in which he has had eminent success in Springfield, Mo.; Annie W., was educated at Miss Baldwin's Female institute in Staunton, Va., and is now the wife of Judge Richard H. Field, in Kansas City, Mo., and Misses Sallie A. and Hattie H. were educated at Miss Baldwin's Female institute in Virginia, and are at home, having lately returned from a European trip. Mr. and Mrs. Camp are members of the Presbyterian church, to which faith they are loyal.

CLAY. What magnetism there is in that name! How the blood bounds at its mention. No matter by whom borne, or whenever, wherever or under whatever circumstances it is written or spoken, it involuntarily and invariably creates an exultant thrill, as it brings to mind the chivalrous and patriotic "Harry of the West." Cobb county contributes to these Memoirs one bearing this talismanic name—one of the coming men of the "Empire State of the South." Alexander S. Clay, lawyer, Marietta, Cobb Co., Ga., son of W. J. and Ann (Peck) Clay, was born in Cobb county, in 1853. On his father's side he is of Scotch descent, his great-grandfather having emigrated from Scotland to this country about the middle of the last century, and settled in Virginia, where he lived and died. His paternal grandparents were W. M. and Margaret (Rose) Clay. He was born in Virginia in 1764, migrated to Georgia and settled in Washington county toward the close of the last century. He accumulated quite a large estate—owning 3,000 acres of land in one body—became one of the largest planters, and was one of the wealthiest citizens of the county at the time of his death, which occurred in 1853, in the ninetieth year of his age. Mr. Clay's father was born in Washington county in 1828, was reared on the plantation and has continued farming as his life occupation. He moved to Cobb county in 1846, which has since been his home. He served three years during the war between the states, and is a member of the Methodist church, of which he is a steward. Mr. Clay's mother is a daughter of James and Mary (Turner) Peck. Her father was a native of what is now Taliaferro county, Ga., was an ordained minister of the Baptist church, and preached until his death in 1890, aged eighty years. He moved to Cobb county in 1859, and for many years was county school commissioner. Mr. Clay was reared on the farm and during boyhood schooled at the near-by country schools. Later he went to Palmetto, Ga., where he received his preparatory education and then entered Hiwassee college, Monroe county, Tenn., from which he was graduated in 1876. Returning home he immediately began the study of law under the preceptorship of Hon. David Irwin, and in 1877 was admitted to the bar. He located in Marietta, where he at once was accorded an advanced professional position, and has steadily risen until now he is acknowledged to be one of the best lawyers in the state, as well as a potential political factor. In 1881 he was elected a member of Marietta's city council, and was re-elected the succeeding year, but resigned and did not serve. In 1884 he was elected to represent Cobb county in the general assembly and served on the committees on railroads, finance and privileges and elections. In 1886 he was re-elected, was chosen speaker pro tem., appointed chairman of the committee on manufacturing, and made a member of the committees on finance, corporation and railroads. He was again elected in 1888 and unanimously elected speaker of the house. His labors and services during this term were unusually arduous, of inestimable value to the state, and placed him high on the roll of Georgia's coming statesmen. In 1890 he was elected to represent his senatorial district (Cobb, Fulton and Clayton counties) in the general assembly and was unanimously elected president of the body—presiding with his usual ability, to his own credit and the advantage of the state. In 1894, he was made chairman of the state democratic executive committee and conducted the Akinson-Hines gubernatorial election. His political career may be said to have just begun, as he is only on the threshold of matured manhood, and the prospects and probabilities—aye, almost certainties—are, that he will attain successively to the highest positions within the gift of the people of Georgia. He is closer to the hearts of the people, and nearer to the front in the race for preferment than any man in the state. His name has already been mentioned in connection with the governorship. Mr. Clay was married in 1880 to Miss Fannie—born in what is now Douglas county, in 1863—daughter of A. J. and Margaret (Butner) White. He is a native of Campbell county, Ga., and a large farmer. He volunteered in the Confederate service during the civil war, was captured and confined in Camp Morton, where he died. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Clay four are living: Eugenia H., Alexander S., Jr., Frank B., and Ryburn G. He is a member of the I. O. O. F. and of the masonic fraternity, and himself and wife are valued members of the Methodist church.

J. R. HUMPHRIES, physician and surgeon, Acworth, Cobb Co., Ga., son of G. W. and Zula (McIntyre) Humphries, was born in Franklin county, Ga., in 1833. His paternal grandfather, Richard Humphries, of English extraction, was a native of Chester district, S. C., and followed farming. Leaving South Carolina he came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county, where he continued farming and stock-raising until he died. He served as a major in the war of 1812. Dr. Humphries' father was born in South Carolina, came to Georgia when a young man and lived awhile in Franklin county, moved from there to Morgan county, thence to De Kalb county, and finally moved to Calhoun county, Ala., where he lived until he died in 1890. He was a very ardent and prominent member of the Methodist church. Dr. Humphries' mother was a daughter of John Gunter McIntyre, who was a native of Scotland. Emigrating to this country he came to Georgia and settled in Franklin county. He was a farmer, a trader and miller, and became very rich. He lived all his life in Franklin county. Dr. Humphries was reared on a farm, receiving his primary education at the nearby country schools, and a higher education at the Decatur high school. In 1852, he began the study of medicine under Dr. James F. Alexander, one of the most eminent physicians of Atlanta, and now (1895) president of the board of health of that city. He then attended lectures at the medical college of Georgia, Augusta—from which he was graduated in 1854. Subsequently he took a post-graduate course at the New Orleans college. Locating in De Kalb county he was establishing a fine reputation when the war between the states began. He entered the army and served as assistant surgeon for some time, but in 1863 permanently settled in Acworth, where he has since practiced his profession, his patronage extending for miles around and into adjoining counties. Professionally his attainments are extensive and his ability superior; while his intelligence and winning social qualities have gained him great popularity.

Dr. Humphries was married in 1859 to Miss Sarah—born in De Kalb county, in 1842—daughter of Robert Joyce. He was a native of North Carolina, came to Georgia when a young man and settled in De Kalb county. He was a good and successful farmer, and spent his days in that county. This lady died in 1861, and Dr. Humphries subsequently married Miss O. H.—born in Forsyth county, Ga.—daughter of Hardy Strickland. Mr. Strickland was born in Jefferson county, Ga., but early in life moved to Forsyth county, where he successfully engaged in farming and mining, and became a large slave owner. He was a man of unusual natural ability and force of character, attained to great prominence and influence politically, and represented Forsyth county in the general assembly fifteen years. Later in life he moved to Cobb county where he died. Dr. Humphries has one child living—John R. Mrs. Humphries is an active member of the Baptist church, and the doctor is a master Mason.

JAMES L. LEMON, banker, Acworth, Cobb Co., son of James and Mary B. (Telford) Lemon, was born in Decatur, De Kalb Co., Ga., in 1835. His paternal grandfather, Robert Lemon, of Irish lineage, was a native of South Carolina, was a prosperous farmer, and was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war. He came to Georgia in 1822 and settled in De Kalb county, within six miles of where Atlanta now stands, where he died in 1848. Mr. Lemon's father was born in Anderson district, S. C., moved to Georgia, settled in what is now De Kalb county in 1821, built the first frame house on the ground now occupied by Decatur, and commenced merchandising in connection with farming. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, represented De Kalb county in the general assembly a number of terms, was a working member of the Presbyterian church—of which he was an elder—and assisted in organizing the first Sunday school in Decatur. In 1843 he moved to Marietta, then near Acworth, where he died in 1849. Mr. Lemon's maternal grandfather, William Telford, was a native of Scotland. When quite young he came to this country and settled in what is now Pickens district, S. C., and served as a soldier in the continental army. He afterward engaged in farming and died in Pickens district in 1841. Mr. Lemon was reared on the farm, and received only the limited education obtainable in the schools of the time and locality. In June, 1861, he enlisted in Company A (Capt. O'Neil), Eighteenth Georgia regiment, and went to the front. He, with his command, participated in the battles at Epling's Landing, Seven Pines, seven days' fight around Richmond, Gaines' Mill—famous for the desperate and formidable charge of the Black Horse cavalry on the position of the Eighteenth Georgia, by whose stubborn and deadly resistance they lost nearly every officer and heavily of the troopers—and Sharpsburg. About this time he was detailed for hospital duty and served three months. He then returned to the field and served as captain during the battles of Fredericksburg, Gettysburg and Knoxville. At this last battle he was shot and badly wounded and made prisoner, was in the hospital for the sick three months, and then left in prison until after the surrender. Before the war he started in life as a farmer, but in 1853 engaged with his brother, Smith Lemon, in merchandising at Acworth. The business was continued until 1885, when his brother went into the banking business, remaining in it until he died, in 1889. Mr. Lemon has been exceptionally prosperous and has acquired much property. He is now largely interested in farming, has extensive milling interests and conducts a banking business. He possesses unusually fine business capability and excellent judgment; hence his continuous success. Mr. Lemon was married in 1856 to Miss Eliza—born in Cobb county in 1837—daughter of Thomas and Clara (Pierce)* Davenport. He was born in South Carolina and early in life came to Georgia and settled in Cobb county, where he has prospered as a farmer and where he now lives. Mr. and Mrs. Lemon have ten children living and have three sons in business in Acworth. Mr. Lemon and wife are devout and active members of the Presbyterian church.

LEANDER NEWTON TRAMMELL, chairman of the railroad commission of Georgia, son of Jehu and Elizabeth (Fain) Trammell, was born in Habersham county, Ga., June 5, 1830. His paternal grandfather, William Trammell, who was of Scotch-Irish descent, was born in South Carolina, and married a Miss Lynch. He enlisted and served three years in the continental army during the revolutionary war under Capt. Daniel Duff and Col. Brandon, and participated in the siege of Savannah, December, 1778; battle of King's Mountain, S. C., Oct. 7, 1780, where he lost an arm, and battle of Cowpens, S. C., Jan. 17, 1781. He died in Macon county, N. C., December, 1843. Col. Trammell's father was born in Union district, S. C., and came to Georgia and settled in Habersham county in 1818, where he soon attained to great popularity and influence, and was twice elected to represent the senatorial district in the general assembly. His maternal grandfather, Ebenezer Fain, was of French extraction, a nephew of Baron Fain, a gallant member of Bonaparte's staff. Members of the family emigrated from France to this country before the revolutionary war and settled in Pennsylvania. Mr. Fain was born in Chester county, in that state, Aug. 27, 1762. While in Washington county, Va., in June, 1776, and not fourteen years of age, he enlisted for three months in the patriot army and was stationed at Black Fort and Montgomery Station, during which he was engaged in two battles with Indians—in one of which sixteen were killed. While in Washington county, N. C. (now Tennessee), he served three months, from June, 1780, as light horseman, under Capt. Trimble, Col. Robertson's command, joined with other troops at Gilberttown, and all marched to Pacolet river, S. C., where they had a fight, taking a number of prisoners. At Buffalo Creek, on Broad river, while on duty in the night as a sentinel, he shot John Fenlon, a spy, on whom was found an express note from Lord Cornwallis to a tory, Capt. Moore, urging him to defend his fort until troops could reach him. The Americans captured the fort, with Capt. Moore and 100 men, and the British reinforcements were intercepted at Musgrove's mills and dispersed. At Wofford iron works the patriots were suddenly attacked at night, and after a desperate struggle were compelled to fall back, but rallying, renewed the fight and defeated the enemy. He was subsequently transferred to Capt. Cunningham's company, which was attached to Col. Elijah Clarke's Georgia regiment. Col. Clarke started for Augusta, Ga., but finding the British occupying that place and Georgia and South Carolina, he returned to Rutledge's Ford, on the Saluda river, S. C., where the command was discharged. In September, 1780, he re-enlisted for two months as mounted horseman, and as a substitute under Capt. Taylor and Col. Sevier in pursuit of Col. Ferguson, who was overtaken at King's Mountain, S. C., where, Oct. 7, 1780, a battle was fought, Col. Ferguson killed and 900 prisoners taken. In this battle Mr. Fain was wounded in one of his legs. From November, 1780, he served with Capt. Gibson and Col. Sevier against the Indians, who were badly defeated and their towns destroyed. He continued in the service until April, 1781. In 1783 he moved to South Carolina and settled in territory known as "Ninety-six," which comprised what is now Pickens and Pendleton and Anderson counties. Thence, in 1792, he moved to Buncombe county, N. C., and finally, in 1818, to Georgia, and settled in Habersham county. He was married in Jonesboro, Washington Co. (then North Carolina), now Tennessee, in June, 1781, to Miss Mary Black. She died in Gilmer county, Ga., Feb. 11, 1846. Col. Trammell was reared and worked on the farm during his boyhood and youth, alternating between farm and school as the necessities of the crop demanded. At the age of nineteen he entered a boarding school at Batt's Creek (now Hiwassee college), Tenn., where he remained fifteen months. After leaving there he taught school a while, and then read law under Simpson

Reid, at Blairsville, Ga., and in 1856 attended the law school at Lebanon, Tenn. Having been admitted to the bar, he located at Ringgold, Catoosa Co., Ga., and entered upon the practice of law as the junior member of the firm of McConnell & Trammell. In 1861 he was elected to represent Catoosa county in the general assembly, and in 1863 was re-elected without opposition. In March, 1862, he entered the Confederate service as quartermaster, with the rank of captain, the duties of which he performed in all its details with that promptness and exactitude which is characteristic of him in everything he does. His fidelity and patriotism elicited from the auditor in the quartermaster-general's department a letter complimenting him upon the evidence shown in his reports for his vigilance and honesty in the discharge of his duties, saying that this was the only letter of the kind he had had the pleasure of writing. In 1866 he resumed the practice of law in Calhoun, Gordon Co. He was elected a member of the constitutional convention of 1867-68, in which he did his most valuable work for the state. He was the recognized leader of the little band of fourteen dauntless patriots in that convention known as the "Hancock democracy," whose unflagging courage and unrelaxing labor saved and secured to Georgia the supremacy of the white race—a service which endeared him to the people, and will never be forgotten. At the election next succeeding he was unanimously tendered the nomination to the state senate, but declined the honor. In 1870 he was elected to represent the senatorial district in the general assembly, and was elected president of the senate. Gov. Bullock having resigned, Mr. Trammell became, by right, governor pro-tem. of the state, but the former president of the senate, Mr. Benjamin Conley, claimed the right and assumed the duties of the office, which came near precipitating serious consequences. Fortunately the blended blood of Scotch-Irish conservatism and French chivalric magnanimity, as represented by Mr. Trammell, interposed and prevented it. He was strongly urged by leading democrats throughout the state, and by the general assembly, to assert his rights, but foreseeing the certain disorder and confusion, and the possible injury to the highest and best interests of the state that such a contention would provoke and prolong, he wisely and patriotically declined to do so. As president of the senate he was distinguished for his fairness, impartiality and parliamentary ability, and in 1873 was re-elected without opposition, and closed his four years' incumbency without having an appeal taken from a decision he had made. He was a Tilden elector in 1876, a member of the constitutional convention in 1877, in which he served on the committee on revision. He was president of the state democratic convention in 1881, and chairman of the democratic executive committee in 1882 and 1883. Speaking of him as president of the memorable state convention of 1881 to nominate a governor, Col. Isaac W. Avery, in his history of Georgia, has this to say: "The Hon. L. N. Trammell was elected unanimously president of the convention. There has never been in the history of public conventions a finer piece of parliamentary presiding than Mr. Trammell's government of this fiery convention. It must be held in mind that he was a warm Colquitt supporter, and he had to steer between the expectations of his friends, for that decided leaning to his own side that an experienced chairman can so helpfully give, and the proclivity of the opposition to suspect his fairness and censure his rulings. It was the highest possible tribute to Mr. Trammell that both sides were satisfied and deemed his action fair. Not only this, but the clash of parliamentary strategy—and, in the turbulence of heated debate, there were repeatedly two dangerous contingencies constantly threatening, namely—inextricable confusion in the order of business, and an ungovernable turmoil. Mr. Trammell met both these perils with a most masterly skill and fairness. His solution of parliamentary puzzles was instantaneous and decisive. No man with a less available and thorough knowledge of the law of deliberative bodies could have been equal to the trying occasion. His intuitions were like lightning, and as resolute as the edict of an autocrat. Both sides stood in eager, reckless antagonism and fought for every advantage. Both sides were determined and combative, and their spirits drove toward an explosion. Mr. Trammell held the unruly elements with a strong hand and carried the stormy proceedings for eight long days to an orderly conclusion. It was a splendid triumph of a presiding genius. It was an extraordinary and unequalled piece of tact, intelligence, firmness and leadership." Prior to his chairmanship of the executive committee in 1883 the two-thirds rule governed the gubernatorial nominating conventions. Through his wholesome influence this rule was changed, and since that time nominations have been made by a majority vote, and the change has proved his wisdom. In October, 1881, Mr. Trammell was appointed railroad commissioner by Gov. Colquitt, reappointed in 1887 by Gov. Gordon, and again in 1893 by Gov. Northen; in 1890 he was made chairman of the commission. Endowed with unusual mental capacity, keen and strong, a courage of conviction unappalled by the most powerful antagonisms, an integrity of character and sincerity of purpose absolutely unassailable, a deep insight into motives, and common sense and executive ability of a high order, he naturally became an almost unerring judge of public sentiment, and a wise and successful leader of men, and enabled to exercise a strong and salutary influence on the legislation of Georgia. Well-informed, patient, diligent and conscientiously just he has, in his present honorable and responsible position, been incalculably serviceable, because he has won and enjoys the entire unreserved confidence of the railway authorities on the one hand and of the people on the other. The interests of the people and the development and advancement of Georgia are near his heart, for them in the prime of his life he has worked in the past, and to them his energies and labors are devoted to-day. Affable, courteous, open-handed, big-hearted and public-spirited, it excites no wonder that his political preferment arouses no jealousy and that everybody is his friend. Mr. Trammell was married in 1856 to Miss Zenobia J., daughter of Elihu S. Barclay, a union which has been blessed with an interesting family of eight children: Mary M., wife of Samuel B. Scott, Atlanta, Ga.; Paul B., Atlanta, Ga.; Elizabeth V., wife of George L. Morris, Birmingham, Ala.; William J., Marietta, Ga.; Alice N., wife of Walter L. Sessions, Marietta, Ga.; Fleta, wife of Frank E. Boston, Atlanta; Margaret Z., and Leander N., Jr. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and a prominent member of the Methodist church.

COFFEE COUNTY.

GEORGE R. BRIGGS, lawyer, Douglas, Coffee Co., Ga., was born in Stafford county, Va., Dec. 29, 1846. His father, Rev. W. S. Briggs, was a prominent Baptist minister who died in Richmond, March 5, 1892. George R. Briggs was educated in the excellent schools of Virginia, and then entered Richmond college where he remained three years. In 1861, he enlisted in the First Virginia cavalry, and served with the regiment until the close of the war. After the surrender he returned to Virginia and taught school until 1870, when he came to Georgia, teaching in Macon and Taylor counties. Elected president of Houston female college, he remained there for four years, when he was elected president of Spalding seminary, near Montezuma, Macon Co., a position he held three years, and then removed to Hawkinsville, Pulaski Co., to take charge of the institute at that place. During this time he was reading law, and in 1884 was admitted to the bar before Judge A. C. Pate. Returning to Montezuma, he entered upon the practice of his profession, and a portion of the time conducted a farm until 1889. That year he was elected principal of the Carrollton high school in Alabama. He held this position but a year. Resigning he went to Birmingham, Ala., where he opened a law office. In June, 1893, he went to Douglas, where he engaged in the practice of law. Mr. Briggs was married in Houston county, Ga., in January, 1873, to Augusta E., daughter of John S. Taylor, of that county. Six children have been born to him: Maude and Bessie, at school at Richmond, and the other four, May, Lucille, Hortense and Seals (a son), are at home. Mr. Briggs is a Baptist, a Mason and a member of the I. O. O. F.

EDWARD A. BUCK, merchant and naval stores manufacturer, Douglas, Coffee Co., Ga., is of North Carolina stock, a son of Edward Buck, a farmer and naval stores manufacturer, and was born in Pitt county, N. C., Nov. 17, 1848. Like many thousands of others whose school age covered the same period of time, Mr. Buck was deprived of the advantage of an education. He has, however, managed to hold his own in his life struggle. In 1875 he came to Georgia and engaged in the manufacture of naval stores in Charlton county. He remained there only a year; then he removed to Wayne county, where he lived eight years. At the end of this time he went to Brunswick, where he engaged in the commission business, but retired after a year's experience. Leaving Brunswick he went to Clinch county where he resumed the manufacture of naval stores, continuing it eight years. From there he came to Douglas, where he is now operating a farm and manufacturing naval stores; and in connection with these conducting a store in town. Mr. Buck married Lillie Lipsey in Clinch county, in 1887, by whom he has had one child, a daughter, Mary Ethel, born Sept. 28, 1889. Mr. Buck is a man of energy and enterprise, and fine business and executive ability, and is reputed to be one of the wealthiest men in the wire grass belt.

F. WILLIS DART, judge of the county court of Coffee county, Douglas, Ga., is a son of F. M. and Mary (Hall) Dart, and was born in Brunswick, Ga., in 1869. He received his primary education in the public schools, and was graduated from the law department of Georgia university, class of '93. In 1893 he practiced law for a short time at Brunswick, Ga., and in 1894 located in Douglas. In March, 1895, he was appointed judge of the Coffee county court, to fill the unexpired term of Judge C. A. Ward, who had resigned. Judge Dart is one of the youngest county judges in the state, and enjoys the distinction of reaching the bench in a little less than two years from the time he was admitted to practice. He took the honors at school, and though young in years, possesses the legal acumen not often found in older heads. He is a close student and a fine orator, and had already secured a gratifying success in his profession when appointed county judge. Judge Dart is a member of the Delta Tau Delta college fraternity, and possessing a most amiable disposition and irreproachable character, is deservedly popular, and has a bright future before him.

M'INTOSH M. HALL, M. D. (deceased), Douglas, Coffee Co., Ga., brother of Dr. J. F. Hall, Statenville, Echols Co., Ga., was born in Montgomery county, Ga., in January, 1853. Receiving a very good common school education during boy and youthhood, he entered the medical department of Washington university, Baltimore, Md., in 1871, from which he graduated in February, 1874. Soon afterward he located in Coffee county, where he has since resided with the exception of one year, 1883, in Appling county. He located in Douglas, county seat for Coffee county, where he established an enviable professional reputation, and an excellent practice, and kept a drug store until he died, Jan. 15, 1895. In 1875, he married Rebecca B., daughter of Hon. John M. Lott, an influential and popular citizen, who has represented Coffee county in the general assembly two terms. Dr. and Mrs. Hall had three children born to them: John M., born December, 1876, who attended the lectures at and graduated from the Southern Medical college, Atlanta, in 1895, and has succeeded to his father's practice and business; J. Frank, born in March, 1879; and Minnie May, born in April, 1886. Dr. Hall was a master Mason, and a member of Broxton lodge No. 247.

WILLIAM A. MOORE, M. D., Willacoochee, Coffee Co., Ga., son of Arthur Moore, farmer, Coffee county, was born in Berrien county, Ga., July 8, 1869. Dr. Moore, having had the advantage of a good common school education, began studying medicine in 1890 under Dr. Jeff Wilson, entered the Southern Medical college at Atlanta the ensuing fall, and graduated from the same in May, 1892. He went to Broxton at first to locate, but after a stay of a few months, decided to move to Willacoochee, where he has already secured a good practice, with a very bright prospective future. Dr. Moore married Georgia, daughter of William Shaw, Berrien county, June 15, 1893, who has borne him one child—a boy, Aubray—born May 10, 1894. The doctor is a master Mason, and a member of Willacoochee lodge No. 197, F. and A. M.

WILLIAM F. SIBBETT, M. D., Douglas, Coffee Co., Ga., was born in Columbus county, N. C., June 12, 1853. His father, of English descent, is still living. Dr. Sibbett, while a boy, received a fairly good common-school education. In 1877, while yet a youth, he came to Georgia and worked three years in Dodge and Appling counties in the turpentine business. Sober, industrious and economical, he saved money and engaged in the drug business in Hazlehurst, Ga., with Dr. Latimer, under the firm name of J. H. Latimer & Co. During this period he read medicine under Dr. Latimer, and, in 1886, entered the Atlanta Medical college, whence he graduated in March, 1888. Returning to Hazlehurst, he remained only a few months, when he sold out and went to Broxton, Coffee Co. After remaining in that place two and one-half years he removed to Douglas, county seat of Coffee county, where he has established himself in an excellent paying practice as a physician, and in connection with this is doing a good drug business. He was elected coroner in January, 1895, being one of two democrats elected to county offices. Dr. Sibbett was married in December, 1884, to Amanda R., daughter of James Graham, of Appling county, by whom he has had two children: Willie, eight, and Annie, six years old. He is a member of the Georgia Medical association and of the Pharmaceutical association. He is a member and worshipful master of Douglas lodge No. 386, F. and A. M., and a royal arch Mason. He is also worthy patron of Douglas chapter of the Order of the Eastern Star.

CALVIN A. WARD, JR., lawyer and county judge, Douglas, Coffee Co., Ga., was born in Coffee county, Dec. 20, 1857. He is of a North Carolina family, his father being a son of John Ward of that state. C. A. Ward, Sr., is a farmer and stock-raiser, and at one time was justice of the inferior court. Calvin A. Ward, Jr., was given the best education obtainable in that part of the state during the troublous time of his boyhood. He then attended the university law school at Athens, from which he graduated in 1886, and soon afterward established himself in Douglas, where he has built up a very handsome practice. On reaching his majority he was elected clerk of the superior court, and held the office six years. His faithfulness and efficiency in this office commended for higher honors, so his fellow-citizens elected him county judge, an office he has held for three years. He is also editor of the county paper, "The Douglas Breeze," and conducts a farm. Judge Ward was married Jan. 24, 1883, to Emma, daughter of J. T. and Elizabeth Smith, Coffee county. He is a member of the State Bar association.

JEFFERSON WILCOX, M. D., Willacoochee, Coffee Co., Ga., was born in Coffee county, March 20, 1860. His father, Mark Wilcox, who died in 1892, was a farmer and at one time was sheriff of the county. Dr. Wilcox, fortunately, was favored with a good common-school education preparatory to his entrance into the Southern Medical college at Atlanta, in 1881, from which institution he graduated in 1883. He located first at Broxton, Coffee county, but left there after a while and settled in Willacoochee, where he is now and where he has a choice remunerative practice not excelled in all that section. In addition to his practice he has a drug store, which is doing a profitable business. Dr. Wilcox has been mayor of Willacoochee, and now represents the county in the general assembly, and is a member of the following committees: Agriculture, hygiene and sanitation, pensions, lunatic asylum and penitentiary. Dr. Wilcox was married May 6, 1883, to Mary A., daughter of James Hinson, Coffee county, who has borne him two children: Ira E., born May 20, 1884, and Mark, born May 21, 1890. He is a master Mason and a member and treasurer of Willacoochee lodge No. 197, F. and A. M. Dr. Wilcox stands high in his locality as an able and successful physician.

COLUMBIA COUNTY.

DR. R. B. BAILEY, the most prominent physician in Columbia county (post-office, Appling) was born in that county in 1828. He was a son of Nathaniel and Ann E. (Wilborn) Bailey. Nathaniel Bailey was a native of Maryland and moved to Wilkes county, Ga., with his parents when he was a small boy. He was a successful man and accumulated large tracts of land and owned many negroes. He moved from Wilkes to Columbia county, was a leading citizen, and served as judge of the inferior court several years. Ann E. (Wilborn) Bailey, Dr. Bailey's mother, was a daughter of Elias and Mary (Marshall) Wilborn. Elias Wilborn was a native of North Carolina, but moved to South Carolina and thence to Georgia. He was a soldier in the revolutionary war, was engaged in many battles and was one of the wealthiest citizens in Columbia county. He was a leader in church and state. Dr. Bailey's maternal great-grandfather was Daniel Marshall, a noted Baptist minister, who sojourned in many places in Virginia and North Carolina, and in 1771 moved to Georgia and settled on the largest of the Kiokee creeks, and organized the church of Kiokee, which is the oldest church in Georgia. It is about eighteen miles from Augusta, in Columbia county, in the neighborhood of the two Kiokee creeks, which empty into the Savannah river. Dr. Bailey was reared on the farm. He received his collegiate education at Emory college and graduated there in 1849. He began the study of medicine under Dr. William S. Jones, afterward under Dr. H. R. Casey, and attended the sessions of the Augusta Medical college, where he graduated in 1851. He located in Appling, where he has practiced ever since. He has a large practice, is a highly cultivated, honorable gentleman, and is greatly respected and loved by the people of Columbia county.

M. J. BRANCH, farmer and legislator, Berzelia, Columbia Co., Ga., and one of the most prominent men in the state, was born in Petersburg, Va., in 1847, the son of Thomas and Sarah P. (Reed) Branch. He received a liberal education and graduated at college. When the civil war began he was a cadet in the Virginia Military academy, and went into active service with the cadets. He moved to Augusta, Ga., in 1868, and engaged in merchandising until 1879. In 1880 Mr. Branch married Miss Sue Steiner, who was born in Tiffin, Ohio, in 1852, and was an adopted daughter of Dr. R. Steiner. They have three living children: Hal S., Melvin C. and Steiner. In 1876 he moved to Columbia county, where he has been engaged in farming ever since, and has taken an active part in public affairs. He was a delegate to the national convention of the people's party at Omaha in 1892 and was chairman of the committee on platform. The same year he was elected a member of the Georgia legislature, and was re-elected in 1894. He is a leading member of the house, is on several important committees, and was the nominee of his party for speaker of the house, but was defeated by W. H. Fleming, the democratic nominee. Mr. Branch's father was a native of Virginia, was prominent in business and public affairs, and a leading member of the Methodist church. He was a delegate to the state convention when Virginia seceded from the union, was a wealthy man, and in 1871 established the Merchants' National bank of Richmond, of which he became president. Dr. Steiner, Mrs. Branch's adopted father, was a very prominent man. He served in the Mexican war with Gen. Scott, was a surgeon in the Confederate army, and after the war settled in Augusta, where he was a leading physician until he died in 1892.

MISS SARAH JANE CRAWFORD, a very prominent and wealthy lady of Appling, Columbia Co., was born in that county in 1813. She is a daughter of Dr. Nathan and Mary (Marshall) Crawford. Her father, Dr. Crawford, was born in Virginia and moved to Georgia in 1799. He read medicine under Dr. Smelt, a prominent physician of Augusta, and after completing his course went to the upper part of Columbia county and settled on the Kiokee creek and practiced his profession. The first tax he ever paid was $5, but he afterward accumulated a large fortune and was the wealthiest man in Columbia county. His practice was very large, extending over a wide territory, in all the adjoining counties, and over into South Carolina. He was the first physician to perform the difficult operation of placing a silver plate on a broken skull. He was prominent in public affairs and served as a member of the legislature, and as judge of the inferior court. His father, Charles Crawford, was a native of Virginia, and came to Georgia a boy at the beginning of the revolutionary war, in which he served in the patriot army as captain, participating at the siege of Savannah and Augusta, being taken prisoner at the latter place. He graduated at the medical college presided over by Dr. Rush, in Philadelphia, in 1799, and returning to Georgia settled on the Kiokee creek, at the residence of Rev. Abraham Marshall, where he practiced his profession. He was a very prominent man, and lived in Columbia county until his death. Mrs.

Mary (Marshall) Crawford, the mother of Miss Sarah J. Crawford, was a daughter of Levi and Sarah (Wyme) Marshall. Levi Marshall was the fourth son of Daniel Marshall; was a wealthy merchant and farmer, and lived in Columbia county all his life. His father, Daniel Marshall was born in Windsor, Conn., in 1706. At the early age of twenty he became a convert to religion and entered upon the work of the ministry with great energy and zeal. He sold his home, and as his biographer says: "Gave up his commodious buildings for a miserable hut; his beautiful fields and orchards for barren deserts, the luxuries of a well-furnished table for coarse, scanty fare, and numerous civil friends for rude savages." He moved to Winchester, Va., thence to Hughwarry, N. C., and then to Abbott's Creek, N. C., where he organized a church and located as its pastor. Subsequently he traveled in Virginia, organized a number of churches, and afterward moved from North Carolina to South Carolina, thence to Georgia, where he established the first Baptist church in the state in 1772, on the Kiokee creek. This church is still standing, about two miles from Appling. Mr. Marshall was once seized while preaching and whipped, a man named Sam Cartledge using the lash, and Cartledge was afterward converted and became a preacher. Miss Sarah J. Crawford, the subject of this sketch, is one of the foremost ladies of the county. Her ancestors were distinguished, and her family connections are prominent and well known. She is first cousin of ex-Gov. George Crawford, second cousin of W. H. Crawford, and Gov. Culbertson, of Texas, is her nephew. Liberal, public spirited, and having a strong intellect, she is highly respected and honored in the community where she lives.

JAMES A. LAMKIN, a prosperous farmer, Kiokee, Columbia Co., was born in Columbia county, in 1850. His father, Augustus Lamkin, was also a native of Columbia county, was a farmer and race-horse man, and traveled over the state, taking part in all the leading races. He was successful in business, was highly respected and lived in his native county until he died in 1869. His parents were James and Katie (Smith) Lamkin. James Lamkin was a native of Virginia, but came to Georgia and settled in Columbia county, when a young man, and was one of the early settlers of that county. When he came to Georgia he was a very poor man, but was successful and accumulated a large fortune. Mr. James A. Lamkin's mother was a daughter of James Alexander, who was a native of Columbia county, and lived there many years, but subsequently moved to Augusta, where he died. He fought in the battle of New Orleans as a major. Mr. James A. Lamkin, the subject of this sketch, was reared on the farm and received a limited education. In 1882 he married Miss Ella Walton, daughter of Jesse and Palatil (Jones) Walton. Mr. Walton was born in Columbia county; was a successful farmer, and lived and died in the county of his birth. Mr. and Mrs. Lamkin had six sons: Walton, James A., Clanton, Griffith, Jacob P. and Frank E. He started in life with very little, but by hard work and diligent application to business was successful, and now owns 3,000 acres of choice land, a gin mill, saw mill, and other property. He was deputy sheriff of his county six years and is a highly respected member of the masonic fraternity. His wife was born in Columbia county, in 1852. She is an active and useful member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

MARION M'DANIEL, farmer, Cluese, Columbia Co., Ga., son of Zero and Catherine (Thompson) McDaniel, was born in Henry county, Va., in 1829. His father was a native of Virginia, a farmer by occupation, and lived all his life in his native state. His mother was a daughter of Mitchell Thompson, a native of Amherst county, Va., who moved to Grayson county, Va., where he served as clerk of the county court several years. He was a man of extraordinary physical vigor, and lived to be ninety-five years of age. Mr. McDaniel was reared on a farm until sixteen years old. In his seventeenth year he discovered a principle by which in tempering steel the proper temper could be ascertained. He traveled ten years in Virginia, the Carolinas and Georgia, giving practical instruction in the art of welding and tempering steel, in horseshoeing, etc. In the early fifties he began training young men who had no experience, and soon found that a bright, sprightly man, white or black, could be taught in eight or ten days to do the simpler kinds of plantation work. He also found that while the negro was almost entirely destitute of the inventive faculty, his imitative power was so great that he was a quick learner. He regards the ten years he thus spent in training mechanics as the most important part of his life. After finishing his work in this line he settled down to quiet farm life in Columbia county, in which he is now contentedly and profitably engaged. Mr. McDaniel has been married three times. He was first married in 1851 to Miss Sallie—born in 1831—daughter of E. D. and Nancy Hamilton Alfriend. She died in 1858, and of the children she bore him but one, Ann H., is living. His second marriage was in 1863 to Miss Ida E.—born in Columbia county in 1847—daughter of Uriah and Sarah (Cartledge) Blanchard. This wife died in 1873; and of the children she bore him three survive: Owenton, Minnie, and Alexander H. For his third wife he married, in 1864, Miss Rosa A., born in Warren county, in 1858—daughter of James A. and Sarah (Lane) Bradshaw. Mr. McDaniel is a master Mason, and himself and wife are members of the Methodist church.

W. H. JONES, one of the most successful farmers of Columbia county, postoffice, Evans, was born in Augusta, Ga., in 1840, but was reared on a farm and educated at Georgetown college. In 1862, he enlisted in the Confederate service, Twelfth Georgia battalion, under J. B. V. Allen, and was engaged in many battles in Virginia, and also in the battles of Resaca, Lost mountain, Kennesaw mountain, Atlanta, and Jonesboro. He was with the army until the close of the war. In 1866, Mr. Jones was married to Mrs. Sophie Ball Mala, widow of William Mala, and daughter of Moses and Harriet (Bassey) Greene. Mr. Greene was a great-nephew of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, of revolutionary fame. Mrs. Jones is also a great-granddaughter of Col. Joseph Taylor of the revolutionary army, known in history as "Fighting" Joe Taylor. They have five children living: Arthur, Jessie, Walter, William H., and Mary E. He and his wife are members of the Baptist church, and are highly respected by all who know them. Mr. Jones' father, William Jones, was a native of Wales, but came to this country in 1812, and settled first in Charleston, afterward moving to Columbia, S. C., and when the Indian war began he enlisted and served through the same. After the same closed he lived in Fort Valley a short time, then moved back to Columbia, S. C., and afterward to Augusta, Ga., where he engaged in the manufacture of gin machinery. In 1841, he moved to Columbia county, Ga., and was engaged in farming until his death. He was a leading citizen, was highly respected and very wealthy. He lost eighty slaves and $100,000 in bank stock by the war. Mr. Jones' mother was a daughter of Marshall Keith, who was born in Virginia, was wealthy and owned land in that state, North Carolina, South Carolina and Alabama. He read law under Henry Clay, but never engaged in the practice. His father was a native of Scotland, but was driven from there on account of his religious belief, during the reign of Charles I. He was a grandson of Lord Keith, and first settled in Virginia, subsequently removing to Georgia. Mr. Jones lives on a large plantation left him by his father.

H. A. MERRY, a merchant and farmer at Berzelia, Columbia Co., was born in Washington, Wilkes Co., Ga., in 1831, a son of Bradford and Ann (Bruckner) Merry. He received a fair education and began life as a clerk in the store of Beers & Roberts, and afterward with Cress & Hickman. In 1853 he began business for himself at Berzelia. In 1861 he moved to Augusta and engaged in the dry-goods business until 1862, when he sold out and enlisted in the Confederate army. He served on detail duty as a manufacturer of shoe lasts, bunks and boxes until the last year of the war, when he went into active service and was engaged in the battles around Savannah. After the close of the war he returned to Berzelia and did business two years, then went to Dalton and lived two years, thence to Augusta and engaged in the produce and commission business, when he returned to Berzelia, where he has been doing business ever since. In 1857 Mr. Merry married Miss A. V. Holmes, daughter of James and Lucinda (Gibson) Holmes. They have nine living children. He and his wife are members of the Methodist church; he is a Mason, and is a highly respected citizen, and holds the honorable position of president of the county board of education. His father, Bradford Merry, was born in New Bedford, Mass., in 1799, moved to Georgia in 1820, and settled in Wilkes county as a saddle and harness maker. He also engaged in farming and owned slaves. Mr. Merry's mother was a daughter of Daniel Bruckner, who was born in Switzerland, ran away from home when a boy, and went to England, where he served in the navy. He afterward came to America and first settled in Charleston, S. C., but subsequently moved to Wilkes county, Ga., and went to farming. He served as clerk of the court several years.

WILLIAM T. WALTON, farmer, Kiokee, Columbia Co., Ga., son of Jesse S. and Palatiah (Jones) Walton, was born in Columbia county in 1836. His paternal great-grandfather was a native of England and emigrated to this country and settled in Virginia about the middle of the last century. His grandparents were William and Sallie (Grinnage) Walton, natives of Virginia. They migrated to Georgia in 1790 and settled in Columbia county, where he prosperously planted all his life. He was a soldier in the patriot army during the revolutionary war, and for his services drew some land in Kentucky. To pay the taxes on this he was accustomed to go there every year on horseback. He was surveyor of Columbia county and held the office many years. Mr. Walton's father was born in Columbia county, was raised a planter and made it a life pursuit with marked success. His maternal great-grandfather, Jones, was a native of Wales, England, and emigrated to this country before the revolutionary war. His mother was a daughter of Ellis, son of the above, and Mary (Pinson) Jones. He was born in Columbia county, near where Harlem now stands, was a large planter, and grew to be what was considered wealthy in his day, and became a leading, influential citizen. Mr. Walton was raised on the plantation and received a collegiate education, graduating in 1856. In 1864 he enlisted in Terrell's artillery company, but in a short time left the service on account of ill health and returned home. He has since devoted himself to planting, and has been content with its pleasures and profits. He is the proprietor of a large estate and is a leading citizen of the county, in which he is held in high esteem. Mr. Walton was married in 1860 to Miss Mary—born in Columbia county in 1841—daughter of Benjamin Berry, a native of Maryland. His father was a native of England, and emigrated to this country and settled in that state. Of the children born to Mr. and Mrs. Walton seven survive: Emma, wife of Thomas B. Dozier; Benjamin B., William T., Pollie E., Francis J., Eloise M. and Ruth. Himself and wife are active members of the Methodist church.

COLQUITT COUNTY.

EDWARD H. BRYAN, Moultrie, Ga., is a son of Rev. J. H. Bryan, a Methodist minister, and a member of the South Georgia and Florida conference, and was born in Lowndes county, Ga., April 21, 1840. Mr. Bryan was educated mainly at the Masonic seminary, Madison, Fla. In 1861 he enlisted in the First Florida regiment, but was subsequently transferred to the First Florida battalion. Having been wounded at Shiloh, he was granted a six months' furlough, on the expiration of which he rejoined the army. He was again wounded at the battle of Murfreesboro, Tenn., in a charge made under Breckinridge. After his recovery Mr. Bryan served in the quartermaster's department until the end of the year, when he joined the Second Florida cavalry, Col. Smith commanding, and was in the battle of Ocean Pond, under Gen. Alfred H. Colquitt. During his service he filled acceptably the offices of second sergeant and sergeant major. When, at last, the end came, Mr. Bryan engaged in farming in Mitchell county for three years; then for several years taught school in the counties of Worth and Colquitt. In 1877 he entered the office of the ordinary of Colquitt county as deputy, and at the same time held the office of commissioner of education. After serving as county treasurer two years Mr. Bryan served as clerk of the superior court eight years. He now holds the office of freight and ticket agent of the Boston & Albany railway. In 1864 Mr. Bryan was married to Emily, daughter of Allen C. Sellers, of Mitchell county. He has four children living—two sons and two daughters. The oldest daughter married J. E. Hornsby, Moultrie; the other children, John, born in 1872; Mattie, born in 1876, and Edward R., born in 1890, are with their parents. In 1877 Mr. Bryan was ordained at Hopewell church, Moultrie, Ga., a minister of the Baptist church, in which sacred relation he is rendering faithful service. For seventeen years or more he has been zealously identified with Sunday school work.

WILLIAM B. DUKES, merchant, Moultrie, Colquitt Co., Ga., was born in what is now Brooks county, Ga., Jan. 13, 1856. His father, Edward C. Dukes, who was a farmer, died in the year he was born. He was reared and worked on the farm, and at intervals attended the near-by common schools of the county until 1874, when, at the age of eighteen years, he went to Thomas county, Ga., to engage in the saw-milling business. A few years later, having saved some money, he borrowed a small additional sum from a Thomasville firm and with limited capital embarked in a general merchandising business on a small scale at Chastain, in Thomas county, in a little 16x25 tenement. He attended closely to his business, worked hard and "kept store" all alone. He succeeded beyond his most sanguine expectations and had to enlarge the store, and a little later he had to enlarge it still more. But his business kept on increasing, until to meet all its demands he determined to establish a business in Moultrie. Accordingly in 1894 he opened a general merchandise store, and well-stocked furniture store, and in connection with these a drug store, conducted under the firm name of Dukes & Smith. Receiving a partner at Chastain, the business was continued there under the name of W. M. Adams & Co. In addition to these he has a store in another part of the county. He has large and well-assorted stocks at all his places of business and gives employment to a large number of clerks. Beginning with very limited capital—part borrowed at that—he has been remarkably successful and prosperous, and ranks among the most substantial men in South Georgia. Comparatively young, energetic and enterprising, and of tried integrity, the success which has so far attended him gives promise of a most brilliant business future and great wealth. Mr. Dukes was married in 1880 to Miss Ella L., daughter of Ellison Dekle, of Thomas county, by whom he has had four children: Boyd, born in 1882; Effie Lee, born in 1884; Hallie, born in 1886, and a son, born in September, 1894.

ALVIN B. PETERS, M. D., was born in Lowndes county, Ga., July 27, 1866, and is the son of W. L. Peters, a prosperous farmer now living in Berrien county. The only educational advantages enjoyed by Dr. Peters were those of the common schools of the county. Thus meagerly equipped he entered the medical department of Vanderbilt university at Nashville, Tenn., in 1887, whence he graduated in 1889, and located at Cecil, Berrien Co. He remained in Cecil about four years, building up a fine practice, and then removed to Moultrie, Ga., where he has gained a remunerative patronage, and in connection with his practice established a good drug business under the firm name of Peters & Belote. In February, 1891, Dr. Peters married Miss Sallie Mathis, Cecil, Ga. One son, Hoke Smith, is the result of this union. Dr. Peters is a man of energy and enterprise, a democrat in politics, has been mayor of Cecil, and is a master Mason, being a popular working member of Ahia lodge, No. 346, in which he has officiated as junior deacon.

WILLIAM R. SMITH, M. D., was born in Brooks county, Ga., Jan. 24, 1863. His father, Dr. Albert D. Smith, a retired physician, resides now in Thomas county. William R. was educated at the academy at Quitman, Ga., and in 1882 began the study of medicine under his father. He attended a course of lectures at Atlanta Medical college in the winter of 1883-84, and afterward attended the Memphis Hospital Medical college, graduating in 1885. Dr. Smith located at Chastain, Thomas Co., whence after six years of successful practice he removed to Moultrie, Colquitt Co. Here, in addition to his extensive professional service, he has, in connection with his partner, W. B. Dukes, established a prosperous and growing drug business. In 1888 he was united in marriage with Miss Anna Hagan, orphan daughter of James Hagan, late of Thomas county. Two daughters, Winona, four, and Fannie, two years old, have blessed this union. Dr. Smith is closely related to State Senator W. S. Humphries, Quitman, Ga.; also to State Representative J. W. Hopson, Brooks county, who is one of its wealthiest and most popular citizens. Dr. Smith is a prominent and much esteemed member of the Baptist church, with a bright and useful future before him.

COWETA COUNTY.

WESLEY W. ADDY, a well-known and esteemed citizen of Coweta county, is the grandson of Simeon Addy and son of Jacob and Mary (Rawl) Addy, both natives of South Carolina, in which state Wesley was born in the year 1827. In 1844 the family left South Carolina and moved to Georgia, when Wesley was seventeen years of age. He made as good use as possible of the limited educational opportunities of those early days and fitted himself to teach school, which calling he pursued for nearly two years. In 1851 he married Margaret Bernhard, daughter of Jacob and Esther (Lites) Bernhard, both natives of South Carolina, who were among the early settlers of Henry county, Ga., where their daughter, Mrs. Addy, was born and reared. In 1862 Mr. Addy enlisted in the Ninth Georgia regiment, under Capt. Brooks, Col. Neeley's command. He was in several very hard-fought battles, as in those of Atlanta and Griswoldville, and in numerous skirmishes. He served through the war and then returned to Georgia. His homestead consists of 225 acres of well-improved land, upon which he has made a competent living. He owned at one time 740 acres, but sold off the greater part. He started in the beginning with only about $700, but has been able to acquire considerable property, as well as the respect and good-will of his fellow-citizens. Mr. and Mrs. Addy are members of the Lutheran church. Their union has been blessed with twelve children: Thomas, Mary, Warren, Stockton, Henry, Jason, Oscar, Simeon, Rosa, Ella, Pearl and Robert.

CAPT. JAMES W. ANDERSON, son of William U. and Mary Ann (Potts) Anderson, was born in Coweta county, Ga., in March, 1835. His father was born in Coweta county in 1808. He was reared on a farm, and had but little education. During his life he kept a record of the noted historical events which affected Coweta county, and in 1880 had them published in book form, which is interesting and very reliable as to dates. He was an uncompromising democrat and a great worker for the party, but would never accept office except once, when he was assistant warden of the penitentiary under Gov. Johnson. He was one of the thirteen original members of the Baptist church at Newnan. His father, the grandfather of Capt. J. W. Anderson, was a soldier both in the revolutionary war and the war of 1812. Mrs. Anderson, the mother of J. W. Anderson, was a daughter of James Potts, who was a soldier in the revolutionary war, and was one of the pioneer settlers of Coweta county, Ga. James W. Anderson, the subject of this sketch, was reared in Coweta county, and received but a very limited education. In April, 1861, he enlisted in Company A, First Georgia regiment, and was present in the first battle in which his company was engaged, and was with it until the close of the war. He was with his company at the retreat of Laurel hill and Greenbrier river under Gen. Jackson. After the battle of Cheat mountain, their time being out, the entire company was discharged; but after being home one month Mr. Anderson enlisted in a company known as the Newnan guards, Twelfth Georgia battalion of artillery, with which he remained through the war. He was adjutant of the first company he was in, and in 1863 was elected captain. He went out in the Twelfth Georgia battalion, though, as first lieutenant. His company, after its reorganization, was ordered to go to Gen. Bragg with the artillery, and went through Kentucky, after which it was transferred to the infantry, but still drew pay as artillery. They then went through the country as far as Charleston, S. C., and served there during the whole siege. In 1864 he was wounded at Winchester, Va., being shot through the thighs, which rendered him unfit for further service. After the war he returned to Coweta county, and began at first as a contractor and builder, working at this several years. He finally saved up a sufficient amount of money to purchase a farm, where he remained until he moved to Newnan. In 1875 he was elected sheriff of Coweta county, serving six years. In 1866 he was married to Miss Sarah, daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth (Rollen) Brown; this lady died in a very short time, and in 1879 he married Elizabeth Blaukenship, daughter of Francis and Sarah (Curtis) Blaukenship, the former of whom was a native of Tennessee and came to Georgia in 1847. Mrs. Anderson was born and reared in Georgia, and is a member of the M. E. church, while her husband is a member of the Presbyterian. Mr. Anderson is a member of the masonic fraternity and is one of the leading citizens of the town.

WILLIAM T. ARNALL, one of Senoia's prominent citizens, was born in Walton county, Ga., in 1839, his parents, John and Nancy A. (Gibbs) Arnall, being also natives of this state. The father, born in Butts county in 1811, was the son of William H. Arnall, a Virginian who came to Georgia, settling in Butts county before 1800, making the long journey thither on horseback. He was by trade a wheelwright and blacksmith, at which he worked for many years. His son John settled in Coweta county in 1843, and there the younger William grew to manhood, attending school in what was noted as a better schoolhouse than most of that time, in that the logs of which it was built were hewed, and the chimney, though of sticks and dirt, was the outlet of a fire-place extending almost across the entire end of the building. The writing-desk, too, was a great improvement for those days, being made like the roof of a house, with a slope on each side so that it would accommodate pupils on both sides. It was no unusual occurrence in those days for the pupils to turn the teacher out on Christmas and make him treat. Soon after the outbreak of the war, in July, 1861, young Arnall enlisted in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment. In this company he remained until the second battle of Manassas, where he was wounded in the arm, on Aug. 30, and when he reached home on Sept. 20 he weighed only eighty-four pounds. As soon as he was sufficiently recovered he helped Capt. J. H. Graham recruit a cavalry company, and on Dec. 29, 1862, he returned to the front, at which time he weighed 172 pounds. In May, 1863, his wound broke out afresh, and the physician told him he must lose his arm or his life; he, however, refused to submit to amputation of the suffering member, and at last, to his great joy, it healed. He was in a number of very hard-fought battles: Yorktown, Va., the seven days' fight at Richmond, Thoroughfare Gap, Va., and that at Manassas. He was with Bragg in his retreat from Chattanooga; was wounded again, this time in the hand, at Chickamauga, by which he was laid up about two months. But as soon as he was able he returned once more to his company, to remain with it to the end of the war. He was with Gen. Wheeler when he captured Stoneman, and shared in the sufferings of those perilous times. In common with his comrades he returned home to Coweta county after the war was done, having nothing with which to begin life, but with courage and patience he engaged in farming, in which he has prospered. In 1878 he removed to Senoia and engaged in the cotton trade, dealing also in buggies, wagons, etc., and still giving attention and care to the interests of his farm. His standing in the community is high, and he is liked and respected by all who know him. In December, 1858, Mr. Arnall was married to Miss Frances J. North, born in Coweta county, January, 1840, the daughter of Abraham B. and Eliza (Holmes) North. To them were born two sons, Robert E. and Lucius T. F. Mrs. Arnall, who was a faithful member of the M. E. church, died in November, 1862. In 1865 he married Martha C. Couch, daughter of Matthew and Jane (Eusley) Couch, and they had four children: Jane E., wife of J. T. Glover; Idelia, wife of Dr. Green; Sallie Gibbs, and John C. The mother, who was born in Coweta county in 1844, died in August, 1892. November 21, 1893, Mr. Arnall married Mrs. Elizabeth J. Tegne, daughter of John and Elvira (Carlton) Urquhart, who was born in Coweta county in 1855. Mr. and Mrs. Arnall are both members of the Baptist church.

HUGH M. ARNOLD, one of the leading citizens of Newnan, Coweta, Co., Ga., was born in November, 1842, his parents being James and Matilda (Ware) Arnold. His father was born in Wilkes county, in 1802, and was reared on a farm. The paternal grandfather of Hugh M. Arnold was a native of South Carolina, who came to Georgia before 1800, settling in the woods, in which there had never been a stick cut. Hugh M. Arnold was reared on a farm and attended school in an old log school-house with a stick chimney and a puncheon floor. For a short time he went to school in Newnan, but in 1861, when only eighteen years of age, enlisted in Company B, under Capt. R. L. Y. Long, remaining one year, at the expiration of which he re-enlisted, and after two years, returned home and engaged in farming, which occupation he still continues. Mr. Arnold was in the battles of Cotton Hills, Seven Pines and Loop Creek. In 1868 Mr. Arnold was united in marriage to Miss Mary Townsen, daughter of James and Sarah (Grantlin) Townsen. To this union three children have been born: Brad, Mollie and Sallie. Mrs. Arnold was born in Upson county, Ga., and died in 1872, a member of the M. E. church. Three years later, Mr. Arnold married Fannie Sims, daughter of John D. Sims, to whom six children have been born: Fannie L., Eva, John, Alma H. M. (deceased), Jennie C., and an infant. Mrs. Arnold was born and reared in Coweta county, and is a member of the Baptist, while Mr. Arnold is a member of the M. E. church. Mr. Arnold was formerly a member of the masonic order. He began life with very little, but has succeeded well, and besides owning a large farm, has one of the nicest residences in Newnan, where he and his family are among the leading and most respected citizens.

WILLIAM S. ASKEW, a prominent citizen of Newnan, was born in Coweta county, Ga., Jan. 1, 1841. His father, James P. Askew, son of William S. and Mary Askew, both natives of North Carolina, came to Georgia with his parents when six years of age, settling in Hancock county, where he grew to manhood. He was a soldier in the war of 1836, and his father was a soldier in the revolutionary war. William S. Askew, the subject of this sketch, attended school in an old log schoolhouse after fodder-pulling time and his education was very limited. In 1861 he enlisted in Company A, Newnan guards, the first company to leave Coweta county. After one year, the company being reorganized, he was connected with the Fourth Georgia regiment. In July, 1861, he was captured at Laurel Hill, but made his escape; his health failed, however, and for about five weeks he was cut off from his men. In the fall of 1861 he enlisted in the company commanded by Capt. Pittman, serving until 1862, when his time expired, but at the same time he re-enlisted under Capt. J. D. Sims, and served until September, 1863, when he was again captured and taken to Camp Morton at Indianapolis, Ind., and then to Fort Delaware, where he was held a prisoner until March 10, 1865, when he was paroled, this ending his war life. He was in some very hard-fought battles, among which were: Laurel Hill, Huntsville, Richmond, Kentucky, and Jonesboro, and was captured at Blountville, Tenn. After the war he returned to Newnan and began farming, and was also engaged in the mercantile business until 1875, when he was elected sheriff of Coweta county, serving two years. In 1891 he and W. L. Cruce built a large-sized corn-mill and also handled all kinds of building material. On Sept. 19, 1893, Mr. Askew bought his partner's interest and since then has been sole proprietor. On March 3, 1867, Mr. Askew was married to Miss Samantha Scroggans, daughter of Barton and Eliza (Bird) Scroggans, to whom children have been born, three of whom are living: Olive May, Eugene and Anna E. Mrs. Askew was born and reared in Coweta county and both she and her husband are members of the M. E. church. Mr. Askew is a member of the I. O. O. F., and is well liked by all who know him.

GOV. W. Y. ATKINSON. The career of Gov. William Yates Atkinson, the present chief executive, is one of the most remarkable in the annals of this state, and one that is full of practical encouragement to the young men of Georgia. Reared in the school of adversity, he grew up with a full knowledge of the hardships and privations that have served as the rigid, though not unkind discipline of many of the foremost men of this country. From a plain country lad, and without the aid of such artificial means of advancement as wealth and influence, armed only with his native force of character and the laudable ambition to leave his impress upon the times, he has risen by sheer force and determination, pluck and self-reliance, to the highest position of honor in the state, and taken his seat in the gubernatorial chair before reaching his fortieth year. The father of the young chief executive, John P. Atkinson, was a farmer and schoolteacher in Brunswick county, Va., and resided in that state during the greater part of his life. He was a man of irreproachable character and eminently respected by his neighbors. He drew their contracts and their wills, served as arbitrator in the settlement of their disputes, and attended to their legal business when they had any, as the school teachers in the mountain districts of Virginia and other southern states usually did. His mother, who still lives to rejoice in the honors of her son, is a native Georgian, born in Putnam county. She is also a woman of good education, famous for her piety, and has exercised a decided influence over her sons. The family moved to Oakland, Meriwether Co., Ga., just before the governor, the sixth of eight children, was born. His childhood was passed upon his father's plantation and the qualities of manhood which were to distinguish him in after life were there carefully nurtured. He received the rudiments of his education from his father and mother, but the former died while he was still a boy, and all the money the governor has ever expended he has earned for himself. He was prepared for college by his brother, Prof. T. E. Atkinson, who was then principal of the Senoia high school, and entered the university of Georgia, Athens, graduating therefrom in 1877. The following year he was admitted to the bar and commenced the practice of law at Newnan, Ga., where he has since resided. No sooner had he begun the practice of law than he married Susie Cobb Milton, who had attended the Lucy Cobb institute for young ladies at Athens, while he was a student there at the university. She came from famous southern stock. Her great-grandfather was a member of the continental congress and received two votes for president at the time Washington was elected; her grandfather was governor of Florida and her father for years has been a man of prominence in that state. Mrs. Atkinson is a very remarkable woman. There is no doubt of her gifts and political acumen, and a large part of the governor's phenomenal success is due to her counsel and assistance, which have been actively and untiringly given him throughout his career. In 1879 Gov. Colquitt, recognizing the ability of the young practitioner, appointed him solicitor-general of the county court of Coweta county, and in this capacity he served with honor for three years. In 1886 Mr. Atkinson was the overwhelming choice of the voters of Coweta county as their representative in the general assembly. He was for four consecutive terms a representative of Coweta county in the legislature, and during his last term, beginning in 1892, was speaker of the house, making one of the best presiding officers that body has had. Gov. Atkinson, though a strong advocate and supporter of the common school system, has always been a loyal friend of the state university, his alma mater, and in 1890 he was made a trustee of that institution. Hon. H. W. Hill, in speaking of the legislative career of Mr. Atkinson, gives the following summary of matters specially worthy of attention: I. He was the author of the bill which took the appointment of the commissioner of agriculture from the governor and provided that he be elected by the people; thus enabling the farmers of the state—the class of our people most interested in it—to select the occupant for this important office. II. The bill which limits the pay of inspectors of oils to $1,500 per annum each, and requires them to pay the excess of fees into the state treasury. This saves the state annually from $10,000 to $12,000. III. The bill to place telegraph and express companies under the control of the railroad commission. IV. The substitute for the senate bill under which the claim of the Western & Atlantic railroad lessees against the state for $750,000 betterments was finally settled by the state's reimbursing the lessees the $99,999 paid to the state of Tennessee for taxes and paying nothing for betterments. V. The bill creating the Georgia Normal and Industrial college for girls at Milledgeville, whereby poor and dependent Georgia girls acquire such an education as will make them self-sustaining and independent. For all time to come this will stand as an imperishable monument to his name, and the men and women of Georgia will rise up and call him blessed. The training of teachers in the normal department of this school has already proven of inestimable value in supplying competent teachers for the common schools. He is now president of the board of trustees of this institution. In 1890, Mr. Atkinson was made the president of the state democratic convention and also chairman of the democratic state executive committee for the ensuing two years. He was re-elected to this office in 1892, and the magnificent victory of the democratic party in the fall of that year—at which time, in its divided condition, it was in great peril from the combination of third-partyism and republicanism which assailed it—was due mainly to his personal and untiring effort. Notwithstanding Gov. Atkinson's brilliant success as a lawyer and advocate and his greater political honors, his heart continually turns to the peaceful joys of rural home life. He has always retained his agricultural interests, and whenever he has been able to find the time in his exceedingly busy life, he has turned to his farms for a few days of happiness. The campaign of 1894 was one of the warmest political fights that has ever occurred on the stump in Georgia. Mr. Atkinson's opponent was Gen. Clement A. Evans, a gallant ex-Confederate soldier and one of the purest men in the state. It was due to the brilliant dash and eloquence of Mr. Atkinson and his rare gifts as a political leader that he carried the day against the seemingly overwhelming odds that might have dismayed an ordinary man. Mr. Atkinson announced his candidacy late, at a time when Gen. Evans seemed almost to be the unanimous choice of the people of the state. Before the end of the contest Gen. Evans retired from the race, leaving the field to his young antagonist, who was nominated by the democratic party for governor without opposition. The inauguration of Gov. Atkinson drew to the state capitol one of the largest crowds that has ever assembled in that building. The presence of the pupils of the Georgia Normal and Industrial college added to the picturesque impressiveness of the occasion. Few men at the age of forty have mounted to such high official position, and with equal confidence it may be asserted that few men have worn their honors more deservedly. His popularity in the state, though very great before, has grown steadily and rapidly since his inauguration as governor. If the spirit of a bold and resolute ambition has dominated the energies of Gov. Atkinson he has never antagonized the interests of his state or his party, and he has always been ready to sacrifice his own personal ends to promote the good of the commonwealth.

WILLIAM S. BARNETT represents another of Georgia's pioneer families, and is the grandson of a revolutionary soldier whose name he bears. That William Barnett was a Virginian and gave five years of faithful service to his country in that heroic struggle. At the end of this strife as he and a friend were on their way home, being in need of food and without any means of obtaining it, having no money, when they could no longer endure their hunger they chanced to see a calf, which they seized and killed, and almost before it had ceased kicking they had skinned a portion of it and were beginning to make a meal of it. Shortly after the revolution Mr. Barnett brought his wife, Mary Hewey, to Georgia, and here in Greene county in 1784 his son John was born and grew to manhood. He served in the war of 1812 and received a land warrant, and in 1827 he left his boyhood's home in Greene county and moved his family to Heard county to settle upon the land conveyed to him by this warrant. The journey was long and toilsome, being made in a two-wheel ox-cart, much of the way through an unbroken forest where they were obliged to cut their own way through the woods. Arriving at their destination they stretched a tent, in which they lived until their little cabin home could be erected, a small and humble abode with its dirt floor, but none the less the abiding place of domestic tranquillity. John Barnett's wife, Elizabeth Buttrill, was the daughter of William and Martha Buttrill, natives of Virginia, who moved first to North Carolina and after a short time to Georgia and made for themselves a home in the wilderness. William S. Barnett, the son of John and Elizabeth Barnett, was born in Heard county in 1832, and was reared in their humble home, bravely enduring the many privations and making the best of the few privileges that fell to his lot. In 1851 he married Miss Penelope Moreland, daughter of Isaac T. and Penelope (Ousley) Moreland; the father, a native of Virginia, born in 1784, came to Georgia at a very early day, where, in Jones county, in 1834, his daughter Penelope was born. Mr. and Mrs. Barnett are faithful members of the Methodist church. Their only child, Ida, is the wife of Lee W. Bohannon. Late in the war, in 1864, Mr. Barnett joined the regiment known as Joe Brown's state troops, often referred to as "Joe Brown's pets." After the war he returned to his home in Coweta county, and has since remained upon the old farm. He began life in moderate circumstances, but has been greatly prospered, has been able to surround himself with an ample supply of the good things of life and to win the esteem of all who know him. He is a Mason, and one of the leading men of the county.

W. B. BERRY, a capitalist of Newnan, is a man of eminence in Coweta county, and a son of the distinguished Andrew J. Berry, one of the pioneers of this section, for many years a leader in its affairs, and a man who well deserves more than a passing mention in this connection. He was left an orphan at the early age of five years, and was placed in an orphan asylum at Charleston, S. C. Here he remained six years, when a good man, Maj. Carruth, took him to rear. With him the boy remained until he reached manhood, and then, at twenty years of age, took a position as clerk in a store at Greenville, S. C. Later he was for some time clerk in the Mansion hotel at Greenville; but in 1827 he determined to try a pioneer life in Georgia, and came to Coweta county. He selected a spot about two miles east of Newnan, the county seat, and there in 1828 he built the first house in Newnan, which house still stands to mark this noted fact. For many years Mr. Berry was an honored and prosperous merchant in this place, acquiring considerable wealth and a widely-extended influence. Politically he was a whig, and in Clay's time was very active, representing his county in the legislature in 1843 and 1845. For eight years he was justice of the inferior courts and at three different times was mayor of Newnan. He was a very ardent and devoted member of the masonic order, and organized the first lodge in Newnan. He was the father of four sons, of whom but one is now living, W. B. Berry, the subject of this sketch. The second son, Thomas J., a graduate of West Point, in 1857, entered the Confederate service in 1861, being commissioned lieutenant by Gov. Brown. In 1862, he was made lieutenant-colonel, and was engaged in many hard battles, and received eight wounds, but survived until 1865. W. B. Berry, who is a native of this county, passed his boyhood in Newnan, where he received an excellent education, and early engaged in the business of life. From 1850 to 1854 he had charge of the stage route between Che-haw and Atlanta, Peters, Beeman and Ellsworth, proprietors, which was discontinued upon the advent of the railroad, when Mr. Berry was made passenger conductor, which position he held for six years. Upon the death of his father, Judge Berry, the young man took his place as one of the leading business men of Newnan, showing himself a worthy son of such a father. In 1871, he founded the First National bank of Newnan, of which he was made president, with L. J. Hill as cashier, and was afterward president of the Gate City National bank. He carried the burdens of this onerous position from 1871 to 1893, when he withdrew, feeling that he had fairly earned a rest. Although at leisure from the cares of business he has by no means laid aside his interest in the affairs of his native city. As in the past, so now all laudable enterprises find in him ready sympathy, and willing aid and encouragement. He has always been liberal in his contributions to churches and schools, and no man stands higher in the estimation of his fellows than W. B. Berry. He has been a member of the masonic order since 1865, and is also an Odd Fellow. His wife, to whom he was married in 1861, was Miss Hibernia Dougherty, a native of Newnan, and a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal church. They have four children.

WILLIAM M. BLANTON, one of the pioneers of Coweta county, was born in Oglethorpe county, Ga., May 13, 1818. His father, Rev. Benjamin Blanton, was born and reared in North Carolina. He was a minister of the M. E. church, preaching in Charleston, S. C. in 1796, coming thence soon after to Georgia, where he located on a farm, combining farming and merchandising. His wife, Susannah, was born in Dublin, Ireland, her father, John Davis, a Welshman by birth, and an officer in the British army. Mrs. Blanton died February 19, 1844, and her husband Sep. 5 of the next year. The son, William, spent his early years on the farm, obtaining as much of an education as the opportunities of those days afforded. In May, 1836, he enlisted with Capt. Hills for the Creek war, under the command of Col. Porter; two years later he joined the company of Capt. Cook and served through the Cherokee war. He draws a pension for his service in these wars. After his return from the latter war he attended school for three years in Athens, Ga. Shortly after he served as justice of the peace for two years. During the late war he served in what is familiarly known as "Joe Brown's pets." In 1873 and 1874 he represented Spalding county in the state legislature. Although he started in life with but little pecuniary means, by persevering effort he has acquired a competency and, moreover, has given his children a good education, and a fair start in life. He has had eleven children, five of whom are now living: William P., L. P., Anna, Julia and Mary. His wife was Miss Julia Thompson, whom he married Nov. 10, 1840. She was born in Greene county, Ga., April 9, 1821, and is the daughter of Thomas and Lucy Hester Thompson, North Carolinians, who were among the early settlers of Georgia. Mr. and Mrs. Blanton are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and they and their family have the respect and good will of all who know them.

WILLIAM A. BRANNON, the foremost business man of Moreland is the grandson of John and Nancy (Parker) Brannon, North Carolinians, who were among the early settlers of Georgia and he is the son of Franklin M. T., and Hannah L. (Westwood) Brannon, the former was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1827, and served in the late war as an enrolling officer; in consequence of the active part he took during hostilities there was a strong feeling against him on the part of the Federalists; on account of this his property was burned after the surrender. He was keeping hotel in Hamilton, Harris county, when some Yankees came in for dinner, after eating which they set fire to the house and destroyed it. In 1875 he was admitted a member of the North Georgia conference, M. E. church south, served the Master faithfully until 1887, when, while on the Fairburn circuit, he was summoned to lay down the cross and ascend to receive his crown. Mrs. Brannon was born in McMynn, Tenn., July 30, 1831, and was the daughter of John and Mary Ann (Elway) Westwood, natives of England, who came to America in 1817, and lived in Boston until 1833; they then came to Georgia, living for a time in Carroll county, later in Heard county, and finally settling in Harris county. Mr. Westwood was a minister of the North Georgia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, of which church his wife was also a devoted member. Mr. Westwood was also ardently attached to the masonic fraternity, of which he was long a member. William A. Brannon was the fourth in a large family of children: John W., born Aug. 31, 1851; Mary Ann Elway, born Jan. 1, 1854; Nancy E., born May 12, 1855; William A., born Nov. 24, 1857; Catharine Magee, born Jan. 30, 1860; Louise Arvilla, born Dec. 7, 1861; Alvin N., born April 12, 1865; Robert F., born Sept. 7, 1866; James C., born Jan. 3, 1869; Paul E., born July 25, 1873. William A. Brannon was reared in Harris county, the place of his birth, and attended school in Hogansville in 1872 and at Grantville in 1873-74-75. In 1876 he came to Moreland and engaged in business with J. R. Cotton, he to take the stock of goods and have half of the profits from their sale. Although he had nothing absolutely at the beginning of this venture, in two years he had more than doubled the amount invested by Cotton. He then removed to Grantville and engaged in general trade for about three years, and then formed a new partnership with his friend Cotton. This lasted about two years, when he spent a few months traveling and prospecting in Texas, after which he once more went into business in Moreland, this time with G. E. Camp. After three years they divided the stock, Mr. Brannon continuing the business on his own account, until quite recently, his business now amounting to about $100,000. Early in 1895 he sold a half interest to J. R. Cotton, and the firm now is W. A. Brannon & Co. Thus has one who began life under many discouragements, by steady application to business gained a position of wealth and influence. His integrity and uprightness of character are well known throughout the county, as well as his generous public spirit, which brings him at once to the support of every laudable undertaking for the common welfare. He has been a member of the city council as alderman, is a stockholder in the Moreland Manufacturing company, of which he is one of the board of directors; he has just finished a large two-story brick business block, which is a material improvement to Moreland. He is also one of the largest fruit growers in this part of Georgia. Mr. Brannon was married in January, 1885, his wife being Mrs. Mary King, whose parents, William and Lizzie (Camp) Reynolds, were natives of this state. Mr. Reynolds, who served through the late war, was for many years in the hotel business, and built the Virginia house in Newnan. He and his wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mr. and Mrs. Brannon are also devoted members of the same church. Mrs. Brannon was born and reared in Coweta county; her birth occurred in 1864. Five children have blessed these parents of whom four are living: Gordon R., Òna May, Frank W., and William A., Jr.

D. H. BROWN, M. D., one of the prominent physicians of Sharpsburg, Ga., was born in Coweta county in 1847. His father, James Brown, was born in Newberry district, S. C., in 1812, and in 1832 came to Georgia, settling in Coweta county, where he cleared up a farm, suffering all the hardships known to pioneer life. Mrs. Lavina (Haines) Brown, the wife of James Brown and mother of Dr. D. H., was a daughter of Daniel and Rachel (Haines) Hanes. Dr. D. H. Brown was reared on a farm and received a good common-school education. In 1869 he began the study of medicine, and in 1870 read medicine under Dr. Calhoun, of Newnan, Ga., entering the medical college at Nashville, Tenn., in 1870. In 1872 he practiced medicine at Sharpsburg, entering in the same year the Jefferson medical college at Philadelphia, from which he was graduated in 1873. He then returned to Sharpsburg and again practiced his chosen profession. In 1879 he was married to Miss Ella, daughter of Dr. Robert W. and Calista (Glass) North, to whom have been born five children, three of whom are living: Ralph, Rex, and D. H. Mrs. Brown was born and reared in Coweta county, and both she and her husband are members of the Baptist church. Dr. Brown is one of Coweta county's best citizens, and is well respected by all who know him.

A. B. CALHOUN, M. D., son of Ezekiel and Frances (Hamilton) Calhoun, and one of the oldest physicians in the state of Georgia, was born in the settlement known as Calhoun settlement, in Abbeville district, S. C., March 17, 1809. His mother was a relative of Gov. Hamilton, of South Carolina. Dr. Calhoun's father was born in South Carolina, but died when the doctor was about eight or nine years of age. From that time on the latter had a hard time to get along, and it is amusing to him now to talk over the times when he was a small boy, and how he had to go barefooted nearly all winter, picking his way to school around the icicles in the woods. At the age of fifteen his mother sent him to Charleston, where he attended school two years, when he accepted a position as clerk in a drug store, remaining there two years. His mother then had him return to Abbeville, where he again entered school. In about two years he began the study of medicine at Cambridge with his brother, who was a practicing physician at that place. In 1829 he entered the medical college at Charleston, graduating in 1831, and came to Decatur, Ga., where he began the practice of his chosen profession, remaining there eighteen months. In the latter part of 1832 he located in Newnan, where he has since remained. When in Decatur his practice extended over a vast territory, and many is the time he has ridden through the woods when there was but one small cabin within miles of the present site of Atlanta, and one small store at "White Hall," near the city limits. He spent the greater portion of 1837 in the hospitals of Paris, and the other portion in London hospitals. He was in London just before the coronation of Queen Victoria. The doctor attributes his great success in the practice of medicine to the knowledge that he gained while abroad. He returned to Newnan, remaining until the war, when he, in company with Dr. Pelzer and Dr. Howard, composed the surgeon conscript board. They occupied this position until the fall of 1864, when Dr. Calhoun refugeed his stock and negroes farther south, and was absent one year, but after the surrender in 1865 he returned. Dr. Calhoun never had any political aspirations, but in 1838 his friends persisted in sending him to the legislature, where he served one term. In 1861 he was made a delegate to the secession convention of Georgia, and he now has the pen with which he signed the ordinance of secession. In his earlier days he was a member of the masonic fraternity. Dr. Calhoun was married to Miss Susan S. Wellborn, a daughter of Abner and Martha (Ronder) Wellborn, both natives of North Carolina, where the Wellborn family was very prominent. To this union six children were born, of whom two sons and two daughters are living: Dr. Abner W., oculist in Atlanta; Andrew E., recorder in Atlanta; Anna E. (Mrs. Dr. W. R. Caldwell, formerly of Charleston, now deceased), and Susan C. (Mrs. John M. Hill). Mrs. Calhoun was born in Richmond county, Ga., and died in 1860. She was a member of the Baptist church, while the doctor is a member of the Presbyterian. Dr. Calhoun stands very high as a citizen in Newnan, and is proud of the distinction of being a second cousin of Hon. John C. Calhoun. The doctor has a large amount of property, and since he gave up his practice, about twelve years ago, he has given his attention to cultivating his lands, being now one of the largest planters in this county.

DR. G. E. CAMP, one of the chief citizens of Moreland, is a member of a family well known among the early settlers of the state. His father, Rev. Hiram Camp, was a minister of the M. E. church, as were also all his brothers, and was a son of Abner and Elizabeth (Ragsdale) Camp, the former a Virginian, the latter born in North Carolina, who, about 1800, settled in Walton county, Ga., and cleared up a farm in the midst of the wilderness. Abner Camp's father, John Camp, also a native of Virginia, was a soldier in the war of the revolution. Rev. Hiram Camp was born in Walton county in 1806, and his wife, Penina Reynolds, was also a native of that county, to which her parents, John and Sallie (Cupp) Reynolds, came at an early day, and for many years kept a country inn. Dr. Camp was born in 1849, and spent his early years upon the farm, receiving such education as was obtainable in the country schools, and afterward completed his course at Newnan, Ga. At the age of twenty he began the study of medicine, and in 1884 he entered the medical college at Atlanta, Ga., from which he received the degree of M. D. in 1886. Dr. Camp began his practice in the town of Moreland, meeting with success, but after six years devoted himself wholly to mercantile affairs. He opened the first store in Moreland, where at that time was nothing but a little railroad station, and has continued in this business fourteen years, building up a large trade, the town also growing and developing very rapidly, so that at the present time there is scarcely a town in the state of its size which is its equal in the amount of business carried on. Dr. Camp is also an enthusiast on the subject of fruit growing, in which he himself has had great success, as well as having aroused an interest in the subject on the part of others. He has on his farm fifteen acres of fine grapes, forty acres in peaches, five in plums and two in strawberries. His industry in the development of the resources of these rich lands is appreciated by the community, where he has the hearty respect and good will of all. In 1870 Dr. Camp married Miss Mattie Couch, daughter of James M. and Martha (Davis) Couch; she was born in Spalding county in 1852; she is a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal church. The union of Dr. and Mrs. Camp has been blessed with three children: George A., Edward H., and Myrtice.

EDMOND N. CAMP, a leading fruit grower of this region, is a grandson of Abner and Mary (Reynolds) Camp, the former a soldier in the war of 1812, who about 1825 brought his family from North Carolina to Coweta county, Ga., among them his three-year-old son, Abner, Jr. The latter was reared on the farm, and in time married Miss Nancy Holland, whose parents, Abraham and Nancy (Underwood) Holland were of South Carolinian birth, her father also having served in the war of 1812. Edmond N., the son of Abner and Nancy, was born in this county in 1851, and received such education as was to be obtained in the country schools. In 1872 he married Miss Orlean Rollins, who was born in Heard county in 1851, and is the daughter of James and Elizabeth (Houston) Rollins. They have ten children: James, Andrew, Fred, Wayman, Hugh, Pauline, Lee, Frank, Victoria and Ralph. The parents are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church. When on reaching manhood Mr. Camp started in life for himself he worked for some years as a mechanic at the carpenter's trade, at wagon making, etc. But he seemed to have a natural fondness for horticulture, and in 1886 he devoted himself wholly to this, with an enthusiasm which could not fail of success. He is recognized throughout this region as the largest and most successful fruit grower in the state. He now has fifty acres of fine grapes and thirty of peaches, several devoted to pears and strawberries, has five acres of quinces and a number in apples. He may well regard with pride his achievements.

ARTHUR P. CAMP, one of the prosperous men of this section, a brother of Dr. G. E. Camp, was born and reared in Coweta county. His birth occurred in 1851, and his parents, Hiram and Penina (Reynolds) Camp, were among the earliest and most esteemed residents of this county. Mr. Camp, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church, was at one time the proprietor of the greater part of the land in and about Moreland. He was foremost in every enterprise designed to benefit the community, whether of business, church or schools. He was generous-hearted and open-handed, an unfailing friend to the poor and needy. He was always ready to bestow of his bounty to the widow and the fatherless, and is said to have given away a small fortune. He was especially zealous in promoting the cause of education, aiding in the establishment of schools and encouraging their successful management. His son, Arthur P. Camp, spent his early years upon the farm, and in 1875 married Miss Martha J. Dunlap. This lady's grandparents, Joseph and Mary (Whitman) Dunlap, came to Georgia from Tennessee some time before 1800, and after a short residence in Elbert county came to Meriwether county to make their home. This family was one of the first three families in this county, and at the time of their settlement in the forest wilds they were twelve miles from neighbors, except Indians and wild animals, which were very numerous, especially the latter; their home was a little cabin of boards, and the wolves frequently came about their door at night and kept them awake by their frightful howls. Mrs. Camp's parents were Robert L. and Jane (McGruder) Dunlap, and her father was born in Elbert county in 1817. She herself was born in Meriwether county in March, 1851. Mr. Camp and his wife are both members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They have had eight children, seven of whom are living: A. Haygood, Lillian P., Ida J., Mary L., Mattie and Mittie, twins, and Ethel. Mr. Camp is also a member of the masonic order, which he joined in 1879. He and his family have the respect of the community, in which he is a leading citizen.

COL. GEORGE H. CARMICAL, of Newnan, Ga., was born in 1842. He is a son of William and Margaret (Hunter) Carmical, both natives of South Carolina, and came to Georgia with them when he was ten years old. He received a common school education, and in May, 1861, enlisted in Company A, Seventh Georgia regiment. He entered as a lieutenant, in which position he served about seven months, when, the company being reorganized, he was chosen captain. In this position he only served a short time, when their major was killed at the Malvern Hill battle. Capt. Carmical was then promoted to the rank of major, and served in that capacity until the death of Col. W. T. Wilson, who was killed in the battle of Second Manassas. He was then promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, which place he filled until the resignation of Col. White, who had been severely wounded at Garnet farm, when he was promoted to the colonelcy of the regiment. His regiment was engaged in some very hard conflicts, such as the battle of Malvern Hill, both battles of Manassas, Antietam, Gettysburg and the battle at Knoxville, Tenn. Col. Carmical was wounded in each of the battles of Manassas, and at Knoxville, Tenn., he received four shot wounds. At Fussell's mill he was hit by a ball which went through his nose and out under the left eye, leaving a very ugly scar, one of seven. After partial recovery from this wound he returned to his regiment, while camped near Richmond, Va., and surrendered at Appomattox Court House. After the war he returned home and was the first man elected to the office of sheriff of Coweta county, which position he resigned and returned to farming until 1882, when he was again elected to the same office, which he has since held. In 1876 he was married to Miss Florence Robinson, daughter of John E. and Sarah (Ramey) Robinson, both natives of Georgia. Col. Carmical is a man of great courage and has but few equals. He won many laurels for a man of his age while in the war, as he was only nineteen when he entered the service. He is a member of the masonic order and is highly respected by all who know him.

W. W. CARMICAL, one of Coweta county's worthiest citizens, a native of South Carolina, born in 1833, is the grandson of Arthur and Frances (Bell) Carmical, of South Carolina, and the son of Arthur and Elizabeth (Cox) Carmical, who came from their native state, South Carolina, and settled in Coweta county, Ga., in 1834. The toilsome journey was made in ox-carts, and on reaching their destination the family lived in tents while their cabins were being built, very small and without floors, for the first year or two. Mrs. Carmical was the daughter of Christopher and Sarah (Mosley) Cox, South Carolinians. The child, W. W. Carmical, who was but a year old when brought to Georgia, grew up on the farm, making the most of his educational privileges, even though obtained at the price of much hardship to himself. Much of the time, even through the winter, he was obliged to go barefooted, but the courageous endurance of his boyhood fitted him for a sturdier manhood. In 1862 he entered the army, enlisting under Capt. Henry North, in the First Georgia cavalry, being appointed corporal. But he was severely wounded at Cassville, Ga., and compelled to return home, nor did he recover his health until some time after the close of the war. In this part of the country, upon which war had laid its devastating hand, the outlook at the time of the cessation of hostilities was very discouraging. But Mr. Carmical entered bravely into the unequal contest and has been very successful, and although his beginning was made on rented land, he now owns 460 acres of fine land in excellent condition, and is regarded as one of the most enterprising and successful men of his section, and is generally respected. He belongs to the masonic fraternity, and he and his wife are members of the Baptist church. He was married in 1854 to Miss Elizabeth Robinson, born in Alabama in 1835, and reared in that state, to which her parents, Feudal and Margaret (Stracener) Robinson, had come in the early days when Indians were numerous, wild game also plenty, and white inhabitants but few. Mrs. Carmical, who was a member of the Baptist church, died in 1890, leaving her husband with ten children: John, Arthur, Maggie, Sallie, Harper, William, Ida, Robert, Walter Lee and James. In 1892 Mr. Carmical married Miss Henrietta Stephenson, a native of Pike county, Ga., and the daughter of James and Sylvia Stephenson.

PATRICK CARMICHAEL, an old citizen of Coweta county, was born in Abbeville district, N. C., in March, 1819. His father, Arthur Carmichael, born in South Carolina in 1774, was the son of Patrick and Elizabeth (Thompson) Carmichael. Patrick Carmichael, the elder, was by birth an Irishman, who took an active part in the revolutionary struggle, in which he was wounded in the arm. He was a well-known Presbyterian, of which church all his family were worthy members. The wife of Arthur Carmichael was Frances Bell, whose parents, John and Sophia Bell, were of German ancestry. In 1831 Mr. Carmichael brought his family from South Carolina to Coweta county, Ga., moving by means of ox-teams. Here they settled in the midst of the woods, at that time full of game, which for many years helped to supply them with food. They cleared up a farm and reared a family of nine children: Elizabeth, Abraham, Sophia, Arthur, Mary Ann, Patrick, Robert, Nancy and W. W. Educational opportunities were of course but limited, but the young Patrick made the best of such as fell to his lot. He married in 1839, March 28, his wife, Mary A. W. Speer, being the daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth (Riggan) Speer, who settled in Jasper county, Ga., in 1818. Mr. Speer had been a soldier in the war of 1812. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael have been the parents of fourteen children, nine of whom are now living: Smith, Thomas, Jane, John, Ella, Abraham, Alberta, James E. and Louisa V. Three of the sons served in the late war, two of whom, Joseph W. and Robert, were killed. Mr. Carmichael himself was in the service of the state during the war, and during the last year of the war served as first lieutenant of Company H, Georgia regiment. Mr. and Mrs. Carmichael are worthy and esteemed members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and are among the leading citizens of Coweta county.

JUDGE BENJAMIN F. COCK is the descendant of Caleb Cock, who early in the last century came from England to North Carolina, where he accumulated a considerable fortune. Here, in 1734, his son Zebulon was born, and afterward married to Miss Sarah Perry. In 1764 they emigrated to Burke county, Ga., and obtained by grant 200 acres of land, the title to which was received from King George the III., who reserved all the gold and silver and one-tenth of the white pine. By one will and three deeds this land has descended to its present owner, Allen Jones. In the midst of this forest wilderness, on the Bark Camp creek, the young couple bravely settled, and here, Sept. 4, 1774, was born a son, John, who was afterward the father of Judge Benjamin F. Cock. Zebulon Cock was a soldier of the revolution, serving throughout the war, and one of his sons, Caleb, also served in that war. In 1788 a Baptist church was formed in the locality of Mr. Cock's home, known as the Bark Camp church, which church is still standing. Of this church Zebulon Cock was a charter member and gave toward it four acres of land. John Cock, the son of this revolutionary hero, enlisted during the war of 1812, but had only been mustered in a short time when the war closed and he was discharged. His wife was Miss Lydia Davis, also a native of Burke county, born May 17, 1791, and a daughter of Benjamin and Elizabeth (Daniell) Davis. Her father was a Virginian by birth and a son of Rev. Elnathan Davis, who was a Baptist minister in the old colonial days, when to preach the doctrines of that sect rendered a preacher liable to imprisonment. Benjamin Davis was also a soldier of the revolution and he and his wife were both members of the Baptist church. John Cock served as justice of the peace for fourteen successive years. He and his wife were also both steadfast members of the Baptist church. Of this brave pioneer stock, with this noble revolutionary record—better than any patent of nobility—comes Benjamin F. Cock, the son of John and Lydia Cock, born in Burke county, Aug. 20, 1812. He spent his youth upon the farm, attending school in the old log schoolhouse, with its dirt floor, dirt and stick chimney and puncheon seats. When he reached manhood he started out for himself with nothing, but has gradually acquired a sufficiency of this world's goods, and the esteem of all who know him. This is shown by the various offices to which he has been called in various parts of the state. In Burke county he served as justice of the peace for about six months. For about six years he was justice of the inferior court of Lee and Terrell counties, and was collector of the taxes in Lee county during the years 1840, 1846 and 1847. In 1840 he took the United States census for Lee county, also in 1850 was assistant in taking the census for Lee county, and in 1860 took the census for Terrell county. For six years he acted as jury reviser in Coweta county. During the war Mr. Cock was judge of the inferior court of Terrell county, and when the war came on it was made the duty of the five inferior judges to care for the women and children left at home by the soldiers in the field. After a year's experience in keeping bachelor hall, in 1841 Judge Cock married Miss Margaret Cameron, whose parents, Alexander and Nancy (McCarty) Cameron, were among the early settlers of Cumberland county, N. C. They were both natives of Scotland, and in faith staunch Presbyterians. Mr. Cameron was a soldier in the war of the revolution. In 1828 he brought his family to Georgia settling in Early county. The daughter, Mrs. Cock, was born in North Carolina, Aug. 16, 1819, and died on June 3, 1889. To Judge and Mrs. Cock seven children were born, of whom six are now living. Of these Henrietta is the wife of M. H. Couch; La Vonnia is the wife of J. H. McKnight; William J. resides in Atlanta, and married Sallie Heard; Alice married J. A. McKnight; B. F. Cock, Jr., married Veta Hunter.

ROBERT DUKE COLE, SR., president and founder of one of the largest manufacturing companies in Western Georgia, was born in Newton county, Ga., Dec. 21, 1820. He is a son of Robert Cole, who was born in Surrey county, N. C., July 29, 1775, and was married to Elizabeth Famborough Oct. 6, 1796. Mrs. Cole, who was born Oct. 7, 1778, was well known as a good and pious lady. Mr. Cole was a man of a very limited education, but was a hard worker. During the revolutionary war, while but a small boy, he suffered much from the hands of the British soldiers. He started in life without anything, settled in Newton county, Ga., and in 1830 came to Coweta county, Ga. He accumulated considerable property in Newton county, Ga., but unfortunately lost all and was left largely in debt, but he found a ready helper in his son, R. D. Cole. Mr. Cole died March 20, 1852, and Mrs. Cole died Aug. 12, 1863. William Cole, grandfather of Robert D., was a soldier in the revolutionary war, but was captured and thrown into prison at Georgetown, S. C., where he died. Robert D. Cole was reared mostly on the farm, and his education was limited, but at an early age he began teaching school in Campbell county, Ga., where he had to study hard at night to keep ahead of his pupils. He continued to teach for three years, but as he could not collect the tuition fees, he did not have money enough to pay his board and expenses, and he consequently ran in debt, for which he was sued. He was then under age and some of his friends advised him to take advantage of his minority, but he would not do so, and little by little he liquidated the whole amount, even plowing barefooted to pay a small balance. After this he began work at the carpenter's trade, saved some money and Sept. 9, 1849, he married Martha Burrell Overby. They had one child, a boy, who died at the age of nineteen, in 1885. Dec. 27, 1849, Robert D. Cole settled on the lot where he now lives and continues to work at his trade. In 1854 he founded the firm of Cole & Barnes, with Thomas Barnes as partner, and began business on a very small scale. In the same year they purchased a small engine, and about this time their friends came to them and advised them to give up the business or they would lose all they had. Mr. Barnes remained with the company only two years, but Mr. Cole continued as sole proprietor until 1858, when Dr. W. T. Cole and his brother, Matthew Cole, became partners, the firm being then R. D. Cole & Co., which it remained until 1866, when W. T. Cole withdrew and it became R. D. Cole & Bro. Jan. 1, 1854, they started up the steam in their little shop, and their business progressed so rapidly that in 1860 they enlarged their engine to a 30-horse power. During the war they did work for the confederacy, but received nothing for what was furnished. But since the war their business has continued regularly to increase, until now the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company, which was organized under this name in 1872, manufactures engines, boilers, saw and grist mills, cotton presses and mill machinery, and also sash, doors and blinds, and all kinds of dressed lumber. Immediately after the war they began to manufacture railroad cars for the Atlanta & West Point railroad, which they continued seventeen years, and it is a noted fact that the railroad company said that the R. D. Cole company did the best work they ever had received. Mr. Cole has accomplished more for Newnan, perhaps, than any man living. Beside being president of the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company he was also instrumental in organizing the cotton mill in 1888, and is the largest shareholder in that corporation, of which he is also president. For this large mill of 6,300 spindles the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company built the boilers, made the shafting, etc., and put in all the machinery. The capital stock paid in is $70,000. Mr. Cole was also one of the prominent men in the organization of the Coweta Fertilizer company of Newnan, and is one of the directors. He is also largely interested in a gin-mill at Grantville. Mr. and Mrs. Cole are earnest workers in and members of the Baptist church. In 1884 the society built a very fine church in Newnan, to which enterprise Mr. Cole donated $2,500. Mr. Cole has always taken a great interest in those in his employ, and for them he built a chapel known as the Mills chapel, at a cost of $1,500, where all those who desire can go and worship. He is an open-hearted man, and although well along in years, he still enjoys a good joke, and likes to tell good yarns, with which he is well supplied. But to appreciate him one must meet him at his own beautiful home. He became a Mason in 1847, but has not attended his lodge since the war closed.

MATTHEW COLE, vice-president of the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company of Newnan, Ga., and a son of Robert and Elizabeth (Famborough) Cole, was born in 1823 in Jasper county, Ga. His father was an early settler of Georgia, and at that time Georgia was in a wild state, and near where he settled, in the woods, there was a large amount of fox grapes, enough to make wine for the whole state if manufactured, and there was also an abundance of chestnuts. Matthew Cole was reared on the farm and received but a limited amount of schooling, learning more out of school than in. He began to work at the wagon-making trade when quite young, and many a time he has had to drive to Augusta, a distance of 200 miles, for provisions. He was in partnership with his brother when they started their business in 1854, since which time their business has largely increased. He was married in 1847 to Emily Woods, by whom he had one child, which died in infancy, the mother following in 1849. Mrs. Cole was a daughter of John Woods, who was the first settler in Newnan, and who sold 200 acres where Newnan now stands for $200. In 1851 Mr. Cole married H. T. Nall, by whom were born six children: Amanda, R. D., Jr., M.

F., E. M., F. B. and R. N. R. D., Jr., is now general manager of the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company. He attended school at the state university three terms, when he was taken sick and had to give up school. M. F. graduated at the commercial college at Atlanta. He is now the secretary and treasurer of the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company. E. M. went to Cornell college, N. Y., but after being there one year his health failed and he had to give up his schooling. He is now superintendent of the machine shop. F. B. also attended Cornell college one year. He is now the draftsman for the R. D. Cole Manufacturing company. R. N. attended the same school in New York. He is now bookkeeper for the same firm. R. D., Jr., and F. B. have both held official city positions. Mrs. Cole, the mother of these children, was born and reared in Georgia and died a member of the Baptist church, of which Mr. Cole and all the children except one, F. B., are members. Matthew Cole was a member of the "Joe Brown's pets" of Georgia during the late war. In this company, of which he was first sergeant, were seven attorneys and five physicians. He served through a short part of the war, but there was a petition gotten up at home for someone to be detailed to return to look after the women and children, and almost everyone signed the petition for Matthew Cole to be the man. He was a member of the masonic order for several years.

J. R. COLE, one of the prominent men of Coweta county, and among the leading men of business of Turin, is a native of this county, born in 1856, his parents, John N. and Mary M. (Britton) Cole, being South Carolinians by birth. John N., who was the son of Richard and Susan O. (Vance) Cole, both of South Carolina, came to Georgia about 1834, and settled in Coweta county, where he cleared up for himself a farm in the woods. When the war broke out he early enlisted, joining a company of the Fifty-third regiment, under command of Capt. Hance, but after serving nearly two years was taken sick with typhoid fever and died in 1862 at Richmond, Va. As a soldier he was loyal and devoted, and as a man was universally liked and respected. He was a faithful and conscientious member of the Baptist church, in which he was an earnest worker. His wife was a daughter of John and Lucinda (Aikens) Britton, who came to Georgia from South Carolina, and after some years' residence in Oglethorpe county, about 1837, settled in Coweta county. After the death of her husband Mrs. Cole had a very hard time, and with very great difficulty provided for the needs of herself and her children. Her son, J. R., was but six years old at the time of his father's death, and the many privations the family must need undergo made a deep impression upon his mind. He saw his mother obliged to burn corn cobs in order to obtain the soda ash with which to lighten her bread. After the marriage of her daughter, the latter, with her husband, made her home with her mother, her husband taking the control of the family and its affairs. For this brother-in-law the young lad, J. R., worked for several years, and thus early in life manifested his promptitude and energy of character, for he was the first to rise in the morning to call the hands, and the first to start his mule in the field. The privation he felt most keenly was his loss of schooling, and when at last, at eighteen years of age, he was able to attend one year, he appreciated the privilege at its true value, and used it accordingly. Upon reaching the age of twenty years he left his brother-in-law and hired out to his grandfather, receiving for his own labor and that of a mule which his brother-in-law had given him, the sum of $10 per month. He remained here for thirteen months, during which time he only spent $20. In August, 1878, he and his brother-in-law bought out a small business, but as they were not familiar with it, for some time they had considerable difficulty in getting along. After two years Mr. Cole bought out his partner, giving his note for the amount. His natural aptitude for business was now developed, and by strict attention to every detail, by care and prudence in its management, and by the most perfect integrity in his dealings, he has built up a large and lucrative business. He occupies a handsome brick block, the foundations of drilled rock, and carries a $10,000-stock of goods. His wife, to whom he was married in 1884, was Miss Lula Sasser, daughter of W. W. Sasser, and they have been blessed with three children, Thomas M., Frank S., and Marie. Mrs. Cole was born and reared in Coweta county, and she and her husband are true and devoted members of the M. E. church. Mr. Cole served as postmaster for Turin from 1882 to 1890. His business ability is recognized throughout his section, where he and his family are well known and highly esteemed.

M. N. COLLEY, a well-known farmer of Coweta county, is one of the old pioneer stock of Georgia, to whose courage and hardihood the present generation is so largely indebted. His grandfather, James Colley, a Virginian, having served during the war of the revolution, came to Georgia and settled in Oglethorpe county some years prior to 1798, when his son James was born. The latter, though but a youth, served with Gen. Jackson in the war of 1812. He married Miss Martha King, whose parents, Bennett and Mary (McCaun) King, were also among the early settlers of the state, and suffered all the hardships attendant upon a pioneer life. After their marriage they moved to Columbia county, where they began to clear up a farm, but Mr. Colley died very shortly afterward, leaving this work uncompleted. His little son, M. N. Colley, born in Wilkes county, Ga., Feb. 13, 1825, was little more than four years old at the death of his father. He necessarily was deprived of many educational opportunities, spending his boyhood upon this farm. He married in 1860 Miss Jane Garrett, daughter of James Garrett. To them one son was born, James W. Mrs. Colley was born in Newton county, Ga., in 1838, and died in 1885. She was a faithful and honored member of the Baptist church. In 1863 Mr. Colley enlisted under Capt. Burris, of Columbus, in Company I, Fifth Georgia regiment, and served to the close of the war. He was in several severe battles, Tannis ferry, Lookout mountain, Missionary ridge. In 1864 he was captured at Pocotalago, near Charleston. After the war was ended he returned to Georgia and began farming in Coweta county. He bought a part of the old farm, and by his diligence and prudence was able gradually to add to it, and now owns a fine farm of over a thousand acres of good land, and is thoroughly liked and esteemed by all who know him, being one of Coweta's best and oldest citizens.

M. H. COUCH, one of the leading business men of Senoia, was born in Coweta county in 1837. His parents were Matthew and Jane (Ensley) Couch, both natives of South Carolina, making the long journey in a one-horse wagon. They brought with them their two children and settled in the dense woods that then covered this section, their nearest neighbor being ten miles away. Mr. Couch purchased fifty acres of land on two years' time, and the man of whom he bought it, a Mr. Shoats, is said to have remarked that "he never expected to get his pay for the land." He was agreeably surprised, therefore, at the expiration of the time to receive from his debtor the full amount of $300. It must be evident to the reader that this payment could only have been made by the most heroic effort and self-sacrifice on the part of Mr. Couch. He worked hard through the day clearing up the wood-land for his farm, then worked a part of the night splitting rails in the woods of a neighbor by which he could earn something toward the payment of his debt, and to furnish bread for his family. Wild game was plenty, which helped to supply them with food. A man of this stamp could not fail to succeed, and so by the same pluck and industry with which he had paid for his farm Mr. Couch conquered fortune and is now one of the men of wealth and standing in Coweta county, where he has reared a family of eleven children. Three of these, Berry, Andrew and John, were killed in the late war, and another son, Madison, lost his life from illness caused by exposure while serving in the war. Mr. Couch was an uncompromising democrat, but would never apply for any position. He was the son of Enoch Couch, of German origin. Mrs. Couch is the daughter of James and Elizabeth Ensley, of Irish descent, and her father was a soldier of the Mexican war, serving through the entire war. The son, M. H. Couch, spent his early years upon the farm, with few opportunities of school attendance, and these only amid the unfavorable surroundings of the little log school-house, with its shabby and comfortless interior. But the lad was studiously inclined, and by his own persevering effort learned more out of school than in. At the outbreak of the war he enlisted in the Second Georgia battalion under Maj. Tom Hardeman, his captain being L. T. Doyle. In 1862 he was elected sergeant and in this position served to the end of the war. He was in the battle of Norfolk, both battles of Manassas, and through the Maryland campaigns, and accompanied his battalion through all the stirring scenes in which it was engaged. After the war he returned to Senoia and entered into the mercantile business, in which he was very successful, having at the present time the largest store in Senoia. On March 2, 1872, he married Miss Henrietta Cock, daughter of Judge Benj. F. and Margaret Cock, a sketch of whom has been given. She was born in Lee county in 1845 and like himself is a member of the Baptist church. They have four children: Pearl, Madge, Mabelle, and Frank D. Mr. Couch is a Mason of the royal arch degree, and thrice illustrious of the council and king in the chapter. He is one of the leading democrats of the county, but would never consent to be a candidate for any office. As a citizen Mr. Couch holds a prominent place in the community, where he is warmly liked and sincerely respected by all who know him.

J. J. FARMER, one of the early settlers of this region, was born in Oglethorpe county May 19, 1825, his parents, John and Elizabeth (Hubbard) Farmer, being Virginians. His grandfather, John Farmer of Virginia, was a soldier in the war of the revolution. About 1805 he moved to Greenville district, S. C., and in 1817 he removed thence to Oglethorpe county, Ga., then a wilderness. Here he cleared up a farm and spent the remainder of his life, his son John succeeding him in charge of the homestead, where he also finished out his life. He was a deacon in the Baptist church, and his wife was the daughter of Thomas Hubbard, a soldier of the revolution, and also a Baptist. In this home in Oglethorpe county young Mr. Farmer spent his boyhood, with restricted privileges of obtaining an education, the old log school house being defective not only in comforts but in many respects more essential, the teachers often receiving quite rude treatment at the hands of the pupils. Mr. Farmer being desirous of further opportunities, when he reached the age of twenty-one, raised cotton with which he paid for his tuition and clothing. He himself wielded the rod of the pedagogue for three years. In 1855 he moved to Coweta county, and in 1861 enlisted in Company H, Fourth regiment of Georgia cavalry, the company commanded by Capt. J. H. Graham. Mr. Farmer served through the entire war, but was captured in August, 1862, and held until the following February. He was in many hard battles and skirmishes: Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Lookout Mountain, Newhope church, Resaca, and the siege of Atlanta. His last fight was at Raleigh, N. C., and at the close of the war he was at Danville, S. C. He was orderly sergeant throughout the war. Mr. Farmer now began life anew, and amid the hardships consequent to the devastations of war, but with the determination of his character, has been able to win in the struggle. He is now the owner of a fine farm of over 200 acres, about forty acres being devoted to the culture of grapes, of which he makes a specialty. He is a member of the masonic fraternity and of the Baptist church, of which he has been deacon for ten years. He is thoroughly respected wherever he is known. Mr. Farmer was married in 1861 to Miss Elizabeth Arnall, whose parents, John G. and Nancy (Gibbs) Arnall, were natives of Putnam county, Ga. Mrs. Farmer was born in Morgan county, Ga., in 1835. She was a member of the Baptist church. To this union seven children were given: Thomas G., Luther M., Millard C., J. J., R. A., Alice, and Lizzie D. In 1878, Oct. 29, Mrs. Farmer died, and in 1880 Mr. Farmer married Mrs. Mary L. Farmer, daughter of William Brown, of Clarke county, Ga. Mrs. Farmer was born in Coweta county in 1843. She is also a Baptist. To them three children have been born: Beatrice M., Grace Lee, and Harvey Hill.

H. L. FREEMAN, a well known citizen of Senoia, was born in Coweta county in 1851. His father, Henry Freeman, was born in South Carolina in 1795, and came with his parents to Georgia about 1820. They settled in the woods of Oglethorpe county and began the clearing and cultivation of a farm, to which occupation Mr. Freeman through life devoted himself. He was a staunch democrat, but would never consent to run for any office. His wife was Miss Nancy Moody, daughter of John Moody, one of the early settlers of the state. Their son, H. L. Freeman, spent his boyhood on the farm, but owing to the early loss of his father, who died in 1858, and the breaking out of the war, he was denied many educational advantages, as he was early thrown upon his own resources. He had a common school education, being able to attend school for a short time after the war. In spite of his lack of many opportunities he has won the regard of the people among whom he dwells, who have honored him by selecting him to fill various important positions. In 1887 he was elected to fill the vacancy on the board of county commissioners, caused by the resignation of W. W. Sasser. The following year he was elected for the full term of four years, received a re-election in 1892, being the present member from the first district, where he is very popular. In January, 1874, Mr. Freeman married Miss E. J. Hardy, daughter of R. W. and Lucy (Bailey) Hardy, who was born and reared in Coweta county, the family being among the early settlers of the state. Six children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, of whom five are now living: Emmett, Nancy L., Rebecca G., Henry, and Robert W. The mother is a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

JONES C. FULLER, a retired merchant and one of the prominent citizens of this part of Georgia, was born in 1838, his parents being South Carolinians. His father, Alsey Fuller, a soldier in the Indian war, was the son of Isham and Sarah Fuller, of Laurens district, S. C., and his mother, Emily R. Fuller, was the daughter of Joseph Quinn. His parents settled in Meriwether county, Ga., in 1836, and here, upon this backwoods farm amid many privations, the young man grew up. In July, 1861, he joined the army, enlisting in Company B of the Second Georgia regiment known as the Jackson Blues, his captain being William R. Harris, who was slain at Gettysburg. Mr. Fuller passed through some very severe experiences during the war, engaging in many of the most important battles, and being wounded several times. He fought at Garnett's farm, and at Malvern hill, where he was shot in the left ankle, from which wound he was laid aside for about a year; he rejoined his company at the Potomac river near Staunton, Va., and later, in the battle of Gettysburg, was shot through the right cheek; at Chickamauga he was shot through the hips, and was sent to the hospital at Atlanta; after seven months he was once more able to rejoin his company, then at Richmond, Va., and in the battle of the Wilderness, May 6, 1864, was captured and held prisoner ten months at Point Lookout, Md., being released but a short time before the war closed. He was postmaster for his regiment from the time of his enlistment until he received his first wound, but during his long absence thereafter another was appointed to the place. Mr. Fuller returned home to Meriwether county at the close of the war, walking about 150 miles. He had but little with which to establish himself in the business, but by persistent application has been very successful. He married in December, 1865, and immediately after settled in Atlanta, where for twenty-five years he was one of the leading merchants, having built up a thriving business, which was very lucrative. About four years ago he returned to Coweta county and founded the town of St. Charles, where he now resides. Mrs. Fuller was Miss Margaret R. Evans, daughter of Pleman P. and Eleanor (Douglass) Evans, the father of Welsh and the mother of Irish origin. On the voyage to America from Wales one of the children died and was buried at sea. The union of Mr. and Mrs. Fuller has been blessed with five children, only two of whom are living: Nettie, wife of I. B. Eubanks, and Clara E. Mr. Fuller and his wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal church, and he is also a member of the masonic fraternity, which he joined in 1865. Mr. Fuller is one of the live men of his section, active and progressive, and he and his family are deservedly valued as members of the community.

JOEL W. T. GIBSON, a son of Jacobus and Sarah (Freeman) Gibson, is a leading cotton merchant at Newnan, Coweta Co., Ga., and was here born Feb. 20, 1843. His father was a son of James H. Gibson, a pioneer settler of Georgia, was born in 1805 and endured all the privations attendant upon a pioneer life. He first settled about six miles from Newnan, to which place he removed in an old-fashioned ox-cart. He lived to be sixty-nine years of age and was a devoted and earnest worker and member of the Baptist church. Joel Gibson was reared on the farm and attended the country school. The first school-house in their neighborhood that had glass windows and a brick chimney was built in 1855. In 1859 he attended school at Newnan and afterward attended school at Cave Spring and came back to Newnan, where he remained until May 7, 1861, when he enlisted in Company A, under Capt. John B. Wilcoxon. He remained with the company until after the battle of Seven Pines, when he was transferred to the Macon light artillery, with which he remained until the close of the war. He was at the Appomattox surrender and was in all the battles in which his company was engaged. After the war he returned to Newnan, farmed the first year, taught school the next and has been connected with business in a general way since. In 1867 he married Louisa Faver, daughter of Chas. Sanders and Carolina (Davis) Faver, who were of French descent, to which union eight children have been born: Joel G., John S., Ada, Mary, Brenda, Sarah, Hattie and Carry. Mrs. Gibson was born and reared in Wilkes county, Ga., and both she and her husband are members of the Baptist church. Mr. Gibson began life after the war without anything, but is now a man well able to enjoy the remainder of his life. He has always been a democrat, but would never allow his name to be used for office. He and his family are universally respected by all who know them.

CAPT. J. GRAHAM, one of the leading business men of Senoia, is the grandson of William Graham, of Irish nativity, who was brought to America when a child of two years of age, and reared in North Carolina. He served in the war of 1812, and in 1825 settled in Harris county, Ga. His son David was born in North Carolina and married Miss Pheriba L. Collins, whose parents, James and Priscilla (Baker) Collins, came to Georgia early in the century and cleared up a farm among the forest wilds. J. Graham was the son of David and Pheriba L. Graham and was born in Harris county, Ga., in 1842. His early years were passed on the quiet farm with only the school privileges found in the backwoods; moreover, the outbreak of the war interrupted even these few opportunities for gaining an education. He enlisted in 1861, entering Company G, of the Thirty-first Georgia regiment, commanded by Capt. Gus Reading and under Gen. Evans. On June 27, 1862, he fought in the battle of Seven Pines, having had nothing to eat except a little hard-tack for five days. He took part in the battles of Malvern Hill, Fredericksburg, Winchester and Millroy, and all through the Wilderness, and at Winchester, on Sept. 19, he was wounded in the nose by a minie ball. On the twenty-second of the same month he was captured, but held only twelve days. He then went home for a short time, but soon organized a cavalry company, with which he went back to the seat of war as captain and remained until peace was declared. In 1864 he was color-bearer and was noted through all these years of conflict for his ardor and daring; always in the front, always inciting his men to follow where he so gallantly led. After the war he returned to Georgia and engaged in farming in Marion county, afterward removing to Coweta county. His sturdy devotion to principle has everywhere won for him the respect of all who knew him. He has been a constant and stanch advocate of prohibition, and was elected mayor of Senoia on this ticket, winning the close contest by fourteen votes, and during the two years he held the office entirely excluding whisky from the town. The grand success of prohibition in Coweta county is due more, perhaps, to Capt. Graham than to any other. He is one of Senoia's best citizens, and liked by all who know him. He is a member of the masonic order. He is a faithful member of the Baptist church, as is also his wife, who was Miss Martha Simms, a native of Sumter county, and daughter of Hartwell Simms. Capt. and Mrs. Graham are the parents of seven children: Ada, Lee, Berta, Delia, Ruby, Windsor and Marion.

HOSEA GRAY is the grandson of William and Sarah Gray, the grandfather an Englishman by birth, having served as captain during the war of the revolution. The parents of Hosea, Abraham and Jane (Wilson) Gray, were natives of South Carolina, in which state he too was born Aug. 31, 1817. His mother was of Irish parentage. In 1832, when Hosea was but a lad, his father moved his family from South Carolina to Fayette county, Ga., making the journey with a four-horse team. At Barnesville they struck an Indian trail which led them to their place of settlement. After a year in Fayette county they moved to Coweta county, which has since been their home. Here they cleared up a farm, experiencing the many hardships incident to pioneer life. For some time their main dependence for food was wild game, and they ground their own corn in a hand-mill. Later a mill was started on Lime creek, to which they carried their corn to be ground. In those days it was customary for each man to assist his neighbor in rolling his logs in the early spring, previous to putting in his crops, and one season Hosea Gray assisted in this work for eighteen days. His school advantages were only such as the limited accommodations of those days afforded. In 1843 he married Frances, the daughter of Henry Freeman, a native of Georgia, and a member of the M. E. church. To them were born four children, none of whom are living, and in October, 1851, the mother died. In 1856 Mr. Gray married Miss Susan E. Kempson, whose parents, Peter and Mary (Long) Kempson, in 1840 came from their native state, South Carolina, to Georgia, and settled in Meriwether county. Mrs. Gray was born in 1830, in Newberry, S. C., and she and her husband are members of the Lutheran church. They have nine children now living: Rosina, Oscar, Leonidas, Mollie, Latimer, Hattie, Rebecca, Ida and Kate. Mr. Gray is a Mason of the royal arch degree. While he did not enlist in the late war he nevertheless rendered considerable service to the Confederacy during that struggle. He is a man widely known and everywhere respected for his uprightness of character.

CALEB J. HARRIS is the son of Tyre Harris, who was born in Virginia in 1800, and was brought by his parents, natives of Virginia, to Georgia the same year. His father, William Harris, cleared up four acres of wood land the first year, and when he was doing his first plowing, which was done with raw-hide traces, his horse died, and he had to tend his little patch of ground as well as he could with no tools but a mallet. He was a member of the Hickory Baptist church. His son Tyre, who was reared in this wilderness home, had but few educational privileges, but made the best of every opportunity. By his own industry and thrift he acquired his wealth, and although he began life with nothing he owned at one time 1,200 acres of land and about forty negroes. At his death his property was valued at some $40,000. He and his wife were members of the Missionary Baptist church, in which he was a leader and a liberal supporter. He also did all in his power to advance educational institutions, appreciating as he did their need. His wife, Miss Lucy Johnson, was born in Virginia. Their son, Caleb J. Harris, was born in Clarke county, Ga., in 1830. He passed his boyhood on the farm, with such limited privileges of schooling as those days afforded. Mr. Harris married in 1885, his wife being Miss Almata Talbert, born in Coweta county, Ga., July 31, 1836. Her parents, John and Mary (Russell) Talbert, came from South Carolina to Georgia in 1835, her father's parents being of Irish nativity, who by chance came as children to America in the same vessel and were afterward married. Mrs. Harris died in March, 1877, leaving her husband with six children: William, Mary L., Julia, Myrtie, Jimmie and Robert Lee. Both Mr. and Mrs. Harris were members of the Presbyterian church. Mr. Harris has also been a member of the masonic fraternity; he is one of Coweta county's best citizens and is universally respected.

JOEL J. HERNDON, one of the early settlers of this section, is the grandson of a Virginian who came more than a century ago to Elbert county, Ga. Here he founded a home, and here in 1793 his son Edward was born. The latter was a soldier in the war of 1812, in lieu of payment for which he drew a piece of land in Meriwether county, Ga. He married Miss Nancy Brown, like himself born and reared in Elbert county, where, Oct. 19, 1829, their son, Joel J., was also born. In 1834 Mr. Herndon went out to his newly-acquired property in Meriwether and built a log cabin, preparatory to removing his family thither, which move was accomplished the next year, and upon the farm which he there cleared and cultivated he reared his family of ten children. Here Joel grew up, attending school in the old log school-house. On May 11, 1862, he enlisted in Company G, Fifty-third Georgia regiment, under Capt. Robert Taylor, Col. Doyle being in command of the regiment which was a part of the force commanded by Gen. Hall J. Simms. Mr. Herndon was in many of the hardest fought and most important battles of the war, among them Malvern Hill, Gettysburg, the battles of the Wilderness and thence to Petersburg, an almost continuous conflict. He was slightly wounded at Gettysburg, but was in every battle in which his regiment was engaged in 1864, and was at the general surrender at Appomattox. At the close of the war he made his way home on foot and returned to the peaceful pursuits of agriculture, to which he has since devoted himself. The war left him—as it did many others—almost destitute, and with the necessity of making a new start in life. He had his land, an old wagon and two small mules, but also a debt of $1,000, for which he offered his land in payment. But he had the courage and resolution which overcame all difficulties, and so he went to work with a will, paid his debts and continued to add to his substance until to-day he is reckoned one of the most successful men and best esteemed citizens of his county. His wife, Elizabeth Kempson, to whom he was married Dec. 9, 1852, is the daughter of Benjamin and Elizabeth (Long) Kempson, both natives of South Carolina, who came to Georgia about 1840 and settled in Meriwether county. Mrs. Herndon was born in Edgefield, S. C.; she is a member of the Lutheran church, her husband being a Baptist. Of the nine children which have blessed their marriage four are now living: Amanda F., wife of James Moody; Laura, Ella and William.
